FABER

FABER, GEORGE STANLEY, B.D., was born at Calverley in Yorkshire, 25th Oct. 1773, and died at Sherborn 27th Jan. 1854. He was educated at Oxford, where he was elected a fellow and tutor of Lincoln College before he had completed his 21st year. He was successively vicar of Stockton-on-Tees, vicar of Redmarshall, rector of Long Newton, and master of Sherborn Hospital. He held also a prebendial stall in Salisbury Cathedral. His writings are very numerous; and are all marked by copious learning, exact and close reasoning, and a zeal for established truth, combined with a dangerous love of hypothesis. In Biblical literature his chief works are his Bampton lecture, entitled, Horæ Mosaicæ, a Dissertation on the Credibility and Theology of the Pentateuch, 2 vols. 8vo, Lond. 1800, a new and greatly improved edition of which appeared in 1818; A Treatise on the Genius and Object of the Patriarchal, the Levitical, and the Christian Dispensations, 2 vols. 8vo, Lond. 1823; The Sacred Calendar of Prophecy, 3 vols. 12mo, 1844; Eight Dissertations on certain connected Prophetical passages of H. S., bearing on the promise of a mighty Deliverer, 2 vols. 8vo, 1845.—W. L. A.

FABER, JOHANN ERNST, was born at Simmershausen in the year 1746, and studied at Coburg and Göttingen. He was professor of Oriental languages at Kiel, and from the year 1772 at Jena, where he died, April 14th, 1774. The following are the most important of his Biblical writings:—Descriptio Commentarii in LXX. interpretes, pars i., Götting. 1768, 4to; pars ii., Götting. 1769; Disp. de animalibus quorum fit mentio Zeph. ii. 14, 1769; Historia Mannæ inter Hebræos, pars i., Kilon, 1770; pars ii. Jenæ, 1773; Novum de Messia exactis CCCCXC. annis post exitum Judæorum Babylonicum nascituro ex Zach. iii. 8, 9, 10, repetitum vaticinium, spatio LXX., hebdomadum Dan. ix. 24, Kilon, 1771, 4to; Jesus ex natalium opportunitate Messias, Jenæ, 1772, 8vo; Archæologie der Hebræer, 1 th., Halle, 1773, 8vo.—S. N.

FABER, JOHANN MELCHIOR, was born Jan. 18, 1743, at Simmershausen, in the neighbourhood of Hildburghausen, and was probably the brother or cousin of J. E. Faber. In 1768 was appointed professor of the Hebrew and Greek languages at Thorn, West Prussia; in 1770 he became professor of Greek and Rhetoric at Coburg; and in 1774 rector of the gymnasium at Ansbach. He died Jan. 31, 1809. The larger part of his writings were published in the form of programmes, issued in accordance with the duties of his office as professor or rector. The most important of these in relation to Biblical literature are his Programmata sex super libro Sapientiæ, Onold. (Ansbach), 1776-77, 4to, and of which he afterwards published a second part, in four sections, in the years 1786-1789. His other Biblical programmes were—In 2 Reg. xxiii. 4-7, Thorun, 1769; In loca quedam Habacuci Prophetæ, Onold. 1779; In Malachiam Prophetam, 1779; Harmonia Maccabæorum, sec. i. 1794; sec. ii. 1797.—S. FABLE. [PARABLE.]

FABRICIUS, JOHN ALBERT, a very learned scholar and bibliographer, was born at Leipzig, 11th November 1668. In 1684 he was sent to the gymnasium at Quedlinburg to study under Samuel Schmid, and complete his preparatory academical studies. Returning to Leipzig in 1686, he was made bachelor in philosophy. In 1688 he became a member of the philosophical faculty. In 1694 he went to Hamburg to see some of his relatives, and while there was received into the house of J. F. Mayer, a celebrated theologian, became his librarian, and was liberally treated. With this patron he repaired to Sweden in 1696. In 1699 he received the chair of eloquence and practical philosophy at Hamburg. In 1708 he became rector of the Johanneum in addition to his professorship, but resigned it in 1711. He died at Hamburg, April 30th 1736. His adopted city had reason to be proud of him; for he refused many tempting offers from various universities. Fabricius was a scholar of immense erudition and unwearied industry. He studied and wrote incessantly. Hence his published works are very numerous, amounting to upwards of forty. The most important of them all is the Bibliotheca Græca, sive notitia scriptorum veterum Græcorum, quorumcumque monumenta integra aut fragmenta edita exstant, tum plerorumque e manuscriptis et dependitis, 14 vols. 4to, Hamburg, 1705-1728. A new edition of it was published by Harles, Hamburg, 1790, and following years. The index did not appear till 1838. Fabricius also published Bibliotheca Latina, sive notitia auctorum veterum Latinorum, quorumcumque scripta ad nos pervenerunt, Hamburg, 1697, 8vo. A new edition was published by Ernesti at Leipzig, 1773, 3 vols. 8vo. Other works are Bibliographia Antiquaria sive introductio in notitiam scriptorum qui antiquitates hebræicas, græcas, romanas, et christianas scriptis illustrarunt, 1713, 4to, second edition, 1716. Codex Pseudepigraphus veteris Testamenti collectus, castigatus, testimoniisque, censuris et animadversionibus illustratus, 1713, 8vo. Codex apocryphus Novi Testamenti collectus, castigatus, testimoniisque, censuris et animadversionibus illustratus, 1703, 8vo, 2 vols.; 1719, 3 vols. 8vo. Bibliotheca ecclesiastica, etc., Hamburg, 1718, folio. He also edited the works of Hippolytus (1716, 1718, 2 vols. folio) and Philastrius (1721). See H. S. Reimarus, De Vita et scriptis Joannis Alberti Fabricii commentarius, 1737, 8vo, Hamburg.—S. D.

FABRICY, GABRIEL, a Dominican father and celebrated bibliographer, was born near Aix in Provence, about 1725. Having gone to Rome about 1760, on account of his being elevated to the rank of a provincial, he was appointed reader in theology; and was subsequently elected one of the theological doctors of the famous library of Casanata. From that time he was chiefly employed in making, along with Audifredi, the magnificent catalogue of that library, of which only four volumes were published. He died, A.D. 1800, at Rome. The only work of his which concerns us here, is Des titres primitifs de la revelation, ou considerations critiques sur la pureté et l'intégrité du texte original des livres saints de l'ancien Testament, 2 vols. 8vo, Rome, 1772. This is an important and useful book on the text of the O. T.—S. D.

FACE, in Scripture, is often used to denote presence in the general sense, and, when applied to the Almighty, denotes such a complete manifestation of the divine presence, by sound or sight, as was equivalent, in the vividness of the impression, to the seeing of a fellow-creature 'face to face.' The 'face of God' therefore denotes in Scripture any thing or manner by which God is wont to manifest himself to man. Thus, when it is said that Adam and Eve hid themselves from 'the face of Jehovah,' we understand that they hid themselves from his presence, however manifested; for פָּנִים penim, not only signifies presence, as well as (literally) face, but it is the very word for presence, however manifested. There is no other word to denote presence in the Hebrew language. Whenever 'presence' occurs in our translation, the word in the original is the same which is rendered 'face' in other places. This is very proper; and the respective terms 'face' and 'presence' are usually applied in the A. V. with much propriety and discretion; the latter term being employed wherever the effect of the word 'face' might have seemed harsh or unseemly.

It was a very ancient and common opinion that our mortal frame could not survive the more sensible manifestations of the divine presence, or 'see God face to face and live' (Gen. xxxii. 30). Hence, in this passage, the gratitude and astonishment of Jacob, that he still lived after God had manifested himself to him more sensibly than by dreams and visions. This impression was confirmed to Moses, who was told, 'Thou canst not see my face: no man can see my face and live' (Exod. xxxiii. 20); which clearly signifies that no one can in this present state of being endure the view of that glory which belongs to Him. The ancient heathen entertained the same notion, which is remarkably expressed in the celebrated mythological story of Semele, who, having prevailed on the reluctant Jove to appear to her in his heavenly splen-dour, was struck dead by the lightnings of his presence (1 Cor. xiii. 12; 1 John iii. 2; Rev. xxii. 4).

It is to be borne in mind that God is usually represented to us in Scripture under a human form; and it is indeed difficult for even more spiritualized minds than those of the Hebrews to conceive of Him apart from the form and attributes of the highest nature actually known to us. The Scripture sanctions this concession to the weakness of our intellect, and hence arise the anthropomorphic phrases which speak of the face, the eyes, the arm of God. The appearances of the angels in the O. T. times were generally in the human form (Judg. xiii. 6, etc.); and from this cause alone it would have been natural, in the imagination, to transfer the form of the messengers to Him by whom they were sent [ANTHROPOMORPHISM].—J. FAIR HAVENS (Καλοὶ Λιμένες), a port on the southern side of the island of Crete. Its exact position was for a long period a matter of doubt; but recent researches have identified it beyond the possibility of question, and have also contributed to throw much light on a portion of the Apostle Paul's perilous voyage. From Myra on the southern coast of Asia Minor, where the Apostle embarked 'in a ship of Alexandria sailing into Italy,' the true course would have been due west, passing close by Rhodes. The wind, however, which generally blows in that region during the autumn from the west or north-west, was unfavourable, and they were compelled to steer north as far as Cnidus. There, also, the wind was contrary, and did not permit them to go on their right course, μὴ προσεὼντος ἡμᾶς τοῦ ἀνέμου (Acts xxvii. 7). They were therefore forced to turn southward, and after rounding Cape Salmone, the most easterly point of Crete, to pursue the voyage along the lee of that island (Conybeare and Howson's Life of St. Paul, ii. 326). Owing to the direction and force of the gale, it was with much difficulty they made Salmone—μόλις τε παραλεγόμενοι αὐτὴν (ver. 8). The southern coast of Crete runs west by south for about half its length, as far as Cape Matala. So far the ship would be in a great measure sheltered from the fury of the north-west wind; but at Cape Matala 'the coast bends suddenly to the north,' and the ship could not pass that point so long as the wind continued west or north-west (Smith's Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, 2d ed. p. 75).

About four miles east of Matala is a good roadstead, still called, as it was in the days of Luke, Καλοὶ Λιμένες. The name is appropriate. It is shut in on the west by a bold headland, on whose summit are the ruins of an ancient convent dedicated to St. Paul. On the south it is sheltered by two little islands; and between these and the shore is safe anchorage. The roadstead, however, is open to the east; and we can thus see the truth of Luke's statement, that it was 'incommodious (ἀνευθέρου) to winter in' (See Smith, pp. 80, and 256). This circumstance appears to have determined the master of the ship, contrary to the advice of Paul, to leave Fair Havens, and taking advantage of a southern breeze, to try and reach the harbour of Phenice, near the western end of the island. When they had rounded Matala, they were again caught by a north-westerly gale (Εὐροκλύδων), and the result is well known (Acts xxvii. 9-16).

Luke is the only ancient writer who mentions

Καλὸι Λιμένες. Early commentators generally supposed that it was identical with the Καλὴ Ἀκτὴ of Stephen of Byzantium (See Kuinoeli Comm. in loc.) The latter, however, lay on the western coast of Crete, and it was a town as well as a harbour (Smith, p. 80). At Fair Havens there was no town, for Luke describes it as ὁ ἐγγὺς τῇ πόλει Λασηαία. The ruins of Lasea were discovered a few years ago, about five miles east of Fair Havens, and thus the chain of evidence was completed (LASEA).

Fair Havens is incidentally mentioned by Raewolf, who touched at this port in his voyage to Palestine in the 16th century. He calls it Calisene (Reiss in die Morgenländer.) Pococke is the first who identifies and describes it. He says, 'it is a small bay about two leagues east of Matala, which is now called by the Greeks the Good or Fair Havens (Λιμένες καλοὺς);' and he adds, 'they have a tradition that St. Paul sailed from that place' (Description of the East, vol. ii. pt. i. p. 250). A good sketch of Fair Havens was taken by Signor Schranz, the artist who accompanied Mr. Pashley in his tour through Crete. It is copied in Smith's excellent work (p. 81), and also in Conybeare and Howson's Life of St. Paul (1st ed. ii. 329). To both these works the student is recommended for fuller details; and in them he will find charts of the roadstead, and of the whole southern coast of Crete.—J. L. P.

FAIRS. This is the rendering in the A. V. of the Hebrew עִוְבוֹנִים in Ez. xxvii. 12, 14, 16, 19, 22, 27. In ver. 33 of the same chapter it is rendered 'wares,' and this is held by Fürst, Hitzig, and others, to be the proper rendering of the word throughout. The LXX., however, give εγορα, and the Vulg. nundina and forum as the equivalent; and this Gesenius considers to be the primary sense of the term, from עָוַן, to let go for a price, to sell. It is impossible, however, to carry this meaning through the chapter; and hence, in order to suit verses 27 and 33, Gesenius (arbitrarily) gives the second meaning, gains, profits. This throws doubt on his explanation of the word; and this is strengthened by the consideration that the phrase עִוְבוֹנִים נָתַן cannot without violence be rendered to expose in the market for sale. On the other hand, the meaning 'wares' can as little be carried through the chapter; for to translate עִוְבוֹנִים נָתַן to pay for wares, is very arbitrary. The only interpretation which can be carried through the chapter is that suggested by Gousset (Commentarii Ling. Heb. p. 594), and adopted by Hävernick (Comment. üb. Ezech. p. 464), viz., exchanges or equivalent, 'id quod alicui relinquis pro alia re tibi ab ipso tradita in contractu permutationis.' = goods given in barter. The construction differs throughout this section. We have עִוְבוֹנִים נָתַן, ver.

12, בָּנָפָן נָתַן בָּעֵד, ver. 16, and בָּעֵד נָתַן בָּרָחַל, ver. 19. The first simply expresses the fact that they gave an equivalent; the second expresses the equivalent they gave, viz., precious stones, etc.; the third indicates that they reckoned for an equivalent with iron, etc. This last construction is peculiar. In ver. 15 for the expression we have been considering we have הָשִׁיב אֶשְׁכֶּר, which signifies to return or render a price; and the expression נָתַן מַעֲרָב also occurs in this section (Hitzig, Comment. in loc.)—W. FAMINE (רָעָב). Considering the early period in the history of the world to which the Biblical records, especially the oldest of them, refer; and considering also how small a proportion to the world at large, or even to the inhabited part of it, the population bore in the primitive ages, we should not antecedently expect to find frequent mention of famines. Yet does it appear, from the testimony of these records, that mankind suffered greatly from dearth of food in the earliest periods of which we have any account; and the Scriptural history in this, as in other particulars, will be found interesting and valuable to the economist and philosopher, as well as to the divine. In truth famine appears to depend, not on the extent of cultivable or of cultivated land, nor on the proportion which such land bears to the actual population—though, doubtless, both these elements enter into the influences which determine the question of abundance or scarcity—but rather on human forethought and thrift so applied, as, in the actual circumstances, whatever they are, to make a suitable provision in all cases against such contingencies as may occasion dearth. In the almost entire absence of this forethought, barbarous and half-civilized nations have been found, scanty though the population may be in relation to the tracts of land over which they roam, to be most frequently on the verge of destitution, and not seldom to suffer the greatest privations from dearth and famine. Vain is the almost unlimited opportunity which Nature spreads around them for the supply of their animal necessities, since they want either the intelligence and skill which are necessary to turn these opportunities to account, or the moral qualities which would spare something from actual abundance in order to provide against coming wants.

Since the Bible gives its unquestionable evidence to shew that dearth was by no means an unfrequent or an inconsiderable evil in the early ages, it supplies a very cogent proof, in answer to those who maintain either that the world is worse or no better than it was in ancient times, that at least in those moral qualities on which man's physical well-being depends, mankind have made unquestionable advances. Indeed, if any large portion of the earth now suffer from famine, the cause may be looked for not so much in the want of forethought and savingness as in the operation of passions and prejudices arising from misconceived self-interest, which prevent the free interchange of the bounties of divine Providence,—passions and prejudices which characterize not mankind at large, but only certain small portions of society, and which, in consequence, how powerful soever they may for a time be, have not the vitality of vices of character that belong to a semi-barbarous age, and must, in a day like the present, soon disappear before the generous and dissolving ardour of enlightened Christian love.

The first mention of a famine which occurs in Scripture is in Gen. xii. 10, where we read that so early as the days of the patriarch Abraham 'there was a famine in the land,' which is described as so grievous as to compel the father of the faithful to quit Canaan. The country to which he resorted was, as we might expect, the land of Egypt, the early and lasting fertility of which is a well-known historical fact. In Gen. xxvi. 1, this famine is designated as 'the first,' that is, the first known, or of which there was any record. The same passage informs us of another famine, which afflicted 'the land' in the days of Isaac, who seems to have contemplated a descent into Egypt; but who, being instructed of God, removed to a part of Arabia Petrea (Gen. xxvi. 17) named Gerar, a city of the Philistines, whose monarch's name was Abimelech.

Even Egypt, however, was not exempt from the desolations of famine (Gen. xli. 30). The ordinary cause of dearth in Egypt is connected with the annual overflow of the Nile. If the rise of the waters is in any year below a certain standard, the country affords scanty supplies of food, and may for the greater part remain a desert. But more than local causes must have been in operation in the case before us; for we are told that 'the famine was sore in all lands,' that 'the famine was over all the face of the earth.' By the foresight and wisdom of Joseph, however, provision against the evil had been made in Egypt, while other countries were left to suffer the unmitigated consequences of their neglect. The provision made by Joseph must have been of a most abundant nature, since the period during which the dearth lasted was no less than seven years, and the people of other parts sought and received supplies in Egypt—'all countries came into Egypt to buy corn.' Among other lands, Canaan suffered from the famine; and which was the immediate occasion of Jacob's sending his sons down into Egypt, of the discovery which they made of their lost brother, and of the settlement in that land of the descendants of Abraham: an event of the highest consequence in the sequel, and serving to illustrate the benignity and wisdom of divine Providence in the evils with which, under its influence, the world is afflicted.

This famine was made by Joseph the occasion of one of the greatest social revolutions which history records. The details may be found in the book of Genesis; and it is enough to say here that, as the special administrator of the affairs of the country, Joseph got into his hands all the property of the kingdom, including the land (excepting that which belonged to the priests), and gave the same back to the people as tenants at will, on condition of their paying to the king 'the fifth,' probably of the annual produce.

From these statements it appears that three successive generations were in these early days visited by famine. The Scriptural narrative (the details of which may be easily ascertained by the help of a Concordance) shews that in after ages famines were, in ancient times, more frequent than they are now; and this justifies the use which is made of so terrible a scourge by the sacred writers, and especially the prophets and our Lord himself, in the highly figurative language which they employ in their righteous endeavours to turn wicked men and wicked nations from the evil of their ways (Ezek. vi. 11; Matt. xxiv. 7). In Amos viii. 11, sq., a heavier woe than even the want of bread is appropriately spoken of under the appellation of a famine; 'Behold, the days come, saith the Lord God, that I will send a famine in the land; not a famine of bread nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the word of the Lord; and they shall wander from sea to sea, and from the north even to the east, they shall run to and fro to seek the word of the Lord, and shall not find it: in that day shall the fair virgins and the young men faint for thirst.' The ensuing verse shews that idolatry was the moving cause of this heavy punishment.—J. R. B.

FARISSOL or FARIZOL (פריסול), ABRAHAM b. MORDECAI, a distinguished geographer, polemic, and commentator, was born at Avignon, in Italy, about 1451. He left his native place about 1470, went to Mantua, and thence to Ferrara, where he became minister of the Jewish community, which office he held till 1520. Whilst ministering to the spiritual wants of the synagogue, Farissol most diligently employed his time in the elucidation of the Hebrew Scriptures, and as the result of his labours, in 1500, finished a commentary on the Pentateuch, entitled, פרחי שושנים, the flower of lilies. This was followed by his great apologetic and polemic work called כנף אברהם, the shield of Abraham, consisting of three parts, the first of which is occupied with an apology for Judaism, the second is directed against Mohammedanism, and the third against Christianity. Shortly after this (circa 1516) he published an excellent commentary on Job (פירוש על איוב), and in the autumn of 1524 he gave to the world his famous cosmography, called אגרת אורחות עולם, Itinera Mundi, in which he describes the abodes of his independent brethren, the ten tribes, the Sambation [ELDAD], and the garden of Eden, which he places in the mountains of Nubia (comp. chaps. xviii. and xxx.) Twelve months after the appearance of this marvellous production, Farissol finished a commentary on the book of Ecclesiastes (פירוש ספר קהלת), and died about the end of 1526. Of his exegetical works the commentary on Job only is printed in the Rabbinic Bible, published at Venice, 1518, and in the famous Rabbinic Bible, edited by Frankfurter, 4 vols. fol., Amsterdam, 1724-1727. His cosmography, which is interspersed with curious matter well worthy of the attention of the Biblical student, has been published no less than six times. One edition was published in England by Thomas Hyde, the celebrated Oriental scholar, under the title אגרת אורחות עולם, id est Itinera Mundi, Oxonii, 1691, with a Latin translation, and very elaborate and learned notes, which is alike an honour to English Oriental scholarship and typography of the seventeenth century.—C. FARMER, HUGH, a learned dissenting minister, was born near Shrewsbury, 1714, and received the rudiments of his education in Llanegryn, Merionethshire. He was afterwards placed under the care of Dr. Charles Owen, at Warrington, and in 1730, under Dr. Doddridge, at Northampton. Having finished his collegiate course, he became private chaplain to William Coward, Esq., and minister of a congregation in Walthamstow, which increased under his pastoral care from a mere handful to a numerous and influential community. In 1761 he was appointed afternoon preacher at Salter's Hall, and afterwards Tuesday lecturer in the same place. In the following year he relinquished the former of these two offices; eight years subsequently, the latter; and finally, his pastorate. He died, 1787, in the seventy-third year of his age. He was a diligent and laborious student, and acquired vast stores of information on Biblical and other subjects. His works, which deserve and will repay perusal, are characterised by great ability and learning, independent thought, and clearness of style. The principal of them are:—(1.) An Inquiry into the Nature and Design of Christ's Temptation in the Wilderness, 8vo, 1761; designed to prove that the temptation of our Lord was not a real occurrence, but a 'divine vision.' (2.) A Dissertation on the Miracles, designed to shew that they are Arguments of a Divine Interposition, and absolute Proofs of the Mission and Doctrine of a Prophet, 8vo, 1761; in which questions relating to the Magicians of Egypt, the Witch of Endor, etc., are ably discussed, while it is maintained that diabolical agency has never, and can never perform a miracle. (3.) An Essay on the Demoniacs of the New Testament, 8vo, of which a third edition appeared 1818; and in which he maintains that the demoniacs were either epileptic persons or madmen. (4.) The General Prevalence of the worship of Human Spirits in the Ancient Heathen Nations asserted and proved, 8vo, 1783. A clause in his will required that all his MSS. should be burned. Accordingly there perished in the flames, among the rest, a volume on the 'Demonology of the Ancients,' 'A Dissertation on the History of Balaam,' and a second edition of his treatise on 'Miracles.'—I. FARTHING. This word occurs four times in the A. V. of the N. T. Two names of coins are rendered by it.

1. Κοδράντης, quadrans (Matt. v. 26; Mark xii. 42), a coin current in Palestine in the time of our Lord. According to St. Mark, it was equal to two lepta (λεπτά δύο ὃ ἐστὶ κοδράντης, Mark, i. c.) The quadrans was originally the fourth part of the as, or a piece of three ounces, called triuncius, and was marked with three balls to denote its value (Plin. xxxiii. 3, 13). It was already, in the time of Cicero (as recorded by Plutarch in the story of the impiety of Clodius, circa B.C. 62), the smallest Roman brass coin (τὸ λεπτότατον τοῦ χαλκοῦ νομίσματος κυναδράντην ἐκάλουν, Plut. In Cic. xxix. 26), though in the earlier times of the Republic there were the sextans or sixth part of the as, the uncia or twelfth part, and the semiuncia or half-ounce (Cohen. Med. Imp., Introduction, p. xii.) The leptum was the smallest Greek copper coin, and, according to Suidas (s.v. τάλαντον and δόλοβς), was the seventh part of the χαλκοῦς. [MITE.] In the Roman copper coinage current in Palestine at the time of our Lord, the smallest coin seems to have been the as (ἀσσάριον, vid. infra), but there was also another currency, the Græco-Roman or Greek imperial. The κοδράντης and λέπτον may have belonged to the latter. If so, the former would be the quarter of the ἀσσάριον, and the latter the eighth.

2. Ἀσσάριον (Matt. x. 29; Luke xii. 6) the Greek name of the Roman as or assarius. The Vulg. in Matt. x. 29 renders it by as, and the ἀσσάρια δύο in Luke xii. 6 by dipondius. The dipondius or dupondius was equal to two asses. From the fact that the Vulg. substitutes dipondius for two assaria, it is probable that a single coin only is intended by this latter form. This statement is partly corroborated by our finding copper Greek autonomous coins of Chios (viz., coins struck during the Imperial period, though without an Imperial head) having on them the words ACCAPION, ACCAPIA ATO or ΑΤΩ and ACCAPIA ΤΡΙΑ. We also have copper coins of Chios with the words HMTACCAPION (sic) and ΟΒΟΛΟΣ, this latter being properly the name of a Greek silver coin, though it was used at Metapontum in Lucania for a copper coin. From the beauty of the work of this piece it cannot be later than B.C. 300, and the obolus at this period was certainly of silver. It has been suggested that it was struck in a time of extreme public distress, but this is doubtful (Millingen, Num. de l'Ancienne Italie, pp. 25, 26). In later times the obolus of copper seems to have been of common occurrence (ὁδοὶ γὰρ τῶν χαλκῶν, ὁβολῶν, ὡς ὁδοὶ, παρὰ τῶν καταλεόντων ἐκδοσὶν ἐκλέγων, Lucian, Contempl., Didot. ed., p. 133; cf. Vitruvius iii. 1). The HMTACCAPION (sic), half-assarius, was, according to Polybius, the sum given by travellers in Italy for a day's living, and the same writer adds that it was equal to the fourth part of the obolus (ἡμισσαρίον, τοῦτο δ' ἐστὶ τέταρτον μέρος ὁβολοῦ, Polyb. Hist. ii. 15, 6). The assarius would thus be equal to half the obolus. In another passage he states that the daily pay of a foot soldier in his time was two oboli (Polyb. Reliq. vi. 39, 12). At this time the attic drachm and denarius were identical [DRACHM], and a denarius in paying the soldiers was estimated at ten asses (Plin. xxxiii. 3, 13). The obolus being the sixth part of the drachm, two oboli a day would be equal to 3½ asses. In this case the assarius would be equal to rather more than half the obolus. The ratio instead of being 1 to 5 would be 1 to 6, but the discrepancy is so small as to be of no material importance.—F. W. M.

FASTS, consisting both of self-imposed and enjoined, total or partial abstinence from food, have existed among the Jews, as among all other nations, from time immemorial.

1. The import of fasting.—The idea which the Jews attached to fasting was to afflict, weaken, and humble the soul by withholding from it the necessary food in order to aid man, thus brought low, to give himself more entirely to serious devotion, repentance, and communion with God. This is evident from the phrase עָנָה נַפְשִׁי, to afflict or humble the soul, well rendered by the Septuagint, ταπεινῶν τὴν ψυχὴν; being the shorter form of עָנָה בָּצוֹם, to afflict the soul by fasting (Ps. xxxv. 13), used to express fasting on the most solemn and only occasion, i.e., the day of atonement, in which it is commanded in the law of Moses (comp. Lev. xvi. 29, 31; xxiii. 27, 32; Num. xxix. 7).^{*} The expressions צוֹם, fast (2 Sam. xii. 16; 1 Kings xli. 9, 12; 2 Chron. xx. 3; Ezr. viii. 21; Is. lviii. 5, 6, al.); and תַּעֲנִית, fast (Ezr. ix. 5), wrongly translated heaviness in the A.V., are still shorter forms of this phrase. This idea of fasting is also seen in the case of Moses himself, where it is evident that his total abstinence from food for forty days was intended as a spiritual discipline to wean him from earth and fit him for his more immediate communion with God (Exod. xxxiv. 28), and from the remark that 'the nobles of Israel,' who had no such intimate communion with God, saw Him without fasting (ibid. xxiv. 11).

2. Fasts from the giving of the Law to the Babylonish captivity.—Though, as has already been remarked, the day of atonement was the only fast enjoined in the law of Moses, yet it was not the only occasion when the pious Israelites endeavoured to crucify the flesh and the lusts thereof by total or partial abstinence from food. From the enactments in Num. xxx. 2-16, we see that husbands and wives, and parents and children of both sexes, not unfrequently voluntarily took upon themselves vows to abstain from food as an act of humiliation in the sight of God, believing to conciliate thereby the favour of heaven. Occasions for fasting rapidly increased with the course of events. Monarchs regarded impending calamities, and the defeat which their armies sustained, as punishments from heaven for some national sin, and proclaimed a national fast (Judg. xx. 26; 1 Sam. vii. 6; 1 Kings xxi. 2 Chron. xx. 3), and the people beheld in any humiliation to which they were subjected by their enemies, and in every affliction to which flesh and blood are heir, the chastisement of God for some secret transgression, and imposed private fasts upon themselves (1 Sam. i. 7; xx. 34; xxxi. 13; 2 Sam. i. 12; iii. 35; xii. 16; 1 Kings xxi. 27). Still up to the time of the Babylonish captivity, the great day of atonement was the only annual fast which the Jews as a nation kept.

3. From the Babylonish captivity to the destruction of the second Temple.—This ascetic mode of piety shews itself more especially in and after the Babylonish captivity. As long as the Temple of the Lord stood upon Mount Moriah, and the altar was blazing with the ever burning fire, the pious Israelites endeavoured to serve God and conciliate His favour by frequent offerings of sacrifices. But when the Temple was destroyed, and the people carried into captivity, the sacrifice of the body and one's own fat and blood was substituted for that of animals. Hence, that touching prayer recorded in the Talmud, which the Jews offered on their fast-days, 'Lord of the Universe! Thou knowest that when the Temple existed, the man that sinned brought a sacrifice, and though only the fat and blood thereof were offered, yet he was forgiven. Now that I fast, and my own fat and blood are consumed, let it please Thee to accept this sacrifice of my fat and blood, as if offered upon Thine altar, and be merciful unto me' (Berachoth 17, a). With such a view of their importance, fasts of all sorts, private, public, and annual, were, as a matter of course, rapidly multiplied. Days on which national calamities occurred, were as eagerly seized as fitting opportunities for creating annual fasts, in order to sacrifice 'the fat and blood of the body,' as the occasions during the time of the Temple to offer animals upon the altar. In the following list, the annual and periodical fasts which originated during this period, and which are observed by the Jews to the present day, are enumerated, and the particulars of those fasts given which are not noticed in separate articles of this Cyclopædia.

I. ANNUAL NATIONAL FASTS.

1. The fast of the fourth month (שבועה עשר בתמוז), which is kept on the 17th of Tamuz, because—1. On this day the Jews made the Golden Calf; 2. Moses broke the tables of the Law, as appears from a comparison of Exod. xxiv. with xxxii.; 3. On it the daily sacrifices ceased for want of cattle, when the city was closely besieged; and 4. On it Jerusalem was stormed by Nebuchadnezzar, comp. Zech. viii. 19; Jer. lii.; Mishna Taanith, iv. 6; St. Jerome on Zech. viii. 19.

2. The fast of the fifth month (חשעה נאח), which is kept on the 9th of Ab, because—1. On this day God decreed that those who left Egypt should not enter the Land of Promise (Num. xiv. 27, etc.); 2. On it the first temple was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, and the second by Titus; 3. On it the city of Bethar was taken by the Emperor Adrian, and 580,000 Jews were massacred; and 4. On it the site of Jerusalem was ploughed up like a field, as predicted by Jer. xxvi. 18, comp. Zech. vii. 3, 4; viii. 19; Mishna Taanith, iv. 6; St. Jerome on Zech. viii. 19; Jost, Geschichte d. Israeliten, iii. p. 240.

3. The fast of the seventh month (צום גדליה), vii. 5; which is kept on the 3d of Tishri, to bewail the murder of Gedaliah at Mizpah, comp. Zech. vii. 5; viii. 19; Jer. xli. 1 ff.; 2 Kings xxv. 25; Seder Olam Rabba, c. xxvi.; Megillath Taanith c. xii.

4. The fast of the tenth month (עשרה בטבת), comp. Zech. viii. 19, which is kept on the 10th of Tebeth, to commemorate the commencement of the siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, which took place on this day; comp. Zech. viii. 19; 2 Kings xxv. 1. These four fasts have been Christianized; and tradition tells us that their transfer into the Christian Church was made by the Roman Bishop Callistus (fl. 223). To deprive them, however, of their Jewish appearance, the whole year was divided into four seasons (quatuor tempora), and a fast was appointed for one week of each season; comp. Herzog, Real-Encyclop., iii. p. 336.

5. The fast of Esther (תענית אסתר), which is kept on the 13th of Adar; comp. Esther iv. 16, 17; ix. 31. [ESTHER, FAST OF.]

II. PERIODICAL AND INDIVIDUAL FASTS.

1. The bi-weekly fast (שני וחמישי), kept every Monday and Thursday between Pesach and Aizereth, and between Succoth and Chanuca, making in all twenty-eight days. On these days of the respective weeks, the first chapter of the section of the Pentateuch forming the lesson for the following Sabbath, is read, when three persons are called to the reading, and a special prayer for mercy (והרחם רחום), composed for these days, is introduced into the daily service (comp. Megilla 31, a; Taanith 12, a; Sopherim xxi. 3; Kol Bo, Hilchoth Taanith, Luke xviii. 12). The cause of these bi-weekly fasts is, as we are told, that Moses went up to Mount Sinai to receive the second tables of the law on a Thursday, having broken the first on account of the golden calf, and came down on a Monday (comp. Baba Kama 82, a, and Rashi on this passage). It is to these frequent fasts that the disciples of John referred when addressing the Saviour (Matt. ix. 14), and it is the abuse of these fasts which the Saviour exposes, ibid. vi. 16. Comp. also Mark ii. 18; Luke v. 33; Acts x. 30. This

4-weekly fasting has also been adopted in the Christian Church; but Monday and Thursday were changed into Wednesday and Friday (feria quarta et sexta), as commemorative of the betrayal and crucifixion of Christ.

2. First-born sons' fast (תענית בכור) on the day preceding the feast of Passover, in commemoration of the fact, that whilst God on that occasion smote all the first-born of the Egyptians, he spared those of the house of Israel; comp. Exod. xii. 29, etc., Sopherim xxi. 3. [FIRST-BORN.]

Passing over many other private fasts which are of a later origin, we come to the mode in which these fasts were observed.

4. The manner in which these fasts were kept.—All these fasts have been and still are kept very rigidly and solemnly. At the annual fasts, during the time of the Temple, public demonstrations of penitence and grief were made in the streets. Cornets and trumpets were blown in Jerusalem, whilst in other places only one such instrument was employed; the pulpits of the ministers were brought out of the temple and synagogues into the streets (רחובת של עיר), where all the people assembled wrapped in sackcloth, strewing ashes upon their heads. Then one of the people also strewed ashes upon the heads of the president or prince (נשיא) and the judges; another, who was the oldest among them, addressed the assembly in heart-moving terms—'My brethren, remember that it is not written respecting the repentance of the Ninevites that God regarded their outwardly wrapping themselves in sackcloth, and for this cause accepted their fast days, but that He saw their acts, and that they had turned from their evil ways' (Jonah iii. 10). Moreover, the teaching of the prophets also, is, 'Rend your hearts, and not your garments' (Joel ii. 13); whereupon another of the elders of the congregation, who had a pious and well-regulated family, stood up with all the people and prayed, introducing into the regular daily service the penitential Psalms (viz., cxx., cxxi., cxxx., and ciii.) All the prayers and benedictions used on these occasions are most appropriate and touching. In Jerusalem, where these solemn services were held, at the east gate, the whole congregation called out to the priests, after each benediction pronounced by the minister, 'Sound the loud trumpet.' This took place seven times. At the close of the service the people in every place went to the cemeteries, where they continued their lamentations and prayers. The whole of the service, with the exception of the few modifications which have been made in consequence of the altered circumstances of the nation, is used to the present day; and the Jews still look anxiously for the rising of the stars, when their fasts terminate, a circumstance to which St. Jerome already refers.

FAT. [FAT.]

FAT was regarded among the Jews, as among all other nations of antiquity, as the richest part of animals, and therefore became synonymous with the first, the best, the prime of anything. Thus the best produce of the land is called 'the fat of the earth' (Gen. xlv. 18), 'the fat of wheat' (Deut. xxxii. 14; Ps. lxxxi. 17; cxlvii. 14); the choicest oil and wine are termed 'the fat of oil, and the fat of wine' (Num. xviii. 12); the first and greatest heroes are denominated 'the fat of the mighty' (Judg. iii. 29; 2 Sam. i. 22; Is. x. 16); and the magnates and most distinguished of the earth are designated 'the fat' (Ps. xxii. 30). Now, as by virtue of its being the best and prime part, fat represents the whole animal; therefore, like the first-born, the first-fruits and the first and best of everything, it belongs to God. It was in accordance with this natural feeling that most of the ancient nations presented the fat to their God. Thus the Egyptians, when sacrificing a pig to the full moon, burnt the tail, spleen, caul, and all the fat about the belly of the animal, and eat the flesh themselves (Herod. ii. 47); the Persians lay a piece of caul of the sacrificed animal upon the fire (Strabo, xv., c. iii. sec. 13); and the Greeks used to cut out the thigh bones of victims, wrap them up in two folds of fat, also lay slices of fat upon them, lay upon the altar, and burn them (comp. Liddell and Scott's Greek-English Lexicon, s. v. μῆλα); and Abel, who brought the first animal sacrifice, not only presented to the Lord 'the firstlings of his flock,' but 'the fat thereof,' which, by virtue of its being the best part, was as much the firstling of the animal itself as the animal was the firstling of the flock.

The parts of the fat or suet of the victims, which belong to God, and are especially to be appropriated to the altar, are given in Exod. xxix. 13-22, and Lev. iii. 3-5, as follows:—1. The fat which covers the entrails (חלב המכסה את הקרב) = εἰς τὸν πλούς, as Josephus rightly has it (Antiq. iii. 9. 2); the omentum, which is only to be found in man and mammals, and is very fat in ruminants (comp. Arist. Hist. Anim. i. 16; Plin. Hist. Nat. xi. 80).

2. The fat which accumulates around entrails (חלב הקרב), and is easily separated therefrom, i.e., the reticular adhering to the colon. 3. The two kidneys, with the fat on them, at the internal muscles of the loins (שתי הכליות ואת והחלב עליון), as the most fat accumulates near the kidneys (Deut. xxxii. 14; Is. xxxiv. 6), and to such an extent in sheep that they sometimes die of it (οἱ νεβροὶ μάστιγα τῶν σπλάγγνων ἔχουσι πιμελήν, Arist. De Part. Anim. iii. 9, and Hist. Anim. iii. 17; Plin. Hist. Nat. xi. 81); and 4. The Yotzer, which is taken by the Sept. and Josephus (Antiq. iii. 9. 2) to mean δ λοβὸς τοῦ ἥπατος, the greater lobe of the liver, similarly the Syriac and Chaldee חצרא רעל בכורא; and is explained by Talmud (Chulin. xlix. 6), Rashi, Kimchi, Solomon b. Melech, etc., טרפשא = τράψα, whereby the Greeks, according to Hippocrates, understood the greater and thickest of the five λοβοὶ τοῦ ἥπατος, and which is also called δ λοβὸς τοῦ ἥπατος (Bähr Symb. ii. p. 354). This meaning of Yotzer is ably defended by Bochart (Hieroz. lib. ii. c. xlv.), and followed by Le Clerc, J. D. Rosenmüller, Kalisch (on Exod. xxix. 13), and others. But the Vulgate, Luther, Tyndal, the Bishops' Bible, the Geneva Bible, the A. V., Piscator, De Wette, Knobel, Fürst, etc., take it to denote omentum minus, which is preferable, for the lobes have no accumulation of fat. And 5. The tail of a sheep (חֲלֵב), which, in certain species (ovis laticaudata), contains a great quantity of fat [SHEEP]. It is for this reason that the eating of fat is forbidden (Lev. iii. 17). The opinion of Maimonides, that it is prohibited because it is unwholesome (More Nebochim, part iii. c. xlvi.) is most appositely met by Bahr's striking question (Symb. ii. 382): Soll Jehovah bekommen, was der Mensch nicht brauchen kann, womit er sich den Magen verderbt? Still more preposterous is the opinion that the fat that covereth the inwards, which was consumed in the fire, 'signified the taking away of our corruption by the Spirit of Christ' (Ainsworth); or that it 'denoted Christ, the fattened calf, whose sacrifice is the best and most excellent' (Gill); that 'the kidneys' denote 'the seat of lust, and were likewise burned to teach mortification of our members which are on earth' (Ainsworth); or that 'they signify the burning zeal and flaming love and affections of Christ for his people, which instructed him, and put him upon offering himself a sacrifice of peace-offering for them' (Gill).

It remains to be added that the Jews, regarding the prohibition in Lev. iii. 17 as absolute, to this day abstain from eating some parts of the suet, and the Rabbinic rule for distinguishing between the lawful and prohibited fat is חֲלֵב טָהוֹר כֹּתוּם טָמֵא אֵינוֹ כֹּתוּם that the former is easily detached from the flesh, and comes under the category of חֲלֵב, whilst the latter is intermixed with the lean, and is designated שֶׁמֶן. The tail of the sheep (חֲלֵב) is a matter of dispute. The Rabbinic Jews maintain that the prohibition of it is restricted to sacrifices, whilst the Karaite Jews regard the eating of the tail as absolutely forbidden.

FATHER. This word, besides its obvious and primary sense, bears, in Scripture, a number of other applications, most of which have, through the use of the Bible, become more or less common in all Christian countries.

1. The term Father is very often applied to God himself (Exod. iv. 22; Deut. xxxii. 6; 2 Sam. vii. 14; Ps. lxxxix. 27, 28; Is. lxiii. 16; lxiv. 8). It is strongly contended by Dr. Lee that it is only applied to God as having adopted the chosen people as his children; and he denies, with some harshness, that it is applied to him in the general sense as the Creator, and thence the Father of all mankind (Lex. s. v. 28). Nevertheless, he admits that man's creation is occasionally mentioned in connection with this use of the word; and this, coupled with the clearer intimations of the N. T., leaves little room to question that it is the intention of the sacred record to set God before us as the Father of all men, in the general sense of creator and preserver of all men, but more especially of believers, whether Jews or Christians. Indeed the analogy of language would point to this, seeing that in the O. T., and in all the Syro-Arabian dialects, the originator of anything is constantly called its father. To the same effect is also a passage in Josephus's paraphrase of the law (Deut. xxi. 18-21), respecting rebellious sons, kai autōs (Θεός) πατήρ τοῦ πατρὸς ἀνθρώπων γένους, 'because he (God) is himself the father of the whole human race' (Antiq. iv. 8. 24).

Without doubt, however, God is in a more especial and intimate manner, even as by covenant, the Father of the Jews (Jer. xxxi. 9; Is. lxiii. 16; lxiv. 8; John viii. 41; v. 45; 2 Cor. vi. 18); and also of Christians, or rather of all pious and believing persons, who are called 'sons of God' (John i. 12; Rom. viii. 16, etc.) Thus Jesus, in speaking to his disciples, calls God their Father (Matt. vi. 4, 8, 15, 18; x. 20, 29; xiii. 43, etc.) The Apostles, also, for themselves and other Christians, call him 'Father' (Rom. i. 7; 1 Cor. i. 3; 2 Cor. i. 2; Gal. i. 4; and many other places).

2. Father is applied to any ancestor near or remote, or to ancestors ('fathers') in general. The progenitor, or founder, or patriarch of a tribe or nation, was also pre-eminently its father, as Abraham of the Jews. Examples of this abound. See, for instance, Deut. i. 11; 1 Kings viii. 21; Matt. iii. 9; xxiii. 30; Mark xi. 10; Luke i. 32, 73; vi. 23, 26; John vii. 22, etc.

3. Father is also applied as a title of respect to any head, chief, ruler, or elder, and especially to kings, prophets, and priests (Judg. xvii. 10; xviii. 19; 1 Sam. x. 12; 2 Kings ii. 12; v. 13; vi. 21; xiii. 14; Prov. iv. 1; Matt. xxiii. 9; Acts vii. 2; xxii. 1; 1 Cor. iv. 15, etc.)

4. The author, source, or beginner of anything is also called the Father of the same, or of those who follow him. Thus Jabel is called 'the father of those who dwell in tents, and have cattle;' and Jubal, 'the father of all such as handle the harp and the organ' (Gen. iv. 20, 21; comp. Job xxxviii. 28; John viii. 44; Rom. iv. 12). This use of the word is exceedingly common in the East to this day, especially as applied in the formation of proper names, in which, also, the most curious Hebrew examples of this usage occur [AB].

The authority of a father was very great in patriarchal times; and although the power of life and death was virtually taken from the parent by the law of Moses, which required him to bring his cause of complaint to the public tribunals (Deut. xxi. 18-21), all the more real powers of the paternal character were not only left unimpaired, but were made in a great degree the basis of the judicial polity which that law established. The children and even the grandchildren continued under the roof of the father and grandfather; they laboured on his account, and were the most submissive of his servants. The property of the soil, the power of judgment, the civil rights, belonged to him only, and his sons were merely his instruments and assistants. If a family be compared to a body, then the father was the head, and the sons the members, moving at his will and in his service. There were exceptions, doubtless; but this was the rule, and, with some modifications, it is still the rule throughout the East.

Filial duty and obedience were, indeed, in the eyes of the Jewish legislator, of such high importance that great care was taken that the paternal authority should not be weakened by the withdrawal of a power so liable to fatal and barbarous abuse as that of capital punishment. Any outrage against a parent—a blow, a curse, or incorrigible profligacy—was made a capital crime (Exod. xxi. 15, 17; Lev. xx. 9). If the offence was public it was taken up by the witnesses as a crime against Jehovah, and the culprit was brought before the magistrates, whether the parent consented or not; and if the offence was hidden within the paternal walls, it devolved on the parents to denounce him and to require his punishment.

It is a beautiful circumstance in the law of Moses that this filial respect is exacted for the mother as well as for the father. The threats and promises of the legislator distinguish not the one from the other; and the fifth commandment associates the father and mother in a precisely equal claim to honour from their children. The development of this interesting feature of the Mosaic law belongs, however, to another head [WOMAN]. See Cellerier, Esprit de la Législation Mosaïque, ii. 69, 122-129.

FEASTS. [HOSPITALITY; BANQUETS.]

FEASTS, RELIGIOUS. [AGAPE; FESTIVALS.]

FELIX (Φῆλιξ), a Roman procurator of Judæa, before whom Paul so 'reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come,' that the judge trembled, saying, 'Go thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season I will call for thee' (Acts xxiv. 25). The context states that Felix had expected a bribe from Paul; and, in order to procure this bribe, he appears to have had several interviews with the apostle. The depravity which such an expectation implies is in agreement with the idea which the historical fragments preserved respecting Felix would lead the student to form of the man.

The year in which Felix entered on his office cannot be strictly determined. From the words of Josephus (Antiq. xx. 7. 1), it appears that his appointment took place before the twelfth year of the Emperor Claudius. Eusebius fixes the time of his actually undertaking his duties in the eleventh year of that monarch.

Felix was a remarkable instance of the elevation to distinguished station of persons born and bred in the lowest condition. Originally a slave, he rose to little less than kingly power. For some unknown, but probably not very creditable services, he was manumitted by Claudius Cæsar (Sueton. Claud. 28; Tacit. Hist. v. 9); on which account he is said to have taken the prenomen of Claudius. In Tacitus, however (loc. cit.), he is surnamed Antonius, probably because he was also a freedman of Antonia, the emperor's mother. He was a brother of Pallas, who had also been set free by Antonia, and had great influence with Claudius; speaking of whom, in conjunction with another freedman, namely, Narcissus, the imperial private secretary, Suetonius (Claud. 28) says, that the emperor was eager in heaping upon them the highest honours that a subject could enjoy, and suffered them to carry on a system of plunder and gain to such an extent, that, on complaining of the poverty of his exchequer, some one had the boldness to remark that he would abound in wealth if he were taken into partnership by his two favourite freedmen.

The character which the ancients have left of Felix is of a very dark complexion. Suetonius speaks of the military honours which the emperor loaded him with, and specifies his appointment as governor of the province of Judæa (Claud. 28); adding an innuendo, which loses nothing by its brevity, namely, that he was the husband of three queens or royal ladies (trium reginarum maritum). Tacitus, in his History (v. 9), declares that, during his governorship in Judæa, he indulged in all kinds of cruelty and lust, exercising regal power with the disposition of a slave; and, in his Annals (xii. 54), he represents Felix as considering himself licensed to commit any crime, relying on the influence which he possessed at court. The country was ready for rebellion, and the unsuitable remedies which Felix applied served only to inflame the passions and to incite to crime. The contempt which he and Cumanus (who, according to Tacitus, governed Galilee while Felix ruled Samaria; but see Joseph. Antiq. xx. 7. 1) excited in the minds of the people, encouraged them to give free scope to the passions which arose from the old enmity between the Jews and Samaritans, while the two wily and base procurators were enriched by booty as if it had been spoils of war. This so far was a pleasant game to these men, but in the prosecution of it Roman soldiers lost their life, and, but for the intervention of Quadratus, governor of Syria, a rebellion would have been inevitable. A court-martial was held to inquire into the causes of this disaffection, when Felix, one of the accused, was seen by the injured Jews among the judges, and even seated on the judgment-seat, placed there by the president, Quadratus, expressly to outface and deter the accusers and witnesses. Josephus (Antiq. xx. 8. 5) reports that under Felix the affairs of the country grew worse and worse. The land was filled with robbers and impostors who deluded the multitude. Felix used his power to repress these disorders to little purpose, since his own example gave no sanction to justice. Thus, having got one Dineas, leader of a band of assassins, into his hands, by a promise of impunity, he sent him to Rome to receive his punishment. Having a grudge against Jonathan, the high-priest, who had expostulated with him on his misrule, he made use of Doras, an intimate friend of Jonathan, in order to get him assassinated by a gang of villains, who joined the crowds that were going up to the temple worship,—a crime which led subsequently to countless evils, by the encouragement which it gave to the Sicarii, or leagued assassins of the day, to whose excesses Josephus ascribes, under Providence, the overthrow of the Jewish state. Among other crimes, some of these villains misled the people under the promise of performing miracles, and were punished by Felix. An Egyptian impostor, who escaped himself, was the occasion of the loss of life to four hundred followers, and of the loss of liberty to two hundred more, thus severely dealt with by Felix (Joseph. Antiq. xx. 8. 6; De Bell. Jud. ii. 13. 5; comp. Acts xxi. 38). A serious misunderstanding having arisen between the Jewish and the Syrian inhabitants of Cæsarea, Felix employed his troops, and slew and plundered till prevailed on to desist. His cruelty in this affair brought on him, after he was superseded by Festus, an accusation at Rome, which, however, he was enabled to render nugatory by the influence which his brother Pallas had, and exercised to the utmost with the emperor Nero. Josephus, in his Life (sec. iii.), reports that 'at the time when Felix was procurator of Judæa there were certain priests of my acquaintance, and very excellent persons they were, whom, on a small and trifling occasion, he had put into bonds and sent to Rome to plead their cause before Cæsar.'

While in his office, being inflamed by a passion for the beautiful Drusilla, a daughter of King Herod Agrippa, who was married to Azizus, king of Emesa, he employed one Simon, a magician, to use his arts in order to persuade her to forsake her husband and marry him, promising that if she would comply with his suit he would make her a happy woman. Drusilla, partly impelled by a desire to avoid the envy of her sister, Bernice, was prevailed on to transgress the laws of her forefathers, and consented to a union with Felix. In this marriage a son was born, who was named Agrippa: both mother and son perished in an eruption of Mount Vesuvius, which took place in the days of Titus Cæsar (Joseph. Antiq. xx. 7. 2). With this adulteress was Felix seated when Paul reasoned before the judge, as already stated (Acts xxiv. 24). Another Drusilla is mentioned by Tacitus as being the wife (the first wife) of Felix. This woman was niece of Cleopatra and Antony. By this marriage Felix was connected with Claudius. Of his third wife nothing is known.

Paul, being apprehended in Jerusalem, was sent by a letter from Claudius Lysias to Felix at Cæsarea, where he was at first confined in Herod's judgment-hall till his accusers came. They arrived. Tertullus appeared as their spokesman, and had the audacity, in order to conciliate the good-will of Felix, to express gratitude on the part of the Jews, 'seeing that by thee we enjoy great quietness, and that very worthy deeds are done unto this nation by thy providence' (Acts xxiii., xxiv.) Paul pleaded his cause in a worthy speech; and Felix, consigning the Apostle to the custody of a centurion, ordered that he should have such liberty as the circumstances admitted, with permission that his acquaintance might see him and minister to his wants. This imprisonment the Apostle suffered for a period of two years, being left bound when Felix gave place to Festus, as that unjust judge 'was willing,' not to do what was right, but 'to shew the Jews a pleasure' (C. W. F. Walch, Diss. de Felice Jud. procur., Jen. 1747). - J. R. B.

FELL, JOHN, was the son of Dr. Samuel Fell, Dean of Christ Church, Oxford, and was born at Longworth, in Berkshire, in 1625. He was removed at the early age of eleven from Thame school to a studentship of Christ Church, where, while his father was Dean, he took his degrees of B.A. in 1640, and of M.A. in 1643. Like his father he was an ardent royalist during the troubles of that time. After the Restoration he was made prebendary of Chichester and canon of Christ's Church in 1660; in the November of the same year he succeeded to the deanery of which his father had been deprived a dozen years before, being then D.D. and chaplain in ordinary to the king. Between 1666-1669 he was Vice-Chancellor of the University, and in 1676 was advanced to the bishopric of Oxford, retaining the deanery in commendam. He was also master of St. Oswald's Hospital, Worcester. He died in 1686. He was extremely munificent and vigorous in every one of his eminent offices. He was also (as Antony à Wood said of him, in Athen. Oxon.) 'a learned divine, and excellently skilled in the Latin and Greek Languages.' We must pass over his miscellaneous works, in biography (such as the life of Dr. H. Hammond, and that of Dr. Richd. Allestree); in logic and philosophy (such as his Institutio Logica, and Alcinoi in Platoniam Philosophiam introductio); and in patristic divinity (such as his edition of St. Clement's two Epistles to the Corinthians, in Greek and Latin, with notes; and of St. Cyprian's works, with notes); and confine our notice to two works of some name—the one in critical, and the other in exegetical divinity. The former had for its title: 'Τῆς καυῆς διαθήκης ἀπαντα—Novi Testamenti libri omnes; accesserunt Parallela Scripturæ loca, necnon variantes lectiones ex plus 100 MSS. codicibus et antiquis versionibus collectæ,' 1675, 8vo. This work, which was an advance in critical editing of the N. T. on every previous publication, was twice reprinted at Leipsic, in 1697, and again in 1702 ('Oxoniensi accuratior ac præfatione Augusti Hermannii Franckii copiosa ac perutili ornata'); it was also reproduced at Oxford in 1703, by John Gregory, in splendid folio. [GREGORY.] This edition is more valuable for the impulse it gave to subsequent investigators than for the richness of its own stores of fresh materials; notwithstanding the statement of its title-page. 'Bishop Fell did not give extracts from the Fathers or cite them as authorities, because he undervalued their authority '[testimony?],' not apprehending how they might, by the union of their evidence with that of MSS. and versions, be of the greatest use, shewing as they often do, what the reading is in whose favour the evidence preponderates. The use of versions, indeed, Fell clearly perceived; yet of those which were available at that time, he only attends to the Gothic and Coptic as revised by Dr. T. Marshall, Rector of Lincoln College; his list of hitherto untouched MSS. is very scanty. To those which Walton had hitherto used in the last vol. of his Polyglot, we can add only R, the Barberini readings, then just published; B, twelve Bodleian codices, 'quorum plerique intacti prius,' in nowise described, and cited only by the number of them which may countenance each variation; U, the two Usher MSS., Evang. 63, 64, as collated by H. Dodwell; three copies from the library of Petavius (P. Act. 38, 39, 40); a fourth from St. Germain's (Ger. Paul. E), the readings of which four were furnished by J. Gachon' (Tregelles, Printed Text, p. 40; and Scrivener, Introduction to the Crit. of N. T., pp. 314, 315). This edition of Bishop Fell, and the encouragement which he gave to the more extensive critical labours of Dr. John Mill, were of great importance in furthering sacred criticism. This latter scholar was liberally assisted by the munificent Bishop, whose intention of defraying the entire cost of Mill's Testament was frustrated by his unexpected death, when the publication had advanced no further than the 24th chap. of St. Matthew. [MILL.] The exegetical work with which the name of Bishop Fell is associated, is entitled: 'A paraphrase and annotations upon all the Epistles of St. Paul.' This work was first printed in 1675. The title-page of the fourth edition of 1708 revealed the names of the contributors and editor, thus: 'A paraphrase, etc. [as above], by Abraham Woodhead, Richd.

Allestrey, and Obadiah Walker. Corrected and improved by the late Right Rev. and learned Dr. John Fell, Bishop of Oxford.' It is doubtful whether Fell had any actual share in the work; yet his influence as editor over the contributors was likely to be very great from his commanding character: he was very fond of short notes, and has imparted his taste to his fellow-labourers in this paraphrase. Nor is their brevity the only recommendation of these 'annotations;' many difficult passages of the holy Apostle have received a careful elucidation at the hands of these competent scholars; and Dr. Doddridge has moreover commended the collection of parallel passages as judicious, and the amended translation as in many instances elucidating the sense of the original. This valuable work was handsomely reprinted in 1852 at the Oxford University Press, under the careful supervision of the present Regius Professor of Divinity, Dr. Jacobson.—P. H.

FELL, JOHN, born at Cockermouth in 1735, died at London in 1797, was for some time pastor of a dissenting congregation at Thaxted in Essex, from which he removed to become teacher of Greek, Latin, and Hebrew at Homerton college, near London. He is described as one who rose 'by native talents from an obscure station to become one of the first scholars of the day' (Bogue and Bennett, Hist. of Dissenters, ii. 518). He engaged in the controversy excited by Farmer's work on Demoniacs, with the following works: Demoniacs; an inquiry into the heathen and Scripture doctrine of Demons, in which the hypothesis of Dr. Farmer and others is particularly considered, Lond 1779; The idolatry of Greece and Rome distinguished from other heathen nations, in a letter to Rev. Hugh Farmer, Lond. 1785. These works are marked by learning and acuteness, but are disfigured by personalities and scottism. He was dismissed from his office in Homerton college, it is said, for reading the newspapers on Sunday. An annuity of £100 having been purchased for him by some of his friends, he was asked to deliver a course of lectures on the Evidences of Christianity at the Scots church, London Wall. He had delivered four of these with great applause when he was cut off by death. These were published with eight others by Dr. Hunter in 1798.—W. L. A.

FERGUSON, JAMES. Little more is known of this expositor than that he was a minister of the Church of Scotland in Kilwinning, and that he died about 1670. He published in his lifetime, A brief Exposition of the Epistles of Paul to the Philippians and Colossians, 1656; A brief Exposition of the Epistles to the Galatians and Ephesians, 1659; and after his death, Mr. Hutcheson edited another commentary which he had left ready for the press—A brief Exposition of the First and Second Epistles to the Thessalonians, 1674. His commentaries are sententious and analytical, with occasional odd phrases that may be commended to the attention of any future Richardson, as when he talks of 'polypragmatic spirits who do importunately ingyre themselves upon the affairs of others.' There is much lucid and vigorous writing nevertheless in these volumes, justifying the remark of Hutcheson, that 'he was a man of deep reach, and well fitted for giving of advice in perplexed and intricate cases.' His works have recently been republished in one volume.—W. H. G.

FERME, CHARLES, or FAIRHOLME. Born at Edinburgh, and educated at its university, he rose to the position of principal of the College of Fraserburgh. For his share in the proceedings of the assembly at Aberdeen in 1605, he was imprisoned in the Castle of Doune for some years. He was ultimately restored to Fraserburgh, where he died in 1617; 'a Tydeus,' according to Adamson 'in body, a Hercules in spirit.' Among other works, which appear to have perished, he left behind him A Logical Analysis of the Epistle of Paul to the Romans, published by Principal Adamson in 1651. Discovered by Dr. Lindsay Alexander on an old bookstall at Newcastle, it was brought under the notice of the Council of the Wodrow Society, and given to the world as one of their publications. It is characterised by the editor as 'a sagacious, exact, and perspicuous commentary on the epistle.' It fully justifies its title as a 'logical analysis.' By the clear method in which he puts the steps of the argument he sometimes sheds more light on a passage than a diffuse commentary would supply.—W. H. G.

FESTIVALS.—As each festival is described in its proper place, we confine ourselves here to some general remarks upon the development of the festivals, the relationship which they sustain to each other, as well as to the whole cycle, the rites and ceremonies which are common to all, and the changes which they suffered in the course of time.

The fact that all the festivals celebrated from the Exodus to the Babylonish captivity belong to the Mosaic institutions, and that the additional ones originated after the captivity naturally divides them into pre-exile and post-exile festivals.

I. PRE-EXILE or MOSAIC FESTIVALS.

Their general designation and classification.—All the festivals in the Mosaic law are designated by one common name, מוֹעֲדֵי יְהוָה or מוֹעֲדִים (comp. Lev. xxiii. 2, 4, 44; Num. xxviii. 2, 29). As מוֹעֵד, from יָעַד to appoint, signifies meeting, a coming together, מוֹעֲדֵי יְהוָה denotes the meetings of Jehovah, i.e., with His people; and these festivals therefore are as much special occasions appointed by God for meetings with the children of Israel as the Tabernacle was אֹהֶל מוֹעֵד a special place appointed by the Lord to meet his worshippers (comp. Exod. xxv. 22; xxvii. 21; xxviii. 43; xxix. 42-46; xxx. 6; Num. xviii. 9). Under this common name, however, are comprised two classes of festivals, viz., annual and periodical.

A 1. Annual Festivals, their names, numbers etc.—The annual festivals are as follows:

i. The Feast of Passover, or of Unleavened bread (חַג הַפֶּסַח), which extends from the 15th to the 22d of Nisan. The first day and the seventh, however, are real festival days (מִקְרָא קֹדֶשׁ, holy convocation), as the five intervening days are the week days of the festival (חֹל מוֹעֵד) comp. Exod. xii. 6; Lev. xxiii. 5, 8; Num. xxviii. 16-25; Deut. xvi. 1-8.

ii. The Feast of Pentecost, of weeks, or of the harvest, or of the day on which were offered the loaves made of the new wheat (יוֹם הַבְּכּוּרִים), which is the 6th of Sivan, comp. Exod. xxxiv. 26; Lev. xxiii. 9-12; Num. xxviii. 26-31.

iii. The Feast of Trumpets (יוֹם תְּרֻעָה), called by the Jews New Year (ראש השנה), which is on the 1st of Tishri (comp. Lev. xxiii. 23-25; Num. xxix. 1-6).

iv. The Day of Atonement, or The Great Sabbath (יום כפור, שבת שבתון), which is on the 10th of Tishri (comp. Lev. xvi. 1-34; xxiii. 26-32; Num. xxix. 7-11).

v. The Feast of Tabernacles or of Ingathering of the Harvest (חג האסיף, חג הסוכות), which extends from the 15th of Tishri to the 22d. The first day alone, however, is the real festival day (מקרא קודש, holy convocation), as the six following days are the week days of the Festival (חול המועד); comp. Gen. xxiii. 16; Lev. xxiii. 33-43; Num. xxix. 12-39; Deut. xvi. 13-15.

vi. The concluding Festival of the whole cycle (שמעני עצרת), which is on the 23d of Tishri, following immediately upon or continuing the Feast of Tabernacles, and requiring distinct sacrifices (Comp. Lev. xxiii. 36; Num. xxix. 35-37).

2. Their connection and adaptation.—The organic connection of these festivals is seen from the fact that the collective number of the holy convocations (viz., two Passover, one on Pentecost, one on Trumpets, one on the Day of Atonement, one on the Feast of Tabernacles, and one on the concluding Feast), amounts to the sacred number seven; and that, as in the seven days of the week, six cluster round the Sabbath, so in these seven festival-days six gather round the Great Day of Atonement (שבת שבתון), which is the Festival of the Feasts. Equally striking is the fact, that in all these annual festivals no two days demanding entire suspension of ordinary labour and devotion to holy service (מקרא קודש), follow each other. If, as is the case with the Feast of Passover and Tabernacles, two days are to be celebrated in this manner, one is put at the beginning and the other at the end of the festivals, and a number of days are made to intervene, on which cessation from public service and the resuming of business and social intercourse are allowed. This arrangement is evidently adapted to the circumstances of man, and is designed to prevent tediousness and fatigue, as well as to afford all the pilgrims who went up to Jerusalem to celebrate the Festivals time for recreation and social intercourse. Moreover, owing to the same benign regard for the convenience of the people, we see that no festival was to be celebrated in the winter, when every thing is dreary and joyless, and travelling is difficult, but that one was appointed for the spring and one for the summer, since the people could not conveniently celebrate more during these seasons, whilst four are ordained for the autumn, two of a serious and two of a joyful character, in harmony with the season, which partakes of both these features.

3. The observances common to all these Festivals.—All these days of holy convocation, 1. Are like the weekly Sabbath declared Sabbaths (שבת), i.e., days on which there must be an entire suspension of all ordinary labour (comp. Lev. xvi. 29; xxiii. 7, 8, 21, 24, 25, 28, 35, 36). 2. On all of them special sacrifices were offered in addition to the daily offerings, which, however, varied according to the character of the festival (comp. Num. xxviii., xxix.) 3. On all of them the trumpets were blown whilst the burnt-offerings and the peace-offerings were sacrificed (comp. Num. x. 10); and 4. They are all holy convocations (מקרא קודש), i.e., as is evident from Num. x. 2, days on which the worshippers are to be called together by the sound of trumpets to the sanctuary (comp. Lev. xxiii.; Num. xxviii.) The three pilgrimage festivals, however, viz., the Feast of Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles, form a circle within the circle of the annual festivals, and are distinguished by the special appellation חג (from חנן to dance, to be joyful), because of their doubly joyful character; for, besides being commemorative of national events, they had an agricultural significance. The Passover is connected with the commencement of the harvest, and hence the offering was of the firstling sheaf of barley; Pentecost with the completion of the same, and hence the offering was loaves made from the new wheat; and whilst these festivals represented the joy of the people after the gathering in of the bread, which is the staff of life, the Feast of Tabernacles, which was connected with the conclusion of the entire agricultural year, when all the fruits, the wine, and the oil were collected, expressed the gratitude of the people at having safely brought in the wine, which cheereth the heart of man.

4. The changes which these Festivals have suffered.—Though all these festivals are most rigidly observed by the Jews to the present day, yet their integrity and beautiful symmetry were destroyed, towards the end of the second Temple as it is supposed. We do not refer to the circumstance that in celebrating these festivals in the present day, some of them are necessarily deprived of their agricultural significance, as well as of the offerings connected therewith, and are merely made commemorative of national events, but we allude to the fact that the original festival day, or days of holy convocation, were nearly doubled at a very early period, and instead of the collective number being seven, the Jewish calendar has thirteen, as follows—four on Passover, two on Pentecost, two on the Feast of Trumpets, one on the Day of Atonement, and four on Tabernacles and the concluding festival. The origin of these additions was this. The commencement of the festivals was fixed in Palestine according to the appearance of the new moon, which was watched in Jerusalem, and communicated from the metropolis to all the Israelites throughout the country by messengers. As these messengers, however, could not reach the parts most distant from Jerusalem before some days had elapsed, and as the inhabitants of these parts could therefore not know at once how the beginning of the new month was fixed, and on what day the festival began, it was determined that they should double the day of the festival, so as to be sure that one day would be right.

B 1. The periodical Festivals.—The periodical festivals are as follows:—

i. The weekly Sabbath, which begins the cycle of the festivals. Comp. Num. xxviii. 9, 10; Lev. xxiii. 1-3.

ii. The feast of the New Moon (ראש חודש), which is always kept at the beginning of the month when special sacrifices were offered. Comp. Num. x. 10; xxviii. 11-15.

iii. The Sabbath year, or The year of Remission (שנת השמיטה, שנת שבתון), which was kept every seventh year. Comp. Exod. xxiii. 11; Lev. xxv. 1-7; Deut. xv. 1.

iv. The year of Jubilee (שנת יובל), which was celebrated at the end of every seven Sabbath-years, beginning on the 10th of Tishri. Comp. Lev. xxv. 8-18.

2. Their connection with the cycle of Festivals.—The organic connection of these periodical festivals with the annual ones, is seen in their gradual rising in the scale, each forming as it were a stepping stone to the other. Beginning with the weekly celebration of the Sabbath, they advance to the monthly, then again to the annual, then to septennial, and then to quinquagintennial festivals. Moreover, the sacred number seven, or the Sabbath, underlies and combines all the festivals.* Thus there are—1. A Sabbath of days; 2. A Sabbath of weeks (the seventh week after the Passover is the Sabbath-week, inasmuch as the first day of it is the festival of weeks); 3. A Sabbath of months (the seventh month has both a festival and a fast, and on its first day is the festival which begins the year); 4. A Sabbath of years (the seventh is the Sabbath-year); and 5. A Sabbath of Sabbath-years, i.e., the year of Jubilee.

3. Observance of these Festivals.—Of these four periodical festivals, two only—viz., the weekly Sabbath and the New Moon—are still observed among the Jews, and their practices on these occasions are noticed under the respective names of these festivals. The Sabbath-year and the year of Jubilee are no longer kept, because of their exclusively local character, which renders them inapplicable to the present circumstances of the Hebrews away from Palestine.

II. POST-EXILE FESTIVALS.

1. Character and order of these Festivals.—All the festivals which were instituted from the Babylonish captivity to the advent of Christ are annual. In treating, therefore, upon these, no classification is necessary beyond enumerating them according to the regular order of the months.

i. The Feast of Acra, which was instituted by Simon Maccabæus, 141 B.C., to be celebrated on the 23d of the second month (אֲרִי), in commemoration of the capture and the purifying of Acra, and the expulsion of the Hellenists from Jerusalem (comp. 1 Maccab. xiii. 50-52).

ii. The Feast of Wood-carrying (קִרְבַּן הָעֵצִים); ἡ τῶν ξυλοφοριῶν ἑορτή, which has been celebrated on the 15th of the fifth month (חֲמִשָּׁה עָשָׂר) ever since the return from the Babylonish captivity (comp. Neh. x. 35; Joseph. Bell. Jud. ii. 17. 6; Megillath Taanith, c. v. p. 32; Mishna, Taanith, iv. 8 a).

iii. The Feast of Water-drawing (שְׁמַחַת בֵּית שֻׁאֵב), which was held on the 22d of the seventh month (חֲשֵׁרִי), the last day of the Feast of Tabernacles (comp. John vii. 37; Mishna, Succa, iv. 9; v. 1-3).

iv. The Feast of Dedication (חֲנוּכָה); τῆς ἐγκαίνια, which was instituted by Judas Maccabæus, B.C. 164, in commemoration of the purification of the Temple, and is celebrated eight days, commencing on the 25th of the eighth month (כִּסְלִיּוֹ) (comp. 1 Maccab. iv. 52-59; John x. 22; Mishna, Taanith, ii. 10; Noed Katon, iii. 9; Joseph. Antiq. xii. 7. 7; Contr. Apion. ii. 39).

v. The Feast of Nicanor, instituted by Judas

Maccabæus, to be celebrated on the 13th of the twelfth month (אֲדָר), in commemoration of the victory obtained over Nicanor (comp. 1 Maccab. vii. 49; Joseph. Antiq. xii. 10. 5; Megillath Taanith, xii.; Jerusalem Taanith, ii. 13; Josippon ben Gorion, iii. 22, p. 244, ed. Breith).

vi. The Feast of Purim (פּוּרִים), which was instituted by Mordecai, to be celebrated on the 14th of the twelfth month (אֲדָר), in commemoration of the deliverance of the Jews from the destruction planned by Haman (comp. Esther iii. 7; ix. 24, sq.; 2 Maccab. xv. 36).

2. Observance of these Festivals.—Three out of these six festivals, viz., The Feast of Wood-carrying, of Dedication, and of Purim, have continued to be observed among the Jews, with some modifications, however, which are duly noticed in the separate articles treating upon these festivals. It only remains to be added that several more festivals were instituted in the Maccabæan period, which, owing to their unimportance and short existence, must be passed over.

FESTUS. Porcius Festus was the successor of Felix as the Roman governor of Judæa, to the duties of which office he was appointed by the Emperor Nero (Joseph. Antiq. xx. 8. 9; De Bell. Jud. ii. 14. 1) in the first year of his reign (Winer, Handwörterbuch, in voc.) One of his first official acts was hearing the case of the apostle Paul, who had been left in prison by his predecessor. He was at least not a thoroughly corrupt judge; for when the Jewish hierarchy begged him to send for Paul to Jerusalem, and thus afford an opportunity for his being assassinated on the road, he gave a refusal, promising to investigate the facts at Cæsarea, where Paul was in custody, alleging to them, 'it is not the manner of the Romans to deliver any man to die before that he which is accused have the accusers face to face, and have licence to answer for himself concerning the crime laid against him' (Acts xxv. 16). On reaching Cæsarea he sent for Paul, heard what he had to say, and, finding that the matters which 'his accusers had against him' were 'questions of their own superstition, and of one Jesus which was dead, whom Paul affirmed to be alive,' he asked the apostle whether he was willing to go to Jerusalem and there be tried, since Festus did not feel himself skilled in such an affair. Paul, doubtless because he was unwilling to put himself into the hands of his implacable enemies, requested 'to be reserved unto the hearing of Augustus,' and was in consequence kept in custody till Festus had an opportunity to send him to Cæsar. Agrippa, however, with his wife Bernice, having come to salute Festus on his new appointment, expressed a desire to see and 'hear the man.'

* This is beautifully pointed out in the Midrash in the passage which treats upon the festivals, with the remark כָּל הַשָּׁבָעִים חֲבִיבִין לְעוֹלָם. Comp. Midrash Rabba on Lev. xxiii. 24.

Accordingly Paul was brought before Festus, Agrippa, and Bernice, made a famous speech, and was declared innocent. But having appealed to Cæsar, he was sent to Rome.

Festus, on coming into Judæa, found the country infested with robbers, who plundered the villages and set them on fire; the Sicarii also were numerous. Many of both classes were captured, and put to death by Festus. He also sent forces, both of horse and foot, to fall upon those that had been seduced by a certain impostor, who promised them deliverance and freedom from the miseries they were under if they would but follow him as far as the wilderness. These troops destroyed both the impostor and his dupes.

King Agrippa had built himself a splendid dining-room, which was so placed that, as he reclined at his meals, he commanded a view of what was done in the Temple. The priests, being displeased, erected a wall so as to exclude the monarch's view; on which Festus took part with Agrippa against the priests, and ordered the wall to be pulled down. The priests appealed to Nero, who suffered the wall to remain, being influenced by his wife Poppæa, 'who was a religious woman' (Joseph. Antiq. xx. 8. 11). Festus died shortly afterwards. The manner in which Josephus speaks is favourable to his character as a governor (De Bell. Jud. ii. 14. 1).—J. R. B.

FETTERS. In the A. V. this term is used in translating three Hebrew words:—

1. מַשְׁכָּלִים; ḥēḏai ḥalāl. This word indicates the material of which fetters were often, though not invariably, made. In 2 Sam. iii. 34; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11; xxxvi. 2, it is translated fetters; in Judg. xvi. 21; 2 Kings xxv. 7, fetters of brass; in other passages, Jer. xxxix. 7; lli. 11, chains; the dual form seems to restrict its application to chains for confining the hands or feet.

2. כְּבִל, Ps. cv. 18, fetters; Ps. cxlix. 8, כְּבִלֵּי, χειρσδέσας σιδηραί, fetters of iron.

3. מְקִיִּים, χειρσδέσας, Job xxxvi. 8, fetters; Ps. cxlix. 8; Is. xlv. 14; Nahum iii. 10, chains. In the Apocrypha the word fetters occurs in Ecclus. vi. 24; vi. 29; xxi. 19, for πείσαι. Manacles for the feet and hands are represented in the Assyrian monuments (Layard, Nineveh, ii. 376; Kitto, D. B. Illustrations, ii. 437).—J. E. R.

FEVER. By this term the A. V. renders the Heb. קָדַח (Deut. xxviii. 22), and the Gr. πυρετός (Matt. viii. 14; Mark i. 30; Luke iv. 38; John iv. 52; Acts xxviii. 8). Both the Hebrew and Greek words are derived from the association of burning heat, which is the usual symptom of a febrile attack; the former coming from the verb קָדַח, to burn, the latter from πύρ, fire: comp. Aram. מִשְׁתַּח from שָׁח, Goth. brinno, from brinnan to burn, Lat. febris, and our own fever from fervere. In Lev. xxvi. 16 the A. V. renders קָדַח by burning ague, but the rendering fever seems better, as it is not necessarily the intermittent type of the disease which is thus designated. In all eastern climates febrile diseases are common, and in Syria and Palestine they are among the commonest and severest afflictions under which the inhabitants suffer (Russell's Aleppo, bk. v. ch. 3). The fever under which Peter's wife's mother suffered is called by Luke πυρετός μέγας, and this has been regarded as having reference to the ancient scientific distribution of fevers into the great and the less (Galen, De diff. febr. see Wetstein, in loc.), and as an instance of Luke's professional exactitude in describing disease. His use of πυρετός in the plural in describing the disease under which the father of Publius laboured (Acts xxviii. 8), has also been adduced as an instance of the same kind, inasmuch as that disease was, from its being conjoined with dysentery, not a continuous, but an intermittent fever. To this much importance cannot be attached, though it is probable that Luke, as a physician, would naturally use the technical language of his profession in speaking of disease. In Deut. xxviii. 22, besides קָדַח, two diseases of the same class are mentioned, נִלְקָח (A. V. inflammation), and חֲרָר (A. V. extreme burning). The LXX. renders the former of these by ῥίγος, shivering, and the latter by ἐρεθισμός, a word which is used by the Greek writers on medicine to designate 'quodvis Naturæ irritamentum, quo sollicitata natura ad obeundas motiones excitatur' (Foes, Oecon. Hippoc.) The former is probably the ague, a disease of frequent occurrence in the East; and the latter probably dysentery, or some species of inflammatory fever. The Syr. version renders it by ܡܫܬܥܬܐ, burning, which favours the latter suggestion. Rosenmüller inclines to the opinion that it is the catarrhus suffocans, but this is without probability. There is no ground for supposing it to be erysipelas.—W. L. A.

FINDLAY, ROBERT, D.D., born 1721, and educated at Glasgow and Leyden, was appointed one of the ministers of Glasgow in 1756, and was elected to the professorship of divinity in the university of that city in 1782. He died in 1814. He wrote Two Letters to Dr. Kennicott, by Philalethes, Lond. 1762; Vindication of the Sacred Books and of Josephus, from various misrepresentations and cavils of Voltaire, Glasg. 1770; The Divine Inspiration of the Scriptures of the O. T. asserted by St. Paul, 2 Tim. iii. 10; and Dr. Geddes's reasons against the tenor of his words examined, Lond. 1804. 'Dr. Findlay,' says Orme (Bib. Bib. 187), 'is a learned but not an interesting writer. The above works contain much solid critical disquisition. The reply to Dr. Geddes is a most satisfactory one; and both vindicates the common reading of 2 Tim. iii. 16, and supports the generally received views of inspiration.'—W. L. A.

FIR. [BEROSH.]

FIRE. Besides the ordinary senses of the word 'fire,' which need no explanation, there are other uses of it in Scripture which require to be discriminated. The destructive energies of this element, and the torment which it inflicts, rendered it a fit symbol of—1. Whatever does damage and consumes (Prov. xvi. 27; Is. ix. 18). 2. Of severe trials, vexations, and misfortunes (Zech. xii. 6; 1 Cor. iii. 13, 15; 1 Pet. i. 7). 3. Of the punishments beyond the grave (Matt. v. 22; Mark ix. 44; Rev. xiv. 10; xxi. 8). [HELL.]

'Fire from heaven,' 'fire of the Lord,' usually denotes lightning in the O. T.; but, when connected with sacrifices, the 'fire of the Lord' is often to be understood as the fire of the altar, and sometimes the holocaust itself (Exod. xxix. 18; Lev. i. 9; ii. 3; iii. 5, 9; Num. xxviii. 6; 1 Sam. ii. 28; Is. xx. 16; Mal. i. 10).

The uses of fire among the Hebrews were various:—

1. The domestic use for cooking, roasting, and baking [BREAD; FOOD].

2. In winter they warmed themselves and their apartments by 'a fire of coals' (Jer. xxxvi. 22, 23; Luke xxii. 55-6). In the rooms it would seem that a brazier with charcoal was usually employed, as is still the case in western Asia, although the ovens and fire-places used in baking bread might have been, and doubtless were, as now, often employed to keep rooms properly warm [BREAD; COAL].

3. The religious use of fire was for consuming the victims on the altar of burnt-offerings, and in burning the incense on the golden altar: hence the remarkable phrase in Is. xxxi. 9—'the Lord, whose fire is in Zion, and his furnace in Jerusalem.'

4. In time of war torches were often carried by the soldiers; which explains the use of torches in the attack of Gideon upon the camp of the Midianites (Judg. vii. 16). This military use of torches was very general among ancient nations, and is alluded to by many of their writers (Statius, Theb. iv. 5, 7; Stobæus, Serm. p. 194; Michaelis, in Symbol. Liter. Bremens. iii. 254.)

5. Burning criminals alive does not appear to have been known to the Hebrews; but as an additional disgrace the bodies were in particular cases burnt after death had been inflicted (Josh. vii. 25; compare verse 15); and it is in this sense that the allusions to burning as a punishment are to be understood, except when the reference is to a foreign usage, as in Dan. iii. 22, 24, 27.

6. In time of war towns were often destroyed by fire. This, as a war usage, belongs to all times and nations; but among the Hebrews there were some particular notions connected with it, as an act of strong abhorrence, or of devotion to abiding desolation. The principal instances historically commemorated are the destruction by fire of Jericho (Josh. vi. 24); Ai (Josh. viii. 19); Hazor (Josh. xi. 11); Laish (Judg. xviii. 27); the towns of the Benjamites (Judg. xx. 48); Ziklag, by the Amalekites (1 Sam. xxx. 1); Gezer, by Pharaoh (1 Kings ix. 16); and the temple and palaces of Jerusalem, by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings xxv. 9). Even the war-chariots of the Canaanites were burnt by the Israelites, probably on the principle of precluding the possibility of recovery by the enemy of instruments of strength for which they had themselves no use. The frequency with which towns were fired in ancient warfare is shewn by the very numerous threats by the prophets that the towns of Israel should be burned by their foreign enemies. Some great towns, not of Israel, are particularly named; and it would be an interesting task to trace, as far as the materials exist, the fulfilment of these prophecies in those more marked examples. Among the places thus threatened we find Damascus (Is. xliii. 12, 13), Gaza, Tyre, Teman (Amos i. 7, 10, 12). The temples and idols of a conquered town or people were very often burned by the victors, and this was enjoined as a duty to the Israelites (Deut. vii. 5, 25; xii. 3, xiii. 16; Is. lii. 12, 13).

There were some special regulations respecting the use of fire among the Israelites. The most remarkable of these was the prohibition to light a fire on the Sabbath (Exod. xxxv. 3). As the primary design of this law appears to have been to prevent the proper privileges of the Sabbath-day from being lost to any one through the care and time required in cooking victuals (Exod. xvi. 23), it is doubted whether the use of fire for warmth on the Sabbath-day was included in this interdiction. In practice, it would appear that the fire was never lighted or kept up for cooking on the Sabbath-day, and that consequently there were no fires in the houses during the Sabbaths of the greater part of the year; but it may be collected that, in winter, fires for warming apartments were kept up from the previous day. Michaelis is very much mistaken with respect to the climate of Palestine, in supposing that the inhabitants could, without much discomfort, dispense with fires for warmth during winter (Mosaïches Recht, iv. 195). The modern Jews, although there is no cooking in their houses, have fires on the Sabbath-day, which are attended to by a Christian servant; or a char-woman is hired to attend to the fires of several houses, which she visits repeatedly during the day.

Another law required the damage done by a conflagration in the fields to be made good by the party through whose incaution it had been kindled (Exod. xxii. 6). This was a most useful and necessary law in a country where the warmth and drought of summer soon render the herbage and underwood highly combustible, so that a fire once kindled often spreads most extensively, and produces disastrous consequences (Judg. ix. 15; xv. 5). This law was calculated to teach caution in the use of fire to the herdsmen in the fields, who were the parties most concerned. And it is to be remembered that the herdsmen were generally substantial persons, and had their assistant shepherds, for whose imprudence they were made responsible. Still no inference is to be drawn from this law with regard to fires breaking out in towns, the circumstances being so very different.

In the sacerdotal services no fire but that of the altar of burnt-offerings could lawfully be used. That fire was originally kindled supernaturally, and was ever after kept up. From it the fire used in the censers for burning incense was always taken; and for neglecting this and using common fire, Nadab and Abihu were struck dead by 'fire from heaven' (Lev. x. 1, 2; Num. iii. 4, xxvi. 61).

Respecting 'passing through the fire,' see MOLOCH; and for the 'pillar of fire,' see EXODUS.—J. K.

FIREPANS. This is the rendering in the A. V. of מִחֶרֶת (Exod. xxvii. 3, Sept. πυρσίων, xxxviii. 3; 2 Kings xxv. 15; Jer. lii. 19), else where rendered snuff-dishes (Exod. xxv. 38, Sept. ὑποθήματα, xxxvii. 23; Num. iv. 9, Sept. ἐξαρωγίδας), and censers (Num. xvi. 6, Sept. πυρσεία; in the sing. מִחֶרֶת, Lev. x. 1; xvi. 12; Sept. πυρσίων). These do not seem to have been different kinds of vessels, but only the same vessel, of probably different sizes, and applied to different uses. It was a metal dish used sometimes to convey fire to the altar, sometimes to burn incense on, and sometimes to receive the snuff from the lamp, and perhaps to hold the snuffers.—W. L. A.

FIRMAMENT. By this word the A. V., following the Vulg., translates the Heb. רָקִיעַ (Gen. i. 6, 7, 8, etc.). The original word, from רָקַע, to stamp, beat out, expand, simply means the expanse; and it is not easy to conceive how the Greek translators came to render it by στερέωμα, a word which is commonly used to designate some compact solid, such as the basis of a pillar, or a pillar itself, and which is used elsewhere by the

LXX. as equivalent to the Heb. סֶלַע, a rock (Ps. xvii. 2), and by Symmachus and Theodotion as the rendering of the Heb. מַטֵּה, a staff. Basil (Hexaem. Hom. 3) explains the term as not intended to describe what is naturally hard, and solid, and weighty, which belongs rather to the earth; but says that because the nature of the objects above it is fine and thin, and not perceptible by sense, it is called στερέωμα, by a comparison between things of extreme rarity and such as can be perceived by sense (συγκρίσει τῶν λεπτοτάτων καὶ τῇ αἰσθήσει καταληπτῶν). It is not very clear what his meaning here is, but probably he intended that as a solid extension would be properly called a στερέωμα, so this mass of light and vapour substances might by analogy receive this name. Others have suggested that this term was employed to indicate that the רָקִיעַ is the 'universitas τῶν λεπτομερῶν in regionem superam conglobata et firmata,' along with the idea that this 'nihil habet uspiam inanitatit, sed omnia sui generis naturæ plena' (Fuller, Misc. Sac. Bk. 1, c. 6). Fuller thinks also that the LXX. selected στερέωμα rather than πέτασμα or περιπέτασμα, in order to convey the idea of depth as well as superficial expansion. A very general opinion is that the LXX. adopted this term rather than one exactly equivalent to the original, because it conveys what was the Hebrew belief concerning the upper atmosphere or visible heavens, which they regarded as a solid expanse encircling the earth. That such was a common notion in ancient times is probable; the Greek οὐρανός, like our heaven,* signifying that which is heaved up or elevated, and the Latin cælum, corresponding to the Greek κοῖλον, signifying that which is hollowed out ('cavernæ cœli,' Lucret. iv. 172; comp. Pott, Etymol. Forschungen, i. 23, 27), have their source in such a notion; while such epithets as σιδήρεον (Odys. xv. 328; xvii. 565), χάλκεον (Il. xvii. 425; Pind. Pyth. x. 42; Nem. vi. 6), and πολύχalkον (Il. v. 504; Odys. iii. 2), plainly enunciate it. It is remarkable, however, that only two of the ancient philosophers seem to have formally taught this. Empedocles described the heavens as στερέμμιον and κρυσταλλοειδής, composed of air glacialised by fire (Plut. Plac. Phil. ii. 11; Stobæus, Eclóg. Phys. i. 24; Diog. Laert. viii. 77; Lactant. De Opif. Dei. c. 17; cf. Karsten, Phil. Gr. Vet. Operum Reliquia ii. 422); and Artemidorus taught that 'summa cœli ora solidissima est, in modum tecti durata'

* If, indeed, it be true that the Anglo-Saxon heofon is derived from heafan, and does not rather stand in relation with the Latin cav in cavus. The A. S. equivalent for the Lat. ca is hea, as caput, heafod.

(Senec. Nat. Quæst. vii. 13). But that the same view was entertained by the Hebrews is by no means certain. It is hardly competent for us to take such highly poetical descriptions as those in which the heavens are compared to a mirror of shining metal, or to a tent, or to a curtain stretched out (Job xxxvii. 18; Ps. civ. 2; Is. xl. 22), and interpret them as scientific statements; nor can we lay any stress on the fact that the sacred writers speak of the doors and windows of heaven, of its pillars, or its foundations (Gen. vii. 11; Is. xxiv. 8; Mal. iii. 10; Job xxvi. 11; 2 Sam. xxii. 8); for these may be mere poetical or pictorial forms of speech, such as even we with our exact scientific knowledge might delight to use. The descriptions in Exod. xxiv. 10, and in Ezek. i. 22-26, have been adduced as proving that the Hebrews conceived the visible heavens as a solid though pellucid floor on which a person might stand, or a solid object rest; but in the former of these passages 'the paved work,' on which Jehovah appears standing, exists only in our version, the original simply stating that under his feet was 'a sort of work of glittering sapphire'

(בְּמַעֲשֵׂה לִבְנַת הַפַּיִר), without determining of what kind the work was; and in the latter passage, though it is said that the throne of God was above the rakiah, it is not said that the throne was resting on it. There is more apparent force in the argument derived from the purpose which the rakia was designed to serve, viz., the supporting of the waters which were above it, and the holding of the heavenly luminaries, both of which would seem to require a solid substance. But the waters above the rakia are merely the clouds, which need no solid support (Delitzsch on Gen. i. 6; Kurz, Bible and Astronomy, Hist. of the Old Covenant, i. 30); and the fixing of the heavenly bodies in it is due to the imagination of the commentator; it has no sanction from the text, which merely says they were set or placed in it, without saying how (Gen. i. 14-18). There seems no reason, then, for thinking that the sacred writers conceived of the rakia as a solid substance; they seem rather to have thought of it as a wide expansion, in which the clouds, and winds, and heavenly bodies had their place, and from which the rain came down. That they would not have applied to it such terms as we have cited from the Greek poets is evident from Deut. xxviii. 23, where a metallic heaven is spoke of as abnormal, and the result of a curse. The cosmography of the Hebrews was far from being scientifically exact, but we need not make it less so than the exigencies of a just exegesis demand.—W. L. A.

FIRST-BORN. The privileges of the first-born son, among the Hebrews, are indicated under BIRTHRIGHT.

FIRST-BORN, SANCTIFICATION AND REDEMPTION OF THE (פְּרִי־הָבֵן קִדְּשָׁתוֹ בְּכוֹרֹת), males of human beings and animals were strictly enjoined to perpetuate the remembrance of the death of Egypt's first-born, whereby the liberty of the Israelites was secured, and of the preservation of Israel's first-born. Comp. Exod. xiii. 2, 11-15.

1. Sanctification of the first-born, its signification, etc.—The fact that the first-born of Egypt were selected to be smitten down for the hard heartedness of Pharaoh, and that their death was regarded as the greatest calamity, shews of itself that a peculiar sanctity had already been attached to the first-born of both man and cattle. The cause of this is easily traced in the Scriptures. The power of procreation was declared by God himself to be a special blessing (Gen. i. 22, 28; ix. 1; xvii. 16; xxix. 31), and was granted as a reward to those who were well pleasing in his sight (Gen. xv. 4; Ps. cxxviii. 4). This was fully appreciated by the Jews; for the possession of children, especially of the male sex, was esteemed the climax of social happiness (Gen. xvi. 2; xxix. 31; Deut. vii. 13, 14; Ps. cxxviii. 3, 4), and the absence of them was considered a reproach (רָעוּת), since it implied divine displeasure (Gen. xxx. 23), and no other earthly blessing could compensate it (Gen. xvi. 1-5). Moreover, the first-born of newly-married young people (בְּנֵי הַנְּעוּרִים, i.s. cxxvii. 4) was believed to represent the prime of human vigour (רֵאשִׁית אָדָם) being born before the strength of the father began to diminish (Gen. xlix. 3; Deut. xxi. 17; Ps. lxxviii. 51; cv. 36). It was therefore natural that the first instalment of God's blessing, and the prime of man's strength, should be regarded with peculiar affection, and have special sanctity attached to him,* and that by virtue of the claim which God has to what is most loved and held sacred by us, and gratitude on the part of man, the first-born males, both of man and animals, should be consecrated to the giver of all good things; the one as a priest, representing the family to which he belonged (Exod. xix. 22, 24),† and the other as a sacrifice (Gen. iv. 4), just as the fat of sacrifices was devoted to God because it was regarded as the prime part of the animal. [FAT.] This explains the fact why the plague of the first-born of the Egyptians was so terribly felt; it was the destruction of the objects most dear and sacred to them, whilst the first-born of the Hebrews, i.e., their priests and sacrifices, were spared. Moreover, it shews the import of the consecration enjoined in Exod. xiii. 1. Hitherto it was optional with the Hebrews whether they would devote the first-born to the Lord, but now God, by virtue of having so signally interposed for their deliverance, claims the public consecration of the first-born of man as his priests, and of the first-born of animals as sacrifices.

2. Origin of the Redemption of the first-born.—After the building of the Tabernacle and the introduction of the extensive sacrificial service, which required a special priestly order, as well as a separate staff of servants, who could exclusively devote themselves to the ministry of the sanctuary, the offices of the first-born were superseded by those of the Levites (Num. iii. 11-13),‡ and it was ordained

* Hence the prerogatives of the first-born, described in the article BIRTHRIGHT.

† That the לְוִיִּם, who in this passage officiate as priests, are the first-born, as the Chaldee paraphrases of Onkelos, and Jonathan ben Uziel, Mishna Sebachim, xiv. 4, Saadia, Rashi, Rashbam, Ibn Ezra, etc., have it, is evident from Exod. xix. 22, 24, where כֹּהֲנִים, priests, are distinctly mentioned before the institution of the Aaronic order. Comp. Exod. xxviii. 1.

‡ This substitution of the Levites in the place of the first-born, and the creation of a new order of priests were no easy task, as may be seen from Korah's rebellion (Num. xvi. 1, 2; xxvi. 5-7) that the first-born of the other tribes, as well as the first-born of the animals which could not be sacrificed, should henceforth be redeemed (ibid. xviii. 15).

3. Redemption of the first-born of man.—The redemption of a child is to take place when it is a month old, when the father is to give to the priest thirty silver shekels of the sanctuary, i.e., about eleven or twelve shillings as the maximum. If the child was sickly, or appeared otherwise to be inferior to children generally, the priest could estimate it at less than this sum (Num. iii. 46, etc.; xviii. 16). The priest had to come to the house of the infant as the mother could not appear with it in the Temple because her days of purification, according to the law (Lev. xii. 2, 4), were not as yet accomplished. No bargaining was allowed, but if the priest saw that the parents were poor, he could, if he chose, return the money when the ceremony was over. When the mother's days of purification were accomplished, and she could appear in the Temple, she then brought the child to the priest to be presented publicly to the Lord (Luke ii. 22). The Jews still observe this law of redemption. When the first-born male is thirty days old, the parents invite to their house their friends and a priest (כֹּהֵן) to a meal for the following day. The priest* having invoked God's blessing upon the repat, and offered some introductory prayers, etc., looks at the child and the price of redemption presented unto him, and asks the father which he would rather have, the money or the first-born child. Upon the father's reply that he would rather pay the price of redemption, the priest takes the money, swings it round the head of the infant in token of his vicarious authority, saying, 'This is for the first-born, this is in lieu of it, this redeems it! and let this son be spared for life, for the law of God and for the fear of Heaven! May it please Thee, that, as he was spared for redemption, so he may be spared for the Law, for matrimony, and for good works. Amen.' The priest then lays his hand upon the child's head and blesses it, as follows:—'The Lord make thee as Ephraim and Manasseh!' etc. It is to this that the Apostle Peter refers when he says 'Ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold,' etc. (1 Peter i. 18). When the first-born son is thirteen years of age, he fasts the day before the feast of Passover, in commemoration of the sparing of the first-born of the Hebrews in Egypt. [FASTS.]

4. Redemption of the first-born of clean animals.—The first-born of every clean animal (i.e., ox, sheep, goat, etc.), from eight days to twelve months old, had to be taken to Jerusalem every year (Deut. xii. 6, etc.); and delivered to the priest, who offered it as a sacrifice to Jehovah, sprinkled its blood upon the altar, burned the fat, and eat the flesh (Exod. xiii. 13; xxxiv. 20; Num. xviii. 15-17). In the mean time the animal was not to be used for any work, for it belonged to the Lord (Deut. xv. 19); but if which, as it is justly regarded by Ramban and Ibn Ezra, was a protest of the first-born.

* The assertion in Herzog's Real-Encyclopädie (s.v. Erstgeburt, p. 145), that it is the Rabbi who redeems the child, by taking the appointed sum, is incorrect. The Rabbi has no right to do it, the performance of the rites of redemption belongs exclusively to the priest (כֹּהֵן), who is the only legal person to do it.

It had any blemish it was not to be sacrificed, but eaten up at home (ibid., xv. 21, 22). If, however, the man whose cattle had first-born lived at too great a distance from Jerusalem to carry them thither, he was commanded to sell them, and take the money to the sanctuary (Leut. xiv. 24, 25).

5. Redemption of the first-born of unclean animals.—The first-born of unclean animals, not being allowed to be offered as sacrifices, were either to be redeemed according to the valuation of the priest, with the addition of one-fifth of the value, and then remain with their owner, or be sold, and the price given to the priests (Lev. xxvii. 11-13, 27), to be redeemed with a lamb, or else be put to death (Exod. xiii. 13).

FIRST-FRUITS. The same natural feeling which at first led man out of gratitude to consecrate to the giver of all good things the first-born of both man and animals, and the prime parts of sacrifices, because they were regarded as the first instalments of his blessings, and which afterwards led to the legalizing of these offerings [FAT; FIRST-BORN], also gave rise to the offering of the first-fruits and to its becoming law.

1. The Character and Classification of the First-Fruits.—Besides the offering of the sheaf of the new barley (עומר ראשית) on the Feast of Passover, and of the two loaves of the new wheat (לחם בכורים) on the Feast of Pentecost, which were the grateful acknowledgment of the whole nation for the blessings of the harvest (Lev. xxiii. 10-20), and which are duly noticed in their proper places [FESTIVALS; PASSOVER; PENTECOST], the Law also required every individual to consecrate to the Lord a part of the first-fruit of the land (comp. Exod. xxii. 29; xxiii. 19; xxxiv. 26; Num. xv. 20, 21; xviii. 12, 13; Deut. xviii. 4; xxvi. 2-11). The first-fruits to be offered are restricted by Jewish tradition to the seven chief productions of Palestine, viz., wheat, barley, grapes, figs, pomegranates, olives, and honey, mentioned in Deut. viii. 8 in praise of the land (comp. Mishna, Bikurim, i. 3; Berachoth, 35, a; Maimonides, Jod Ha-Chesaka, Hilchoth Bikurim, ii. 2), and are divided into two classes—1. The actual produce of the soil, the raw material, such as corn, fruits, etc., which are denominated בכורים, προσηγηματα, primitiva; and 2. Preparations of the produce, as oil, flour, wine, etc., and are called תרומה, ἀπαρχαί, primitia (comp. Midrash Rabba, the Chaldee Paraphrases of Onkelos and Jonathan ben Uziel, and Rashi on Exod. xxii. 29).

2. The Quantity and Time of Offering.—The quantity of first-fruits to be consecrated to the Lord has neither been fixed by the law nor by tradition; it was left entirely to the generosity of the people. 'Yet,' says Maimonides, 'it is implied that a sixtieth part is to be consecrated, and he who wishes to devote all the first fruits of his field may do so' (Hilchoth Bikurim, ii. 17). The way in which a proprietor fixed which first-fruit he should offer was this, as the Mishna tells us, 'when he went into his field and saw a fig ripening, or a bunch of grapes, or a pomegranate, he tied a rush about it, and said 'Lo, this is first-fruit' (הרי אלו בכורים, Bikurim iii.). All the first-fruits thus devoted to the Lord had to be delivered at Jerusalem between the feasts of Pentecost and Dedication (מעשרת תוך חנכה, Exod. xxiii. 16; Lev. xxiii. 16, 17; Bikurim, i. 36); any offering brought after this time was not received.

3. The manner in which these offerings were taken to Jerusalem.—The law that every one should take up the first-fruits to Jerusalem was soon found impracticable, since even the most pious Israelite found it very difficult, in addition to his appearing at the three great festivals, to have to go to the temple with every newly ripened fruit. Nor was it found convenient for every one to go up with his first-fruits separately. Hence the custom arose, that when the first-fruits were ripe, all the inhabitants of one district who were ready to deliver them assembled together in the principal town of that locality where their representative lived, with a basket containing the ripe fruits of the seven several kinds, arranged in the following manner—'The barley was put lowermost, the wheat over it, the olives above that, the dates over them, the pomegranates over the dates, and the figs were put uppermost in the basket, leaves being put between every kind to separate it from the other, and clusters of grapes were laid upon the figs to form the outside of the basket' (Maimonides, Hilchoth Bikurim, iii. 7; Tosifot Bikurim, ii.) With this basket all the pilgrims stayed up all night in the open market place, because they were afraid to go into houses to sleep lest any inmate of them should die, and thus cause pollution. Early in the morning the representative of the district, who was the official (מטמר) and ex officio the leader of the imposing procession, summoned them with the words of the prophet Jeremiah—'Arise, and let us go up to Zion, to the house of Jehovah our God' (xxxi. 6). The whole company were then ready to start. We cannot do better than give literally the description which the Mishna and the Talmud give of this imposing procession—'An ox [destined for a peace-offering] went before them with gilded horns and an olive crown upon its head, and a piper who played before them, whilst the air rang with the song of the people, 'I was glad when they said unto me: Let us go into the house of the Lord' (Ps. cxxii. 1). On approaching Jerusalem a messenger was sent forward to announce their arrival, and the first-fruits were tastefully arranged. The officiating priest, the Levites, and the treasurers, went out to meet them, the number of officials who went out being in accordance with the largeness of the party that arrived, and conducted them into the holy city, singing, as they entered, 'Our feet stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem' (Ps. cxxii. 2), whilst all the workmen [who plied their craft] in the streets of Jerusalem, stood up before them and welcomed them, saying, 'Brethren of such and such a place, peace be with you.' The piper continued to play before them till the procession came to the mount of the Temple. Here every one, even the king, took his own basket upon his shoulders, and went forward till they all came to the court of the Temple, singing, 'Praise ye the Lord, praise God in his sanctuary,' etc. [through the whole of Psalm cl.]; whereupon the Levites sang, 'I will extol thee, O Lord! because thou hast lifted me up, and hast not made my foes to rejoice over me' (Ps. xxx.). Then the pigeons which were hung about the baskets were taken for burnt-offerings, and the pilgrims gave to the priests what they brought in their hands. With the baskets still upon their shoulders every one repeated, 'I profess this day unto the Lord thy God,' etc., till he came to the words, 'A wandering Syrian was my father' (i.e., from Deut. xxvi. 3-5), when he took the basket off his shoulders and laid hold of it by its brim; the priest then put his hands under it and waved it, whilst the offerer continued to recite from the words 'A wandering Syrian,' where he had left off, to the end of the section (i.e., to Deut. xxvi. 10), then put the basket by the side of the altar, threw himself down on his face, and afterwards departed,' Mishna, Bikurim, iii. 2-6; Jerusalem Bikurim, 65; Maimonides, Hilchoth Bikurim, iv. 16, 17). These first-fruits then became the property of the priests who officiated during that week.

4. Exemptions from the offering or the service connected therewith.—Those who simply possessed the trees and not the land were exempted from the offering of first-fruits, for they could not say 'the land which thou hast given me' (Maimonides, Hilchoth Bikurim, ii. 13). Those, too, who lived beyond the Jordan could not bring first-fruits in the proper sense of the libation, inasmuch as they could not say the words of the service, from 'the land that floweth with milk and honey' (Deut. xvi. 15); comp. Mishna, Bikurim, i. 10. A proselyte, again, though he could bring the offering, was not to recite the service, because he could not use the words occurring therein (Deut. xvi. 3). 'I am come to the country which the Lord swore unto our fathers to give us' (Bikurim, i. 4). Stewards, servants, slaves, women, sexless persons, and hermaphrodites, were also not allowed to recite the service, though they could offer the libation, because they could not use the words, 'I have brought the first-fruits of the land which thou, O Lord, hast given me' (Ibid. xxvi. 10), they having originally had no share in the land (Bikurim, i. 5).

5. The offering of the prepared produce.—In this, too, the quantity to be offered was left to the generosity of the people. But it was understood, says Maimonides, that 'a liberal man will give a fortieth part of his first-fruits, one who is neither liberal nor illiberal will give a fiftieth part, and a covetous man will give a sixtieth' (Hilchoth Theruma, iii. 2). They had to be presented even from the produce of Jewish fields in foreign countries, and were not allowed to be taken from the portion intended for tithes, nor from the corners left for the poor (Theruma i. 5; iii. 7), and were not required to be delivered in the Temple, but might be given to the nearest priest (Ibid. iv. 3; Bikurim ii. 2).

6. The first-fruit of the dough.—Besides the offering of the first-fruits themselves, the Israelites were also required to give to the Lord a cake made of the first corn that was threshed, winnowed, and ground (Num. xv. 18-21). Tradition restricts this to wheat, barley, casmin, or rye, fox-ear (barley), and oats (Chala i. 1; Maimonides, Bikurim, vi. 1), of which a twenty-fourth part had to be given, but the baker who made it for sale had to give a forty eighth part (Maimonides, Hilchoth Bikurim, v. 2, 3). This was the perquisite of the priest, and it is to this that the Apostle refers in Rom. xi. 16.

7. The first-fruits of fruit-trees.—According to the law, the fruits of every newly planted tree were not to be eaten or sold, or used in any way for the first three years, but considered 'uncircumcised' or unclean. In the fourth year, however, the first-fruits were to be consecrated to the Lord, or, as the traditional explanation is, eaten in Jerusalem, and in the fifth year became available to the owner (Lev. xix. 23-25). The three years, according to Rabbinic law, began with the first of Tishri, if the tree was planted before the sixteenth of Ab. The reason of this is that the fruits of those three years were considered imperfect; such imperfect fruit could not, therefore, be offered to God; and as man was not allowed to partake of the produce before he consecrated the first instalment of God's blessings to the giver of all good things, the planter had to wait till the fifth year. Comp. Joseph. Antiq. iv. 8. 19; and Ibn Ezra on Lev. xix. 23.

8. Literature.—The Mishna, tracts Bikurim, Theruma, Chala and Orla; Maimonides, Jod Ha-Chesaka, Hilchoth Bikurim, vol. iii. p. 121; Lewis, The Antiquities of the Hebrew Republic, vol. i. p. 145, etc., London, 1724; Saalschütz, Mosaische Recht, p. 343 ff., 416 ff., 433 ff.; Herzfeld, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, vol. ii. p. 128 ff.; Jost, Geschichte des Judenthums, vol. i. p. 172 ff.—C. FISCHER, JOHANN FRIEDRICH. This eminent philologist was born at Coburg, October 10, 1724. In 1751 he was appointed rector of St. Thomas's School, Leipzig; and, 1767, Principal of the Fürsten Collegium in the same city. He died October 11, 1799. In addition to a large number of works on various departments of classical philology, he made numerous contributions to Biblical literature. He was the editor of the best edition of Stochius's Clavis, of Leusden de dialectis Novi Testamenti, and of other works then valued as aids to the critical study of the original Scriptures. He also superintended the publication, from a Greek MS. in the library of St. Paul's, Leipzig, of a portion of the O. T., including Leviticus, Numbers, and parts of Exodus and Deuteronomy. Of his original works, the following are the most important:—Prolusiones xxxiii. de vitis Lexicorum N. T., 1772-1790; afterwards published in a collected form with the title Prolusiones de vitis Lexicorum Novi Testamenti separatim antea nunc conjuncte editae, multis partibus auctae, multisque in locis emendatae, Lips. 1791, 8vo; Prolusiones de versionibus graecis librorum V. T. litterarum hebraicarum magistris; accessit prolusio qua loci nonnulli Vers. Grr. oraculorum Malachiae illustrantur, Lips. 1772, 8vo; Progr. quo loci nonnulli librorum N. T. e versionibus Graecis, maximeque Alexandrina, oraculorum Malachiae illustrantur, 1773; Progr. de Chaldaicis Onquolosi Jonathaeque versionibus V. T. litterarum hebraicarum scientiae intelligentiaeque librorum divinorum adjutricibus, Lips. 1774, 4to; Prolusio I. de versione librorum divinorum V. T. vulgata verae legitimaeque rationis hebraeae in latinum convertendi magistra, 1775, 4to; Prolusiones V. in quibus varii loci librorum divinorum utriusque Testamenti eorumque versionum veterum, maxime

FISH; FISHES; FISHING.—Various and interesting are the statements of ichthyological facts scattered throughout the Scriptures. We propose to collect these, not in the order of their occurrence, but in a method which seems to us best to illustrate the Biblical aspect of the subject. The creation of fish is described in Gen. i. '20-22 as occupying a prominent portion of the divine work of the fifth day. This account is remarkable for the terms employed by the sacred historian. There is an absence, not only of all specific names of fishes, which was to be expected in the narrative of a general fact like the creation, but also of all generic phrases, such as are usually employed, even in Scripture, to designate the animal tribes which inhabit the sea. This absence, however, is compensated by the use of language, simple but most effective, which, while it pictures to the mind the grand event with a vividness which no translation can express, is yet singularly consistent with scientific accuracy. 'God said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life.' This is but a faint, though not an incorrect rendering of the original, יִשְׂרְוּ הַמַּיִם שָׂרָן נֶפֶשׁ (verse 20). The neuter verb שָׂרָן combines the ideas of swarming and creeping, and is here accompanied with its cognate noun, to add intensity to the meaning; so that the Almighty's fiat impregnated the waters and made them 'teem and move with the writhing' ['wriggling' is the expressive old word of Holland, Plinie xxii. 2] swarms of beings endowed with life [literally, the soul of life].* In the next verse follows the creative act, 'God created great whales and every living creature that moveth,' etc. Here occur the same terms, with the exception of the word which expresses the motion of the creatures הִקְשִׁיטָה palpitans, motitans; Rosenmüller], again without any specific or generic phrases; but we notice two important points in the statement: (1.) A distinction between the great whales [הַתַּיִם הַגְּדֹלִים] and the other aquatic animals. This distinction is not only compatible with the simple classification of the Jewish zoologists (either David or Solomon [comp. 1 Kings iv. 33], or probably some later writer in Psalm civ. 25)† into great and small animals of the sea; but makes room for, and anticipates the more elaborate characteristics of modern science, which distinguishes between (ex. gr.) the warm-blooded viviparous whale and other cetaceans; and the cold-blooded oviparous shark and other fishes, properly so called. (2.) The provision made to keep the myriads which crowd the deep specifically distinct amid their multitudinous association. The command of God, that aquatic animals should generate 'after their kinds' [לְמִינֵהֶם, i.e., pro variis eorum speciebus, according to Gesenius, who includes the idea, likewise, of form in the word; Thes. 778], is as a wall that separates their natures. Nor does that 'Word of the Lord return to Him void'; it still keeps unmixed the species which haunt the waters as purely and potentially as when first spoken. This perpetuity is the effect of the blessing which the Creator originally pronounced on this part of His work. 'God blessed them, saying: Be fruitful and multiply, and fill the waters in the seas' (verse 22). In the brief but efficacious paranomasia, כָּר וּרְכוּ, lies the germ of that fertility which has made the vast realm of waters instinct with life.*

In the next passage which bears on our subject, we first meet with the generic word, fish [דָּגָה].†

In verses 26, 28, the Almighty confers on man his supremacy over animate nature; one of the express prerogatives of that dignity is 'dominion over the fish of the sea.'—This was renewed to Noah, Gen. ix. 2. St. James seems also to speak of it in his epistle, when, in chap. iii. 7, he refers to man's subjugation of 'things in the sea' [ἰλάσα φύσιν . . . ἐναλίην δαμάσεται καὶ δεδάμασται τῇ φύσει τῇ ἀνθρωπίνῃ] as a prerogative still unrevoled.

In the legislation of Moses on the subject of 'clean and unclean' animals, we find a more particular classification of the various tribes of the animal kingdom, so far at least as they fell under the notice of the sacred writer in a somewhat limited district. The portion pertaining to aquatic animals is contained in Lev. xi. 9-12, and Deut. xiv. 9, 10. A distinction is here drawn between salt-water and fresh-water fish, and between such as are clean and unclean in each. The distinction is a simple one; 'Whatsoever hath fins and scales, etc., ye shall eat;' and 'All that have not fins and scales, etc., shall be an abomination unto you.' No particular fishes are named,‡ and this is the more

* The ancients observed the extreme fecundity of fishes. The early Hebrews formed the verb דָּגָה, to multiply exceedingly, from דָּג a fish. See Gen. xlviii. 18, where Jacob's blessing literally means, 'let them increase like the fish.' Onkelos renders the phrase in terms equivalent to ut pisces maris multiplicentur. Compare Pliny, Hist. Nat. ix. 50, and Aristotle, Hist. Animal. vi. 31. For some modern notices of this fecundity of fishes, see Kitto, Bible Illustr. i. 34.

† In most instances דָּגָה differs from the other generic word דָּג, in having a collective sense, as in the passage mentioned in the text; whereas the latter has rather an individual meaning, as in 1 Kings iv. 33. In the book of Jonah, however, the דָּג of i. 17, and the דָּגָה of ii. 1, are undoubtedly synonymous. (See Gesenius Thes. 320, who compares דָּגָה with the collective ΔΩΔΕΚΑ = ἡ δώδεκα, cavalry; comp. Fürst, Hebr. Wörterb. i. 286).

‡ In the Epistle of Barnabas, c. x., the writer, with express reference to this law of Moses, mentions certain fishes as prohibited by name—Καὶ οὐ μὴ φάγῃς. φησί, σμύραναν, οὐδὲ πολύτροδα, οὐδὲ σηπίαν: Thou shalt not eat of the lamprey, the polypus, nor the cuttle-fish (Hefele's Patres Apost. [ed. 2], p. 21). This addition appears in no existing copy of the Pentateuch, nor does it even occur in the quotation from Barnabas, made by remarkable, because the context before and after the two passages mentions many individual names of birds and beasts. A similar distinction of fishes with and without scales as fit and unfit for offerings [or, as Bochart (Hieros. ed. Leusden, p. 42) says, for food at the sacrificial feasts], seems to have been early made in the sacred rites of Rome. Pliny quotes from Cassius Hemina an old law of Numa, 'ut pisces qui squamosi non essent nisi [ne] polluerent (Hist. Nat. xxxii. 2, 10). In ancient Egypt, the sanctity and the wholesomeness of fishes were incompatible qualities. 'The most effectual method of forbidding the use of any fish was to assign it a place among the sacred animals of the country' (Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians, iii. 58). On this principle the lepidotus, a scaly fish, was deemed both sacred and unfit for use. The reason of the law lies perhaps in the nature of things; the terms of the prohibition would exclude all aquatic animals which are not fishes (strictly so called), such as the saurians and the serpents, which would be accounted as an abomination and unclean. Sanatory considerations would have weight in such legislation. * In Egypt, fish which have not scales are generally found to be unwholesome food. One of the few reasonable laws of the Caliph, El-Hakim, was that which forbade the selling or catching of such kinds of fish (Lane's Modern Egyptians, i. 136, note; De Sacy's Chrestomathie Arabe [ed. 2] i. 98; Knobel, on Lev. xi. 9). Maimonides, with less reason, sees in the Levitical distinctions of fishes and scales among fishes 'marks whereby the more noble and excellent species might be distinguished from those that were inferior' (Townley's Mora Nevochim, p. 305). In no ordinance of the laws of Moses do we find fishes prescribed as religious offerings. In this respect, as well as many others, these laws were opposed to the heathen rituals, which appointed fish-offerings to various deities. Besides the lepidotus, the oxyrhincus, the phagrus [ed., 'from its unwholesome qualities not eaten by the ancient Egyptians,' Wilkinson v. 251], latus and moleis were held sacred† in various parts of ancient Clement of Alex. (Stromat. 2 [ed. Sylb.], p. 168). It is no doubt an inference drawn by Barnabas himself from the general language of the legislator. Similarly is St. Athanasius (in Synops. in Lev. l. c.) to be understood when in reference to this law he says—Ταῦτα λέγει εἶναι καθάρα, ὅσα ἔχει πτερύγια καὶ λεπίδας, ὁ δὲ ἐστὶ τρύγλα (mullet), σκάρος, γλαῦκος, κιστροῦς, καὶ τὰ ὅμοια αὐτοῖς· τὰ δὲ λειπόμενα ἐν τῇ τοῦ νόμου ἀκρίβεια, καὶ οὐ βιωρτέα, ὁ δὲ ἐστὶ σπηλία (cuttle-fish). So St. Jerome: 'Ne gustaveritis carnem sepium et loliginum (a species of cuttle), murænzæ, et anguillæ, et universorum piscium qui squamas et pinnulas non habent,' (Epist. 151, quaest. 10; and comp. Tertullian, adv. Marcion, ii. 20).

* This phrase, נֶפֶשׁ חַיָּה, is perhaps the best explanation of נֶפֶשׁ in the sense of 'fish,' in Isaiah xix. 10.

† This Psalm was doubtless written during the reign of either Josiah or of one of his successors.—(Thrupp on the Psalms, vol. ii. p. 174).

* 'This law of Moses may have given rise to some casuistry, as many fishes have scales, which, though imperceptible when first caught, are very apparent after the skin is in the least dried.' (C. H. S. in first edition of this work).

† And similarly in the heathen observances of other nations; thus, Apua [query, Anchora] Veneri erat sacra; Concha [perhaps Parl-oyster] Veneri erat; Mullus Dianæ; pisces omnes Neptuno; Thunnus Neptuno. (Beyer, Addit. ad Seldeni Syntag. de Diis Syriis. Ugolini, Thes. xxxiii. 338. Vossius, in Hoffmanni Lexicon, iii. 771, has a much

Egypt (Clem. Alex.; Plutarch; Strabo; Athenæus, are the authorities referred to by Sir G. Wilkinson, v. 125). In the Ordinances of Menu, chap. v. (on Diet, Purification, etc.), sects. 15, 16, 'the twice-born man is commanded diligently to abstain from fish; yet the two fishes called pât'hina and rôhita may be eaten by the guests, when offered at a repast in honour of the gods or manes; and so may the râjiva, the sinhatunda, and the sasalca * of every species.' (Sir W. Jones' Laws of Menu, by Haughton, p. 146).

Taking fishes in the scientific sense of 'oviparous, vertebrated, cold-blooded animals, breathing water by means of gills or branchia, and generally provided with fins,' none are mentioned by name throughout the O. T. and N. T.; but regarded in the popular and inexact sense of aquatic animals, inhabitants more or less of the water, we meet with eleven instances, which require some notice here. (1.) That well-known Batrachian reptile, the frog (עֲרֹבָה, LXX. Βάτραχος, Vulg. Rana), which emerges from a fish-like infancy, breathing by gills instead of lungs, and respiring water instead of air, is often mentioned in Exod. viii., but only in two passages else, Ps. lxxviii. 45, and cv. 30 [TSEPHARDEA]. (2.) The Annelid, horse-leech, whose name occurs only once, Prov. xxx. 15 (עֲרֹבָה, LXX. Βέλλα, Vulg.

Sanguisuga). 'It would appear that the blood-sucking quality of this useful little animal is a direct and exclusive ordination of Providence for man's advantage. That blood is not the natural food of the animal is probable from the fact that, in the streams and pools which they inhabit, not one in a hundred could in the common course of things ever indulge such an appetite; and even when received into the stomach, it does not appear to be digested; for though it will remain there for weeks without coagulating or becoming putrid, yet the animal usually dies, unless the blood be vomited through the mouth' (Gosse's Zoology, ii. 374). Of course it is the smaller species, the Hirudo Medicinalis, that is here referred to. But the larger species, the Hæmopsis sanguisuga, or 'horse-leech,' has a still greater voracity for blood. Bochart (Hieros. ii. 796-802), and Schultens (Prov. in loc.), give another turn to Prov. xxx. 15, by identifying עֲרֹבָה with the Arabic عِلْوَق, and making fate or destiny, instead of the horse-leech, the insatiable exacter. The ancient versions, however, must be deemed to outweigh their learned speculations;

added to which the Arabic عِلْقَة, the Syriac ܥܠܩܬܐ, and the Chaldee and Talmudic עֲרֹבָה or עֲרֹבָה, all designate the leech, which is as abundant in the East as it ever was in our Western longer list of fourteen fishes, 'a veteribus pro Diis habiti.' Consecrated fishes were kept in reservoirs, with rings of gold, or silver, or brass, attached to them. So Sir J. Chardin in Harmer, iii. 58).

* We add the names of these fishes as known to us; the pât'hina is the sheat-fish (Silurus pelotius); the rôhita is the rôhi-fish (cyprinus denticulatus); the râjiva, a large fish (cyprinus niloticus); the other two sorts are probably shrimps and prawns. (Haughton's note, p. 441).

countries. The blood-appetite of this animal made it suitable to point a proverb; Horace says, non missuro culem, nisi plena cruoris, hirudo (De Arte Poet, 476). With which compare Plautus, Epidicus ii. 2, 4, 5; and Cicero ad Atticum, lib. i. epist. 13. (3). The testaceous mollusk [ostrea marina, Gesenius Thes. 1263], called by the Hebrews אֲרֶגְמָן; by Avicenna الرجوان (Alargiawan); by Galen Θαλασσία πορφύρα,* is the murex trunculus of zoology, from which the renowned Tyrian dye used to be obtained. This shell-fish (and not the 'purple' extracted from it), is with good reason supposed by Gesenius to be referred to, 'in the Canticles vii. 5, רֵלֶת רֶאשֶׁהָ, 'בְּאֶרְגָּמָן.' This in A. V. is 'the hair of thine head like purple.' But in the view of Gesenius (which is favoured by the context, where the other points of comparison are derived from palpable objects), it should run—in allusion to the convolute wreaths of the beautiful shell—The tresses of thine head are like the writhed shell of the purple-fish; reminding us of the ancient head-dresses of the Athenians, described by Thucydides, i. 6. 3; Χρυσῶν τετρίγων ἐνέρσει κρωβύλλον ἀναδούμενοι τῶν ἐν τῇ κεφαλῇ τριχῶν (comp. the conical head-tuft of the Roman Tutulus [Varro, de ling. latin. vii. 3. 90], and Virgil's Crines nodantur in aurum). A second reference to this shell-fish probably occurs in Ezek.

xxvii. 7, where the prophet mentions תְּכֵלֶת אֶרְגָּמָן תְּכֵלֶת אֱלִישָׁה (A. V., 'Blue and purple from the Isles of Elishah'). The Tyrians seem to have imported some murices from the Peloponnesus (the same as 'Elishah' according to Heeren, Researches, Asiatic Nations [Oxford trans.], i. 361); and Gesenius supposes that these, the material out of which the celebrated dye was procured, are referred to by the prophet in his enumeration of the Tyrian merchandise. That these fishes were supplied from the coast of Greece we learn from Horace, Od. ii. 18. 7 (Laconica purpurea); from Pausanias iii. 21. 6; and from Pliny ix. 36. (For other coasts which yielded these fishes, see Winer B. R. W. ii. 290, 291. (4) The other word used by Ezekiel in this passage, תְּכֵלֶת, is described by Gesenius, Thes. 1503, as 'a species of shell-fish (Conchylum, Helix ianthina [conchæ]), found cleaving to the rocks in the Mediterranean Sea, covered with a violet shell (Forskall, Descript. animal., p. 127), from which was procured a dark blue dye.' In the many other passages where these two words occur, they undoubtedly designate either the colours or the material dyed in them. The phrase, 'treasures hid in the sand,' Deut. xxxiii. 19, is supposed to refer to the abundance of the rich dyes afforded by the תְּכֵלֶת and other testaceous animals found in the sand, on the Phœnician coast, assigned to Zebulon and Issachar. (Targum of Jonathan b. Uziel, Walton, iv. 387, and Gesenius, Thes. 1503). (5.) The תַּנִּינִים (plur.

תַּנִּינִים or תַּנִּינִים) must be carefully distinguished from תַּנִּים, the plural of the unused word תַּן a jackal, according to Gesenius, Lexicon [by Robinson], p. 1138. 'The sea-monsters,' which are described by Jeremiah (Lament. iv. 3), as 'suckling their young,' used to be regarded as the mammiferous whales or other larger cetacea (Calmet by Taylor, 'Fragments' on Natural History, No. xxvi.) They are by Gesenius (l. c.) supposed to be rather תַּנִּים, jackals; this is the reading of some of the MSS. (Kennicott, ii. 546), and Gesenius accepts the Masorete text as an Aramaic form of it. In Ezek. xxix. 3; and xxxii. 2, the textual reading תַּנִּים, which is represented usually as an anomalous singular noun, should no doubt be תַּנִּין, the regular singular, which may well bear (what the other word could not) the suitable sense of crocodile; the MS. authority in favour of the latter word is overwhelming (Kennicott, ii. 212). For a description of the תַּנִּין, see CROCODILE; TANNEEN; WHALE. (6.) בְּהֵמֹת, Behemoth. (7.) לְוִיָּתָן, Leviathan; for descriptions of these aquatic animals see the respective articles, and CROCODILE.

(8.) 'The great fish,' דָּג גָּדוֹל, of Jonah i. 17 [דָּג in ii. 1], was probably some species of shark, such as the Zygena malleus, or the Carcharias vulgaris (the white shark), therefore, strictly a fish.* The difficulty that in the LXX. of Jonah, and in the Greek Testament (Matt. xii. 40), Kḗros is the word by which the fish is designated, is removed by the fact that this Greek term does not specifically indicate whales only, as the objection supposes, but any of the larger inhabitants of the deep. (Wesseling's Herodot., Fragm. de Incremento Nili, p. 789, as quoted in Valpy's Stephani Thes. s. v. Kḗros; here 'piscis,' as well as 'Bellua qualibet ingens, veluti crocodilus et hippopotamus,' are included. Accordingly Kḗros stands in the LXX., passim, for דָּג, as well as for תַּנִּין.

(See Schleusner, Lex. V. T. s. v. Kḗros). For more on the subject of this fish, see Kitto, Bible Illustr. vi. 399-404, and JONAH; TANNEEN. Admiral Smyth, in the chapter on Ichthyology, in his Mediterranean, p. 196, says the white shark has been called 'Jonæ piscis' from its transcendent claim 'to have been the great fish that swallowed the prophet, since he can readily engulf a man whole.' (9.) Of Tobit's fish, O. F. Fritzsche, in his Commentary on the passage [Tobit vi. passim] enumerates nine or ten speculations by different writers. According to Bochart and Helvigius, the Silurus has the best claim. This the former describes as 'being very large, of great strength and boldness, and ever ready to attack other animals, even men, an inhabitant of the rivers Euphrates and Tigris.' C. H. S., in the first edition of this work, combats Bochart's conclusions, and suggests, 'the Sesax of the Indus, a crocodile, probably of the genus Gavial, which grows to a great size, is eaten, and has a gall bladder, still used to cure obstinate wounds and deflections.' (But see Winer, B.R.W. i. 187, note 1). Glaire suggests the sturgeon, but this is more suitable to northern rivers. Pennant mentions the capture of one in the Esk weighing 464 lbs. (British Zoology, iii. 127). See more in Bochart, Heroes, v. 14; Glaire, Introduction de l'Antien. et du N. T. ii. 91 [ed. 3], Paris, 1862, and TOBIT. (10.) If Dr. French and Mr. Skinner, in their Translation of the Psalms, are right in rendering Ps. civ. 26, 'There swimmeth the nautilus and the whale,' etc. (as if the sacred writer meant to indicate a small, though conspicuous, as well as a large aquatic animal, as equally the object of God's care), we have in the נִינְיָא an unexpected addition to our Scripture nomenclature of fishes, in what Lord Byron calls—

* In 1 Maccab. iv. 23, this phrase 'purple of the sea,' has the force of unadulterated purple, as extracted from the fish. So Diodor. Sicul. (xvii. 70), uses the phrase ἐσθῆτες θαλαττῆλαι πορφύραις τετρακυκλόμεναι (C. L. W. Grimm, in. loc.)

* Of the same kind of huge fish, ἀδρῶποφάγος, does Amos speak in prophecy, ix. 3, 'I will command the serpent from the bottom of the sea, and he shall bite them.' Bochart, Hiemps, l. c. 4c. l. 40.

'The tender Nautilus who steers his prow,
The sea-born sailor of his shell canoe,
The ocean Mab, the fairy of the sea.'—The Island.

In their note the translators say; 'The nautilus—This little creature floats, at pleasure, upon the surface of the sea. Its shell resembles the hull of a ship, whence it has its name.' Mr. Thrupp accepts the new rendering as having 'much apparent probability' (Introduction to the Psalms, ii. 178).* We may add that it gives greater fitness to the 27th verse, which at present is hardly compatible with the 25th and 26th, owing to the intrusion of the clause, there go the ships. Replace this by the nautilus, and the coherence of the 27th verse with the two preceding is complete in all its terms. (11.) Our last specific fish is rather suggested than named in Ezek. xxix. 4, where the prophet twice mentions 'the fish of the rivers which cleave to the scales' [of the crocodile]. This description seems to identify this fish with the Echeneis Remora, so remarkable for the adhesive or sucking disc which covers the upper part of the head, and enables it to adhere to the body of another fish, or to the bottom of a vessel. (Its fabulous powers of being able even to arrest a vessel in her course are recorded by Pliny, Nat. Hist. xxxii. 1; it is mentioned by Aristotle, Hist. Anim. ii. 14, ἡ ἰχθυόδων τῶν δὲ καλοῦσι τῶν ἐχένηδων. It is also mentioned by Forskal as seen at Gidda, and by Hasselquist at Alexandria). The lump-sucker (Cyclopterus lumpus) is furnished with ventral fins which unite beneath the body and form a concave disc, by which the fish can with ease adhere to stones or other bodies. Either in the remora, with its adhesive apparatus above, or in the lump-sucker with a similar appendage below, or in both, we have in all probability the prophet's fishes, which cleave to the monster of the Nile. So much for the specific instances of aquatic animals mentioned in the Scriptures.

We proceed to suggest, in general terms, what were the fishes which frequented the Syrian waters,

* Another recent expositor of the Psalms, Dr. Justus Olshausen (page 402), remarks that 'the introduction of ships amongst the living creatures of the sea has always presented [etwas auffallendes] an obstacle' to the understanding of the sentence. The paper nautilus (Argonauta), frequents the Mediterranean. The verb נִינְיָא, to proceed, to walk, very well describes the stately progress of the nautilus as it floats upon the wave.

and supplied the ancient inhabitants with food abridging for this purpose the remarks of C. H. S. in the Art. FISH, in the first edition of this work;—['The species which were known to the Hebrews, or at least to those who dwelt on the coast, were probably very numerous, because the usual current of the Mediterranean sets in, with a great depth of water, at the Straits of Gibraltar, and passes eastward on the African side until the shoals of the delta of the Nile begin to turn it towards the north; it continues in that direction along the Syrian shores, and falls into a broken course only when turning westward on the Cyprian and Cretan coasts. Every spring, with the sun's return towards the north, innumerable troops of littoral species, having passed the winter in the offings of Western Africa, return northward for spawning, or are impelled in that direction by other unknown laws. A small part only ascends along the Atlantic coast of Spain and Portugal towards the British Channel, while the main bodies pass into the Mediterranean, follow the general current, and do not break into more scattered families until they have swept round the shores of Palestine.'] Lists of species of the fish frequenting various parts of the Mediterranean may be found in Risso (Ichthyol. de Nice), who describes 315 species he had observed at Nice; and in Adm. Smyth's Mediterranean, where in the chap. on Ichthyology he gives a list of about 300 fishes haunting the waters of Sicily, besides 240 crustacea, testacea, and mollusks. Admiral Smyth remarks generally of the Mediterranean fish, that, 'though mostly handsomer than British fishes, they are for the most part not to be compared with them in flavour' (pp. 192-209). Professor E. Forbes (in his Report on Aegean Invertebrata) divides that part of the East Mediterranean, in which for many years he conducted his inquiries, into eight regions of depth, each characterized by its peculiar fauna. 'Certain species,' he says, 'in each are found in no other; several are found in one region which do not range into the next above, whilst they extend to that below, or vice versa. Certain species have their maximum of development in each zone, being most prolific in individuals at that zone in which is their maximum, and of which they may be regarded as especially characteristic. Mingled with these true natives are stragglers, owing their presence to the secondary influences which modify distribution.' C. H. S. supposes the Syrian waters to be not less prolific. ['The coasts of Tyre and Sidon would produce at least as great a number. The name of the latter place, indeed, is derived from the Phœnician word fish' (see Gesenius, s. v. צִידָן, Sidon: the modern name has the same meaning, صيدا, Saida; Abulfar. Syria, p. 93.

See Winer, ii. 535, and SIDON); 'and it is the oldest fishing establishment for commercial purposes known in history. . . . The Hebrews had a less perfect acquaintance with the species found in the Red Sea, whither, to a certain extent, the majority of fishes found in the Indian Ocean resort. Beside these, in Egypt, they had anciently eaten those of the Nile' (for the fish of the Nile, see Rawlinson's Herodotus, ii. 119-121, and, more fully, Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians, iii. 58, and v. 248-254); 'subsequently, those of the lake of Tiberias and of the rivers falling into the Jordan' (Von Raumer, Palästina, p. 105, after Hasselquist, mentions the sparus galilæus, 'a sort of bream,' the silurus and mugil; and Reuchlin, in Herzog, after Dr. Barth, adds the labrus Niloticus as inhabiting this lake, which Dr. Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, p. 375, represents as 'abounding in fish of all kinds [comp. St. John xxi. 11, with St. Matt. xiv. 17 and xv. 34]. From the earliest times—so said the Rabbinical legends—this lake had been so renowned in this respect' [see Reland, p. 260, who quotes the Bava Bathra, of the Babylonian Gemara], 'that one of the ten fundamental laws laid down by Joshua was, that any one might fish with a hook in the Sea of Galilee. Two of the villages on the banks derived their name from their fisheries, the west and the east Bethsaida, "house of fish" [cf. the modern name of Sidon just mentioned]. The numerous streams which flow into the Jordan are also described by Dr. Stanley as full of fish, especially the Jabbok, p. 323; 'and they may have been acquainted with species of other lakes, of the Orontes, and even of the Euphrates. The supply, however, of this article of food, which the Jewish people appear to have consumed largely, came chiefly from the Mediterranean. From Neh. xiii. 16 we learn that Phœnicians of Tyre actually resided in Jerusalem as dealers in fish; which must have led to an exchange of that commodity for corn and cattle.'] C. H. S. proceeds to enumerate the most nutritious and common of the fishes which must have filled the Jewish markets ['there were genera of Perca (perch tribes); Scianida (much resembling the perches); and particularly the great tribe of the Scomberida (mackerel), with its numerous genera and still more abundant species, frequenting the Mediterranean in prodigious numbers, and mostly excellent for the table; but being often without perceptible scales they may have been of questionable use to the Hebrews. All the species resort to the deep seas, and foremost of them is the genus Thynnus, our tunny'], a fish often mentioned with honour by the ancients, from Aristotle downward; a specimen taken near Greenock, in 1831, was nine feet in length. Its flesh is highly prized, and from its great solidity it partakes much of the character of meat. Although repeatedly taken on the English coast, it is really a native of the Mediterranean, where it abounds, not only in Sicilian waters, but, in three or four species, in the Levant. The following complete C. H. S.'s catalogue; the Mugilidæ family (the sea mullets, mugiles, being valuable in every part of the Mediterranean); the Labridæ (or Wrasse of Pennant); and Cyprinidæ (carps), particularly abundant in the fresh waters of Asia. ['After these may be ranged the genus Momyrus, whereof the species, amounting to six or seven, are almost exclusively tenants of the Nile and the lake of Tiberias, and held among the most palatable fish which the fresh waters produce' . . . Cat or Sheat-fish (Silurida) are a family of numerous genera, all of which, except the Loricaria, are destitute of a scaly covering, and are consequently unclean to the Hebrews; though several of them were held by the ancient Gentile nations and by some of the modern in high estimation, such as the black fish, probably the shilbeh (Silurus Schilbe Niloticus) of the Nile and others. Of salmon (Salmonidæ), the Mylietes dentex or Hasselquisti, belongs to the most edible fishes of the Egyptian river; there were also Clupeidæ (herrings) and the Gadidæ (or cod), these last being present about Tyre; Pleuro- nectes (or flat fish) are found off the Egyptian coasts, and eel-shaped genera are bred abundantly in the lakes of the Delta.'] A comparison of this list of Col. H. Smith, with the enumeration of the ancient Egyptian fish given by Strabo (xvii. 823), or by Sir G. Wilkinson in his Ancient Egyptians (iii. 58), will shew us that some of the fish which have to the present day preserved their excellent character as wholesome food (such as some species of the *Perca*dæ [the 'gisher,' to wit] and the Labridæ [e.g., the 'bulti'], and the Cyprinidæ [e.g., the 'benni'; 'the carpe is a dayntous fische,' wrote old Leonard Maschal in 1514, when he introduced the fish into England]), were the identical diet which the children of Israel 'remembered' so invidiously at Taberah, when they ungratefully loathed the manna (Num. xi. 5).

The extreme value of fish as an article of food (our Lord seems to recognise it as sharing with bread the claim to be considered as a prime necessary of life, see St. Matt. vii. 9, 10) imparted to the destruction of fish the character of a Divine judgment (see Is. i. 2; Hosea iv. 3; Zeph. i. 3, comp. with Exod. vii. 18, 21; Ps. cv. 29; and Is. xix. 8). How fish is destroyed, largely in the way of God's judgment, is stated by Dr. E. Pococke on Hosea iv. 3, where he collects many conjectures of the learned, to which may be added the more obvious cause of death by disease,* such as the case mentioned by Welsted (Travels in Arabia, i. 310) of the destruction of vast quantities of the fish of Oman by an epidemic, which recurred nearly every five years. Certain waters are well known to be fatal to life. The instance of the Dead Sea, the very contrast† of the other Jordan lakes so full of life, is well described by the Rabbi J. Schwarz (Descriptive Geography of Palestine, pp. 41-45), and by Dr. Stanley (Sin. and Palest., pp. 290-294), and more fully by De Saulcy (Dead Sea and Bible Lands [passim]). But there are other waters equally fatal to fish life though less known, such as the lake called Canoudan in Armenia (کنودان, Avicenna, i.g. δχορον, without life), and that which

* Aristotle (Hist. Anim. viii. 19) mentions certain symptoms of disease among fish as known to skilful fishermen; but he denies that epidemics such as affect men and cattle fall upon them; ῥόσημα δὲ λοιμῶδες μὲν ἐν οὐδενὶ τοῖς ἰχθύσι φαίνεται ἐμπιπτον, ὅσον ἐπὶ τῶν ἀνθρώπων συμβαίνει πολλᾶκις, κ. τ. λ. In the next section he mentions the mullein plant (verbascum, πῶμος) as poisonous to fresh water and other fish.

† Contrast the present condition of this Sea of Death with the vitality which is predicted of it in the vision of Ezekiel (xlvi. 9, 10). Its healed waters and renovated fish 'exceeding many,' and 'the fishers which shall stand on it from Engedi even unto Eneglaïm,' and 'the places on its coast to spread forth nets'—all these features are in vivid opposition to the present condition of 'the Asphaltite lake.' Of like remarkable import is 2 Esdras v. 7, where the writer, among the signs of the times to come, predicts 'The Sodomitish sea shall cast out fish.' For ancient testimonies of the death which reigns over this lake, see St. Jerome on Ezekiel, lib. xiv.; Tacitus, Hist. v. 6; Diod. Sicul. ii. 48, and xix. 98; and the Nubian Geographer, iii. 5, as quoted by Bochart, Herzog, i. 40.

Ælian in his Hist. Animal., iii. 38, thus mentions : ἡ δὲ τὸ Φερεῶ λίμνη ἰχθύων ἀγρός ἐστιν. This epithet ἀγρός is applied to the Dead Sea itself by Josephus, Bell. Jud. v. 4 (Bochart, Hieros., i. 40).

The copious supply of fish in the waters of Palestine encouraged the art of fishing, to which frequent allusions are made both in the O. and in the N. T. The most prevalent method of catching their fish, in use among the Hebrews, was by nets, of various kinds and sizes. Four of these are mentioned (Winer, B. R. W. i. 374). Two in Habak. i. 15, 16, רֶשֶׁת (LXX. ἀμφίβληστρον : no doubt in v. 16 this word and σαγήνη have been by some means transposed; verse 17 compared with verse 15 makes this evident), the casting-net Matt. iv. 18 (δίκτυον), and Mark i. 16; and סַכְסַכִּי (LXX. σαγήνη), the drag-net [a larger kind], see Matt. xiii. 48. The third occurs Eccl. ix. 12, מַצְוֵה (LXX. ἀμφίβληστρον), a casting net. The fourth רֶשֶׁת (LXX. παγίς), a fowler's net as well as a fisher's. In Ps. xxxv. 7, 8 the רֶשֶׁת, net, is used with תַּחַטְּ, a pit ['They have hid for me their net in a pit'], the allusion would seem to be to that mode of winter-fishing which Aristotle describes as practised by the Phœnicians; 'Ορύττουσι τάσθρον εἰς τὸν ποταμὸν διὰ ξηροῦ· εἰτα ταύτην καταστράπτουσιν χόρτω καὶ λῦδοις, φωλεὸν ποιοῦσιν ἐκδύσει ἔχοντα ἐκ τοῦ ποταμοῦ καὶ θῶν πάγος ἢ, ἐκ τούτου κύρτω (a fishing basket) Ὁρμεῖουσιν τοὺς ἰχθύς (Hist. Animal. viii. 20). Net-fishing is still used on the lake of Tiberias (Dr. Pococke, Descrip. of the East, ii. 69; 'We went on the lake in a boat, and diverted ourselves by fishing with casting-nets, which they use here : sometimes the net is thrown from the shore, or from a rock [ibid.]).

This mode of fishing prevailed in Palestine, and is a prominent feature of the piscatorial associations in the Gospel history to the very last (see St. John xxi. 6, 8, 11). It is certainly less characteristic of Egyptian fishing of which we have frequent mention in the O. T. The instruments therein employed, were the רֶשֶׁת (LXX. ἀγκίστρον, comp. St. Matt. xvii. 27), angling-hook, for smaller fish; Is. xix. 8; Hab. i. 15. These hooks were (for disguise) made to resemble thorns [on the principle of the fly-fishing instruments, though not in the same manner; for the Egyptians, neither anciently nor now, seem to have put winged insects on their hooks to attract their prey; Wilkinson, iii. 54], and were thence called רֶשֶׁת, Amos iv. 2 (from their resemblance to thorns, Gesenius, Lex. s. v.); and (in the case of the larger sort) רֶשֶׁת, A.V. 'barbed irons'; Job xli. 7 [xl. 31]. Another name for these thorn-like instruments was רֶשֶׁת, Amos iv. 2 [a generic word, judging from the LXX., θάλα]. רֶשֶׁת was either a hook or a ring put through the nostrils of fish to let them down again alive into the water (Gesenius); or (it may be) a crook by which fishes were suspended to long poles, and carried home after being caught (such as is shewn in plate 344 [from a tomb near the Pyramids] in Wilkinson, iii. 56). The word is used in Job xli. 2 [Hebr. Bib. xl. 26] with מַצְוֵה, a cord of rushes (σχοῖνος). Rosenmüller, in loc., applies these two words to the binding of larger fish to the bank of the river until wanted, after they are captured, and quotes Bruce for instances of such a practice in modern Egyptian fishing. Though we have so many terms for the hook, it is doubtful whether any have come down to us denoting the line; רֶשֶׁת and רֶשֶׁת, though the most nearly connected with piscatorial employment, hardly express our notion of a line for angling (see Gesenius, s.v.); while רֶשֶׁת and רֶשֶׁת (thread, twine) are never used in Scripture for fishing purposes. The large fish-spear, or harpoon, used for destroying the crocodile and hippopotamus was called רֶשֶׁת (Job xli. 7 [Hebr. Bib. xl. 31], comp. with Wilkinson, iii. 72, 73). רֶשֶׁת means a cymbal or any clanging instrument, and this seems to have led to the belief of fishes being attracted and caught by musical sounds; stories of such, including Arion and the dolphin, are collected by J. G. Schellhorn in his Dissertation on the רֶשֶׁת of Job (Ugolini, Thes. xxix. 329, etc.) 'The Egyptian fishermen used the net; it was of a long form, like the common drag-net, with wooden floats on the upper, and leads on the lower side; though sometimes let down from a boat, those who pulled it generally stood on the shore and landed the fish on a shelving bank' (Wilkinson, ii. 21). This net is mentioned in Is. xix. 8, under the name מַצְוֵה. It is, however, doubtful whether this be anything more than a frame, somewhat between a basket and a net, resembling the landing net represented in Wilkinson, iii. 55. The Mishna (vi. 76, 116) describes it by the word מַצְוֵה, nassa, corbis piscatoria, a basket. Maillet (Epist. ix.) expressly says that 'nets for fishing are not used in Egypt.' If this be so, the usage has much altered since the times which Wilkinson has described. Frames for fishing attached to stakes driven into the bottom were prohibited in the lake of Tiberias, 'because they are an impediment to boats' (Talmudic Gloss, quoted by Lightfoot, Horæ Hebr. on Matt. iv. 18). No such prohibition existed in Egypt, where wicker traps, now as anciently, are placed at the mouths of canals, by which means a great quantity of fish is caught (Rawlinson, Herod. ii. 232, note). The custom of drying fish is frequently represented in the sculptures of Upper and Lower Egypt (p. 127, note). On the west side of Jerusalem was the fish-gate, which is mentioned in Neh. iii. 3, and three other passages. This probably derived its name from a fish-market there. According to Aristotle (Hist. Anim. viii. 19) comp. with St. Luke v. 5, the night was the best time for fishing operations : ἀλλοκονταὶ δὲ μέγιστα οἱ ἰχθύες πρὸ ἡλίου ἀνατολῆς καὶ μετὰ τὴν δύση—'before sunrise and after sunset.'—P. FITCHES. [QETSACH.]

FLACH or FLACIUS, surnamed ILLYRICUS, a celebrated theologian of the 16th century, was born at Albona in Istria, A.D. 1520, and died at Frankfurt on the Maine, 1575. In 1539 he went to Basel, where he was greatly aided in his studies by Simon Grynaeus and others. From Basel he repaired to Tübingen in 1540. In 1541 he went to Wittenberg, and heard there Luther and Melancthon. In 1544 he was appointed professor of Hebrew at Wittenberg. In consequence of the war he was obliged to fly to Brunswick, but he returned and resumed his functions in 1549. Having differed with Melancthon, he left Wittenberg, and established himself at Magdeburg, where he soon found himself at the head of the rigid Lutherans. In 1557 he was appointed professor of theology at Jena. In 1562, being deprived of his place, and ordered to leave the states of the Duke of Weimar, he retired to Ratisbon. In 1566 he was invited to Antwerp, along with others, to take the direction of the evangelical church newly formed there; but as it was soon persecuted, he was obliged to flee to Strasburg. Thence he withdrew to Frankfurt, where he died. Flacius was a learned theologian; but, like most of the rigidly orthodox, fiery, bitter, and intolerant in spirit. He wrote a great deal: most of it was controversial. The only works of his that belong to our department are, Clavis Scripturae Sacrae, Bâle, 1567, folio; Glossa compendiaria in Novum Testamentum, Bâle, 1570, folio; Ecclesiastica Historia, integrum ecclesiae Christi ideam secundum singulas centurias perspicuo ordine complectens, Bâle, 1559-1574, folio, 13 vols.—This is the celebrated work known as the Magdeburg centuries. Flacius was assisted by various others in its composition. Baronius's Annales ecclesiastici (1588-1607) were undertaken to refute it. See Twisten's Matthias Flacius Illyricus, eine Vorlesung, 1844.—S. D.

FLAG. [ACHU.]

FLAGONS. The Hebrew term which is thus translated in the A. V. in all the passages where it occurs, excepting one, is אֶשְׁכֶּלֶת, which, according to the best modern lexicographers, means a flat cake of pressed grapes. Gesenius distinguishes it from צֶמֶד, a bunch of dried grapes, and from רֶגֶלֶת, a lump or cake of figs. The meaning flagon (sextarius) is founded on an erroneous derivation from the numeral שֵׁשׁ. It occurs in 2 Sam. vi. 19, ἀγαγον ἀπὸ τρυφάνου; similam frixam oleo; where the words of wine, in the A. V., are an addition; 1 Chron. xvi. 3, ἀποστρυψάμενοι, frixam oleo similam; Cant. ii. 5, ἐν μύρῳ, floribus; Hosea iii. 1, πέμματα μετὰ σταφίδος, vinacia uvarum; the word עֲנָבִים translated in the A. V. wine, uniformly means grapes, as in the marginal reading.

In the A. V. of Is. xxii. 24, flagon is used for the Hebrew בִּבְלִי, which sometimes means a bottle or vessel, but often a musical instrument, probably from its shape (Name eines bauchigen Ton-Instruments, Fürst, H. W. B., s. v.), as in the marginal reading, instruments of viols; the Vulg. has omne vas musicorum. On the terms used by the LXX., Schleusner may be consulted with advantage.—J. E. R.

FLATT, JOHANN FRIED. VON, D.D., prelate and professor of theology at Tübingen, was born 20th Feb. 1759, and died 24th Nov. 1821. His contributions to Biblical literature consist chiefly of some volumes of exegetical lectures published from his notes after his death. We have, in this form, from his pen, Vorlesungen üb. d. Br. an die Galater und Ephesier, Tüb. 1823; Vorles. üb. die Br. an die Philipper, Koloss. Thessal. und an Phillem, Tüb. 1829, both edited by Kling; Vorles. üb. d. Br. an d. Römer, Tüb. 1825; Vorles. üb. die

Br. an d. Korinther, Tüb. 1833, both edited by Hoffmann; Vorles. üb. die Br. an den Tim. und Tit. nebst einer allgem. Einleitung über die Br. Pauli, edited by Kling, Tüb. 1831. The notes in these works are generally brief; but they are marked by sound learning, clearness, and good sense.—W. L. A.

FLAX. [PISHTAH.]

FLEA. [PAR'OSH.]

FLESH (פֶּשֶׁת). This word bears a variety of significations in Scripture:—

1. It is applied, generally, to the whole animated creation, whether man or beast; or, to all beings whose material substance is flesh (Gen. vi. 13, 17, 19; vii. 15, etc.).

2. But it is more particularly applied to 'man-kind;' and is, in fact, the only Hebrew word which answers to that term (Gen. vi. 12; Ps. xlv. 3; cxlv. 21; Is. xl. 5, 6). In this sense it is used somewhat figuratively to denote that evil principle which is opposed to the spirit and to God, and which it is necessary to correct and subdue (Gen. vi. 3; Job x. 4; Is. xxxi. 3; Matt. xvi. 17; Gal. i. 26, etc.).

3. The word 'flesh' is opposed to נֶפֶשׁ nephesh, 'soul,' or 'spirit,' just as we oppose body and soul (Job xiv. 22; Prov. xiv. 30; Is. x. 18).

4. The ordinary senses of the word, namely, the flesh of men or beasts (Gen. xli. 2, 19; Job xxxiii. 25), and flesh as used for food (Exod. xvi. 12; Lev. vii. 19), are both sufficiently obvious; and with respect to the latter, see FOOD.

5. The word 'flesh' is also used as a modest general term for the secret parts, in such passages as Gen. xvii. 11; Exod. xxviii. 42; Lev. xx. 2; Ezek. xliii. 20; 2 Peter ii. 7, 8, 10; Jude 7. In Prov. v. 11 the 'flesh of the intemperate' is described as being consumed by infamous diseases.—J. K.

FLEURY, CLAUDE, was born at Paris, Dec. 6, 1640. He was educated in the Jesuit's College at Clermont. His father, who was an advocate, wished him to follow the same profession, but his preference for the clerical vocation was so strong, that after nine years' practice in the law, he took priest's orders. In 1672 he became tutor to the Prince of Conti, who was brought up with the Dauphin, and afterwards to the Count de Vermandois, a natural son of Louis XIV., who died in 1683. In 1689 Fleury was appointed sub-preceptor (with the illustrious Fénelon) to the Princes of Burgundy, Anjou, and Berri, and on the completion of their education, was made Prior of Argenteuil. Louis XV. chose him for his father confessor on account of his moderation in reference to the Jansenist controversy, and this office he held till his death, July 14, 1723. His works are numerous. The first was his Catéchisme historique, Paris, 1679; translated into Spanish 1707, and into German 1718. We may also mention his Moeurs des Israélites, Paris, 1681, of which there is an English translation by Dr. Adam Clarke; Mœurs des Chrétiens, Paris, 1662; Institution au droit ecclésiastique, 2 vols., Paris, 1687; translated into Latin by Gruber 1724-1733. But his great work is his Histoire Ecclesiastique from the Ascension to A.D. 1414; Paris, 1691-1720. A continuation, written with very inferior ability, by Claude Fabre, a priest of the Oratory, and La Croix, a Carmelite monk, brings the history down to 1778. Fleury's own work is written in a devout and liberal spirit, with a constant protest against the corruptions of the Church, and the union of the secular with the spiritual power. A Latin translation (including the continuation) appeared at Augsburg, 1757-1793, and a German translation at Frankfort-on-Maine, 14 vols. 4to, 1752. The 'Abrégé de l'histoire ecclésiastique de Fleury,' Bern, 1766, is ascribed to Frederic the Great. His 'Discours sur les libertés de l'église Gallicane' was published soon after his death, Paris, 1724.—J. E. R.

FLUX, BLOODY, a disease under which the father of Publius, the governor of Melita, laboured at the time of Paul's visit to that island (Acts xxviii. 8). Luke, with professional accuracy, describes the disease as μυερός καὶ δυσεντερία. Dysentery is always accompanied with febrile symptoms, and frequently with intermittent fever, the presence of which in the case of the father of Publius, Luke intimates by the use of the plural. [FEVER.] Dysentery is a common disease in all warm climates, and is frequently epidemic; it is a disease at once painful and dangerous, and it often assumes a chronic form, which is very difficult to cure. It has been suggested that it was of chronic dysentery, followed by prolapsus ani, that King Jehoram died (2 Chron. xxi. 15, 19); but the manner in which the historian speaks of Jehoram's disease, as a special and awful judgment inflicted by God, renders it improbable that it was a disease so familiar to the Jews as dysentery must have been.—W. FOOD. Under this head we shall consider—
I. The materials of food mentioned in the Bible; and II. The methods of preparing them for use; referring for the customs connected with the consumption of them to the article BANQUETS.

I. The original grant of the Creator made over to man the use of the vegetable world for food (Gen. i. 29), with the exception of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil (Gen. ii. 17), and apparently also the tree of life (iii. 22). So long as man continued in Paradise, he doubtless restricted his choice of food within the limits thus defined; but whether, as is commonly stated, we are to regard this as characteristic of the entire period between the creation of Adam and the grant of animal food to Noah after the flood (Gen. ix. 3), admits of doubt. It is doing no violence to the passage last cited to view it rather in the light of an ordinance intended to regulate a practice already in use, than as containing the first permission of that practice; and when we consider that man is by his original constitution omnivorous, that there are special adaptations in his frame, as made by God, for the use of animal food, that from the beginning he was acquainted with the use of fire, that from the beginning there was a distinction known to him between clean and unclean animals (Gen. vii. 2, 8), corresponding apparently to a distinction between animals good for food and animals not so, and that the pastoral was as early as the agricultural occupation among men; it seems more probable than otherwise that the use of animal food was not unknown to the antediluvians. Perhaps some fierce or cruel custom connected with the use of raw flesh, such as Bruce found in his day among the Abyssinians, and such as Moses glances at (Exod. xii. 9), may have prevailed among the more barbarous and ferocious of the antediluvians; and it may have been in order to check this that the communication recorded Gen. ix. 2-5 was made to Noah. It is not, however, to be overlooked that, in the traditions of antiquity, the early age of the world was represented as one in which men did not use animal food (Diod. Sic. i. 43; ii. 38; Ovid, Metam. i. 101, ff.; xv. 96, ff.; Fast. iv. 395, ff.).

In the Patriarchal age the food of the ancestors of the Hebrews comprised the flesh of animals both tame and wild, as well as the cereals. We read of their using not only cakes of fine meal, but also milk and butter, and the flesh of the calf, the kid, and game taken by hunting (Gen. xviii. 6-8; xxvii. 3, 4). They used also leguminous food, and a preparation of lentiles [ADASHIM] seems to have been a customary and favourite dish with them (Gen. xxv. 34). They made use also of honey (עֲבֵךְ, either honey of bees or syrup of grapes), spices, nuts [BOTNIM], and almonds [SHAKED], (Gen. xliii. 11).

During their residence in Egypt the Israelites shared in the abundance of that land; there they 'sat by the flesh-pots, and did eat bread to the full' (Exod. xvi. 3); and amid the privations of the wilderness they remembered with regret and murmuring 'the fish which they did eat in Egypt freely; * the cucumbers and the melons, and the leeks and the onions, and the garlic' (Num. xi. 5). These vegetable products have always formed an important part of the food of the people of Egypt; and the abundant use also of animal food by them is sufficiently attested by the monuments (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, ii. 367-374).

In their passage through the wilderness, the want of the ordinary materials of food was miraculously supplied to the Israelites by the manna. [MAN, 2.] As it was of importance that their flocks and herds should not be wholly consumed or even greatly reduced before their entering on the promised land, they seem to have been placed under restrictions in the use of animal food, though this was not forbidden (Lev. xvii. 3, ff.); and when their longing for this food broke out into rebellious murmurs, a supply was sent to them by means of large flocks of a species of partridge [SELAV] very much in use in the East (Exod. xvi. 11-13; Num. xi. 31; comp. Diod. Sic. i. 60).

When they reached the promised land, 'the land flowing with milk and honey,' abundance of all kinds of food awaited the favoured people. The rich pasture-lands of Palestine enabled them to rear and maintain large flocks and herds; game of various kinds was abundant in the more mountainous and uninhabited districts; fish was largely supplied by the rivers and inland seas, and seems to have been used to a considerable extent (2 Chron. xxxiii. 14; Neh. iii. 3; Matt. vii. 10; xiv. 17; xv. 34; Luke xxiv. 42; John xxi. 6-14), so that the destruction of it was represented as a special judgment from God (Is. l. 2; Hos. iv. 3; Zeph. i. 3) [FISH]. In the Mosaic code express regulations are laid down as to the kinds of animals that may be used in food (Lev. xi.; Deut. xiv.) Those expressly permitted are, of beasts, the ox, the sheep, the goat, the hart, the roebuck, the fallow-deer, the wild goat, the pygarg, the wild ox, the chamois, and in general every beast that parteth the hoof and cleaveth the cleft into two claws [that is, where the hoof is completely parted, and each part is separately cased in bone], and cheweth the cud; of fish, all that have scales and fins; of fowls, all clean birds, that is, all except the carnivorous and piscivorous birds; of insects, the locust [ARPEH], the bald locust [SALEAM], the beetle [CHARGOL], and the grasshopper [CHAGAB]. Whether the Hebrews attended to the rearing of gallinaceous fowls remains matter of doubt [BARBURIM; BIRDS; COCK.]

Besides animals declared to be unclean, the Israelites were forbidden to use as food anything which had been consecrated to idols (Exod. xxxiv. 15); animals which had died of disease or been torn by wild beasts (Exod. xxii. 31; Lev. xxii. 8; comp. Ezek. iv. 14), and certain parts of animals, viz., the blood (Lev. xxvii. 10; xix. 26; Deut. xii. 16-23), the fat covering the intestines, the kidneys, and the fat covering them, the fat of any part of the ox, or sheep, or goat, especially the fat tail of certain sheep (Exod. xxix. 13-22; Lev. iii. 4-9, 10; ix. 19). They were also forbidden to use any food or liquids occupying a vessel into which the dead body of any unclean beast had fallen, as well as all food and liquids which had stood uncovered in the apartment of a dead or dying person (Num. xix. 15). The eating of a kid boiled in the milk or fat of its mother was also prohibited (Exod. xxiii. 19; xxxiv. 26; Deut. xiv. 21). These restrictions rested chiefly, doubtless, on religious and theocratic grounds [FAT], but for some of them reasons of a sanitary kind may also have existed. It belonged to the essence of the theocratic system that the people should be constantly surrounded by what reminded them of their separation to Jehovah, and the need of keeping themselves free from all that would level or lower the distinction between them and the nations around them. For this reason specific restrictions were laid upon their diet, which were not attended to by other nations, nor were in every case insisted on in the case of strangers dwelling within their bounds (Deut. xiv. 21). This does not, however, preclude our admitting that reasons of a social or political kind may have also conspired to render these restrictions desirable. In warm climates the importance of avoiding contagion renders the utmost caution necessary in handling whatever may have been exposed to the influence of a corpse; and it is well known that the use of adipose matter in food requires, in such climates, to be restricted within narrow limits. The peculiar prohibition of a kid boiled in its mother's milk was ordained probably for the purpose of avoiding conformity to some idolatrous usage, or for the purpose generally of encouraging humane feelings on the part of the Israelites towards their domesticated animals (Winer, R. W. B., art. Speisegesetze; Spencer, De Legg. Hebr. Ritvall., bk. ii. ch. 8; Michaelis, Mos. Recht, iv. 200).

Subject to these restrictions, the Israelites were free to use for food all the produce of their fertile and favoured land. 'Thou shalt bestow thy money,' said God to them, 'for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, for oxen, or for sheep, or for wine, or for strong drink, and thou shalt eat thereof before the Lord thy God, and thou shalt rejoice, thou and thy household' (Deut. xiv. 26). And in the enumeration of blessings conferred by God on Israel, we find 'honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock, butter of kine, and milk of sheep, with fat of lambs, and rams of the breed of Bashan, and goats, with the fat of kidneys of wheat,' specified as among his free gifts to his people (Deut. xxxii. 13, 14). Though allowed this wide range, however, of animal food, the Hebrews do not seem to have in ordinary life availed themselves of it. The usual food of the people appears to have consisted of milk and its preparations [MILK; CHEESE], honey, bread, and vegetables of various sorts; and only at the royal table was animal food in daily use (1 Kings iv. 23; Neh. v. 18). The animals commonly used for food were calves (Gen. xviii. 7; 1 Sam. xxviii. 24; Amos vi. 4); these were fattened for the purpose, and hence were called fatlings, or fatted calves (μωβοῦς στευνός, Luke xv. 23; στυνός, Matt. xxii. 4); lambs (2 Sam. xii. 4; Amos vi. 4); sheep (1 Sam. xiv. 34; xxv. 18; 1 Kings iv. 23); oxen stall-fed, or from the pastures (1 Kings i. 9; iv. 23; 2 Chron. xviii. 2; Matt. xxii. 4); fat cattle (שׂוֹרֵי חֵלֶב), a particular kind of the bovine genus peculiar to Bashan, supposed by some to be a species of buffalo or ure-ox, but not to be confounded with the fatling or fatted calf above mentioned, 2 Sam. vi. 13; 1 Kings i. 9; Amos v. 22; Ezek. xxxix. 18); kids (1 Sam. xvi. 20); and various kinds of game, such as the ajil, the tsibi, and the jachmur (1 Kings v. 3 [iv. 23, A. V.]) The articles brought by Abigail to David were bread, sheep, parched [roasted] corn, raisins, and figs (1 Sam. xxv. 18); when Ziba met David on his flight from Absalom he brought to him bread, raisins, and summer fruits [FRUITS] (2 Sam. xvi. 1); and the present of Barzillai to the king consisted of wheat, barley, flour, roasted corn, beans, lentils,* honey, butter, sheep, and cheese (2 Sam. xvii. 28). We may presume from this that these formed the principal articles of food among the Jews at this time. Besides raisins or grapes dried in the sun, they used grapes pressed into cakes (כֶּמֶח); they had also fig-cakes (רִבְלִים). On special occasions they probably indulged in more costly viands; in times of famine they resorted to even very vile food; in seasons of affliction they abstained from all delicacies, and even sometimes from all food; and to prisoners the food allowed seems to have been only bread and water (1 Kings xxii. 27; Jer. xxxvii. 21).

* The text. rec. repeats קל twice in this passage; in the former instance the A. V. renders it by 'parched corn,' in the latter by 'parched pulse.' De Wette translates the latter 'auch geröstet.' It is wanting in the LXX., Syr., Arab., and is probably to be omitted.

Besides the vegetables above mentioned, the Jews were acquainted with the melon, the cucumber, the mallow, the leek, the onion, garlic, and bitter herbs [ABATTICHIM; QISHUIM; MALLUACH; CHATZIZ; BETZAL; SHUMIM; MERORIM]. In Job

vi. 6 mention is made of רִיר חֲסִמֶת, which Gesenius would translate purslain-slime, or purslain-broth = something extremely insipid (Theo. p. 480). The reasons he gives for this are not without force, but cannot be held conclusive. The A. V. follows the Rabbinical interpretation, which Rosenmüller, Ewald, etc., also approve; Lee (in loc.) and Fürst prefer understanding it of the whey of curdled milk; Renan translates it le jus de la mauve.

The drinks of the Hebrews were, besides water, which was their ordinary beverage, milk, wine, and לֶחֶם, which in the A. V. is rendered strong drink [SHECHAR]. To give the water a greater relish, they probably sometimes dissolved a portion of fig-cake in it, according to the fashion of the Arabs at the present day (Niebuhr, Arab. p. 57). The wines used were of various sorts, and sometimes their effect was strengthened by mingling different kinds together, or by the mixture with them of drugs (Ps. lxxv. 9; Prov. ix. 23, 30; Is. v. 22). A species of delicacy seems to have been furnished by 'spiced wines,' that is, wines flavoured by aromatic herbs, or perhaps simply by the juice of the pomegranate (Song viii. 2). No mention is made in Scripture of the mixing of water with wine for the purpose of drinking it; the reference in Is. i. 22 being to the adulteration of wine by fraudulent dealers; but the habit was so common in ancient times (comp. Odys. i. 110; ix. 208 ff.; Hippocrates De Morb. iii. 30; Lucian Asin. vii.; Plin. Hist. Nat. xxiii. 22) that we can hardly doubt that it was known also among the Hebrews [WINE]. Vinegar, חֶמֶץ, was also used by them as a means of quenching thirst (Ruth ii. 14; Num. vi. 3); mixed with oil this is still a favourite in the East, and mixed with water it was drunk by the Roman soldiers and poor under the name of posca (Plin. N. H. xix. 29; xxii. 58; Plaut. Mil. Glor. iii. 2, 23).

The Hebrews made use of condiments to heighten the flavour of their dishes as well as of spices to increase the effect of their wines. Besides the general condiment salt, they used cummin, dill [ANETHON], mint [HEDUOSMON], coriander [GAD], rue [PEGANON], mustard [SINAPIS], and the seeds of an herb to which they gave the name of קֶצֶח [QETSACH]. Sometimes their made dishes were so richly flavoured that the nature of the meat used could not be discovered (Gen. xxvii. 9, 25). Besides myrrh, with which they flavoured their wines, the Hebrews used various odiferous products [AHALIM; KOPHER; QETZIA; QIDDAH; QINAMON]; but whether they used any of these with food is uncertain.

II. The early acquaintance of the race with the use of fire renders it probable that from the beginning men used some process of cooking in the preparation of their food, except in the case of such products as are more agreeable to the palate in a crude than in a concocted state. The cereals were sometimes eaten raw (Lev. xiii. 14; Deut. xxiii. 25; 2 Kings iv. 42; Matt.

xii. 1); but from an early period it was customary to roast the grains, and so prepare them for food (Lev. ii. 14; comp. Robinson, B. R. ii. 394).

This received the name of קָלִי, more fully אֶבֶן קָלִי and קָלִי אֶשׁ, A. V. 'parched corn;' and was eaten either dry or formed into a sort of porridge, perhaps something after the manner of the pilaw in the East at the present day. This was not peculiar to the Hebrews; even as late as the time of Virgil roasting was a recognised method of preparing corn for use (Georg. i. 267), though this may have been only preparatory to bruising it (comp. Servius on Æn. i. 179; Plin. N. H. xviii. 18, 23). For the preparation and kinds of bread in use among the Hebrews, see BREAD and MILL.

Vegetables were cooked by boiling, and seem to have been made into a pottage (יִרְיָה), the niph. part. of רָוַה, to boil, Gen. xxv. 30, 34; 2 Kings iv. 38, 39), probably strengthened by the addition of some oily substance, such as butter or fat, or by having bones and gristles boiled down with them as is still customary in the East (Shaw, Travels. p. 125, cited by Jahn, Archæol. I. ii. p. 190).

When animal food was to be used, the animal was killed in such a way as to allow all the blood to leave the carcase, in order scrupulously to observe the prohibition, Exod. xxii. 31. Among the modern Jews, this is accomplished by cutting the throat of the animal quite through, and then suspending the carcase so as to allow all the blood to run out; the entrails with the fat are removed, the nerves and veins extracted, and strict search is made lest any drop of blood should be allowed to remain in any part (Buxtorf, Syn. Jud. c. xxvii.) The flesh thus prepared for cooking was commonly boiled in water (בְּסֵל Pih. of בָּשַׁל),* probably also sometimes in milk as is still the case among the Arabs. Before being put into the pot, the flesh freed from the skin appears to have been cut into small pieces, or perhaps this was done during the process of cooking (Mic. iii. 3, comp. Hitzig, in loc.) The broth and the flesh were served up separately (Judg. vi. 19), and both were eaten with bread. Salt was used to season the food, spices were also occasionally introduced, and highly flavoured dishes were sometimes prepared (Ezek. xxiv. 10; Gen. xxvii. 4; Prov. xxiii. 3). For boiling, the caldron or pot was used [CALDRON]; and the fuel was commonly wood, especially thorns (Eccles. vii. 6; Ps. lviii. 9; Is. xlv. 16; Ezek. xxiv. 10), sometimes the dried excrement of animals (Ezek. iv. 15), a species of fuel still much used in the east (Irby's and Mangles' Travels, p. 172; Rae Wilson's Travels, ii. 156; Hue's Travels, passim). Food was also prepared by roasting (צֶלֶה). This was regarded as the more luxurious mode of preparation, and was resorted to chiefly on festive occasions. The paschal lamb was to be roasted whole (Exod. xii. 4, 6), but it does not appear that this was the usual method of roasting flesh; it is more probable that the ancient Hebrews, like the modern Arabs, roasted their meat in small portions, by means of short spits of wood or metal placed near the fire, and turned as the process of cooking required (comp. Odys. iii. 461-2 et saepe; Il. i. 465, etc.) Birds were roasted whole on such a spit. The Persians roast lambs and calves entire, by placing them in an oven (Tavernier i. 269; Chardin iii. 88), and this may also have prevailed among the Hebrews. Among the poor, locusts were eaten roasted, as is still common among the Arabs, whose method of cooking them is as follows: the feet and wings having been plucked off, and the entrails taken out, the body is salted, and then roasted by means of a wooden spit, on which a row of bodies similarly prepared are strung. Fish were usually broiled (Luke xxiv. 42; John xxi. 9), but it would seem that they were sometimes cured, or at least brought into a state in which they could be used without further cooking (Matt. xiv. 17, 19; xv. 34, 36). In either case they were eaten with bread.

* The radical meaning of this word seems to be the bringing of anything to a fit state for food; hence it is used of the ripening of grain (Joel iv. [A. V. iii.] 13), and of cooking generally by whatever means done (Ezek. xxiv. 5; Deut. xvi. 7).

In primitive times, the mistress of the house presided over the cooking of the food, as the master of the house charged himself with the slaughtering of the animals required (Gen. xviii. 6, 8; Judg. vi. 19; comp. Il. xxiv. 622, and Odys. ii. 300). Among the Egyptians, servants who were professional cooks took charge of preparing the food (Wilkinson Anc. Egypt., ii. 382 ff.); and in later times among the Hebrews, similar functionaries were employed, both male and female (מַבְחָה, Sam. ix. 23, 24; מַבְחָה, Sam. viii. 13).

The culinary utensils were פֶּרֶד, a deep pan (Num. xi. 8; Judg. vi. 19; 1 Sam. ii. 14); רֹדֶד; קַלְחָת [CALDRON]; בִּיזָר, a basin or pan (Exod. xxx. 18; 1 Sam. ii. 14); סֶפֶל; צֵלָה; כַּף [DISH]; מַחֲבֵת, an iron pan; מִרְחֶשֶׁת, a frying pan (Lev. ii. 5-7; vii. 9); חֲבָתִים, pans (1 Chron. ix. 31); מִזְלֶה, a fork or flesh-hook with which flesh was drawn from the pot (1 Sam. ii. 13, 14), and perhaps the flesh separated from the bones in the pot (Mic. iii. 3); כִּירִים, a word of doubtful significance, rendered by the LXX. χυτροσφοδες (Lev. xi. 34), by the Syr. ܟܝܪܐ place of pots, by Gesenius range for pots, by Fürst hearth for cooking, consisting of two rows of stones meeting at an angle, by Rosenmüller a place in the hearth under which was fire, and on the surface of which were orifices, over which pots were placed, and by Knobel an earthenware stew-pan (Ravius, De re cibaria vet. Heb., Traj. ad Rhen. 1768; Parcau Antiquitas Hebr. p. 388 ff.; Jahn Archæologie, i Th., Bd. ii. p. 167 ff.; Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, II. ch. 5-7).—W. L. A.

FOOL. The fool of Scripture is not an idiot, but an absurd person; not one who does not reason at all, but one who reasons wrong; also any one whose conduct is not regulated by the dictates of reason and religion. Foolishness, therefore, is not a condition of privation, but a condition of wrong action in the intellectual or sentient being, or in both (2 Sam. xiii. 12, 13; Ps. xxxviii. 5). In the Proverbs, however, 'foolishness' appears to be sometimes used for lack of understanding, although more generally for perverseness of will.

FOOT. Of the various senses in which the word 'foot' is used in Scripture, the following are the most remarkable. Such phrases as the 'slipping' of the foot, the 'stumbling' of the foot, 'from head to foot' (to express the entire body), and 'foot-steps' (to express tendencies, as when we say of one that he walks in another's footsteps), require no explanation, being common to most languages. The extreme modesty of the Hebrew language, which has perhaps seldom been sufficiently appreciated, dictated the use of the word 'feet' to express the parts and the acts which it is not allowed to name. Hence such phrases as the 'hair of the feet,' the 'water of the feet,' 'between the feet,' 'to open the feet,' 'to cover the feet,' all of which are sufficiently intelligible, except perhaps the last, which certainly does not mean 'going to sleep,' as some interpreters suggest, but 'to dismiss the refuse of nature.'

'To be under any one's feet' denotes the subjection of a subject to his sovereign, or of a servant to his master (Ps. viii. 6; comp. Heb. ii. 8; 1 Cor. xv. 25); and was, doubtless, derived from the symbolical action of conquerors, who set their feet upon the neck or body of the chiefs whom they had vanquished, in token of their triumph. This custom is expressly mentioned in Scripture (Josh. x. 24), and is figured on the monuments of Egypt, Persia, and Rome. See an instance in the cut No. 215.

In like manner, 'to be at any one's feet,' is used for being at the service of any one, following him, or willingly receiving his instructions (Judg. iv. 10). The passage (Acts xxii. 3) where Paul is described as being brought up 'at the feet of Gamaliel,' will appear still clearer, if we understand that, as the Jewish writers allege, pupils actually did sit on the floor before, and therefore at the feet of the doctors of the law, who themselves were raised on an elevated seat.

'Lameness of feet' generally denotes affliction or calamity, as in Ps. xxxv. 15; xxxviii. 18; Jer. xx. 10; Micah iv. 6, 7; Zeph. iii. 19.

'To set one's foot' in a place signifies to take possession of it, as in Deut. i. 36; xi. 34, and elsewhere.

'To water with the feet' (Deut. xi. 10) implies that the soil was watered with as much ease as a garden, in which the small channels for irrigation may be turned, etc., with the foot. [GARDEN.]

An elegant phrase, borrowed from the feet, occurs in Gal. ii. 14, where St. Paul says, 'When I saw that they walked not uprightly'—literally, 'not with a straight foot,' or 'did not foot it straightly.'

Nakedness of feet expressed mourning (Ezek. xxiv. 17). This must mean appearing abroad with naked feet; for there is reason to think that the Jews never used their sandals or shoes within doors. The modern Orientals consider it disrespectful to enter a room without taking off the outer covering of their feet. It is with them equivalent to uncovering the head among Europeans. The practice of feet-washing implies a similar usage among the Hebrews [FEET, WASHING OF]. Uncovering the feet was also a mark of adoration. Moses put off his sandals to approach the burning where the presence of God was manifested (Exod. iii. 5). Among the modern Orientals it would be regarded the height of profanation to enter a place of worship with covered feet. The Egyptian priests officiated barefoot; and most commentators are of opinion that the Aaronite priests served with bare feet in the tabernacle, as, according to all the Jewish writers, they did afterwards in the temple, and as the frequent washings of their feet enjoined by the law seem to imply. [SANDALS].

The passage, 'How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth glad tidings, that publisheth peace' (Is. lii. 7), appears to signify that, although the feet of messengers and travellers are usually rendered disagreeable by the soil and dust of the way, yet the feet of these blessed messengers seemed, notwithstanding, even beautiful, on account of the glad tidings which they bore.

Respecting the 'washing of feet,' see ABLUTION and WASHING.—J. K.

FOOTMEN. This is the rendering in the A. V. of two distinct Hebrew words. 1. פְּרָקִי, the pl. of פָּרָק, a foot, used as a military term to designate the infantry of an army (1 Sam. iv. 10; xv. 4; 2 Sam. x. 6; Jer. xii. 5) [ARMY], or those simply who journeyed on foot, whether soldiers or not (Exod. xii. 37; Num. xi. 21). In this latter case the word probably indicates the male portion of the company, those who walked whilst the females rode, like the Arabic رَجُل, rajul, a man. Sometimes the word is joined with אִישׁ, as in Judg. xx. 2.

2. רָצִים, pl. of רָץ, the part. of רוץ, to run (1 Sam. xxii. 17). In this passage the word designates the body-guard or messengers of a king; and so also in 2 Sam. xv. 1; 1 Kings i. 5; 2 Kings x. 25; xi. 4, 6, 11, 13 [A. V. 'guard']. Whether these Ratzim were the same as the Pelehites in David's guard admits of doubt; at any rate there is no direct evidence that they were. In the book of Job רָץ is used to designate a swift messenger (ix. 25), and hence a weaver's shuttle (vii. 6). In Esther iii. 13, 15, viii. 14, it is used to designate the messengers of the Persian kings.—W. L. A.

FORBES, PATRICK, of Corse, in Aberdeenshire, was born in 1561, and died in 1635. He studied at Glasgow and St. Andrews under the illustrious Andrew Melville. On the death of his father he succeeded to the family property, and intending to lead the life of a country gentleman, he took up his abode at Corse. Having been induced, however, by his friends to take orders, he was ordained in his 48th year, and became episcopal minister of Keith. In 1618 he was consecrated bishop of Aberdeen, in which office he conducted himself in such a manner that, to use the words of Burnet, he 'greatly allayed and almost conquered the distempered judgments and perverse and turbulent humours of divers in his diocese.' As chancellor of King's College, he did much to restore that ancient institution to vigour. He wrote Exercitationes de Verbo Dei; Disputatio de versionibus vernaculis; and a Commentary on the Revelation, published in 1613 (2d ed. 1614), and a translation of which into Latin appeared at Amsterdam from the pen of his distinguished son, John Forbes, in 1646. The author follows the historical scheme of interpreting the Apocalypse, desiring, 'in all singleness and sound affection,' to 'contribute his sparkle' to the illustration of that book. Like all the literary productions of his family, it displays learning, research, and ingenuity; but it cannot be regarded as affording any very material aid towards the understanding of the book.—W. L. A.

FORD (מַעְבָּרָה; Sept. didbaous). The original word (from עָבַר, to pass over, cross) signifies simply a passage, and is used both in the singular and in the plural in reference to the mountain pass at Michmash between Seneh and Bozez (1 Sam. xiv. 4, and Is. x. 29). Most frequently it is used in the plural to denote a place of passage across a river or ford. Mention is repeatedly made of the fords of Jordan (Josh. ii. 7; Judg. iii. 28; xii. 5, 6 [passages, A. V.]). These were evidently in ancient times few in number, and well known; though now the Jordan is fordable in hundreds of places (Smith's Dict. of Geogr., art. Palastina, p. 521). Of these, that named Bethabarah was probably the most noted [BETHABARAH]. Mention is made also of the ford (מַעְבָּרָה) of the Jabbok (Gen. xxxii. 22), and the fords of Arnon (Is. xvi. 2). Why Fürst, Knobel, and others, should suppose the word in this last passage to indicate the banks of the Arnon, including the surrounding country, does not appear. The מַעְבָּרָה of the Euphrates (Jer. li. 32) were probably the bridges across that river built by Nitocris, as the Euphrates was not fordable at Babylon (Hitzig, Exeg. Hb., in loc.)—W. L. A.

FOREHEAD. Marks upon the forehead, for the purpose of distinguishing the holy from the profane, are mentioned in Ezek. ix. 4, and again in Rev. vii. 3. These passages may be explained by reference to the customs of other nations. Thus the Rev. J. Maurice, speaking of the rites which must be performed by the Hindoos before they can enter the great pagoda, says, 'an indispensable ceremony takes place, which can only be performed by the hand of a Brahmin; and that is, the impressing of their foreheads with the tiluk, or mark of different colours, as they may belong either to the sect of Veeshnu or Seeva. If the temple be that of Veeshnu, their foreheads are marked with a longitudinal line, and the colour used is vermilion. If it be the temple of Seeva, they are marked with a parallel line, and the colour used is turmeric or saffron. But these two grand sects being again sub-divided into numerous classes, both the size and the shape of the tiluk are varied in proportion to their superior or inferior rank. In regard to the tiluk I must observe, that it was a custom, of very ancient date in Asia, to mark their servants. It is alluded to in these words of Ezekiel, where the Almighty commands his angels to 'Go through the midst of the city, and set a mark on the foreheads of the men who sigh for the abominations committed in the midst thereof' (ix. 4).

The classical idolaters used to consecrate themselves to particular deities on the same principle. The marks used on these occasions were various. Sometimes they contained the name of the god; sometimes his particular ensign, as the thunderbolt of Jupiter, the trident of Neptune, the ivy of Bacchus, etc.; or else they marked themselves with some mystical number whereby the god was described. Thus, the sun, who was signified by the number 608, is said to have been represented by the two numeral letters XII.

If this analogy be admitted, the mark on the forehead may be taken to be derived from the analogous custom among the heathen of bearing on their forehead the mark of the gods whose votaries they were. Some, however, would rather understand the allusion to refer to the custom of marking cattle, and even slaves, with the sign of ownership.

There has been much speculation respecting the mark itself. It was a Jewish notion that it was the letter ת, because that was the first letter of the Hebrew word תורה, 'the law,' as if it pointed out those who were obedient to the sacred code; or because it was the first letter of the word תחיה, 'thou shalt live.' It is indeed alleged that the angel had orders to write this mysterious letter with ink upon the foreheads of the righteous, and with blood upon the foreheads of the wicked; in the one case signifying, 'thou shalt live,' and in the other, 'thou shalt die.' The early Christian commentators readily adopted the notion that the mark was the letter ת, but alleged that its form was that of a cross in the old Samaritan alphabet which was used in the time of Ezekiel. Indeed both Jerome and Origen distinctly allege that the letter still bore that form in their time: and although the letter does not retain that form in the present Samaritan alphabet, there is certainly evidence of its being represented on old coins by the character ⲧ; and another proof arises from the fact of its being represented by T in the Greek alphabet, which is derived from the Phœnician. It having been thus settled that the character marked on the forehead was the letter ת in its ancient cruciform shape, it was easy to reach the conclusion that the mark on the forehead denoted salvation by the cross of Christ.

This is very ingenious; but there is no proof that the mark was the letter ת, or any letter at all. The word employed is טו tau, and means simply a mark or sign (not a letter), and is so rendered in the Septuagint, the Targum, and by the best Jewish commentators. The name of the letter ת is, however, probably from this word, and in this fact we have perhaps the source of the conjecture. It is, however, a curious circumstance that the analogous Arabic word توي denotes a mark in the form of a cross, which was branded on the flanks or necks of horses and camels (Freytag's Lex. Arab. s. v.) See Hävernick's Commentar. über Ezekiel, and Gill's Exposition, on Ezek. ix. 4.—J. K.

FORESKIN, the prepuce, which was taken off in circumcision. [CIRCUMCISION.]

FOREST is used in the A. V. as the equivalent of three Hebrew words. In this article it is proposed to define the true meaning of these several terms, and to identify and describe the more important localities to which the name forest is applied in Scripture.

חֹרֶשׁ. This word appears to be derived from a Chaldee root, חָרַשׁ, 'to be entangled,' and would therefore signify 'a thicket' of trees or bushes, such as might afford a safe hiding place (cf. 1 Sam. xxiii. 15), and such as is now often seen in Palestine on the sites of ruined cities (cf. Is. xvii. 9). Others think it comes from חָרַט, 'to cut into.'

The term occurs seven times in Scripture, but is only once rendered forest—'In the forests (Sept. ἐν τοῖς δρυμοῖς) he built castles and towers' (2 Chron. xxvii. 4). The locality here referred to appears to be the south of Judah, where the mountains were formerly, and are in places still, clothed with dwarf oaks and tangled shrubberies.

פֶּרֶדִּים is found only three times in the Bible, and is once translated forest. In Neh. ii. 8 Asaph is called 'the keeper of the king's forest' (Sept. ροῦ παρὰ βασιλεως). פֶּרֶדִּים, like the Arabic فردوس, and the Greek παράδεισος, means an enclosed garden or plantation attached to a palace, intended either for ornament or for containing animals of the chase (Eccles. ii. 5; Cant. iv. 13; Xenoph. Cyrop. i. 3. 12).

עֵרָה and עֵרָה. This term occurs very often, and is usually rendered forest, though occasionally wood (Deut. xix. 5). It signifies redundancy or luxuriance, such as is seen in the growth of forest trees. It is the name given to all the great primeval forests of Syria, where the stately trees grew (Eccl. ii. 6; Is. xlv. 14), and where the wild beasts had their homes (Jer. v. 6; Micah v. 8). Hosea appears to use it as equivalent to the Arabic وعر, a rugged and desolate place (ii. 12), 'I will destroy her vines and her fig-trees . . . and I will make them a forest, and the beasts of the field shall eat them.'

The following are the most noted forests mentioned in the O. T.:

1. 'The forest of Hareth' (1 Sam. xxii. 5). The Sept. gives this passage ἐν τῇ πόλει Ἀριδθ, having doubtless mistaken עֵרָה for עֵרָה. The precise locality of Hareth is not mentioned. It was somewhere in the south of Judah; and a comparison with 1 Sam. xxiii. 15 would seem to indicate that it was near Ziph, a few miles south-east of Hebron.

2. 'The forest (wood) of Ephraim' (2 Sam. xviii. 6; Sept. δρυμὸν). It was here the army of Absalom was defeated, and he himself slain. It lay near, probably a little to the west of, the town of Mahanaim, where David had his head-quarters, and where he received the first tidings of the fate of his son (xvii. 26; xviii. 24). Why a forest east of the Jordan should bear the name Ephraim cannot now be determined; but one thing is certain, in the noble oaks which still clothe the hills of Gilead north of the Jabbok, we see the remnants of 'the Wood of Ephraim,' and the representatives of that 'great oak' in one of whose branches Absalom was strangely imprisoned (xviii. 9; See Handbook for Syria and Palestine, pp. 311, 314).

3. 'The forest of Carmel.' This phrase is used in 2 Kings xix. 23, and Is. xxxvii. 24, in reference to the same event, the ravages committed by the army of Sennacherib on the land of Israel—'I am come up to the height of the mountains, to the sides of Lebanon; and I will cut down the tall cedars thereof, and the choice fir-trees thereof; and I will enter into the height of his border, the forest of his Carmel.' The real meaning of the last clause, יער כרמלו, seems to be its garden forest; that is, the garden-like cedar forests of Lebanon, to which reference is made (See Keil on Kings, and Alexander on Isaiah, in loc.)

4. 'In the forest in Arabia' occurs in Is. xxi. 13. The phrase is remarkable, because Arabia is a country singularly destitute of trees. In no part of it are there any traces of forests. The Sept. translates the passage ἐν τῷ ἄρῳ ἐστρέπας; and Lowth and others adopt it; but the Masoretic reading is preferable. The meaning of the word ער in this place is probably the same as that of the Arabic وعر, a rugged region, whether wooded or not.

5. 'The house of the forest of Lebanon' is several times mentioned. It appears to have been a part of the royal palace built by Solomon at Jerusalem, and used as an armoury (1 Kings vii. 2, sq.; x. 17-21; 2 Chron. ix. 16-20). The house had 'four rows of cedar pillars, with cedar beams upon the pillars, and it was covered with cedar above upon the beams.' Hence, in all probability, its name (See Keil, in loc.)

6. In Zech. xi. 2 there is a singular expression: 'Howl, O ye oaks of Bashan, for the forest of the vintage is come down.' The Hebrew יער הכנור rather signifies 'the fortified forest' (Vulgate, saltus munitus), and it is probable that Jerusalem is thus figuratively alluded to, the houses of which are close together as the trees of a forest (cf. Micah iii. 12. Henderson on the Minor Prophets, in loc.) The word forest is frequently used symbolically to denote a city, kingdom, or government, as in Is. x. 18; xxxii. 19; Jer. xxi. 14, etc.

There are still some remnants of ancient oak forests on the mountains of Bashan, Gilead, Hermon, and Galilee. One solitary grove of cedars exists on Lebanon; but fir trees are there abundant. The other forests of Palestine (2 Kings ii. 23; 1 Sam. xiv. 25; vii. 2, etc.) have almost disappeared. Yet here and there one meets with a solitary oak or terebinth of huge dimensions, as at Hebron, valley of Elah, Shiloh, and Dan. These are the last trees of the forests, and serve to indicate what the forests of Palestine once were. See Stanley, S. and P., pp. 121, 314, 354, 1st ed.; Handbook for S. and P., pp. 70, 311, 322, 444, 512, etc.; Burckhardt's Travels in Syria; Lord Lindsay's Travels.—J. L. P.

FORETELLING FUTURE EVENTS. [PROPHECY, vol. iii. p. 585.]

FORNICATION. In Scripture this word occurs more frequently in its symbolical than in its ordinary sense.

VOL. II.

In the Prophets woman is often made the symbol of the church or nation of the Jews, which is regarded as affianced to Jehovah by the covenant on Mount Sinai. In Ezek. xvi. there is a long description of that people under the symbol of a female child, growing up to the stature of a woman, and then wedded to Jehovah by entering into covenant with him. Therefore when the Israelites acted contrary to that covenant, by forsaking God and following idols, they were very properly represented by the symbol of a harlot or adulteress, offering herself to all comers (Is. i. 21; Jer. ii. 20; Ezek. xvi.; Hos. i. 2; iii. 11). And thus fornication, or adultery (which is fornication in a married state), became, and is used as, the symbol of idolatry itself (Jer. iii. 8, 9; Ezek. xvi. 26, 29; xxiii. 37). See Wemyss's Clavis Symb., art. 'Woman.'

FORSKAL, PETER, born 1736, was educated at Göttingen, and after residing for some time at Upsala and Stockholm, became professor at Copenhagen. His knowledge of Oriental languages, and his eminence as a naturalist, led to his being appointed by the King of Denmark to be one of those sent by him in 1761 to visit Arabia, and report on its inhabitants, productions, geography, etc. He died at Jerim, a town of Yemen, 11th July 1763. His companion, H. Niebuhr, published from his papers, after his death, his Descriptiones animalium, avium, etc., quæ in itinere Orient. observavit, Kopenh. 1775; and Flora Ægypt. Arab., etc., Ibid. 1775. These works furnish valuable helps to the elucidation of the natural history of the Bible.—W. L. A.

FORSTER, JOHANN, was born at Augsburg in 1495, and died at Wittenberg, December 8, 1556. He was the intimate friend of Luther, Melancthon, and Reuchlin, and was a warm advocate of the reformed doctrines. He was Professor of Hebrew in the University of Wittenberg, and enjoyed a high reputation as a teacher of that language. He was the author of a Hebrew lexicon, which claims to be mentioned with respect on account of the service it rendered in emancipating the study of this language from the fetters imposed by Rabbinical authority. A full description of this work is given by Orme, Bibl.-Bibl., and long extracts from the preface may be found in Buddeus, Isagoge, p. 1451. Its title is, Dictionarium Hebraicum Novum, non ex Rabbinorum Commentis nec nostratium Doctorum stulta imitatione descriptum sed ex ipsis thesauris Sacrorum Bibliorum, et eorundem accurata locorum collatione depromptum, cum phrasibus Scripturæ Veteris et Novi Testamenti diligenter annotatis; Basil, 1557, fol.—S. N.

FORSTER, JOHANN, Professor of theology at Wittenberg, and Superintendent-General of the county of Mansfeld, and who died in 1613, was the author of the following commentaries:

1. Dixodus exodi, auslegung des andern Buchs Mose in hundert und vierzehn predigten, Witt. 1614, fol., and 1625, 4to. 2. Commentarius in Esaiam; Witteb., 4to, 1620, 1664, 1699. 3. Commentarius in prophetam Jeremiam in quo non tantum adcurata analysis textus et conspectus totius contextus exegesis sed etiam varium singulorum capitulum et omnium in iisdem prophetiarum usus exhibentur. FORTIFICATIONS. 'FENCED CITIES.'
Inventions for the defence of men in social life are older than history. The walls, towers, and gates represented on Egyptian monuments, though dating back to a period of fifteen centuries before the Christian era, bear evidence of an advanced state of fortifications—of walls built of squared stones, or of squared timber judiciously placed on the summit of scarped rocks, or within the circumference of one or two wet ditches, and furnished on the summit with regular battlements to protect the defenders. All these are of later invention than the accumulation of unhewn or rudely chipped uncemented stones, piled on each other in the form of walls, in the so-called Cyclopean, Pelasgian, Etruscan, and Celtic styles, where there are no ditches, or towers, or other gateways than mere openings occasionally left between the enormous blocks employed in the work. As the three first styles occur in Etruria, they shew the progressive advance of military architecture, and may be considered as more primitive, though perhaps posterior to the era when the progress of Israel, under the guidance of Joshua, expelled several Canaanitish tribes, whose system of civilization, in common with that of the rest of Western Asia, bore an Egyptian type, and whose towers and battlements were remarkably high, or rather were erected in very elevated situations. When, therefore, the Israelites entered Palestine, we may assume that the 'fenced cities' they had to attack were, according to their degree of antiquity,

243. [a. Wet ditches.]

fortified with more or less of art, but all with huge stones in the lower walls, like the Etruscan. Indeed, Asia Minor, Armenia, Syria, and even Jerusalem, still bear marks of this most ancient system, notwithstanding that this region, the connecting link between Asia and Africa, between the trade of the East and the West, and between the religious feelings of the whole earth, has been the common battle-field of all the great nations of antiquity, and of modern times, where ruin and desolation, oftentimes repeated, have been spread over every habitable place. Stones from six to fifty feet in length, with suitable proportions, can still be detected in many walls of the cities of those regions, wherever 245.

quarries existed, from Nineveh, where beneath the surface there still remain ruins and walls of huge stones, sculptured with bas-reliefs, originally painted, to Babylon and Bassorah, where bricks, sun-dried or baked, and stamped with letters, are yet found, as well as in all the plains of the rivers where that material alone could be easily procured. The wall,

חומה choma, was sometimes double or triple (2 Chron. xxxii. 5), successively girding a rocky elevation; and 'building a city' originally meant the construction of the wall.

Before wall-towers, מגדלות migdaloth, were introduced, the gate of a city, originally single, formed a kind of citadel, and was the strongest part of all the defences: it was the armoury of the community, and the council-house of the authorities. 'Sitting in the gate' was, and still is, synonymous with the possession of power, and even now there is commonly in the fortified gate of a royal palace in the East, on the floor above the doorway, a council-room with a kind of balcony, whence the sovereign sometimes sees his people, and where he may sit in judgment. Hence the Turkish government is not unfrequently termed the Porte, and in this sense allusion to gates often occurs in the Scriptures. The tower, צריח tsaroch, was another fortification of the earliest date, being often the citadel or last retreat when a city was taken; or, standing alone in some naturally strong position, was intended to protect a frontier, command a pass, or to be a place of refuge and deposit of treasure in the mountains, when the plain should be no longer defensible. Some of these are figured among the Egyptian monuments, and in the west of England the round towers of Launceston, Restormel, Trematon, and Plympton, shew that similar means of defence were once employed by the Celts of this island, who may have derived their knowledge from Phœnician or Carthaginian traders. Watch-towers, מזפח mizpah, and טירה terah, טירות teroth, used by shepherds all over Asia, and even now built on eminences above some city in the plain, in order to keep a look-out upon the distant country, were already in use and occasionally converted into places of defence (2 Chron. xxvi. 10; xxvii. 4). The gateways were closed by ponderous folding doors, שער shaer, שערים shaerim, the valves or folds, דלתים delethim, being secured by wooden bars: both the doors and bars were in after times plated with metal. A ditch, חל hal, where the nature of the locality required it, was dug in front of the rampart, and sometimes there was an inner wall, with a second ditch before it. As the experience of ages increased, huge 'counter forts,' double buttresses, or masses of solid stone and masonry (not bulwarks*) were built in particular parts to sustain the outer wall, and afford space on the summit to place military engines (2 Chron. xxvi. 15).

As there was no system of construction strictly

* Bulwark, from the Dutch bolwerk, anciently called a mound, and in the 16th century always referable to bastion. Buttresses of the kind above mentioned still exist in the Celto-Roman walls at Pevensey in Sussex.

so called, but simply an application of the means of defence to the localities, no uniformity of adaptation existed, and, therefore, we refer to No. 242 of our illustrations, representing some primeval fable of the rats besieging the cats in their strong tower, where regular hewn courses of stones in the walls shew skill in structure, and the inclined jambs of the door, with double impost, experience in obviating a too great pressure from above. In the following cut (No. 249), taken from another Egyptian work, we have a series of towers, that in the middle being evidently the citadel or keep, and a gateway indicating that the wall is omitted, or is intended by the lines of the oval surrounding the whole. In No. 242 there is a scaling-ladder. In No. 249 we see a regular labarum, the most ancient example extant of this form of ensign, and the towers are manned with armed soldiers. In No. 243, another towered fortress, garrisoned with troops, is surrounded by a double ditch, and approached by bridges, both in front and rear. This representation refers to a city in Asia, attacked by one of the Egyptian conquering kings, anterior to the rise of the Assyrian and Babylonish power. No. 245 is taken from a seal, and is a symbol of Babylon, where the city, sustained by two lions, is shewn standing on both sides of the Euphrates, having an outer wall; the inner rampart is flanked by numerous elevated and embattled towers. There is another, but less antique representation of Babylon, with its lions and towers, etc.; but the battlements are squared, not pointed, as in the first. Not very different from these double walls are those represented in the Egyptian painting copied in No. 246. The towers are here crowded with soldiers, some of whom, from the form of their shields, are obviously Egyptians. These are sufficient to give a general idea of cities fenced entirely by art; but in No. 247 we give the Tsaroch tower, taken from one still extant in Persia, shewing a ditch and gateway below in the mound or rock, its double outer walls and inner keep, very like Launceston castle. This was the kind of citadel which defended passes, and in the mountains served for retreat in times of calamity, and for the security of the royal treasures; and it was on account of the confined space within, and the great elevation of the ramparts, that private houses frequently stood upon their summit, as was the case when the harlot Rahab received Joshua's spies in Jericho (Josh. ii. 1).—C. FORTUNATUS (Φορτυνάτος), a disciple of Corinth, of Roman birth or origin, as his name indicates, who visited Paul at Ephesus, and returned, along with Stephanas and Achaicus, in charge of that apostle's first Epistle to the Corinthian church; B.C. 59 (1 Cor. xvi. 17).

FOUNTAIN. A greater uniformity in the translation of Hebrew terms would have contributed much to the clearness of many passages in the A. V. This remark is especially applicable to the word fountain. For example the term בְּיַר or בֵּיַר, is rendered 'fountain' in Jer. vi. 7; 'As a fountain (Sept. λάκκος), casteth out her waters.' Its literal meaning, like its cognate Arab. بئر, is 'well' or 'pit,' from באר, Arab. بار, 'to dig.' It may have living water or not; but it does not convey the idea of water at all.

מִבְּנֵי is also translated fountain, in Eccl. xii. 6 (Sept. πηγή). In the two other places where it is used, the A. V. has 'spring' (Is. xxxv. 7; xlix. 10). It signifies a 'source' or 'spring' of water, from the root נבע, Arab. نبع, 'to gush or bubble forth.'

מִקְוֵה, from the root קר, 'to dig a well,' is rendered fountain in many passages, but mostly in a figurative sense; as 'fountain of life' (Prov. xiii. 14); 'fountain of wisdom' (xviii. 4), etc.

עַיִן or מַעַיִן is the only proper equivalent for our word fountain. Its original signification is 'eye,' and so it is used in the vast majority of cases in Scripture; but it is also frequently employed to denote a fountain of living water (Gen. xvi. 7). Its force and meaning are unfortunately sometimes obscured by the rendering in the A. V., 'well;' as in Exod. xv. 27; in Elim 'were twelve wells of water;' that is, not artificial wells, but natural fountains, as still seen in Wady Ghurundel (Bartlett's Forty Days in the Desert, p. 43).

Some of the fountains of Palestine are of great size and beauty. All the perennial rivers and streams in the country have their sources in fountains, and draw comparatively little strength from surface water. Such are the fountains of the Jordan at Dan and Banias; of the Abana at Fijeh and Zebedany; of the Leontes at Chalcis and Baalbek; of the Orontes at Ain and Lebweh; of the Adonis at Afka, etc. Palestine is a country of mountains and hills; and it abounds in fountains of lesser note. The murmur of their waters is heard in every dell; and the luxuriant foliage which surrounds them is seen on every plain. They have given names to many of its cities and villages; as En-shemesh, and En-gedi, and En-tappuah, and Enon. Advantage was taken of these fountains to supply some of the great cities of Palestine with water. An aqueduct some ten miles in length brought water to Jerusalem from a fountain near Solomon's Pools. A much longer one conveyed an abundant supply to Damascus, from the great fountain at Fijeh. But perhaps the most remarkable works of this kind are at Tyre, where several copious springs were surrounded with massive walls, so as to raise the water to a sufficient height. Aqueducts, supported on arches, then conveyed it to the city. (See Handbook for S. and P., pp. 142, 555, 390).

Palestine can also boast of several warm fountains, famous from time immemorial for their medicinal properties. They are confined to the volcanic valley of the Jordan. The most celebrated are those of Tiberias (or Hammath, Josh. xix. 35), Amatha, near the ruins of Gadara, and Callirhoe, on the north-eastern shore of the Dead Sea. They are all strongly impregnated with sulphur. The temperature of that of Tiberias is 144° Fahr. (Handbook for S. and P., pp. 310, 320, 423; Plin. Hist. Nat., v. 15; Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 2. 3; Bell. Jud. i. 33. 5; Lightfoot, Opp. ii. 224).

Fountains are much more rare on the eastern side of the Jordan, than on the western. There are a few among the mountains of Gilead; but in the great plateaus of Moab on the south, and Bashan on the north, they are almost unknown. This arises in part from the physical structure of the country, and in part from the dryness of the climate. Huge cisterns and tanks were constructed to supply the want of fountains.—J. L. P.

FWOL [BIRD; COCK.]

FOWLING. The act of taking birds by means of nets, snares, decoys, etc., is frequently alluded to in Scripture, mostly in a figurative and moral way. Birds of various kinds abound, and no doubt abounded, in ancient times, in Palestine. Canon Stanley speaks of 'countless birds of all kinds, aquatic fowls by the lake side, partridges and pigeons hovering, as on the Nile bank, over the rich plains of Genesareth' (Sinai and Palestine, p. 427). The capture of these for the table or other uses, would, we might expect, form the employment of many persons, and lead to the adoption of various methods to effect it. Hence

We read of the 'snares,' נֶטֶס, Ps. xci. 3; cxxiv.

7; Hos. ix. 8: and of the 'net,' נֶטֶס, Prov. i. 17;

Hos. vii. 11: 'of the fowler,' יֹקֵשׁ or יִקְשֵׁשׁ = snares. In Hos. v. 1, both net and snare are mentioned together. The mokēsh (מוֹקֵשׁ) is used synonymously with the paḥ, Amos iii. 5. This was employed for taking either beasts or birds. It was a trap set in the path, Prov. vii. 23; xxii. 5; or hidden on or in the ground, Ps. cxl. 6; cxlii. 4. 'The form of this springe, or trap net, appears from two passages, Amos iii. 5, and Ps. lix. 23. It was in two parts, which, when set, were spread out upon the ground, and slightly fastened with a stick (trap-stick), so that as soon as a bird or beast touched the stick, the parts flew up and inclosed the bird in the net, or caught the foot of the animal. Thus Amos iii. 5, 'Doth a bird fall into a snare upon the ground, when there is no trap-stick for her? doth the snare spring from the ground and take nothing at all? i.e., does anything happen without a cause?' [But here the Mokēsh, rendered 'trap-stick,' is synonymous with the paḥ, or snare.] Ps. lix. 23, 'Let their table before them become a snare;' here the  is the Oriental cloth or leather spread upon the ground like a net (Robinson's Gen.) The  was a net spread or cast over the bird or beast to be caught. 'My net also will I spread upon him, Ezek. xii. 13; see also Ezek. xvii. 20; xix. 8; xxxii. 3. Considerable dexterity must have been required in the management of it.

There seems to be a reference to the decoy in Jer. v. 27—'As a cage full of birds, so are their houses of deceit'—same birds being placed in the trap cage to entice the wild which were caught by this stratagem.

We do not read of any other mode of fowling spoken of, or referred to, in the Bible; yet, most probably, the Egyptian method, described by Wilkinson, was not only known, but employed by fowlers in Palestine:—'Fowling was one of the great amusements of all classes. Those who followed this amusement for their livelihood used nets and traps; but the amateur sportsman pursued his game in the thickets, and felled them with the throw-stick, priding himself on his dexterity in its use. The bow was not employed for this purpose, nor was the sling adopted, except by gardeners and peasants, to frighten the birds from the vineyards and fields. The throw-stick was made of heavy wood, and flat, so as to offer little resistance to the air in its flight; and the distance to which an expert arm could throw it was considerable; though they always endeavoured to approach the birds as near as possible, under cover of the bushes and reeds. It was from one foot and a quarter to two feet in length, and about one and a half inch in breadth, slightly curved at the upper end; but in no instance had it the round shape and flight of the Australian Boomerang.

'On their fowling excursions they usually proceeded with a party of friends and attendants, sometimes accompanied by the members of their family, and even by their young children, to the jungles and thickets of the marsh-lands, or to the lakes of their own grounds, which, especially during the inundation, abounded with fowl; and seated in punts made of the papyrus, they glided, without disturbing the birds, amidst the lofty reeds that grow in the water, and masked their approach.

The attendants collected the game as it fell, and one of them was always ready to hand a fresh stick to the chasseur as soon as he had thrown. They frequently took with them a decoy-bird, and, in order to keep it to its post, a female was selected, whose nest, containing eggs, was deposited in the boat.'

'A favourite cat sometimes attended them on these occasions, and performed the part of a retriever, amidst the thickets on the bank' (Pop. Acc. of the Ancient Egyptians, i. 234-8).

A word must be added on a Mosaic regulation as to birds. In Deut. xxii. 6, 7, whoever finds a bird's nest is permitted to take the eggs, or the young, but forbidden to take the dam with them. This law breathes a spirit of wisdom and benevolence; being obviously designed to prevent the extermination of any species of birds, which would be an injury in a country where annoying and destructive insects abound; and, at the same time, supplying a check to their undue increase, which would itself prove an evil,—a regulation which ignorance and stupid prejudice have often overlooked or violated, with the natural disastrous results (See Kitto's Pict. Bib. in loc.)—I. J.

FOX. [SHUAL]

FRANCKE, AUGUSTUS HERMANN, a zealous philanthropist and learned theologian, founder of the celebrated Orphan House at Halle, was born at Lübeck, 1663, and carefully and religiously educated by his parents. At Gotha he passed through the gymnasium, and in 1679 visited the university of Eriurt, where he applied himself to the study of Hebrew. Six months afterwards he visited the university of Kiel, prosecuting with renewed vigour his favourite studies. At Hamburg he enjoyed for two months the instructions of the celebrated Hebraist, Esra Edzardi, who urged him to read the Hebrew original in course; in compliance with which advice he read through the Hebrew Bible seven times in one year. In 1684 he accompanied, as companion and Hebrew teacher, a young man to the university of Leipsic, where he had further opportunity of enlarging his stores of knowledge, and acquired the Italian and Rabbinic languages. Soon afterwards he enjoyed the privilege of receiving the instructions of C. H. Sandhagen in Scripture interpretation at Lüneberg, where his mind passed through a deeper spiritual change than he had before experienced; religion gained an entire influence over him, and he consecrated himself wholly to God. On his return to Leipsic, he lectured on the epistles of Paul with distinguished success, until envy raised an outcry against him, and his lectures were prohibited by the Theological Faculty, 1690. The same year he was appointed to the Diaconate of the Augustine Church at Erfurt, and by his earnest, fervent discourses, attracted crowds, but envy and malice again prevailed. The enemies of truth clamoured against him, and he was ordered by an Electoral rescript to quit the city. In 1691 he was appointed Professor of the Greek and Oriental languages in the university of Halle, to which the pastorate of the Church of St. George, in a suburb of Halle, was added. In 1698 he became Professor of Theology in the same university, in which office he continued till his death in 1727, in the 64th year of his age. His labours as pastor, professor, and philanthropist, were incessant, and at length wore him out. But, estimated by his works in his Master's service, his life was a long one. His principal productions in the department of biblical science are as follow:—1. Manuductio ad Lectionem Scripturæ Sacre, Halae, 1693, etc., translated into English by Mr. Jacques under the title of, A guide to the reading of the Holy Scriptures, London, 1813. 2. Pnektionen Hermeneuticæ ad viam dextræ indagandi et exponendi Sensus Scripturæ Sacre, etc., Halae, 1717. 3. Commentatio de Scopo Librorum Veteris et Novi Testamenti, Halae, 1724. 4. Christus S. Scripturæ Nucleus, etc., translated from the German into Latin by H. Grischovius, Halae, 1724. 5. Introductio ad Lectionem Prophetarum, 1. Generalis; 11. Specialis ad Lectionem Jona quæ in reliquis exemplo esse possit: Utrâque directâ ad Comparandum et prophetis agnitionem Jesu Christi, Halae, 1724.—I. FRANKFURTER, MOSES B. SIMEON. This distinguished Hebraist flourished between 1700 and 1762, was judge of the Jewish community, and a celebrated typographer in Amsterdam, and wrote glosses on the Pentateuch, which he called מנחה קטנה, a small offering; on Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Hosea, Joel, Amos, and Jonah, which he denominated מנחה גדולה, a great offering; and on the Psalms, Song of Songs, Ecclesiastes, and Chronicles, which he called מנחת הערב, an evening offering. The work, however, which immortalized Frankfurter's name, is The Great Rabbinic Bible, over which he spent the greater part of his life, and which he edited with the utmost care. The scholarship, the perseverance, and the fortune required to edit this work, and its great utility to the Biblical student, may be judged of from the following analysis of its contents. This gigantic work is called קהלת משה, the Congregation of Moses, and was published in Amsterdam in 1724-1727, four volumes royal folio.

The first volume, embracing the Pentateuch (תורה), begins with an Index Rerum, and a Treatise on the design of the Law by Obadiah Seforno; a general Introduction; an Index of all the chapters, and another of all the sections of the O. T., giving the commencement of the verses; Introductions by Chaskuni, Levi b. Gershon, Seforno, and Ibn Ezra. Then follow the five books of Moses in Hebrew and Chaldee by Onkelos, in two parallel columns, surrounded by the Massora, Commentaries of Rashi, Ibn Ezra, Levi b. Gershon, Jacob b. Asher (Baal Ha-Turim), Chaskuni, Jacob de Illescas (אמרי נעים), Seforno, and Frankfurter (קומץ משנה), the editor.

The second volume, comprising the earlier Prophets (נביאים ראשונים), i. e., Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings, begins with Prefaces of David Kimchi, Levi b. Gershon, Samuel b. Laniado, Frankfurter, etc. Whereupon follow the Hebrew and the Chaldee, with Commentaries by Rashi, D. Kimchi, Levi b. Gershon, Samuel b. Laniado (כלי יקר), Frankfurter (מנחה קטנה), and notes on Judges and Samuel by Isaiah de Trani. At the end of Judges (p. 97, etc.), are added the notes of Aaron b. Chajim, called לב אהרן, the heart of Aaron, on Joshua and Judges; and at the end of Samuel (p. 278, etc.), are Meier Arama's notes on Isaiah and Jeremiah, called אורים ותמים, light and perfection.

The third volume, comprising the later Prophets (נביאים אחרונים), i. e., Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor Prophets, begins with Prefaces by a grandson of Laniado, Frankfurter, and Be-Rab, then follow the Hebrew text and the Chaldee Paraphrase, surrounded by the Massora and the Commentaries of Rashi and D. Kimchi, which extend over all the books in this volume; of Ibn Ezra on Isaiah and the minor Prophets; Be-Rab (לקוטי שושנים) on Isaiah, Jeremiah, and the minor Prophets; Meier Arama (אורים ותמים) on Isaiah and Jeremiah; Samuel Laniado (כלי פז) on Isaiah; Frankfurter (מנחה גדולה) on Isaiah, Jeremiah, Hosea, Joel, Amos, and Jonah; Almosino on Hosea, Habakkuk, and Micah; and Seforno on Jonah, Habakkuk, and Zechariah.

The fourth volume, comprising the Hagiographa (כתובים), i. e., the Psalms, Proverbs, Job, the Five Megilloth, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles, begins with Prefaces of Ibn Ezra, Frankfurter, Ibn Jachja, and then follow the Hebrew text and the Chaldee Paraphrase, with Commentaries of (1.) Rashi on the Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles; (2.) Ibn Ezra on the Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles; (3.) Ibn Jachja on the Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles; (4.) Seforno on the Psalms, Job, Song of Songs, and Ecclesiastes; (5.) Jaabez (תורת חסד) on the Psalms, Job, Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, Chronicles; (6.) Levi b. Gershon on Proverbs, Job, Song of Songs, Ruth, Esther, Daniel; (7.) Frankfurter (מנחת ערב) on Proverbs, Ruth, Esther, and Chronicles; (8.) D. Kimchi on Daniel and Chronicles; (9.) Menachem Ha-Mieri on Proverbs; (10.) David Ibn Jachja on Proverbs; (11.) Nachmanides on Proverbs; (12.) Farissol on Job; (13.) Simon Duran (אורח משפט) on Job; (14.) Meier Arama on the Song of Songs; (15.) Saadia on Daniel; and (16.) Samuel Alepo on Psalms cxix.-cxxxiv.

Whereupon follow the Great Massora, the various readings of the Eastern and Western Codd., a Treatise upon the Accents, and the differences between Ben-Asher and Ben-Naphthali. This work, as will be seen from its contents, constitutes in itself a library of Biblical literature and exegesis, and is indispensable to the historico-critical expositor.—C. D. G.

FRANKINCENSE. [LEBONAH.]

FRANZ or FRANZIUS, WOLFGANG, a theologian of the 16th century, was born at Plauen in Saxony, 1564. He studied at Frankfurt on the Oder, attended the university of Wittenberg for several years, where he took his degrees, and was appointed professor of history there, 1598. In 1601 he became superintendent at Kempsberg. He returned to Wittenberg in 1605, was elected professor of theology, and died there of apoplexy, 1620. He was a voluminous writer on theology. Among other books, he wrote Tractatus theologicus de interpretatione S. S. Scripturarum maxime legitima, Wittenberg, 1634, 4to; Animalium historia sacra, 1612, 8vo, Wittenberg, a work often reprinted, and very valuable. The best edition is that of Frankfurt, 1712, five parts in four vols. 4to. This contains Cyprian's continuation. The work was translated into English (1670), as well as into German and Dutch.—S. D.

FRASER, JAMES. Born 1700, he became eventually minister of Alness, and died 1769. His work appeared under the title of The Scripture Doctrine of Sanctification, but is in truth a 'Critical Explication and Paraphrase of the sixth and seventh chapters of the Epistle to the Romans, and the four first verses of the eighth chapter.' The work was edited, for it appeared posthumously, by Dr. Erskine of Edinburgh, who spoke of Fraser, and with justice, 'as a learned and ingenious author.' The commentary is marked by close and careful reasoning. He holds and argues that chap. vii. 14-25 is descriptive, not of a state of unregeneracy, but of a state of grace. It is perhaps the ablest argument in support of this view.—W. H. G.

FRENCH VERSIONS. There is every reason to believe that researches, judiciously and pereveringly directed, would be rewarded by the discovery of a large amount of activity expended on the translation of the Scriptures into the language of the people of France from a very early period. What is really known, however, on this subject anterior to the period of the Reformation, is very partial, and in some instances of doubtful authenticity. We may gather from the conciliar edicts prohibiting the use of translations of the sacred books in the vulgar tongue, that such existed as early as the beginning of the 13th century (Acta Concil. Tolos. 1229, c. 14, ap. Mansi xxiil. 197; comp. those also of the Synod of Tarragona in 1234, and Beziers in 1246), and even as early as 1109, Pope Innocent III. had heard that 'evangelia, epistolas Pauli, moralia Job, et plures alios libros in Gallico sermone,' were in use among the Albigenes (Epist., ed. Baluz. i. 432); but we are very much in the dark as to the character of these translations, or the source whence they emanated. Writers on the Waldensian Church assert the existence of translations in the Romance dialect possessed by that church anterior to the 12th century (Monastier, History of the Vaudois, p. 73; Henderson, The Vaudois, p. 248; Gilly, The Romantic Version of the Gospel of St. John, etc., Lond. 1848); but the evidence on which this is advanced does not stand the test of a thorough scrutiny. In the Nobla Leyron, which contains the religious belief of that church, there are several citations of Scripture, but there is no evidence that these are made from any extant version; and at any rate this work cannot be placed earlier than the end of the 12th or beginning of the 13th century (Hallam, Hist. of Literature, i. 26). Walter de Mapes says, that, during the Pontificate of Alexander III. (1159-1181), he was present at a synod at Rome where certain Waldensians presented to the Pope a book written in the Gallic tongue, 'in quo textus et glossa Psalterii plurimorumque legis utriusque librorum continebatur' (De Nugis Curial., p. 64, Camden Society ed.; Usher, De Chr. Eccles. Success., Opp. ed. Elrington, ii. 244); but it is doubtful whether any part of this was in the vernacular except the gloss, which in a translation would be of little use. That Peter Valdo himself possessed a vernacular translation of the Scriptures has been asserted; but when examined this tradition resolves itself into the fact that he requested a grammarian, Stephanus de Ansa, to supply him with a translation of the Gospels and other books of the Bible, 'et auctoritates sanctorum;' but whether it was a 'textus cum glossa,' or 'sententias per titulos congregatas,' the witnesses leave uncertain. From what Reiner says (ap. Usher, l.c.), 'Cum esset [Valdus] aliquantulum literatus, Novi Testamenti textum docuit eos vulgariter,' the presumption is that no vernacular version existed, but that Valdo in preaching translated for his hearers, i.e., probably gave them the glosses which Stephanus had collected for him. Inthemius, however, expressly says, 'libros sacræ Scripturæ maxime Novi Testamenti sibi in linguam Gallicam fecit transferri' (Annal. Hirsauensis, ann. 1160, vol. i. p. 442). The MSS. of the Waldensian versions preserved at Zürich, Grenoble, Dublin, and Paris, are not of an earlier date than the 16th century, nor can the version they present claim any high antiquity. That vernacular versions of the N. T., and portions of the Old, existed among the so-called Sectaries of the south of France from an early period does not admit of doubt; but we are not in circumstances to say anything definite concerning them. Dr. Gilly (p. xxii.) has called attention to the curious fact that an English ecclesiastic in 1345 disposed by will of a copy of the Romance Bible, 'Bibulam (Bibulum?) in Romanam linguam translata' (Publications of Surtees Soc. for 1836, vol. ii. p. 10). In the library of the Académie des Arts at Lyons, there is a codex containing the N. T. in Romance, to which is appended the liturgy of the Cathari, indicating its origin among them (Gieseler, Church Hist. iii. 409). In the north of France also we have some clear traces of vernacular copies of the Scriptures. A translation of the four books of Kings in the dialect of the north of France (langue d'Oïl) has been published (Paris 1841, 4to) by M. Leroux de Lincy, who attributes it to the 12th century. M. Reuss has examined and described in the Revue de Strasbourg, iv. 1 ff., a codex preserved in the library of that city, which contains in the same dialect, somewhat varied, the Pentateuch, Joshua, and Judges, with the Glossa ordinaria et interlinearis [GLOSSES], and the rest of the historical books of the O. T. with the Psalter without the gloss. As respects the translation said to have been executed, cir. 1250, for Saint Lewis, that of Du Vignier (cir. 1340), that of De Sy (1350), and that of Vaudetar (1372), we can say nothing more than that tradition asserts that such did once exist.

Of translations of parts of Scripture, chiefly the Psalters, into the more modern French, a large number exist in MS., of which a copious list is given by Le Long in his Bibliotheca Sacra. About the year 1380 a translation was undertaken by command of Charles V. of France by Raoul de Prailles, of which more than one copy exists. Le Long gives a description of a codex containing it, with some extracts, by way of specimen, of the language; and there is another MS. of it in the British Museum, of which a full description is given in the Bibliotheca Lansdowniana, p. 284, ff. The version in these codices does not go beyond Proverbs.

Emerging from these obscurer regions of inquiry we come to those versions which have been printed, and of which it is possible to give a certain account.

1. That of Guiars des Moulins, an ecclesiastic of Picardy. Taking as his basis the Historia Scholastica of Peter Comestor, a digest of the Bible History with glosses, he freely translated this; adding a sketch of the history of Job, the Proverbs, and probably the other books ascribed to Solomon; substituting for Comestor's history of the Maccabees a translation of this from the Vulgate; and in general conforming the whole more closely to the text of the Vulgate than Comestor had done. The Psalms, Prophets, and Epistles, were not in the work as first issued; and it is uncertain whether the Acts was not also omitted; all these, however, were added in later copies. Many MSS. of this work exist, the most important of which is at Jena. An edition of this Bible, as completed by different hands, was issued from the press by order of Charles VIII. about the year 1487, edited by the king's confessor, J. de Rely, and printed by Verard, Paris, 2 tomes, fol. Twelve editions of this, some at Paris and some at Lyons, appeared between 1487 and 1545. This is called La Grant Bible, to distinguish it from a work entitled La Bible pour les simples gens, which is a summary of the history of the O. T., and of which several undated editions have been examined. Previous to the edition of 1487, an edition of the N. T., of the same translation as that found in the completed work of Guiars, but not by Guiars himself, was printed at Lyons by Barth. Buyer, fol., and edited by two Augustinian monks, Julien Macho and Peter Farget; it is undated, but is referred to the year 1478, and justly claims to be the Editio Princeps of the French Scriptures.

2. In the year 1523, appeared at Paris, from the press of Simon De Colines, an anonymous translation of the N. T., which was often reprinted, and to which in 1525 was added the Psalter, and in 1528 the rest of the O. T. (together 7 vols. 8vo), the last portion being issued at Antwerp, in consequence of attempts on the part of the French clergy to prevent its appearance. Tradition ascribes this version to Jacques Le Fevre d' Etaples, who had before this distinguished himself by a Latin translation of St. Paul's Epistles, and by exegetical works on the Gospels and Epistles; and there is no reason to question the justice of the ascription. This version is made from the Vulgate with slight variations in the N. T., where the author follows the Greek. The complete work appeared in one vol. fol., at Antwerp, in 1530, and again from the same types in 1532. It was placed in the Papal Index, in 1546; but in 1550 it was re-issued at Louvain in fol., edited by two priests, Nicolas de Leuze, and Franz van Larben, who corrected the style, and struck out all that savoured of what they deemed heresy. Of this corrected version many editions have been issued.

3. The first French Protestant version was prepared by Pierre Robert Olivetan, a relation of Calvin, and was printed at Serrieres near Neuchâtel in Switzerland, in 1535, fol. Of this edition very few copies survive. It was reprinted at Geneva in 1540, at Lyons in 1541, and, with a few emendations from the pen of Calvin, again at Geneva in 1545. In 1551, a thoroughly revised edition, with the addition of some of the Apocryphal books by Beza, and a new translation of the Psalms by Budé, was issued at Geneva. It has been often reprinted since. An edition for the use of the Vaudois, and for which they subscribed 1500 golden crowns, was printed at Neuchâtel in 1556. This translation was made for the O. T., from the Latin version of Santes Pagninus, and for the N. T. after the versions of Lefevre and Erasmus. In its first form it was very imperfect, and even after the revisal of Calvin, and the emendations of subsequent editors, it remained behind the requirements of an authorized version.

4. To remedy the defects of Olivetan's version and produce one more suited to the wants of the age, the Venerable Company of Pastors at Geneva undertook a thorough revisal of the work with the special aid of Beza, Goulart, Fay, etc., and under the editorial care of Cornelius Bertram. This appeared in 1588. In this revision Seigneur, which, in all the other Protestant versions is rendered by a word equivalent to Lord, is throughout translated L'Eternel. Revised editions have been issued by the Venerable Company in 1693, 1712, 1726, 1805, and of the N. T. in 1833; the two last very modernized in style. This claims to be the most elegant of the French versions, but it is far from being an adequate rendering of the original.

5. The Bible of Diodati, Gen. 1644; of Desmarets, Amst. 1669; of Martin, Utr. (N. T.) 1696, (Bible) 1707, 2 vols. fol.; of Roques, Basle 1744; Osterwald, Neuch. 1744, are revisions of Olivetan's text undertaken by individuals. Of these Osterwald's is the most thorough, and may be viewed as occupying the place in the French Protestant Church of an authorized version, though Martin's is the one most esteemed by the more orthodox of its members, while that of Desmarets is sought by those who attach value to fine paper and printing. A carefully revised edition of Osterwald's Bible, with parallels by the Rev. W. Mackenzie, has just been issued by the French Bible Society, Par. 1861.

6. Of avowedly new translations from the original by individuals may be mentioned that of Seb. Chastillon (Castalio) 2 tomes fol., Bas. 1555, in which the translator aimed to impart classical elegance to the style, but which was universally regarded as neither conveying the just sense of the original nor being in accordance with French idiom; that of Le Clerc, 2 vols. 4to, Amst. 1703, in the interests of Arminianism; that of Le Cene, published after his death in 2 vols. fol., Amst. 1741, deeply marked by Socinian leanings; and that of Beausobre and L'Enfant, 2 vols. 4to, Amst. 1718. This last is by much the best, and has been repeatedly reprinted [BEAUSOBRE].

7. Of Roman Catholic versions of the Bible the first is that of René Benoist, a member of the theological faculty at Paris, which appeared in 1566. It was condemned by Pope Gregory XIII. in 1575, and involved the author in much trouble because of its supposed Protestant leanings. It is in fact only a slightly altered transcript of the Geneva Bible. A revised edition, conformed to the Vulgate, was proposed and issued by the divines at Louvain. Four translations of the N. T. had appeared before this, viz., that of Claude Deville, 1613; that of Jacques Corbin, an advocate of Paris, 1643; that of Michel de Marolles, Abbé of Villeloin, 1649; and in 1666 that of Denys Amelotte, a priest of the oratory, whose hatred of the Jansenists and desire to damage their version, then in the press, prompted him to a work for which he was wholly unfit, and the blunders of which drew down on him the unsparring criticism of Richard Simon, a priest of his own order. Marolles had begun a translation of the O. T., but it was suppressed after the printing had proceeded as far as Lev. xxiii. A translation of the N. T. by the Theologians of Louvain appeared in 1686; of this only a few copies exist. All these are made from the Vulgate. So also is the famous Jansenist translation begun by Antoine Lemaître, and finished by his brother Isaac Louis Lemaître de Sacy, aided by Antoine Arnauld, P. Nicole, etc. The N. T. was first published in 2 vols. 8vo. in 1667, and subsequently the O. T., nominally at Mons, but really at Amsterdam. It is variously styled the Version of Mons, the Version of Port Royal, but now commonly the Version of De Sacy. Many editions of it have appeared, with and without notes; the best is that of Fossé and Beaubrun, Par. 1682, 3 vols. 8vo; a beautifully illustrated edition was issued at Paris in 1789-1804, in 12 vols. 8vo. It was with an edition of this version, altered so as to be more conformed to the Vulgate, that Quesnel published his Reflections, 1671-80. The translation of Calmet, in his Commentaire Littéral et Critique, Paris, 1724, may be also viewed as a revised edition of the Mons Bible. Antoine Godeau

Bishop of Grasse, published a translation made from the Vulgate, in 2 vols. 8vo, Paris, 1668. It holds a middle place between a literal version and a paraphrase. The translation of Nic. Legros was published anonymously at Cologne in 1739, and afterwards with his name in several editions. Of the N. T., a translation, from the pen of Richard Simon, appeared anonymously in 1702 at Trevoux. This version was charged by Bossuet with Socinian leanings, and was condemned by Cardinal de Noailles. Of the translation by Huré, 1702, and that by the Jesuits Bouhours, Tellier, and Bernier, between 1697 and 1703, it may suffice to make mention.

8. In our own day several versions of the Psalms have appeared in France. A translation of the whole Bible from the Vulgate, by Eugene Geronde, in 23 vols. 8vo, appeared at Paris between 1820 and 1824. This has been frequently reprinted, and has excited much attention, some of the journals vehemently commending it, while by others it has been no less severely criticised. The latest appearance in this department is the translation of the Gospels by La Mennais, 1846, the style of which is admirable, but the notes appended to it are in the interest of Socialism. But the most important work of this kind is undoubtedly the translation from the Hebrew of the O. T. by S. Cahen, La Bible: Traduction Nouvelle avec l'Hebreu en regard, &c.; 18 vols. 8vo, Par. 1832-39 [CAHEN]. (Le Long, Bibliotheca Sacra; Simon, Hist. Crit. du N. T., liv. ii.; Brunet, Manuel du Libraire; Horne, Introduction, vol. ii. pt. 2; Reuss, Geschichte des V. T., sec. 466, etc., and art. Romanische Bibelübersetzungen, in Herzog's Encyclopædie).—W. L. A.

FRIEDLÄNDER, DAVID, was born in Königsburg in 1749. Attracted by the great reformation in Judaism, and the revival of Hebrew literature, which were carried on by Mendelssohn and his associates in Berlin, Friedländer came to the metropolis of Prussia in 1770, where he at once lent his powerful influence to the aid of the Society for the promotion of Biblical literature. His contribution to the great Bible-work started by Mendelssohn, is קהלת, Das Buch Koheleth, im Original, mit dem hebr. Commentar Mendelssohns u. die Uebersetzung David Friedländers, Berlin, 1770. [MENDELSSOHN.] He died in 1834 in Berlin.—C. D. G.

FRINGES, or FRINGED GARMENTS (צִיצִית, קפדאָדע, Sept. and N. T.) The law respecting fringes is contained in Num. xv. 38-41, and Deut. xxii. 12. Here the children of Israel are enjoined to append fringes or tassels (צִיצִית, גְּדִילִים), consisting of several threads, to the four corners (כַּסּוֹת, בָּנָךְ) of their outer garment (אֶרְבַּע כַּסּוֹת), put one distinguishing thread of deep blue in each of these fringes (וַתִּתְּנוּ עַל צִיצִית הַכֵּנָה פָּתִיל תְּכֵלֶת).*

* The A. V., following the Vulg., Coverdale, Matthew's Bible, the Geneva Version, and the Bishops' Bible, renders פָּתִיל here by ribbon, which entirely mars the sense of the passage. It needs hardly to be remarked, that the Sept., the Chaldee, and all the Jewish interpreters who knew from practice what it meant, rightly render it thread.

and constantly look at them (וּדְאִיתֶם אֹתָם), in order to be put in mind thereby (וּתְזַכְּרֶתֶם) of God's commandments, to keep them. What number of threads each of these symbolical fringes is to have besides the said blue one, of what material, or how they are to be made, the injunction does not say; like most of the Mosaic laws, it leaves the particulars to be determined by the executive powers according to the peculiar circumstances of the time.

Guided by the fact that they are symbolical, tradition, in determining the manner in which these fringes are to be made, endeavoured to act in harmony with their spiritual import, and hence fixed that each of these four צִיצִית = fringes or tassels, for the four corners of the garment, should consist of eight threads of white wool, the emblem of purity and holiness (Is. i. 18); that one of these threads is to be wound round the others, first seven times, and then a double knot to be made; then eight times, and a double knot (15 = י"ה); then eleven times (= ו"א), and a double knot; and finally thirteen times (= אָחֵד), and a double knot, so as to obtain from the collective number of times which this thread is wound round, the words אָחֵד אָחֵד, constituting the creed which was the distinguishing mark of the Hebrew nation, and which was inscribed on their banners, whilst the five knots represent the five books of the Law. As the Law, however, is said to contain 613 commandments [EDUCATION], and as the design of these fringes is to remind the Jews of all these commandments (אֵת כָּל מִצְוֹת), tradition has so arranged it, that the word צִיצִית, which is numerically 600, with the 8 threads and 5 knots, should exactly comprise this number, and thus constitute a perfect symbol of the Law.

Originally, as we have seen, this fringed or tasseled garment was the outer one. It was more like a large oblong piece of cloth, with a hole in the centre through which the head was put, thus dividing it into two halves, one covering the front, and the other the back of the body, like a tunic.

But when the Hebrews began to mix with other nations, and especially when they were dispersed and became a byword and a hissing, this ancient badge of distinction which God conferred upon them became the signal of persecution, inasmuch as it indicated that the wearer of it was a Jew, on whom Christians thought they ought to avenge the blood of Christ. Hence the Israelites found it necessary to discard the fringed garment as an outer dress, and to wear it in a smaller size, and a somewhat altered form, as an under garment, in order to conceal it from their persecutors.

This under fringed-garment is called אֶרְבַּע

כנפות, the four-cornered dress, or simply ציצית, fringes or tassels, and is worn by every orthodox Jew to the present day.

But though the Jews have been compelled to relinquish the large outer fringed-garment as a permanent article of apparel, they still continue to wear it in a somewhat modified form, at their morning prayers, and call it טלית, Talith, i.e., cover or wrapper.

This Talith, or fringed wrapper, is generally made of a white woollen material; the wool must be spun by Jews for this express purpose. It has three or more blue stripes running in parallel lines across the whole garment, at the right and left side. In some cases, however, the Talith is also made of silk. Every married Jew must wear it at morning prayer; a single man can do what he likes. When putting it on, the following prayer is offered: 'Blessed art thou, O Lord, King of the universe, who hast sanctified us with thy commandments, and enjoined us to array ourselves with fringes.' The Jews attach the utmost importance to the fringed garment. Thus it is related in the Talmud, that 'R. Joseph asked R. Joseph b. Rabba, which commandment has your father admonished you to observe more than any other? He replied, the law about the fringes. Once when my father, on descending a ladder, stepped on one of the threads and tore it off, he would not move from the place till it was repaired' (Sabbath, 118, b). Some of the rabbins go so far as to say, that the law respecting the fringes is as important as all the other laws put together (comp. Rashi on Numb. xv. 41). It was for this reason that the woman with the issue of blood (Matt. ix. 20), and the inhabitants of Gennesaret (ibid. xiv. 36), were so anxious to touch a fringe of our Saviour's garment (κράσπεδον τοῦ ἱματίου). This superstitious reverence for the external symbol, with little care for the things it symbolised, led the Pharisees to enlarge their fringes, believing that the larger they made the tassels, the better they did God's service; and this it was that our Saviour rebuked: comp. Matt. xxiii. 5.

FROG. [TSEPHARDEA.]

FRONTLETS. [PHYLACTERIES.]

FRUITS. פֶּרִי peri, fruit in general, vegetable or animal (Deut. vii. 13, bis; xxviii. 51, bis). It originated the English word 'fruit,' by the פ being sounded as ph, and subsequently converted into f. The Hebrews had three generic terms designating three great classes of the fruits of the land, closely corresponding to what may be expressed in English as, 1. Corn-fruit, or field produce, דָּגָן; 2. Vintage-fruit, תְּיֹבֶה; 3. Orchard-fruit, תְּאֵנָה.

Referring to the separate articles under these heads, we shall here simply exhibit their relative positions.

a. They are found mutually associated in nineteen places. Dagan occurs with tirosk alone eleven times; with yayin only once, and there (Lam. ii. 12) yayin is used for grapes. Tirosk occurs thirty-eight times; in thirty places it is associated with the confessedly generic word dagan; in twenty-one with yitzhar; and it is found only six times without either dagan or yitzhar.

b. Tirosk occurs seven times with rayshyth or biccor, 'first-fruits;' ten times with terobhah, 'offerings,' or magnasayr, 'tithes,' which were mainly the first of gathered fruits and grain in their natural state.

c. Tirosk is connected with yayin in three passages only twice by way of climax merely (Hos. iv. 11; Is. xxiv. 7-10), and once (Mic. vi. 15) as the yielder of wine, not wine itself.

d. Tirosk is not directly united with shemen (oil) in a single place.

e. The three terms are constantly and closely connected with expressions indicating increase of vegetable produce, or the spontaneous growth of the fruits of the earth, or the increase of objects of culture, especially the fruits of the field and the vineyard; they also occur in connection with terms expressive of fruitful or animal produce, sometimes with the vine, olive, fig, or palm tree, but scarcely ever with their specific fruit, or with particular articles of diet; still more rarely are they connected with terms evincing the process of preparing or preserving them, or the vehicle or mode of their consumption. In all these respects they present a complete contrast to terms denoting specific products or artificial preparations, as yayith (olive), shemen (oil), yayin (wine), or lekhem (food or bread).

f. In the very rare instances in which they do occur in connection with specific articles or circumstances, special reasons obviously exist for the fact, confirmatory of the view advanced as to their generic signification. The exceptions prove the rule.

g. Lastly, though the three terms are employed throughout a period of one thousand years (Num. xviii. 12, B.C. 1489, to Neh. xiii. 12, B.C. 409) by a series of fourteen authors, the bulk of whom also use yayin and shemen, occasionally in conjunction, yet not in one instance have they crossed tirosh with shemen, or yayin with yitzhar. On the contrary, the triad of generic terms have been cautiously and correctly discriminated from words merely denoting some of their species, or artificial preparations from them.

The term קַיִץ kayits, 'summer-fruits,' appears to denote those less important species of fruit which were adapted only to immediate consumption, or could not be easily or conveniently conserved for winter use (Jer. xl. 10, 12). Kayits may have been included as a species under the head of Orchard-fruit: it would seem to indicate either the existence of some contrasted term, as 'winter-fruits,' or to imply that the products of the class under which it ranked as a species were generally distinguished by their capability of being preserved throughout the year. It is conceived that the products denoted by the third of the generic terms above noticed were chiefly characterized by their capacity of being stored up and preserved like our own orchard-fruit; and thus their generic name might be inclusive of kayits, 'summer-fruits,' though mainly and originally referring to 'winter-fruits.'—F. FULKE, WILLIAM, was born about the year 1538, probably in London. Of his parentage and early life nothing is certainly known. From Christ's Hospital, where he is supposed to have received the rudiments of his education, he removed to St. John's College, Cambridge, in the year 1555. After taking his B.A. degree, he spent six years in the study of the law at Clifford's Inn; but preferring divinity, he was admitted to holy orders; he took his M.A. in 1564, in which year he was elected to a fellowship of his college. To the study of theology he added an accomplishment which was rare at that time, a sound knowledge of the Oriental languages. He proceeded to his B.D. degree, but was shortly afterwards ejected from his college for too strong a leaning to the principles of puritanism. Upon this he commenced a course of lectures and disputations, which were attended by a numerous class of students. It was not long before he experienced a favourable turn in his affairs, having attracted the friendly notice of Queen Elizabeth's favourite, the Earl of Leicester. Through his means he was presented, Aug. 10, 1571, to the rectory of Warley in Essex, and soon afterwards, March 1573, to that of Dennington in Suffolk. Fulke obtained an honorary D.D. on being appointed chaplain to the Earl of Lincoln, when that nobleman went to Paris as British ambassador. The same influence probably contributed to Dr. Fulke's advancement to the mastership of Pembroke College, Cambridge, in 1578. Having filled the office of Vice-Chancellor, and governed his college for eleven years, he died in August 1589. No less than twenty-six treatises were published by him, besides some works known to exist among the Harleian MSS. The characteristic of all his writings was polemical zeal in defence of the Protestant cause, of which he was one of the most able apologists of his time. Although controversy was his calling, three of his works deserve to be mentioned here from their Biblical character. We mention them in the order of their publication. (1.) In sacrum Divi Johannis Apocalypsim prælectiones, London, 1573, 4to. Translated into English by George Gyfford, London, 1573, 4to. (2.) The text of the New Testament of Jesus Christ, translated out of the Vulgar Latine by the Papists of the traitorous Seminarie at Rheims, with arguments of bookes, chapters, and annotations, pretending to discover the corruptions of diuers translations, and to clear the controuersies of these days. Whereunto is added the translation out of the original Greeke, commonly used in the Church of England, &c., by William Fulke, D.D., London, 1580, 1589, 1601, 1617, 1633, folio. This work may be said to embody the whole popish controversy respecting the Scriptures, and as it gives in parallel columns the Rheinish translation of the Vulgate, and the Bishops' translation, it enables the reader to make an easy comparison of their respective merits. Fulke was a very able man, and his work is entitled to a place in every critical library. Mr. Charles Butler, though a Romanist, candidly commends it as very curious and deserving of attention. This polemico-biblical work, which is a good voucher of the advanced learning of the Elizabethan divines, has been lately reprinted at New York, without the two rival versions. By the help of a close but clear type, however, the whole of Dr. Fulke's unanswered and unanswerable confutation is comprised in a convenient 8vo volume. (3.) A Defence of the sincere and true translations of the Holy Scriptures into the English tongue, against the cavills of Gregory Martin, by William Fulke, D.D., master of Pembroke Hall, Cambridge. This is the title (slightly abridged by being weeded of some vituperative epithets) of a work which has done good service in the Romish controversy since its first publication in the year 1583, and which may still be read with interest, for the proofs it affords of the existence of a sound and vigorous criticism in the age of the learned author. Fulke's book is rendered the more interesting by incorporating in its pages the attacks on our early translations of the Scriptures, made by one of the most learned controversialists of the time, Gregory Martin, one of the divinity professors in the English [Romanist] College of Rheims. The Parker Society reprinted Fulke's defence, including Martin's assaults, in 1843, with great care and accuracy, under the superintendence of the Rev. C. H. Hartshorne, who enriched the edition with some valuable notes, and a revision of the numerous quotations. Fulke's work seems to have settled the controversy until the time of our James II., when a Romish writer, named Thomas Ward, revived it by the publication of what was little more than an abridgment of Gregory Martin's volume, entitled, Errata of the Protestant Bible. This work of Ward's has been often reprinted in Ireland in the present century; but has called forth able refutations by the Rev. Drs. Ryan and Grier.—P. H.

FULLER. At the transfiguration, our Sa-

jour's robes are said to have been white, 'so as no fuller on earth could white them' (Mark ix. 3). Elsewhere we read of 'fullers' soap' (Mal. iii. 2), and of 'the fullers' field' (2 Kings xviii. 17). Of the processes followed in the art of cleaning cloth and the various kinds of stuff among the Jews, we have no direct knowledge. In an early part of the operation they seem to have trod the cloths with their feet, as the Hebrew Ain Rogel, or En-rogel, literally Foot-fountain, has been rendered, on Rabbinical authority, 'Fullers' fountain,' on the ground that the fullers trod the cloths there with their feet. A subsequent operation was probably that of rubbing the cloth on an inclined plane, in a mode which is figured in the Egyptian paintings, and still preserved in the East.

FULLER, ANDREW, was born at Wicken, near Ely, Cambridgeshire, Feb. 6, 1754. He became pastor of the Baptist Church at Soham, in 1775, and removed to Kettering, in Northamptonshire, in 1782. He was one of the founders of the Baptist Missionary Society, and acted as its secretary from its formation, Oct. 2, 1792, to his death, May 7, 1815. His education was extremely limited, and his early associations were very unfavourable to enlarged views of religion, or to mental improvement in general. But the native vigour of his mind surmounted every obstacle, and raised him to be one of the ablest theologians of his day; while the sagacity, firmness, and energy of his character, admirably fitted him for his position in relation to the cause of missions. His writings are numerous; but his reputation as an author is chiefly founded on The Gospel its own witness; and The Calvinistic and Socinian systems compared.

The only other productions of his pen that demand special mention in the present work are his Expository Discourses on the Book of Genesis, (1806, 2 vols. 8vo), and a similar volume On the Revelation (1815). For learned criticism he was wholly unfitted; but for questions not involving scholarship, he possessed some of the most valuable qualifications of a Biblical expositor, masculine sense and acuteness, independence in forming his opinions, combined with a profound reverence for divine truth. An uniform edition of his works appeared soon after his decease, edited by his most intimate friend Dr. Ryland, with a copious biography; a second edition was published by his son Andrew Gunton in 1857, 5 vols. 8vo, including a number of miscellaneous pieces collected from various periodicals; a third edition in one vol. royal 8vo was issued in 1850. His works on Deism and Socinianism have also been reprinted by Mr. Bohn in his Standard Library.—J. E. R.

FULLER, NICHOLAS, was born in 1557 at Southampton; and was educated first at the Grammar School of that town, and afterwards at Hart Hall, Oxford. To ripe scholarship in the ordinary learning of the time, he added the unusual acquirement of a thorough knowledge of Hebrew and its cognate languages. His attainments have been commended by many eminent authorities, and his writings, though not voluminous, procured for him the respect of the learned at home and abroad (comp. Bochart Hieros. [ed. Leusden] p. 17, and passim; Grotius on Luke ii. 49; Poole, Synopsis on Exod. xxix. 13; Wood, Athen. Oxon.; Orme, Biblioth. Bibl., etc.). Our author is one instance, out of not a few, which have occurred and do still occur, of high-minded men, who toil on amidst poverty and neglect, sustained by the confidence that the labour which they bestow on a good pursuit, though it fail to requite them beyond the pleasure it inspires, may be not in vain. Fuller, to defray the expenses of his 'education, was amanuensis or scribe to Dr. Horne, bishop of Winchester, afterwards he attended, as tutor servant, on Sir Henry Wallop to Oxford; and returning thence, was made minister of Allington, near Salisbury, where he had a benefice rather than a living, so small were the revenues thereof' (Fuller's Worthies of England [by Nuttall], vol. ii. p. 19). It was here that, in the hours he could spare from tuition, to which he resorted to supplement the insufficiency of his clerical income, he wrote his six books of Miscellanea Sacra, or disquisitions of various extent but of unvarying acumen and learning, in which (as Thomas Fuller quaintly, but correctly says of him), 'he was happy in pitching on not difficult trifles, but useful difficulties, tending to the understanding of Scripture.' The first three books of this work were published at Heidelberg, 8vo, 1612, with a dedication addressed to Sir H. Wallop. The author, who seems to have resorted to a foreign publisher because of his poverty, was sadly disappointed at the miserable manner in which his book was given to the world. A second edition, with the addition of a fourth book and a dedication to his friend Lake, afterwards bishop of Bath and Wells, appeared at Oxford, 1615; this was reprinted in London and at Heidelberg in 1618: two more books were added in the next edition, with a dedication to Bishop Andrews, in whom Fuller had found a Maccenas; and reprints of this appeared at Leyden, in 1622, and Strasburg, 1650, with the title Miscellanea Theologica in place of M. Sacra. This change (for which the author was not responsible) was not a happy or correct one; for the work is not theological in its character, though full of sacred subjects. In the one hundred and twenty articles or treatises, of which the entire work consists, the author illustrates and comments on many passages and prominent words of Holy Scripture, involving inquiries of natural history and archæology, as well as of sacred criticism and exegesis. He seems to have furnished his mind with information derived from many varied sources. The entire Misc. Sacra is reprinted in the Critici Sacri among the dissertations in the 8th volume. Poole has also transferred to the pages of his Synopsis the substance of Fuller's treatises.

Besides his learning, which has been often commended for its 'accuracy,' there is much good sense, kindly manner, and modesty in Fuller's writings, which he humbly describes as 'a widow's mite thrown into the treasury as an offering to God, and for the use of the studious.' His modest volume, which was in general so well received, excited the jealousy of Drusius, the Belgian critic, who accused him of plagiarism. To this Fuller replied in the Appendix Apologetica, subjoined to his Miscellanea Sacra, which is the very model of a refutation. His answer to Drusius is as gentle as it is effective; firmly vindicating his own character as his dearest possession, but most sorry that it must needs be against the aspersions of a man whom his labours in the same field had made him so greatly to respect. Bishop Andrewes lost no time in rewarding the long neglected but most meritorious scholar who had been thrown in his way; he gave him the valuable living of Bishop's Waltham in Hampshire—but it was too late. Fuller lived only a year or two to enjoy this with a prebendal stall in the neighbouring cathedral of Salisbury, which had been previously bestowed upon him. He died about the year 1626 (Fuller's Worthies, ii. 20). In the last of his published writings he expresses an intention (ἐὰν περ ἐκέρπηγῃ ὁ Θεός) of completing certain other 'Opuscula' for the press—these probably are the two MSS. which are said to be still extant in the Bodleian Library (see A. à Wood's Athen. Oxon. by Bliss.)—P. H.

FULLER, THOMAS, D.D., was born at Aldwinkle in Northamptonshire, in June 1608, and died in London 16th Aug. 1661. He was successively curate of St. Benet's, Cambridge, prebendary of Salisbury, rector of Broadwindsor, Dorsetshire, lecturer at the Savoy, London, and, during the Commonwealth, for a time perpetual curate of Waltham, and afterwards vicar of Cranford. After the Restoration, he returned to the Savoy, and was restored to his prebend. Though his life was comparatively short, and was cast on troublous times, not many authors have been so remarkable for the number and elaboration of the works they have produced. His claims to be numbered among Biblical scholars rest chiefly on his Pisgah-sight of Palestine, and confines thereof; with the history of the O. and N. Testaments acted thereon, fol., Lond. 1662. Perhaps no work was ever written on such a subject so sparkling with wit, and so full of quaint and humorous remark as this; at the same time preserving so much of faithful adherence to the subject of which the author professes to treat. The work is not confined to Biblical topography, but handles many points of history and archaeology; it is also illustrated by maps and engravings, which are as quaint in their way as the text they are meant to illustrate. Fuller published also A Comment on the book of Ruth, Lond. 1654, being the substance of lectures delivered at St. Benet's twenty-four years before; A Comment on the first eleven chapters of Matthew's Gospels, concerning Christ's temptations, Lond. 1652; and Notes on Jonah, appended to a volume of sermons, Lond. 1656. His fame rests chiefly on his Holy and Profane State, his Holy War, his Church History of Britain, and his History of the Worthies of England.—W. L. A.

FULLER'S FIELD (שִׁדְרֵי כֹלֶם; Sept. ἀγρὸς τοῦ γράβου). This place is three times mentioned in the Bible, and always in the same connection. 'The conduit of the upper pool which is in the highway of the fuller's field' (2 Kings xviii. 17. 1s.

vii. 3; xxxvi. 2). Its position is not defined; but we can gather that it was on one of the leading roads, to which it also gave its name; that it was on the 'conduit' or canal connected with the 'upper pool,' and that it was near Jerusalem. The heralds of the king of Assyria spake in the hearing of the people on the wall from 'the highway of the Fuller's Field' (2 Kings xviii. 17, 26). There can be little doubt that the 'upper pool' is the cistern now called Birket el-Mamilla, at the head of the valley of Hinnom, a short distance west of the Yafa gate (Handbook for S. and P., 99, 136.) Hezekiah conveyed the waters from it by a subterranean aqueduct to the west side of the city of David (2 Chron. xxxii. 30). The natural course of this aqueduct was along the ancient road to the western gate beside the castle; and this was the road by which the Assyrian ambassadors would doubtless approach the city, coming as they did from Lachish. The position of the Fuller's Field is thus indicated. It lay on the side of the highway west of the city. The fullers' occupation required an abundant supply of water, and an open space for drying the clothes. We may, therefore, conclude that their 'field' was beside, or at least not far distant from the upper pool.

Dr. Williams, and some others who follow him, affirm that the Fuller's Field, and the fountain or pool of Gihon, were somewhere on the plateau north of the Damascus gate, and near, if not in the upper part of the valley of the Kidron. But this view is opposed to 2 Chron. xxxii. 30; and no amount of reasoning can get over the plain statement of that passage, that Hezekiah 'stopped the upper outflow (or spring כְּנֶזֶר) of Gihon, and brought it straight down to the west side of the city of David.' Now this would be a physical impossibility if we place Gihon elsewhere than on the west side of the city. (See, however, William's Holy City, ii. 471, sq.; Smith's Dict. of the Bible, s. v. Gihon and Jerusalem; Barclay's City of the Great Kings.)—J. L. P.

FULLERS' FOUNTAIN. [EN-ROGEL.]

FULLERS' SOAP. [BORITH.]

FUNERALS. [BURIAL; MOURNING.]

FURNACE. The furnaces mentioned in the Bible were of various kinds. 1. אֶפְרַיִם, according to Ges., for אֶפְרַיִם, from the root אָפַן, to smoke, with א as a formative prefix. But Fürst says, non ex אֶפְרַיִם ortum, sed ex radice אָפַן, addita terminatione nominali UN . . . Somniant, qui hujus modi vocabula e duobus coaluisse arbitrantur (Concord. Vet. Test. Heb. et Chal.) Dan. iii. 6, 11, 15. A large kind of furnace having a wide open mouth above, with an opening near the bottom to allow the metal, or other material, to run out. The employment of the furnace as an instrument of punishment seems to have been a favourite method with the King of Babylon, as it has continued to be in Persia down to recent times. 'During the death of 1662,' says Chardin, 'I saw such ovens heated in the royal square at Ispahan to terrify the bakers, and to deter them from deriving advantage from the general distress' (quoted by Kitto). References to the same mode of punishment are found in Jer. xxix. 22, and Hos. vii. 7.

2. כִּבְשָׁן, from the root כִּבַּשׁ, to subdue, so called from its subduing metals or other materials thrown into it (Gen. xix. 28; Exod. ix. 8, 10; xix. 18). From the occurrence of this word in Exod. ix. it seems to denote a furnace or kiln for baking bricks, although it may have been also used for smelting metals.

3. כִּבּוּר, from the verb of the same form, meaning to boil up, although Furst takes it in the sense of boring, or hollowing out, 'a profunditate vel cavitate,' a furnace for smelting metals certainly. Thus, Ezek. xxii. 20, 22, 'the house of Israel are brass, and tin, and iron, and lead in the midst of the furnace,' כִּבּוּר; Prov. xvii. 3; xxvii. 21, 'the furnace,' כִּבּוּר, 'for gold.' See also Is. xlviii. 10; Deut. iv. 20; where the word is used metaphorically.

4. תַּנּוּר = a furnace of fire, compounded, according to Ges., of תָּנָה, i. q., תַּנְאָה, or תַּנְחָה, an oven, and נֹר, Chal., a fire; to which, however, Furst objects, maintaining that 'ex נֹר, crebro illo Substantivorum additamento rite formatum,' properly, an oven for baking bread, although it seems to have been used for other purposes. In its wider acceptance it occurs Gen. xv. 17; Is. xxxi. 9; Mal. iii. 19 (iv. i). In its special reference, it is found Ex. vii. 28, (viii. 3); Lev. xxvi. 26; Hos. vii. 4. 'The Tannur is a large round pot of earthen or other materials, two or three feet high, narrowing towards the top; this being first heated by a fire made within, the dough or paste is spread upon the sides to bake, thus forming thin cakes.' Of the Gr. κλίσανος, 'by which the LXX. render this word,' Jerome says, on Lam. v. 10, Clibanus est coquendis panibus aeni Vasculi diducta rotunditas, quae sub urentibus flammis ardet intrinsecus' (Ges. in Verb.) 'The tower of the furnaces,' מִגְדֹּל הַתַּנּוּרִים, upon, or near the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 11; xii. 38), should perhaps rather be, tower of the ovens, if not taken as a proper name, Migdol-Hattannurim.

5. Κάμνος, by which the first three of the preceding words are usually rendered by the LXX., occurs in the Apocrypha and N. T. to denote furnaces of different sorts, e. g., the Potter's furnace (Sirach xxvii. 5; xxxviii. 30). The Egyptian potter's furnace, as represented in Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians, resembled a chimney in shape, and was about six feet high (ii. 108). It is also used of the Smith's furnace (Sirach xxxviii. 28; Apoc. i. 15). The word is used indefinitely (Apoc. ix. 2), where there is a reference to Gen. xix. 28; and in Matt. xiii. 42, 50, where there is an obvious reference to Dan. iii. —I. J.

G.

GAAL (גַּל) miscarriage; Sept. Γαλ), son of Ebed. He went to Shechem with his brothers when the inhabitants became discontented with Abimelech, and so engaged their confidence that they placed him at their head. At the festival at which the Shechemites offered the first-fruits of their vintage in the temple of Baal, Gaal, by apparently drunken bravadoes, roused the valour of the people, and strove yet more to kindle their wrath against the absent Abimelech. It would seem as if the natives had been in some way intimately connected with, or descended from, the original inhabitants; for Gaal endeavoured to awaken their attachment to the ancient family of Hamor, the father of Shechem, which ruled the place in the time of Abraham (Gen. xxxiv. 2, 6), and which seems to have been at this time represented by Gaal and his brothers. Although deprived of Shechem, the family appears to have maintained itself in some power in the neighbourhood; which induced the Shechemites to look to Gaal when they became tired of Abimelech. Whether he succeeded in awakening among them a kind feeling towards the descendants of the ancient masters of the place, does not appear; but eventually they went out under his command, and assisted doubtless by his men, to intercept and give battle to Abimelech, when he appeared before the town. He, however, fled before Abimelech, and his retreat into Shechem being cut off by Zebul, the commandant of that place, he went to his home, and we hear of him no more. The account of this attempt is interesting, chiefly from the slight glimpse it affords of the position, at this period, of what had been one of the reigning families of the land before its invasion by the Israelites (Judg. ix. 26-48) B.C. 1026.—J. K.

GAASH (גַּאשׁ, shaking, earthquake; Sept. Γαᾶδδ, Γαδδ), the name of a hill (גַּד), part of the Ephraim range, on the north side of which Joshua was buried (Josh. xxiv. 30; Judg. ii. 9). In 2 Sam. xxiii. 30, and 1 Chron. xi. 32, mention is made of the גַּאשׁ, the ravines, valleys, or wadys running down from Gaash (A. V. 'brooks of Gaash'), as the designation of the locality whence came Hiddai or Hurai, one of David's heroes. The hill has not been identified.—W. L. A.

GABA. [GEB.]

GABBATHA occurs John xix. 13, where the Evangelist states that Pontius Pilate, alarmed at last, in his attempts to save Jesus, by the artful insinuation of the Jews, 'If thou let this man go, thou art not Caesar's friend,' went into the pretorium again, and brought Jesus out to them, and sat down once more upon the βῆμα or tribunal, in a place called Λιθόστρωτον, but in the Hebrew Gabbatha. The Greek word, signifying literally stone-paved, is an adjective, and is generally used as such by the Greek writers; but they also sometimes use it substantively for a stone pavement, when ἔδαφος may be understood. In the Septuagint it answers to רֶצֶף (2 Chron. vii. 3; Esther i. 6). Jerome reads 'Sedit pro tribunali in loco qui dicitur Lithostrotos.' The Greek word, as well as the Latin, is frequently used to denote a pavement formed of ornamental stones of various colours, commonly called a tessellated or mosaic pavement. The partiality of the Romans for this kind of pavement is well known. It is stated by Pliny (Hist. Nat. xxxvi. 64) that, during the time of Sylla, the Romans decorated their houses with such pavements. They also introduced them into the provinces. Suetonius relates that Julius Cæsar, in his military expeditions, took with him the materials of tessellated pavements, ready prepared, that, wherever he encamped, they might be laid down in the pretorium (Casaubon, ad Sueton. p. 38, etc., edit. 1605). From these facts it has been inferred by many eminent writers, that the τῶρος Λιθόστρωτος, or place where Pilate's tribunal was set on this occasion, was covered by a tessellated pavement, which, as a piece of Roman magnificence, was appended to the prætorium at Jerusalem. The emphatic manner in which St. John speaks of it agrees with this conjecture. It further appears from his narrative that it was outside the prætorium; for Pilate is said to have 'come out' to the Jews, who, for ceremonial reasons, did not go into it, on this as well as on other occasions (John xviii. 28, 29, 38; xix. 4, 13). Besides which, the Roman governors, although they tried causes, and conferred with their council (Acts xxv. 12), within the prætorium, always pronounced sentence in the open air. May not then this tessellated pavement, on which the tribunal was now placed, have been inlaid on some part of the terrace running along one side of the prætorium, and overlooking the area where the Jews were assembled, or upon a landing-place of the stairs, immediately before the grand entrance?

It has been conjectured that the pavement in question was no other than the one referred to in 2 Chron. vii. 3, and by Josephus, De Bell. Jud. vi. 1. 8, as in the outer court of the temple; but though it appears that Pilate sometimes sat upon his tribunal in different places, as, for instance, in the open market-place (De Bell. Jud. ii. 9. 3), yet the supposition that he would, on this occasion, when the Jews were pressing for a speedy judgment, and when he was overcome with alarm, adjourn the whole assembly, consisting of rulers of every grade, as well as the populace, to any other place, is very unlikely; and the supposition that such place was any part of the temple is encumbered with additional difficulties. The word Gabbatha remains to be considered. It is not certain that St. John intends Λιθόστρωτος as a translation or interpretation of Gabbatha; he may simply mean that the same place was called by these two names in Greek and Hebrew respectively. Yet it may be said that the names אֲבָתָה and Ἀβαθών, which he introduces in a similar way (Rev. ix. 11), are synonymous; and if the word Gabbatha be derived, as Lightfoot suggests (in loc.), from גַּב, 'a surface,' it may correspond to the idea of a pavement; but if, as is usual, it be derived from גָּבַהּ, 'to be high or elevated,' it may refer chiefly to the terrace, or uppermost landing of the stairs, which might have been inlaid with a tessellated pavement. Schleusner understands an elevated mosaic pavement, on which the βήμα was placed, before the prætorium. The most natural inference from St. John's statement is, that the word Gabbatha is 'Hebrew,' or rather Aramaic. The Syriac version, instead of Gabbatha, reads Gepiptha [גִּפְתָּה, lorica, peribolus. The double b in Gabbatha is an objection to its being derived from גָּבַהּ; it is more properly derived from גַּב in the sense of back, or top. The Aramaic and Greek words are different names of the same place.] (Disser. De Λιθοστρώτω, a Conrad Iken, Bremæ, 1725; Lightfoot's Works, vol. ii. pp. 614, 615, Lond. 1684; Hamelsveld, *Bibl. GABISH (גַּבִּישׁ). This word occurs Job xxviii. 18, where it is translated in the A. V. 'pearls.' The LXX. retains it untranslated γαβῖς, while the Vulg. renders it by eminentia—a rendering which rests on its supposed derivation from גָּבַהּ, to be high.

The Targum represents it by בִּירְלִין, but this probably, like the Arab. بلور, which is the same word slightly transposed, denotes not merely beryl but also chrystal. This last is what most modern scholars are agreed upon as the proper equivalent of גַּבִּישׁ. Gesenius and Fürst derive it from גָּבַשׁ, to freeze, congeal; hence אֶלְגִּישׁ, hail (Ez. xiii. 11); and hence, from the similarity of chrystal to ice, the meaning chrystal; comp. κρύσταλλος and Plin. Hist. Nat. xxxvii. 2. It must be confessed, however, that the conclusion here rests on somewhat precarious grounds. The only authority for the verb גָּבַשׁ is in its supposed derivatives; and of not one of these is the meaning even tolerably certain, as all are ἀπὸ λεγόμενα. The reasoning, in fact, is throughout in a circle; the verb is held to convey the idea of congelation, because the derivatives contain it, and this meaning is ascribed to these derivatives because it is contained in the verb.

Gesenius adduces also the Arab. جَبَس, to freeze, but this sense is of dubious legitimacy, the verb properly meaning to raze or crop. Dr. Lee (Book of Job, in loc.; and Heb. Lex. in v.) takes it to mean heavy, and hence precious; and understands it of some valuable metal. Some of the Rabbins understood by it a valuable garment; see Castell, Lex. Heptagl. in voc.—W. L. A.

GABRIAS (Γαβρίας, LXX.; Γαβriel, FA.) According to Tobit i. 14, the brother of Gabael, the person with whom Tobit left in trust (παραθήμην) ten talents of silver; but in iv. 20, Gabael is said to be the son of Gabrias. No light is thrown on this discrepancy by the various readings and versions of this book. The Vulg. in both passages differs widely from the LXX. The old Latin has in the first passage, Et commendavi Gabelo fratri meo filio Gabahel, and in the second, Gabelo filio Gabahel. See Fritzsche, Exegetisches Handbuch zu den Apocryphen.—J. E. R.

GABRIEL (גַּבְרִיאֵל, the mighty one [or hero] of God), the heavenly messenger who was sent to Daniel to explain the vision of the ram and the he-goat (Dan. viii.), and to communicate the prediction of the Seventy Weeks (Dan. ix. 21-27). Under the new dispensation he was employed to announce the birth of John the Baptist to his father Zechariah (Luke i. 11), and that of the Messiah to the Virgin Mary (Luke i. 26). Both by Jewish and Christian writers, Gabriel has been denominated an archangel. The Scriptures, however, affirm nothing positively respecting his rank, though the importance of the commissions on which he was employed, and his own words, 'I am Gabriel, that stand in the presence of God' (Luke i. 19), are rather in favour of the notion of his superior dignity.

In the Book of Enoch, 'the four great archangels, Michael, Raphael, Gabriel, and Uriel' are described as reporting the corrupt state of mankind to the Creator, and receiving their several commissions. To Gabriel he says, 'Go, Gabriel, against the giants, the spurious ones, the sons of fornication, and destroy the sons of the watchers from among the sons of men' (Greek Fragment of the Book of Enoch, preserved by Syncellus in Scaliger's notes on the Chronicon of Eusebius, Amstel. 1658, p. 404). In the rabbinical writings Gabriel is represented as standing in front of the divine throne, near the standard of the tribe of Judah (Buxtorf, Lex. Talmud. s. v. אוריאל). The rabbins also say that he is the Prince of Fire, and appointed to preside over the ripening of fruit; that he was the only one of the angels who understood Chaldee and Syriac, and taught Joseph the seventy languages spoken at the dispersion of Babel; that he and Michael destroyed the host of Sennacherib, and set fire to the temple at Jerusalem (Eisenmenger's Entdecktes Judenthum, th. ii. ss. 365, 379, 380, 383).

By the Mohammedans Gabriel is regarded with profound veneration. To him, it is affirmed, a copy of the whole Koran was committed, which he imparted in successive portions to Mohammed. He is styled in the Koran, the Spirit of Truth, and the Holy Spirit. In his hands will be placed the scales in which the actions of men will be weighed at the last day (Sale's Koran; D'Herbelot's Bibliothèque Orientale).—J. E. R.

GABRIEL SIONITA, a Maronite, born in 1577 at Edessa, a village in the Lebanon: when seven years old he was sent to Rome, and there received his first instruction at the Maronite College. He then devoted himself chiefly to the study of Oriental languages, and by some of his writings came under the notice of the then French ambassador in Rome, Savary de Brèves. The latter, at the instance of Cardinal Perrone, and the librarian at the Royal Library in Paris, De Thou, who were both anxious to carry out their favourite plan of printing a new comprehensive Polyglott Bible, secured the services of both Gabriel and another Maronite, Johannes Esronita, for the new work. Gabriel arrived in Paris in 1614, and was forthwith appointed Professor of Arabic—his mother-tongue—at the Collège de France, and endowed with a rich salary. The two Maronites commenced their Biblical labours, which chiefly consisted in their revising all the Oriental texts, and adding Latin translations to them. In the meantime the Cardinal and De Thou, who had taken the greatest interest in the proposed Polyglott, died, and the scheme was abandoned. Gabriel, who had finished his share of the work, addressed himself to the synod assembled at Blois, in 1619, asking for a subsidy which should enable him either to print the entire Polyglott, or at least to publish the Oriental texts. The synod immediately granted his prayer, and assigned 8000 livres for the purpose of furthering his undertaking; but somehow the money never reached his hands, and he not indistinctly hints at its having gone into the wrong pocket. After this he was involved in a series of troubles and vexatious disputes with Le Jay, the editor of the Polyglott, which ended in his being sent for six months to Vincennes. From this he was released only on the condition that he would now unremittingly work at the Polyglott until it should be completed. He kept his word most conscientiously, but three years after it was finished he died, in 1648, a broken old man, at Paris, which he had hardly ever left since he had first arrived there. His exact share in the work (contained in vol. vii. ff. of the Polyglott) consists in the collation of the various Arab. and Syr. MSS., in the revision of the printed texts, and in the addition of Latin translations to all the Biblical books save Ruth (done by A. Echellensis) and the four Gospels, which he merely revised from Raymundus. The judgments on his achievements vary; but it would appear, both from the mistakes he corrected as from those he left (Cf. Eichh. Intr.), that neither the high-flown praise nor the exaggerated blame bestowed upon them are deserved; but that Gabriel did just what would be expected from a man possessed of a fair knowledge of Arabic and Syriac, but only partially acquainted with Hebrew and Latin, and whose acquisitions generally were on a par with the good scholars of the time. He has, in three small pamphlets, told the whole story of his appointments and disappointments, his squabbles and successes. Besides his contributions to the Polyglott may be mentioned the following works, some of which he published, together with Joannes Ezronita and Victor Szialac,—Liber Psalmorum Davidis ex arabe idiomate in Latinum translatus, Rome, 1614; Grammatica Arabica Maronitarum in libros V. divisa, Paris, 1616, which, however, contains only one book of reading-lessons; Geographia Nubienensis, etc., a very faulty Latin translation of a still more faulty, abridged text of Edrisi (published in Rome in 1592), Paris, 1619. Nor is there much to be said for the appendix of their own, which the translators, Gabriel and Joannes Ezronita added to this last work, entitled, De nonnullis Orientalium urbibus, etc.—Liber Psalmorum ex idiomate Syra in Latinum translatus, Paris, 1625; Veteris philosophi Syri de sapientia divina, poema enigmaticum Syr. et Lat.—Testamentum et pactioes inter Mohammedem et Christiana fidei cultores, Paris, 1634, etc.—E. GAD (גָּד; Sept. Γάδ). 1. The son of Jacob and Zilpah, Leah's maid. His name is explained in the story of his birth, and the explanation is confirmed by a subsequent allusion—'Zilpah bare Jacob a son, and Leah said a troop cometh, and she called his name Gad' (Gen. xxx. 11). The passage is rendered somewhat obscure by the fact that the Kethib has גָּדִי, which the Sept., Vulg., and some modern commentators render 'in felicity'; whereas the Masoretic Keri gives גָּד בָּה as the true reading, and is followed by our A. V. That the latter reading is the true one may be seen by comparing the passage with Gen. xlix. 19, where the word גָּד must bear the signification of 'a troop.' Of the personal history of this patriarch no details are given. His name is not once mentioned except in those lists where the sons of Jacob are all enumerated. All we know of him is that he had seven sons at the time Jacob and his family migrated to Egypt (xlii. 16).

The materials for the history of the tribe of Gad are very scanty. In Jacob's prophetic blessing there is a characteristic play upon the name, and one of the most remarkable examples of paronomasia in the Bible יָגֵד יְנֻדָּנוּ הוּא יָגֵד עֵקֶב (Gen. xlix. 19). No translation can do justice to it. Stanley's rendering approaches the force and point of the original: 'Gad is a troop of plunderers; a troop of plunderers shall plunder him, but he shall plunder at the last' (S. and P., 320). The troops destined to plunder him were the wild hordes of Arabs and Ammonites by whom his borders were infested, whose incursions were frequent, and whose defeat and slaughter were signal (Judg. x, xi.) The tribe numbered 45,650 fighting men at the time of the Exodus; and during the wilderness journey it decreased to 40,500 (Num. i. 25; xvi. 18). The Gadites, like their brethren of Reuben and Manasseh, had retained while in Egypt their old pastoral habits, and were very rich in cattle (xxxii. 1). When the Israelites approached Canaan after the long pilgrimage through the rugged defiles of Sinai, and across the arid plains of Western Arabia, the rich pasture lands of Gilead, with its forests, streams, and glorious scenery, immediately attracted the attention of these tribes; and they 'came and spake unto Moses . . . saying . . . (this) country . . . is a land for cattle, and thy servants have cattle; wherefore . . . let this land be given unto thy servants for a possession' (xxxii. 2-5). Their request was granted; and the two tribes and half settled east of Jordan. They had probably an additional object in making this choice. The country west of the river was of narrow limits. It was not so well suited for the freedom and nomad habits of pastoral life. The Gadites and their brethren wished a wider range for their vast flocks than Palestine afforded; and they saw the great eastern plains open to them. At one period this tribe occupied the country as far east as Salchah (1 Chron. v. 11-16).

The territory which fell to the lot of the Gadites is one of the most beautiful in Syria. On the south it was bounded by the valley of Heshbon; on the west by the Jordan; and on the east by the plain of Arabia (Josh. xiii. 24, sq.). Its northern boundary is somewhat more difficult to define. Gad possessed the whole Jordan valley as far as the sea of Galilee (xiii. 27); but among the mountains eastward the territory extended no farther north than the river Jabbok. The border seems to have run diagonally from that point across the mountains by Mahanaim to the southern extremity of the Sea of Galilee (Josh. xii. 1-6; xiii. 26, 30, 31; Deut. iii. 12, 13 (see Porter's Damascus, ii. 252). As seen from the west this region is a continuous range of purple-tinted mountains, rising abruptly from the chasm of the Jordan, intersected by deep ravines, and partially clothed with oak forests, and jungles of evergreen shrubs. When viewed from the east the appearance is altogether different. It is a low, irregular ridge, in some places not rising more than a hundred feet above the high, bleak plateau of Arabia. The soil among the mountains and in the picturesque glens is fertile, and the pastures are more luxuriant than in any part of Syria. The territory also embraced a number of places remarkable in the sacred and civil history of the patriarchs, judges, and kings; such as Mahanaim, Peniel, Ramoth-Mizpeh, Galed, Succoth, and Rabbath-Ammon.

The Gadites were a warlike race, and they bravely aided their brethren in the conquest of Canaan. Leaving their women and children in their strongholds east of the Jordan, they crossed over armed, and with Reuben and Manasseh led the van in the long campaign under Joshua (Josh. iv. 12, 13; xxii. 1-4). The position of their territory compelled them to keep up their warlike spirit and training in after ages. The Ammonites, whose country they possessed, hung upon their eastern border (Judg. x. 17); and the wild hordes of the Arabian desert made periodical raids upon their pastures and flocks (chaps. vii., viii.) Though often sorely pressed by these fierce plunderers, yet they nobly defended their country, and more than once bore back the tide of conquest on their assailants. One of their greatest victories was that gained over the descendants of Ishmael, the tribes of Jetur, Nephish, and Nodab, from whom they took enormous booty (1 Chron. v. 19-22). The Gadites were well described at that time as 'valiant men, men able to bear buckler and sword, and to shoot with bow, and skilful in war' (ver. 18). This country too produced many eminent men. Jephthah the Gileadite ranks high among the heroes of Israel; and 'Elijah the Tishbite of the inhabitants of Gilead,' was one of the grandest characters the world ever saw. It may be that he owed some of those qualities for which he was distinguished to the habits and state of his native country—his wonderful physical strength; his powers of enduring fatigue, hunger, and thirst; his dress in every respect resembling that of a modern inhabitant of Gilead; his wandering mode of life; and his apparent dislike to the restraints of society. Gilead was a land of roving shepherds, and moving camps, and mountain castles, and wild adventure (GILEAD).

The Gadites were devotedly attached to both Saul and David. Some of their mighty men followed the fortunes of the latter in their darkest period—men of whom it is said that they were 'men of war for the battle, that could handle shield and buckler, whose faces were the faces of lions, and who were swift as the roes upon the mountains' (1 Chron. xii. 8). The taking down the bodies of Saul and Jonathan from the battlements of Bethshean was an act of noble daring and grateful recompense. Among the Gadites David afterwards found an asylum when he fled from Absalom; and in their territory the battle was fought which regained him his throne (2 Sam. xlvii., xviii.). The Gadites suffered much during the ascendancy of the warlike monarchs of Damascus. At length the whole country was overrun by the armies of Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, and the people carried away captive (2 Kings xv. 29). Soon afterwards the Ammonites appear to have taken possession of the land; and Jeremiah was then commissioned to pronounce that prophetic doom which we now see so fearfully executed on the cities and villages of Gilead (Jer. xlix. 1, seq.) In addition to those already named, the following works may be consulted—Reland, Pal., p. 162, seq.; Stanley, Sin. and Pal., p. 319; Kalisch on Gen. xlix. 19; Handbook for Syr. and Pal., 295, 308, seq.; Burckhardt, Travels in Syria, 345, seq.; Irby and Mangles' Travels.—J. 2. A prophet contemporary with David, and probably a pupil of Samuel, who early attached himself to the son of Jesse (1 Sam. xxii. 5). Instances of his prophetic intercourse with David occur in 2 Sam. xxiv. 11, seq.; 1 Chron. xxi. 9, seq.; 2 Chron. xxix. 25. Gad wrote a history of the reign of David, to which the author of the Second Book of Samuel seems to refer for further information respecting that reign (1 Chron. xxix. 29), B.C. 1062-1017.

GAD (גָּד; Sept. δαμδον, or, according to the reading of Jerome and of some MSS., ρύχη) is mentioned in Is. lxx. 11. The word admits of two different significations. If it be derived from גַּד in the sense of to cut, it may mean a lot, and, by a combination with the Arabic جَد, which means to be new, to occur, to be fortunate, may be legitimately taken to denote fortune. Indeed, some find this 'fortune,' although not as an idol, in Gen. xxx. 11, where the Sept. has rendered the Kethib גַּד by ἐν τύχῃ, which is approved by Selden, and especially by Tuch, who does not even wish to change the punctuation, but ascribes the Qametz to the influence of the pause (Comment. über die Genesis, ad loc.) This is the sense in which Gesenius, Hitzig, and Ewald have taken Gad in their respective versions of Isaiah. All render the clause, 'who spread a table to Fortune.' This view, which is the general one, makes Fortune in this passage to be an object of idolatrous worship. There is great disagreement, however, as to the power of nature which this name was intended to denote; and, from the scanty data, there is little else than mere opinion on the subject. The majority, among whom are some of the chief rabbinical commentators, as well as Gesenius, Münter, and Ewald, consider Gad to be the form under which the planet Jupiter was worshipped as the greater star of good fortune (see especially Gesenius, Comment. über den Jesaia, ad loc.) Others, among whom is Vitringa, suppose Gad to have represented the Sun; and Movers, the latest writer of any eminence on Syro-Arabian idolatry, takes it to have been the planet Venus (Die Phönizier, i. 650).

On the other hand, if Gad be derived from גַּד in the sense of to press, to crowd, it may mean a troop, a heap (to which sense there is an allusion in Gen. xlix. 19); and Hoheisel, as cited in Rosenmüller's Scholia, ad loc., as well as Deyling, in his Observat. Miscell. p. 673, have each attempted a mode by which the passage might be explained, if Gad and Meni were taken in the sense of troop and number.—J. N.

GAD (גַּד) occurs in two places in Scripture, in both of which it is translated coriander, viz., Exod. xvi. 31, Num. xi. 7. The manna which fell in the desert, and on which the Israelites were fed during their sojourn there, is usually described, from a collation of the different passages, in which it is mentioned as white, round, and like gad, which last has almost universally been considered to mean 'coriander' seed, though some prefer other seeds. The chief and indeed only proof of gad signifying the coriander, has been adduced by Celsius (Hierobot. vol. ii. p. 81): 'Γολδ, quod Africanis coriandrum est, ut docet auctor ignotus sed utilissimus, qui Dioscoridem synonymis exoticis auxit et illustravit. Αἰγύπτια, inquit, ὄχιον, Ἀφροί γολδ: coriandrum Ægyptii ὀχιον appellat, Afri goid.' This passage Sprengel incorporates with the text of Dioscorides as well as the other synonyms, which are supposed by others, as above, to be additions by another but unknown ancient author. Rosenmüller, referring to this passage, observes: 'the Africans, i.e. Carthaginians, whose language, the Punic, was cognate with the Hebrew, called the coriander Γολδ, which word is not at all different from the Hebrew gad.' Celsius states that the coriander is frequently mentioned in the Talmud. It was known to and used medicinally by Hippocrates: it is mentioned by Theophrastus, as well as Dioscorides, under the name of κόριον or κοριαννον; and the Arabs, in their works on Materia Medica, give korion as the Greek synonym of coriander, which they call كزبرة kuseereh, the Persians kushneez, and the natives of India dhunya. It is known throughout all these countries, in all of which it is cultivated, being universally employed as a grateful spice, and as one of the ingredients of currie-powder. It is also common in Egypt (Prosper Alpinus, De Plantis Ægypti, c. xlii. p. 61). Pliny also, long before, mentioned 'coriandrum in Ægypto præcipuum.' It is now very common in the south of Europe, and also in this country, being cultivated, especially in Essex, on account of its seeds. The coriander is an umbelliferous plant, the Coriandrum sativum of botanists. The fruit, commonly called seeds, is globular, greyish-coloured, about the size of peppercorn, having its surface marked with fine striae. Both its taste and smell are agreeable, depending on the presence of a volatile oil, which is separated by distillation.—J. F. R.

GADARA (Γαδάρ). A city of Peræa, and one of its ancient capitals. It stood on the northern end of the mountains of Gilead, five miles east of the river Jordan, and about six from the Sea of Galilee. It is only mentioned in Scripture in connection with the miracle performed by our Lord on the demoniacs. The story is told by three of the Evangelists. Matthew, according to the Textus Receptus, says it occurred in the country of the Gergesenes (Γεργεσενῶν; viii. 28); while Mark (v. 1) and Luke (viii. 26) call it the country of the Gadarenes (Γαδαρηνῶν). We shall first endeavour to remove this apparent contradiction. The name of the place must be ascertained before an attempt is made to identify and describe it.

On examining the MS. authorities for the text of Matthew's gospel, we find them strangely divided about this word. Seven Uncials have Γεργεσενῶν, the reading of the T. R., but none of these is older than the eighth century. One, the Cod. Beza, has Γερασσηῶν; four have Γαδαρηῶν; but these include the most ancient and valuable extant, B. and C.; and the Sinaitic MS., according to Tischendorf, has Γαζαρηῶν, manifestly a corruption of the same reading (Notitia Edit. Cod. Bib. Sinait., p. 15). The weight of MS. evidence is thus decidedly in favour of Γαδαρηῶν. The ancient versions are nearly equally balanced; the Syriac having Gadara, and the Latin Gerasa. Origen is the first writer who mentions the reading Γεργεσηῶν. He states that the common reading was Γερασά; but that in a few (ἐν ὀλίγοις) he found Γαδαρ. He thought, however, that both these cities were too far distant from the Sea of Galilee to meet the requirements of the narrative, and consequently he conjectures that Gergesa, which he says lay upon the shore, must be the place referred to (Comment. in Joh.) Now in a question of this kind conjecture cannot be admitted. We must implicitly follow the most ancient and credible testimony, which clearly pronounces in favour of Γαδαρηῶν. This reading is adopted by Tischendorf, Alford, and Tregelles (see their Greek Testaments, in loc.)

In Mark v. 1, ancient authorities are nearly equally balanced between the readings Γερασσηῶν and Γαδαρηῶν. The former is the reading of the Vatican and Sinaitic MSS., and of the Latin versions; while the latter is that of the Alexandrine and seven other Uncials, and of the Syriac versions (Tregelles' Account of the Printed Text, p. 192; Tisch., Notitia, ut sup.) The same is the case in reference to Luke viii. 26; and all the best critics adopt there also the reading Γερασσηῶν, as that of the highest authority (See Alford's Greek Test., vol. i.; Prolegomena, p. 95, 4th ed.; Kuinzel, Commentar. in loc.)

Whatever may be the true reading in these two passages, there can be no doubt that the city (πόλις) out of which Luke says the demoniac came was Gadara. Matthew and Mark represent him as coming out of the tombs (μνηστέον), and Gadara has a large number of rock-hewn tombs. Origen indeed affirms that the demoniacs were natives of Gergesa, which was situated on the shore of the lake; but we do not hear elsewhere of any such city, for though Josephus mentions the Gergashites (Antiq. i. 6. 2), yet it appears that their towns had been all destroyed at the time of the conquest of Palestine by the Israelites (Deut. vii. 1; Josh. xiv. 11; see, however, GERGESA).

Gadara was a large and splendid city, for a time the capital of Peræa (Joseph. Bell. Jud. iv. 7. 3). Eusebius describes it as situated opposite to Scythopolis and Tiberias, on a mountain, at whose base, three miles distant, are warm springs (Onomast. s. v. Aetham and Gadara). Pliny says it was on the banks of the Hieromax (H. N. v. 18); and Josephus adds that it was sixty stadia distant from Tiberias (Vit. 65). With such clear data, we can have no difficulty in identifying it with the modern ruins of Um Kais.

Gadara does not appear to have been a city of high antiquity. It is not mentioned either in the O. T. or Apocrypha; and Josephus calls it a Grecian city (πόλις Ἑλληνική). Another ancient writer referred to by Reland (Pal. 1013), terms it Γάδαρα Ἀσσυρία. These statements, when connected with the fact that it was one of the chief cities of the Decapolis, seem to indicate that Gadara was founded, and mainly inhabited by foreign and probably Grecian colonists. The first historical notice we find of it is in a quotation by Josephus from Polybius, to the effect that when Antiochus the Great conquered Scopus, the general of Ptolemy (B.C. 198), he obtained possession of Gadara (Antiq. xii. 3. 3). At a long subsequent period the city fell into the hands of the Jews, and was destroyed by them, but rebuilt by Ptolemy in B.C. 63 (Joseph. Bell. Jud. i. 7. 7). When Gabinius was appointed pro-consul, he changed the government of Judæa by dividing the country into five districts, in each of which he created a superior council. Gadara was capital of one of them (i. 8. 5). Augustus gave the city to Herod the Great; but after Herod's death, it was separated from the government of Archelaus, and annexed to the province of Syria (Antiq. xvii. 11. 4). It was captured and sacked by the Jews, in revenge for the massacre of their brethren at Cæsarea (Bell. Jud. ii. 18. 1). At the commencement of our era it contained a small Jewish community (ii. 18. 6), who increased so much in wealth and power, that they attempted to defend the town against Vespasian; but he captured it, and reduced it and the surrounding villages to ashes (iii. 7. 1). It was captured a second time by him (iv. 7. 3). At a later period it rose to considerable importance, and became one of the most beautiful towns of Syria. It was for several centuries the seat of a bishopric (Geogr. Sac. S. Paul. p. 307; Reland Pal. 776). It fell to ruins soon after the Mohammedan conquest, and has now been deserted for centuries, with the exception of a few families of shepherds, who occasionally find a home in its rock-hewn tombs.

The above historical sketch will serve to illustrate the narrative of the Demoniacs. Christ crossed the Sea of Galilee 'to the territory of the Gadarenes,' which extended down to the shore. It will be observed that there is nothing in the Gospels to indicate that the city itself was near the lake. If the reading Gerasenes be the true one in Mark and Luke, it is still geographically accurate. In the time of our Lord, Gerasa was capital of northern Peræa, and its province included that of Gadara (GERASA). The Demoniacs, we are told, had their dwelling 'in the tombs' (ἐν τοῖς μνημασιν), which abound in the immediate neighbourhood of the ruins. The herds of swine were either the property of the Gentile inhabitants, or were kept by the Jews for their use. It is not stated where the swine were feeding, but it was near the scene of the miracle, and most probably on the high point of land which separates the ravine of the Hieromax from the lake. From that there is a long and 'steep' descent to the shore, and down this the swine may have rushed.

The ruins of Gadara occupy a narrow and high ridge, which projects from the mountains of Gilead. On its northern side is the deep valley of the Hieromax, now called Sheriat el-Mandhūr; on the west is the Jordan valley; and on the south is a glen called Wady el-Arab, running parallel to the Hieromax. The ruins crown the ridge, and as it declines in elevation towards the east, the site is strong and commanding. The space occupied by the city is about two miles in circuit; and there are traces of the ancient wall all round. On the northern slope is a large theatre, a view of which is given in Traill's Josephus (i. 145). Gadara had, like Palmyra, Damascus, and other eastern cities, a via recta, or 'straight street,' lined with colonnades. Many of the bases remain in situ, though the shafts have fallen. A sketch of this street is given in the same work, shewing the theatre and acropolis in the background (ii. 16). The buildings of the city are all in ruins. Not a house, nor column, nor wall, remains standing; though the old pavement of the streets is almost perfect, shewing the marks of the chariot wheels in the stones, as at Pompeii. The necropolis is on the north-east declivity. The tombs are excavated in the limestone rocks, and consist of chambers of various sizes, some above twenty feet square, with deep recesses in the sides for bodies. The doors are made of heavy slabs of stone, like those in the ancient houses of Bashan (Porter's Damascus, ii. 54). A few of them are in their places, and are ornamented with panels. There are, besides, many beautifully sculptured sarcophagi scattered over the surrounding heights.

The identity of Um Keis and Gadara has been disputed by some writers; but the clear description of Eusebius, Josephus, and Pliny, and especially the existence of the celebrated warm springs at the base of the mountain, beside the river Hieromax, remove all possibility of mistake. Full descriptions of Um Keis are given by Burckhardt, Buckingham, and Irby and Mangles. GALANTE, ABRAHAM B. MORDECAI, a celebrated Kabbalist and commentator of the sixteenth century, and disciple of Moses Cordovera. His father's name was originally Mordecai Angelo (אנגלי), but he received the appellation Galante, or rather Galant'uomo, in Rome, where he resided, because of his beautiful appearance and manners, and when his family afterwards emigrated to Safed, in Upper Galilee, they retained this name. Abraham Galante wrote (1) a commentary on the Sohar, entitled יקר ירח, extending over the whole Pentateuch, of which the first part, embracing Genesis, was published under the title הורי חומה, Venice 1655, and (2) a commentary on the Book of Lamentations, called קִינֵת סְתָרִים, which was published with additions by Ibn-Shoëb under the title קול בוכים, Venice 1589, of which a second edition appeared in Prag, 1621. Galante died about 1600.—C. D. G.

GALANTE, MOSES B. MORDECAI, brother of the preceding commentator, and president of the celebrated Rabbinic College at Safed. The works of this author which relate to the Bible are (1) ספתת הזוהר, an Index to the Sohár, in which are given all the passages of the O. T. explained in the Sohár. This work is extremely useful to those who are engaged in writing Christological treatises, inasmuch as it enables them to see how the Messianic passages are treated in the Talmud of the Kabbala. It was first published in Venice, 1666, and then at Frankfort-on-Maine, 1681; and (2) a commentary on Ecclesiastes, entitled קהלת יעקב, published in Safed, 1578, which is profusely illustrated with passages from the Sohár. Galante died between 1596 and 1608. Robinson (Biblical Researches in Palestine, London 1856, vol. ii. p. 430) places his death in 1618, which is too late. Comp. Steinschneider, Cata- GALATIA (Γαλατία). This name is employed in two senses by ancient writers. First, to denote the country inhabited or possessed by the eastern Galli; τῇ Γαλατικῇ χώρᾳ, as St. Luke calls it (Acts xvi. 6). And secondly, as the name of the later Roman province. It will be necessary here to consider each in succession, as the word is evidently used in both senses in the N. T.

The Galli, or Keltæ (Κέλται, Celts), for the names are identical, originally emigrated from Gallia. In the fourth century B.C., sections of three tribes of Galli, the Tectosages, whose home was near the Pyrennees, the Trocmi, and the Tolistobogii, left their native country, crossed to the banks of the Danube, and then struck southward into Greece. After some fierce contests with the Greeks at Thermopylae, at Delphi, and other places, they were forced to retire to the shores of the Hellespont (Strabo iv. p. 129, sq.; Pausan. i. 16; x. 19; Justin xxiv.) One of their tribes crossed the straits in boats obtained from Antipater of Macedonia; and the others were carried across by Nicomedes I., king of Bithynia, on condition they should aid him against his enemy Zybœtas (Memnon, ap. Phot.; Liv. xxxviii. 16; circa B.C. 270). Having thus obtained a footing in Asia Minor, they led a wandering life for many years. At one time we find them employed as mercenaries by the native princes in their wars against each other; at another we find them warring on their own account, and living on plunder. They soon became the terror of the whole peninsula, marching from city to city, and from province to province, and leaving desolation and death in their track. They were at length opposed and defeated by Antiochus, king of Syria, who, in consequence of the victory over them, obtained the name Soter, or 'Saviour' (Appian, Syriac. 65). Soon afterwards they sustained a still more signal defeat from Attalus, prince of Pergamum; and they were then compelled to retreat to the mountainous region in the centre of Asia Minor, between the rivers Sangarius and Halys, where they settled about B.C. 230 (Liv. l. c.; Strabo, xiii. p. 429). Here, however, they still followed their old habits, plundering all within their reach; and it was not until the Roman rule was extended over western Asia that they were completely subdued. The pro-consul Manlius attacked them in their strongholds, defeated the tribes in succession, summoned their chiefs to meet him on the shores of the Hellespont, where he dictated his own terms, and sent them back to their mountains humbled and submissive (B. C. 189; Liv. xxxviii. 40).

The country now colonized by these warlike tribes was called Galatia, or Gallogracia. Its boundaries cannot be accurately determined, as it embraced portions of several provinces. The Tectosages made the strong city of Pessinus their capital, and occupied the region on the borders of Phrygia and Bithynia. The Tolistobogii settled around Ancyra, and extended as far east as the banks of the Halys. The Trocmi seized the fertile region along the east side of the Halys. Tavium was their chief city, and they encroached considerably on the provinces of Pontus and Cappadocia (Memnon, ap. Phot.) Pliny says the Galli were divided into peoples and tetrarchies, numbering 195 (v. 42). Each tribe had four tetrarchies; and the twelve tetrarchies had a council of 300 members, who exercised supreme authority over the nation; but Strabo tells us that in his days the whole power devolved first on three men, then on two, and finally on one, who was proclaimed king (xii. p. 390). Their first monarch was Deiotarus, who, having espoused the cause of Pompey, was stripped by Cæsar of his tetrarchy and kingdom. Cicero defended him in a noble speech, which is still extant (pro Deiot. 13).

Though the Galli were the dominant race in Galatia, they were mixed with Phrygians and other native tribes. A large number of Greeks, also, who had followed the conquests of Alexander, settled among them—hence the name Gallogræcia. Greek soon became the common language of all; but the Galli, as we learn from Jerome, retained their own language even down so late as the fourth century, —‘Galatos excepto sermone græco, quo omnis oriens loquitur, propriam linguam eandem habere quam Treviros’ (Hieron. Prol. in Epist. Gal.) The Galli were fierce, restless, and warlike. They were impatient of all foreign restraint, and eagerly seized on every opportunity to throw off the yoke of Rome. They appear to have had little religion of their own; and they adopted the superstitions of the Phrygians and the mythology of the Greeks with an easy indifference. The character given to them by Thierry strikingly illustrates many passages in Paul’s epistle—‘Une braveure personnelle que rien n’égalait . . . un esprit franc, impétueux, ouvert à toutes les impressions, éminemment intelligent; mais, à côté de cela, une mobilité extrême, point de constance, une répugnance marquée aux idées de discipline et d’ordre’ (Histoire des Gaulois, Int. iv.)

When Galatia was constituted a Roman province under M. Lollius (circa B.C. 22; Eutrop. vii. 10), its boundaries were greatly enlarged. They are given by Ptolemy (v. 3). It had Bithynia and Phrygia on the west; Pamphylia on the south; Cappadocia and Pontus on the east; and the Euxine on the north. Its line of coast reached from Cyturus in Bithynia to the mouth of the Halys. It thus included the whole of Paphlagonia, with large sections of Phrygia, Lycaonia, and Cappadocia. It extended from the Black Sea to the range of Taurus.

Luke records two visits of the Apostle Paul to Galatia; and in a previous missionary tour he had passed through the southern border of the Roman province to Iconium and Antioch (Acts xiv. 21). Silas accompanied him on his first visit to Galatia proper, which Luke terms τῆς Γαλατίας χώρας, that is, ‘the region of the Galli,’ not including those districts which were now politically united with it (Acts xvi. 6; Conybeare and Howson, i. 292). No town is mentioned; but the probability is he visited Ancyra, the capital, and numerous other places, for it appears he founded ‘churches.’ He was received everywhere with readiness and hospitality (Gal. iv. 15). He was evidently suffering at the time from sickness; and he bears grateful testimony to the kindness of the people (verses 13, 14). The changeableness of their character and views was soon exhibited, however, in abandoning the sound doctrine of the apostle, and adopting some new one (i. 6). When among them, he tells us, they received him ‘as an angel of God;’ but no sooner had he departed than they were led to regard him ‘as an enemy’ (iv. 14-16). Of his second missionary journey to ‘the region of Galatia,’ we have no details farther than that ‘he went over all the region of Galatia and Phrygia in order’ (Acts xviii. 23). It would seem from these facts that the Epistle to the Galatians was addressed to those churches which Paul had established among the Galli, and the Greek-speaking population of Galatia proper. Peter’s first epistle is addressed ‘to the strangers scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia’ (1 Pet. i. 1). Every place named is a Roman province; and we may, therefore, conclude that the Apostle refers to the extended province as described by Ptolemy.

The best work on the Galli is that of Thierry, Histoire des Gaulois. For the geography of Galatia consult Livy, xxxviii; Ptolemy, v. 4; Strabo, xii. and xiii.; Conybeare and Howson’s Life and Epistles of St. Paul, i. 261, sq.; Hamilton’s Researches in Asia Minor.—J. L. P.

GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO THE. The Pauline origin of this epistle is attested not only by the superscription which it bears (i. 1), but also by frequent allusions in the course of it to the great Apostle of the Gentiles (comp. i. 13-23; ii. 1-14), and by the unanimous testimony of the ancient church (Lardner, Works, vol. ii. 8vo). It is corroborated also by the style, tone, and contents of the epistle, which are perfectly in keeping with those of the apostle’s other writings.

The parties to whom this epistle was addressed are described in the epistle itself as ‘the churches of Galatia’ (i. 2; comp. iii. 1). Into this district the Gospel was first introduced by Paul himself (Acts xvi. 6; Gal. i. 8; iv. 13, 19). Churches were then also probably formed; for on revisiting this district some time after his first visit it is mentioned that he ‘strengthened the disciples’ (Acts xviii. 23). These churches seem to have been composed principally of converts directly from Heathenism, but partly, also, of Jewish converts, both pure Jews and proselytes. Unhappily, Judaizing teachers had visited these churches, and had succeeded in infecting them with a zealous desire to incorporate the rites and ceremonies of Judaism with the spiritual truths and simple ordinances of Christianity. So active had this party been in disseminating their views on this head through the churches of Galatia, that the majority at least of the members had been seduced to adopt them (i. 6; iii. 1, etc.) To this result it is probable that the previous religious conceptions of the Galatians contributed; for, accustomed to the worship of Cybele, which they had learned from their neighbours the Phrygians, and to the theosophistic doctrines with which that worship was associated, they would be the more readily induced to believe that the fulness of Christianity could alone be developed through the symbolical adumbrations of an elaborate ceremonial (Neander, Apostol. Zeitalter, s. 400, 2te Aufl.) From some passages in this epistle (e. gr. i. 11-24; ii. 1-21) it would appear also that insinuations had been disseminated among the Galatian churches to the effect that Paul was not a divinely-commissioned apostle, but only a messenger of the church at Jerusalem; that Peter and he were at variance upon the subject of the relation of the Jewish rites to Christianity; and that Paul himself was not at all times so strenuously opposed to those rites as he had chosen to be among the Galatians.

Of this state of things intelligence having been conveyed to the apostle, he wrote this epistle for the purpose of vindicating his own pretensions and conduct, of counteracting the influence of these false views, and of recalling the Galatians to the simplicity of the Gospel which they had received. The importance of the case was probably the reason why the apostle put himself to the great labour of writing this epistle with his own hand (vi. 11).

The epistle consists of three parts. In the first part (i.-ii.), after his usual salutations, Paul vindicates his own apostolic authority and independence as a directly-commissioned ambassador of Christ to men, and especially to the Gentile portion of the race; asserting that the Gospel which he preached was the only Gospel of Christ—expressing his surprise that the Galatians had allowed themselves to be so soon turned from him who had called them to a different Gospel—denouncing all who had thus seduced them as troublers of the church, perverters of the doctrine of Christ, and deserving, even had they been angels from heaven, to be placed under an anathema instead of being followed—maintaining the divine origin of his apostolic commission, which he illustrates by the history of his conversion and early conduct in the service of Christ—and declaring that, so far from being inferior to the other apostles, he had ever treated with them on equal terms, and been welcomed by them as an equal. Having in the close of this part of the epistle been led to refer to his zeal for the great doctrine of salvation by the grace of God through faith in Christ, he enters at large, in the second part (iii.-iv.), upon the illustration and defence of this cardinal truth of Christianity. He appeals to the former experience of the Galatians as to the way in which they had received the Spirit, to the case of Abraham, and to the testimony of Scripture in support of his position that it is by faith and not by the works of the law that men are accepted of God (iii. 1-9). He proceeds to remind them that the law has brought a curse upon men because of sin, a curse which it has no power to remove, and from which the sinner can be redeemed only through the substitutionary work of Christ, by whose means the blessing of Abraham comes upon the Gentiles. And lest any should object that the law being of more recent origin than the covenant must supersede it, he shews that this cannot be the case, but that the covenant must be perpetual, whilst the law is to be regarded only in the light of a temporary and intercalary arrangement, the design of which was to forward the fulfilment of the promise in Christ (10-29). The relation of the Jewish church to the Christian is then illustrated by the case of an heir under tutors and governors as contrasted with the case of the same person when he is of age and has become master of all; and the Galatians are exhorted not willingly to descend from the important and dignified position of sons to that of mere servants in God's house—an exhortation which is illustrated and enforced by an allegorical comparison of the Jewish church to Ishmael, the son of Hagar, and of the Christian to Isaac, the son of Sarah, and the Child of Promise (iv. 1-31). The third part of the epistle (v.-vi.) is chiefly hortatory and admonitory: it sets forth the necessity of steadfast adherence to the liberty of the Gospel in connection with obedience to the moral law as a rule of duty, the importance of mutual forbearance and love among Christians, and the desirableness of maintaining a firm adherence to the doctrine of Christ and Him crucified. The epistle concludes with benedictions and prayers.

Respecting the time when and the place where this epistle was written, great diversity of opinion prevails. Marcion held this to be the earliest of Paul's epistles (Epiphanius, Adv. Hæres. xlii. 9); and Tertullian is generally supposed to favour the same opinion, from his speaking of Paul's zeal against Judaism displayed in this epistle as characteristic of his being yet a neophyte (Adv. Marc. i. 20); though, to us, it does not appear that in this passage Tertullian is referring at all to the writing of this epistle, but only to Paul's personal intercourse with Peter and other of the apostles mentioned by him in the epistle (ii. 9-14). Michaelis also has given his suffrage in favour of a date earlier than that of the apostle's second visit to Galatia, and very shortly after that of his first. Koppe's view (Nov. Test., vol. vi. p. 7) is the same, though he supposes the apostle to have preached in Galatia before the visit mentioned by Luke in Acts xvi. 6, and which is usually reckoned his first visit to that district. Others, again, such as Mill (Proleg. in Nov. Test., p. 4), Calovius (Biblia Illust., t. iv. p. 529), and, more recently, Schrader (Der. Ap. Paulus, th. i. s. 226), place the date of this epistle at a late period of the apostle's life: the last, indeed, advocates the date assigned in the Greek MSS. and in the Syriac and Arabic versions, which announce that it was 'written from Rome' during the apostle's imprisonment there. The majority, however, concur in a medium view between these extremes, and fix the date of this epistle at some time shortly after the apostle's second visit to Galatia. This opinion appears to us to be the only one that has any decided support from the epistle itself. From the apostle's abrupt exclamation in chap. i. 6, 'I marvel that ye are so soon removed from him that called you,' etc., it seems just to infer that he wrote this epistle not very long after he had left Galatia. It is true, as has been urged, that ὄντω ταχέως in this verse may mean 'so quickly' as well as 'so soon'; but the abruptness of the apostle's statement appears to us rather to favour the latter rendering: for, as a complaint of the quickness of their change respected the manner in which it had been made, and as the apostle could be aware of that only by report, and as it was a matter on which there might be a difference of opinion between him and them, it would seem necessary that the grounds of such a charge should be stated; whereas if the complaint merely related to the shortness of time during which, after the apostle had been among them, they had remained steadfast in the faith, a mere allusion to it was sufficient, as it was a matter not admitting of any diversity of opinion. We infer, then, from this expression, that this epistle was written not long after Paul had been in Galatia. The question, however, still remains, which of the two visits of Paul to Galatia mentioned in the Acts was it after which this epistle was written? In reply to this Michaelis and some others maintain that it was the first; but in coming to this conclusion they appear to have unaccountably overlooked the apostle's phraseology (iv. 13), where he speaks of circumstances connected with his preaching the Gospel among the Galatians, τὸ πρότερον, the former time, an expression which clearly indicates that at the period this epistle was written, Paul had been at least twice in Galatia.* On these grounds it is probable that the apostle wrote and despatched this epistle not long after he had left Galatia for the second time, and, perhaps, whilst he was residing at Ephesus (comp. Acts xviii. 23; xix. 1, seq.) The reasons which Michaelis urges for an earlier date are of no weight. He appeals, in the first place, to chap. i. 2, and asks whether Paul would have used the vague expression, 'all the brethren,' without naming them, had it not been that the parties in question were those by whom he had been accompanied on his first visit to Galatia, viz., Silas and Timothy, and, 'perhaps, some others.' The answer to this obviously is, that had Paul referred in this expression to these individuals, who were known to the Galatians, he was much more likely on that very account to have named them than otherwise; and besides, the expression 'all the brethren that are with me' is much more naturally understood of a considerable number of persons, such as the elders of the church at Ephesus, than of two persons, and, 'perhaps, some others.' Again, he urges the fact that, about the time of Paul's first visit to Galatia, Asia Minor was full of zealots for the law, and that consequently it is easier to account for the seduction of the Galatians at this period than at a later. But the passage to which Michaelis refers in support of this assertion (Acts xv. 1) simply informs us that certain Judaizing teachers visited Antioch, and gives us no information whatever as to the time when such zealots entered Asia Minor. In fine, he lays great stress on the circumstance that Paul, in recapitulating the history of his own life in the first and second chapters, brings the narrative down only to the period of the conference at Jerusalem, the reason of which is to be found, he thinks, in the fact that this epistle was written so soon after that event that nothing of moment had subsequently occurred in the apostle's history. But even admitting that the period referred to in this second chapter was that of the conference mentioned Acts xv. (though this is much doubted by many writers of note), the reason assigned by Michaelis for Paul's carrying the narrative of his life no further than this cannot be admitted: for it overlooks the design of the apostle in furnishing that narrative, which was not certainly to deliver himself of a piece of mere autobiographical detail; but to shew from certain leading incidents in his early apostolic life how from the first he had claimed and exercised an independent apostolic authority, and how his rights in this respect had been admitted by the pillars of the church, Peter, James, and John. For this purpose it was not necessary that the narrative should be brought down to a lower date than the period when Paul went forth as the apostle of the Gentiles, formally recognised as such by the other apostles of Christ. This fact, then, is as little in favour of Michaelis's theory as any of his other arguments. Conybeare and Howson have advocated the opinion that this epistle was written from Corinth at the same time as the Epistle to the Romans; but as they rest this almost exclusively on the improbability that two epistles so closely resembling each other in subject should have been written at a long interval from each other, their suggestion cannot be allowed to have much weight, in opposition to the reasons which sustain the commonly received opinion. There is certainly no reason in the nature of things why Paul should not have written twice on the same subject at distant periods; and when the Epistle to the Galatians is compared with that to the Romans, the similarity between the two is such as rather to suggest that the latter is the development, at a later period, and in a more systematic form, of thoughts more hastily thrown out to meet a pressing emergency, in the former.

GALBANUM. [CHELBENAH.]

GALGALA (Γάλαλα). In 1 Maccab. ix. 2, the army of Demetrius is said to have gone by the way leading to this place, on their march to Jerusalem, when they besieged Maseloth, which is in Arbela. Were we sure of these places, it would help us more certainly to determine the site of Galgala; but this can hardly be said to be the case. Ewald (Gesch. Isr. iii. 2, p. 370, note 2) thinks that the village Dshildshilja (Jilgilija), west of Bethel and north of Jerusalem (Robinson, B. R., iii. 81), is the place meant; but in order to sustain this view he is obliged to suppose the operations of the campaign to have been confined to Judea, contrary to the express statement of Josephus, who places them in Galilee (Antiq. xii. 11. 1). If Arbela be the modern Irbid, Galgala is probably the Gilgal near Jericho. In the margin of the A. V., for Galgala is substituted Galilee; and this, Michaelis holds for the true reading. In Josh. xii. 23, it is supposed that גלגל is for גליל, and so the LXX. give it in the Vat. text, which would shew that these two words were sometimes confounded. If this reading were adopted, it would remove all difficulty. Γάλαλα, however, is the invariable representative of the Hebrew גלגל, in the LXX.—W. L. A.

GALICHO OR GALIKO (גלכיקון = Gallaeus)

ELISHA B. GABRIEL, a Jewish commentator who lived about 1552 to 1583, and was president of the Rabbinic College at Safed in Upper Galilee. His exegetical works are (1) a commentary on Ecclesiastes באור על קהלת, published in Venice, 1578, in which he divides the book into twenty-seven sections, according to the number of the letters in the Hebrew alphabet, including the finals. An analysis and specimen of this commentary are given by

* Prof. Stuart says, in bar of this conclusion, that 'πρότερον means only a time antecedent to that in which he (Paul) wrote.' (Notes to Fosdick's Translation of Hug's Introd., p. 748). Usteri also, and Fritzsche, adopt the same view. But if Paul had been only once in Galatia before writing this epistle, he would not have used πρότερον at all; in such a case this would have been a superfluous addition.

Ginsburg, Historical and Critical Commentary on Ecclesiastes, Longman, 1861, p. 67, etc. The edition of Galiko's Commentary, published in 1548, mentioned by Bartolucci (Bibl. Magna Rabbinica, vol. i. p. 118), is not extant; (2) a commentary on the Book of Esther באור על אסתר, published in Venice, 1583, which is very diffuse and Kabballistic; and (3) a commentary on the Song of Songs, פירוש שיר השירים, with the Hebrew text and points, also published in Venice, 1587. In this commentary Galiko had an excellent opportunity of displaying his genius for allegorical exposition. —C. D. G.

GALILEE (גליל and גלילה; Sept. and N. T.

Γαλιλαία). In the O. T. this name is given to a small 'circuit' among the mountains of Naphtali; and in the N. T. to a large province embracing the whole of Northern Palestine. It is first mentioned by Joshua, who describes Kedesh as 'in Galilee in Mount Naphtali' (xx. 7). Its limited extent is indicated in 2 Kings xv. 29, where the historian detailing the conquests of Tiglath-pileser states that 'he took Ijon, and Abel-Beth-Maachah, and Janoah, and Kedesh, and Hazor, and Gilead, and Galilee, all the land of Naphtali.' Galilee, therefore, did not extend beyond the bounds of Naphtali; and a comparison with other passages shews that it embraced only the northern section of that tribe, or at least that the name was at first confined to that district (Josh. xx. 7; xxi. 32; Joseph. Antiq. v. i. 18). The region thus lay on the summit of a broad mountain ridge. Here were situated the towns which Solomon offered to Hiram as payment for his services in procuring timber and stones for the temple. Hiram, however, whose great want was grain for his island city, and who doubtless expected a portion of some of the rich plains of central Palestine, could not conceal his disappointment when he saw the mountain towns and their rugged environs, and declined them as useless (CABUL; comp. 1 Kings ix. 11, and 2 Chron. viii. 2). At this period Galilee, though within the allotted territory of Naphtali, does not appear to have been occupied by the Israelites. It was only after Hiram had declined the towns that Solomon rebuilt and colonized them (2 Chron. i. c.). Hazor, the great stronghold and capital of the northern Canaanites, lay within or near Galilee; and, though Joshua had captured and burned it (Josh. xi.), yet during the rule of the Judges it was possessed by a king Jabin, whose general, Sisera, dwelt in the neighbouring Harosheth of the Gentiles (Judg. iv.). The presence of these powerful and warlike tribes, and the natural strength of the country, sufficiently account for the continued occupation of the old Gentile inhabitants. David subdued, but did not expel them. Solomon, as has been seen, took some of their towns; but they remained among these rugged mountains in such numbers, that in the time of Isaiah the district was called 'Galilee of the Gentiles' (Is. ix. 1).

The word גליל signifies a 'circuit' or 'ring,' and may at first have been given to one of the little circular plains among the mountains of Naphtali. There is such an one just beside Kedesh. Afterwards, as was the case with other names, this was extended to a wider and wider region. There is some indication in Scripture that it was used in a more extended sense in the time of Tiglath-pileser than in that of Joshua. May it not be that in the days of Isaiah the name had come to be applied, perhaps somewhat vaguely, to the country extending south of Naphtali, and that the ancient territory was therefore distinguished by him as 'Galilee of the Gentiles.' In 1 Maccab. v. 15 and 17, this distinction appears to be made. 'Galilee of the Gentiles' had then a large heathen population (1 Maccab. v. 21-23; Strabo, xvi. p. 523). Josephus makes the same distinction though under a slightly different name. He divides Galilee into Upper and Lower, ἡ ὕψω καὶ ἡ κατὰ Γαλιλαία; and in one place he seems to consider the former as constituting the whole of Galilee proper (Reland, Pal. 182 and 306; Euseb. Onomast., s. v. Galilaea; Lightfoot, Opp. ii. 488, seq.).

In the beginning of our era Palestine was divided into three provinces, Judæa, Samaria, and Galilee. Josephus thus describes Galilee, — 'There are two Galilees, the Upper and the Lower, which are environed by Phœnicia and Syria. They are bounded on the west by the territory of Ptolemais and Carmel, a mountain belonging formerly to the Galileans, but at present to the Syrians. On the south Samaria and Scythopolis, as far as the Jordan, form their limits. Towards the east Hippene and Godaris, Gaulanitis and the frontiers of Agrippa's kingdom; while Tyre and its dependencies constitute their northern border. Lower Galilee extends in length from Tiberias to Zabulon, adjacent to which, on the sea-coast, is Ptolemais. In breadth it stretches from a village called Xaloth, lying in the Great Plain, to Bersabe; commencing from which is measured, also, the breadth of Upper Galilee, as far as the village of Baca, which bounds the land of the Tyrians. In length it runs from a village in the vicinity of the Jordan to Meroth' (Bell. Jud. iii. 3. 1). A comparison of this with some other passages enables us to fix the boundaries still more accurately. The western border ran along the narrow strip of coast land belonging to Phœnicia. The southern border is marked by Carmel, the northern range of Samaria and the towns of Scythopolis, for, though he says Xaloth, which lies near the base of Tabar, is on the border, yet in another passage he states that Ginea (now Zenin) lay between Samaria and Galilee (Antiq. xx. 6. 1). Galilee thus included the whole plain of Esdraelon. The Jordan was its eastern border, separating it from the provinces named. Its northern limits are uncertain. Perhaps a line drawn from Banias westward to the angle formed by the Litany, and then along the banks of that river to the Phœnician plain, would mark its boundary with a near approach to accuracy.

The province of Galilee is thus about fifty miles long by twenty-five wide. Its northern division, called 'Upper Galilee,' and 'Galilee of the Gentiles,' consists of a broad mountain ridge, a continuation of the Lebanon range. On the summit is a tract of undulating table-land, diversified by wooded heights and smooth green plains. In the centre of this table-land stood Kedesh-Naphtali. Among its rich pastures Heber, the Kenite, sojourned, when Sisera, fleeing from the carnage on Esdraelon to his home at Harosheth, took refuge in the tent of Jael and was slain (Judg. iv.). On the east the mountains break down abruptly into the deep basin of the upper Jordan. On the west the slopes are more gradual, and long ravines of singular beauty and wildness wind down to the sea-coast and the plain of Acre. These western declivities, once the possession of Asher, who 'dipped his foot in oil' (Deut. xxxiii. 24), are still celebrated for their olive groves. The town of Safed, perched on the culminating point of the mountain chain to the south, is one of the four sacred cities of the Jews. It is the centre of a wide volcanic region, and has frequently been the scene of most destructive earthquakes. The last occurred in 1837, when nearly five thousand of its inhabitants were buried in the ruins of the town (Robinson's B. R. ii. 420-32; Hand-book for S. and P. 438).

The southern slopes of the mountain range, from the castellated heights of Safed to the broad plain of Esdraelon, afford some of the richest and most picturesque scenery in Palestine. Forests of evergreen oak sweep round the flanks of the hills in graceful belts, and line the sides of the valleys, leaving open glades, and undulating expanses of green grass, such as are seen in English parks. Here, too, are upland plains, like vast terraces, with rich soil and rank vegetation. The largest is now called el-Battauf; and on its northern border lie the ruins of Cana of Galilee, while on its southern are those of Sepphoris. There are others to the eastward, along the brow of the hills that encircle Tiberias, and extending down to Tabor. These are separated from the great plain of Esdraelon by a line of rocky but picturesque hills, which culminate on the east in the dome of Tabor. Esdraelon stretches out beyond them like a sea of verdure, laying in the distance the base of Carmel and the mountains of Samaria.

Lower Galilee was a land of husbandmen, famed for its corn-fields, as Upper Galilee was for its olive groves, and Judæa for its vineyards. The rich soil remains, and there are still some fields; but its inhabitants are few in number, and its choicest plains are desolated by the wild Bedouin (Handbook for S. and P., 355). Galilee was, and is, also remarkable for the variety and beauty of its wild flowers. In early spring the whole country is spangled with them, and the air is filled with their odours. Birds, too, are exceedingly numerous. The rocky banks are all alive with partridges; the meadows swarm with quails and larks, 'the voice of the turtle' resounds through every grove, and pigeons are heard cooing high up in the cliffs and glen-sides, and are seen in flocks hovering over the corn-fields. The writer has travelled through Galilee at various seasons, and has always been struck with some new beauty—the delicate verdure of spring and its blush of flowers; the mellow tints of autumn, and the russet hues of the oak forests in winter, have all their charms (Handbook for S. and P., 363, 416, 420, 424; Stanley, S. and P., 355, sq.; Van de Velde, ii. 403, sq.; Robinson's B. R. iii.)

The northern tribes inhabiting Galilee were taken captive by the Assyrians; but a large number returned with their brethren of Judæa in the time of Cyrus. Galilee had a dense Jewish population at the commencement of our era, yet the foreigners settled among them, and their continual intercourse with Greeks and Phœnicians, produced a marked effect both on their language and habits, and tended also to allay those feelings of pride and fanaticism which were so characteristic of the Jewish race, and which were so strongly developed in Judæa. 'Galilean' was a term of reproach among the southern Jews (Matt. xxvi. 73;

John vii. 52; Buxtorf's Lexicon, s. v. גלילי; Lightfoot, Opp. ii. 492, sq.) On the death of Herod the Great, the province of Galilee was given by Cæsar to his son Antipas (Joseph. Bell. Jud. ii. 6. 3). It was at that time the most densely peopled part of Palestine. Josephus tells us that it contained more than 200 cities and villages, so crowded with men that the smallest of them contains above 15,000 inhabitants (Bell. Jud. iii. 1-3).

These facts all tend to illustrate the writings of the Evangelists. Galilee was the home of Jesus. His mother dwelt in Nazareth. To it she returned again from Egypt, and there she lived with Jesus till he began to be about thirty years of age (Matt. ii. 22, 23; Luke ii.). After his baptism and temptation Jesus came back to Galilee; and though he frequently visited other provinces, this was emphatically his own country, where the greater part of his public life was spent, and most of his miracles were performed. Here, also, he appeared to his disciples after the resurrection (See Well's Sacred Geography, ii. 143). When our Lord entered on his public ministry, and declared his divine mission, he was met with the indignant and insulting remark, 'Search and look; for out of Galilee ariseth no prophet' (John vii. 52). In Galilee his mission was successful. Thousands from its teeming population followed him wherever he went, and hung eagerly upon his lips. In no other part of Palestine could he have found such a sphere for his works and words of mercy. The villages were filled with industrious peasants; the towns were crowded with a manufacturing population; the sea swarmed with busy fishermen. He had a word for all. By parables and illustrations suitable to the circumstances, and pleasing to the tastes of each class, he sought to rivet their attention, enlighten their minds, and touch their hearts. The Gospel was likened to 'seed' sown. Some fell on stony ground, such as is seen on every bank; some fell on those hard, beaten paths that wind through the open fields of Galilee; some fell among thorns, which spring up so rankly on the plains. The wild birds that hover over the fields, and the tares (Arab. suwân) that may still be seen in them, were pressed into the service of the Gospel. Thus did our Lord teach the husbandmen. Turning to the commercial towns-folk, he likened the kingdom of heaven to 'a merchantman seeking goodly pearls;' and then to the fishermen on the lake he likened it to 'a net cast into the sea.' The minds of these people were more free from prejudice, and more open to conviction, than the self-righteous Pharisees and rationalistic lawyers of the capital. Hence most of our Lord's disciples were Galileans (See Rohr's Hist. Geographical Account of Palestine, in Biblical Cabinet, p. 94, sq.; Stanley, S. and P., 418; Handbook for S. and P., 424, sq.) The first three Gospels are chiefly occupied with the history of our Lord's teachings in Galilee, and many of their peculiarities, as contrasted with the Gospel of John, are owing to this fact (Alford, Proleg. to Matt.) The features of the country, its scenery its products, the character and occupations of its people, had all their influence upon the teachings of our Lord, and come out strikingly in the Gospel narratives.

Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee in the time of our Lord, was a weak but crafty voluptuary.

His incestuous intercourse with his brother's wife brought upon him the stern rebuke of the Baptist. He was present at Jerusalem during the trial of Jesus, but declined to interfere (Luke xxiii.) Antipas was the founder of Tiberias, and there he chiefly resided. In Galilee the Jews made an obstinate resistance against the Romans. Their leader was Josephus the historian, and he fortified the principal cities and natural strongholds, as Tiberias, Tarichæa, Sepphoris, Jotopata, Mount Tabor, etc. (Vita, xxxvii. 2; Bell. Jud. ii. 20. 6). But after a long and harassing campaign the province was completely subdued by Titus (Bell. Jud. iv. 2. 5). At a subsequent period, when Jerusalem was destroyed, and the Jewish nation scattered, the Sanhedrim was re-established at Tiberias; and from the 2d to the 6th century Galilee was the chief seat of Jewish learning. It contained a large and wealthy Jewish population. Traces of their splendid sacred edifices still exist at Tell Hum, Irbid, Kedesh, Kefr Birim, and other places (Handbook for S. and P., pp. 428, 432, 443, etc.; Robinson's B. R. iii. 71-74). The fairest and richest parts of Galilee are now utterly waste; its greatest cities are heaps of ruin, and the miserable remnant of its population are oppressed and spoiled by the Eastern Arabs, who make their periodical raids as their forefathers did 3000 years ago (Judg. vi.; see Handbook, 355).—J. GALILEE, SEA OF (ἡ θάλασσα τῆς Γαλιλαίας); also called 'The Sea of Tiberias' (τῆς Τιβεριοῦδος), and 'The Lake of Gennesareth' (ἡ λίμνη Γεννησαρὲτ), and emphatically 'The Sea' (ἡ θάλασσα, Matt. iv. 15). In the O. T. the only name given to this lake is 'The Sea of Cinnereth' (יַם כִּנְרֶת, or כְּנָרוֹת). It is a remarkable fact that in the whole of the O. T. it is only mentioned three times; and then incidentally in giving the boundaries of the tribes east of the Jordan (Num. xxxiv.

255. Sea of Galilee.

11; Josh. xii. 3; xiii. 27); while it forms one of the most prominent names in N. T. history. The prophets never allude to it. It would almost seem as if they had been ignorant of its existence. Their attention was directed to other scenes and localities.

The ancient name Cinnereth was derived from a fenced city situated somewhere on its western shore; adjoining this city was a little territory of the same name (CINNERETH). By a change in the pronunciation, and a corruption therefrom, this became among the later Jews גֶּנֶסָר, Genesar.

Hence the Greek Γεννησάρ of the Apocryphal writers and Josephus (1 Maccab. xi. 67; Joseph. Bell. Jud. iii. 10. 8), and the Γεννησαρὲτ of the Evangelists. The theories of the Rabbins regarding the origin of this name are given by Lightfoot (Opp. i. 498), and are elsewhere referred to (GENNESARET). The lake got its other names from the province of Galilee, which extended along its whole western shores; and from the city of Tiberias founded by Herod Antipas.

The Sea of Galilee is described particularly by Pliny and Josephus. The former says, the Jordan discharges itself into a lake, by many writers known as Genesera, sixteen miles long and six wide; which is skirted by the pleasant towns Julius and Hippo on the east, of Tarichea on the south (a name which is by many persons given to the lake itself), and of Tiberias on the west' (v. 15). Josephus refers to other features. 'The lake of Gennesareth derives its appellation from the adjacent district. It is 40 furlongs (five Roman miles), broad, by 140 (17½ miles) long. Its waters are sweet, and extremely pleasant to drink, as they flow in a clearer stream than the muddy collections of marshes, and they can be drawn free from impurities, being throughout confined by abrupt and sandy shores. They are of a medium temperature, milder than those of the river or the fountain; yet uniformly colder than might be expected from the expanse of the lake. . . . The kinds of fish found here differ from those elsewhere met with' (Bell. Jud. iii. 10. 7).

Recent measurements have shewn that the dimensions of the lake have not been quite correctly given by either writer. Its extreme length is 12½ geographical miles, and its breadth 6; equal to about 16 by 7½ Roman miles. It is of an oval shape, or rather the form of an egg, with the large end to the north. The Sea of Galilee has none of those picturesque or sublime features for which the lakes of Italy and Switzerland are justly celebrated; it has not even the stern grandeur of the Dead Sea. The shores are singularly uniform. There are no bold cliffs jutting far out into deep water; there are no winding bays running away inland. The bed of the sea is like a huge basin. Along its eastern and western sides the banks rise steep, bare, and rugged, to the height of nearly 2000 feet; and their tops, especially those on the east, are as level as a wall. At the north and south ends, where the Jordan enters and passes out, there are wide openings, through which views are gained up and down the valley. Yet nature has not left this scene altogether destitute of ornament. The scenery is not quite so dreary, nor are the hues of the landscape so dead and sombre as Dr. Traill would have us imagine (Traill's Josephus, ii. p. cvi.) True, when the sun is high and the sky cloudless, and when the pilgrim looks down from the top of the mountains, there is a dreariness in the landscape, and a uniformity of cold gray colour, which wearies the eye; but let him go down to the shore and wait till the sun declines, and he will be enchanted with the deep ethereal blue of the smooth water, and the tints, 'rose-coloured, pearl-gray, and purple, blended together,' and thrown in soft shades over the sides of the encircling hills. The pale blue cone of Hermon, with its glittering crown of snow, forms a glorious back-ground (Van de Velde, ii. 388; Robinson, ii. 380, sq.; Stanley, 362; Handbook for S. and P., 418). Round the whole shore, with only one or two short interruptions, there is a broad strand of white pebbles, mixed with little shells. The Jordan enters at the extreme northern end of the lake, and leaves again at the southern. The utter loneliness and absolute stillness of the scene are exceedingly impressive. It seems as if all nature had gone to rest, languishing under that scorching heat. How different it was in the days of our Lord! Then all was life and bustle along the shores; the cities and villages that thickly studded them resounded with the hum of a busy population; while from hill-side and corn-field came the cheerful cry of shepherd and ploughman. The lake, too, was dotted with dark fishing-boats, and spangled with white sails. Now, a mournful and solitary silence reigns alike over sea and shore. The cities are in ruins. Capernaum, Chorazin, the two Bethsaidas, Hippo, Gamala, and Tarichea, are completely deserted. Tiberias and Magdala are the only inhabited spots; and for several miles inland in every direction the country looks waste and desolate. The inhabitants—merchants, fishermen, and peasants—are nearly all gone. The few that remain in the shattered houses of Tiberias, and the mud hovels of Magdala, and the black tents of the wandering Bedawin, seem worn and wasted by poverty and sickness. When the writer last visited it (1858), the Sea of Galilee could just boast of one small boat, and it was so rotten and leaky as not to be sea-worthy. The fish, however, are as abundant as ever; for though only little hand-nets are used, a considerable sum is paid to the government for the privilege of fishing (Burckhardt, Travels in Syria, 332; Robinson, ii. 386). It was observed by Hasselquist that some of the same species of fish are found in the Sea of Galilee as in the Nile (Travels, p. 158); the same fact had been noted by Josephus (Bell. Jud. iii. 10. 8). The kinds referred to are Cyprinus Benni, Silurus, Mormyrus, etc. (See Wilson's Lands of the Bible, ii. 113; Robinson, ii. 386).

The most remarkable fact in the physical geography of the Sea of Galilee, is its great depression. Its surface is about 650 feet (some make it as much as 845) below the level of the ocean! (Van de Velde's Memoir of Map of Palestine, p. 181). This has a marked effect on the temperature, climate, and natural products. The heat is intense during the summer months. The harvest on the shore is nearly a month earlier than on the neighbouring high lands of Galilee and Bashan. Frost is unknown, and snow very rarely falls. The trees, plants, and vegetables, are those usually found in Egypt; such as the palm, the lote-tree (Zizyphus lotus), and the indigo plant, etc. (Robinson, ii. 388; Josephus, Bell. Jud. iii. 10. 7 and 8). Though the whole basin of the lake, and indeed the Jordan valley, is of volcanic origin, as evidenced by the thermal springs and the frequent earthquakes, yet the main formation of the surrounding wall of mountains is limestone. A large number of black stones and boulders of basaltic tufa are scattered along the slopes and upland plains, and dykes of basalt here and there burst through the limestone strata in the neighbourhood of Tiberias and along the northern shore (See Robinson, l. c.; Hasselquist, p. 283; Wilson's Lands of the Bible, ii. 112, 151).—J. GALL. Two distinct Hebrew words are rendered by this term in the A. V. 1. מָרָה (once מָרָה, Deut. xxxii. 32); LXX. χολή, θυμός, πικρός, ἀγρωστis, the name of a bitter plant, classed with wormwood (Deut. xxix. 17 (18); Lam. iii. 19; Amos vi. 12) of an intensely disagreeable taste (Ps. lxxix. 22 (21)); and described as growing up quickly and luxuriantly (Hos. x. 4). It is used to denote extreme bitterness (Deut. xxxii. 32), also poison (Deut. xxxii. 33; Job xx. 16); in both which places it expresses the poisonous and destructive nature of sin, which, however, is swallowed down by the wicked as if it were wine. Thus the word is always used in a figurative sense. For the plant itself, see ROSH. מָרָה never denotes the animal secretion called gall.

2. מָרָה and מָרָה; LXX. χολή, κακὰ, δαιτῆα; literally bitterness (e.g., Deut. xxxii. 32; Job xiii. 26). Hence it is used for the gall of the human body, a substance of extreme bitterness (e.g., Job xvi. 13; xx. 25), and for the poison of serpents (Job xx. 14).

In the N. T. the word gall, χολή, occurs twice: once in connection with the crucifixion of Jesus (Matt. xxvii. 34), 'They gave him vinegar to drink mingled with gall' (in Mark xv. 23, 'wine mingled with myrrh'), where it denotes the juice of a bitter herb, which, being mingled with vinegar or sour wine, formed a drink intended to produce stupefaction and insensibility to pain, but which Jesus, desiring to endure the full bitterness of death for us, having tasted, would not drink (see Wordsworth and Alford, in loc.). In the second case the word is used respecting Simon the magician (Acts viii. 23), 'I perceive that thou art in the gall of bitterness,' eis cholēn pikrias—'fallen into the gall of bitterness,' where it expresses the poisonous moral condition into which the sorcerer had sunk, in allusion to the notion of the ancients that the poison of the serpent existed in the gall—χολή ἀσπίδος ἐν γαστρὶ αὐτοῦ (Job xx. 14).—L. GALLERY. Three Hebrew words are thus translated in the A. V. 1. רִיחַיִּים, Ezek. xli. 15, 16; xlii. 3, 5. The proper meaning of this word is very doubtful; even Jarchi says, 'I know not what this is,' and Kimchi leaves the explanation of the whole passage in which it occurs to be given 'in the future time by Elias.' The LXX. render it in the one chapter by τὰ ἀνδρῶτα, and in the other by τὰ περιστῦλα; the Targ. gives רְחֵימֵי, 'its corners,' as the equivalent; and the Syr. ܥܒܠܐ, which Castell says, means balaustia adificiorum. Modern opinions are divided between pillars or columns (Villalpandus, Cocceius), and gallery or terrace (Gesen., Fürst, Hävernick, Hitzig.)

2. רִיחַיִּים (Song i. 17, in the marg. of A. V.) This is the textual reading for which the K'ri is רִיחַיִּים, a reading which many codices also give. The meaning of this, however, as well as of the other, is doubtful. Some, tracing it to the obsolete root רָחַם, retained in the Aram. ܪܚܡܐ (רִחַם), to run, renuere by rafters, 'qui nomen habent a currendo quod de trabe in trabem incurunt' (Vatablus, L. Capellus); while others, comparing it with רִיחַיִּים, Gen. xxx. 38 ('gutters,' A. V.), Exod. ii. 16 ('troughs,' A. V.), render it by laqueare, lacunar, because the lacunae are like canals (Gesenius, Heiligstedt). Hengstenberg makes it das belaufene, the betrod or walked over, and understands it of the floor which, in the temple, was made of cypress wood (1 Kings vi. 15); but to run is not the same thing as to be run upon, and though רִיחַיִּים signifies the former, it does not signify the latter; besides, there is nothing about the temple here. Ewald adheres to the textual reading, which he takes to be a plural, and consequently to be read רִיחַיִּים, or רִיחַיִּים; and he traces it to the Arab. خراط Kharat, dolare, whence comes مخروط, turned or carved work; but this labours under the objection of requiring us to suppose a transposition of the initial letters in the Hebrew word. The LXX. gives φατρινώματα, and the Vulg. laquearia. We incline to adopt the K'ri with Ewald's suggestion, that it is plural and not singular; which produces an accordance between the Hebrew text and the versions.

3. רִיחַיִּים (Song. vii. 6 [A. V. 5]). From founding this word with רִיחַיִּים, our translators have rendered it by gallery. It signifies here, curled or crisped hair, locks: 'Rex captus est cincinnis, i. e., pulchritudine cincinnorum tuorum, etc., Heiligstedt, in loc.—W. L. A.

GALLIM (גַּלִּים: Sept. Γαλλίμ). We read in 1 Sam. xxv. 44 that Saul gave his daughter Michal, 'David's wife, to Phalti, the son of Laish, which was of Gallim.' Isaiah shews the position of this ancient place when describing in prophetic vision the advance of Sennacherib's army upon Jerusalem. Every stage of the conqueror's march is portrayed with such clearness, that any traveller can even now follow the line, as the writer has done (Is. x.). The army is supposed to leave the main road near Bethel, and to diverge to the eastward. Michmah, Geba, Ramah, and Gibeah, are passed in succession. Then follow Gallim, Laish, and Anathoth, so close together that the cry of the one could be heard in the others. Gallim must, therefore, have been situated on the brow of one or other of those rocky glens which run down into the wilderness east of Gibeah and north of Anathoth. It was probably a very small village or castle. Its site was unknown to Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v.); and recent researches have failed to discover it. The little village of Hizmeah would suit the circumstances of the narrative so far as situation is concerned; but there is nothing else to indicate identity (See Handbook for S. and P., p. 214; Stanley S. and P.; p. 202; Reland, p. 784).—J. GALLIO (Γαλλίω). Junius Annæus Gallio, elder brother of Seneca the philosopher. His name was originally M. Ann. Novatus, but changed to Jun. Ann. Gallio in consequence of his adoption by Jun. Gallio the rhetorician ('pater Gallio,' Quintil. Inst. Orat. iii. 1, sec. 21; ix. 2, sec. 91). Seneca dedicated to him his treatise De Vita Beata, and in the preface to the fourth book of his Naturales Quaestiones describes him as a man universally beloved ('nemo mortalium uni tam dulcis est, quam hic omnibus'); and who, while exempt from all other vices, especially abhorred flattery ('inexpugnabilem virum adversus insidias, quas nemo non in sinum recipit'). According to Eusebius, he committed suicide before the death of Seneca ('Junius Gallio, frater Senecæ, egregius declamator, propria se manu interfecit,' Thesaurus Temporum, etc., p. 161, Amstel. 1658); but Tacitus speaks of him as alive after that event (Annal. xv. 73), and Dion Cassius states that he was put to death by order of Nero. He was Proconsul (ἀνθυπατεύωντος, Tex. rec. ἀνθυπάρχου ὄντος, Lachmann) of Achaia (Acts xviii. 12) under the Emperor Claudius, when Paul first visited Corinth, and nobly refused to abet the persecution raised by the Jews against the apostle. Dr. Lardner has noticed the strict accuracy of Luke in giving him this designation, which is obscured in the A. V. by the use of the term deputy (Credibility, part i. book i. ch. i.; Works, i. 34).—J. E. R.

GAMAL (גַּמַּל). [CAMEL] From this comes the pr. n. GEMALLI (גַּמְלִי), camel-man, Num. xiii. 12).

GAMALIEL (גַּמְלִיֶּה; Sept. Γαμαλιήλ; reward of God, Gesen.; El is rewarder, Fürst). A descendant of Joseph and leader of the tribe of Manasseh (Num. i. 10; ii. 20; vii. 54, 59; x. 23).—†.

GAMALIEL I. (גַּמְלִיֶּה, Γαμαλιήλ, i. e., the gift or benefit of God), son of Simon, grandson of Hillel of the royal family of David, and the celebrated teacher of the Apostle Paul (Acts xxii. 3).

He was called Gamaliel the elder (גַּמְלִיֶּה הַזֶּקֶן), to distinguish him from his grandson Gamaliel II., and became president of the Sanhedrin (נֹשֵׁב), A. D. 30, which shews that he must at least have been born in the first year of the Christian era, since he could hardly have succeeded to so eminent and responsible a position under thirty years of age. It is greatly to be regretted that it is now utterly impossible to form an adequate estimate of the character, religious sentiments, and intellectual endowments of the Rabbi who educated the great Apostle of the Gentiles, and so much contributed to the development of his character. For since the separation of Shammai from Hillel I., and his formation of a distinct school [EDUCATION], the theological disquisitions and opinions of the different heads of these colleges have mostly come down to us in the collective name of the school of Shammai and the school of Hillel; so that it is not stated whether the conclusions reported as having been arrived at in the school of Hillel belong to the presidency of Simon I., Gamaliel I., Simon II., or to the days of Hillel himself. Hence it is very hazardous to say which of the maxims of the school of Hillel belong to Gamaliel. From the fragments, however, which have his name attached to them, we see that Gamaliel was endowed with great intellectual powers, a fondness for study and for definitely settling every point of difficulty, refined taste, and good judgment, that he was humane, anxious to ameliorate the condition of the helpless, a strict Pharisee, yet liberal-minded, and averse to persecute those who differed from him, and that he had a very high opinion of his office. His mental powers, tastes, and liberal-mindedness, may be seen from the fact that he extended his studies to Greek literature, and infused into the minds of his disciples a taste for the Greek poets (Acts xvii. 28; 1 Cor. xv. 33; Tit. i. 12). His liberal sentiments may also be seen from the law which he passed with regard to the observance of the Sabbath. Though it had been determined since the days of Judas Maccabæus that it was allowable to carry on defensive war on the Sabbath, yet it was still a matter of doubt whether the soldiers who, at the termination of the war, were more than a Sabbath-day's journey (i.e., 2000 paces), from their homes, might return home and carry their weapons on the Sabbath. Gamaliel decreed that all persons called to assist either at hostile invasions, or inundations, or fires, or at the falling down of houses, or even at childbirth, might walk 2000 paces in any direction (Erub. 45, a). Far in advance of his times were his humane laws that the poor heathen should have the same right as the poor Jews to gather the gleanings after the harvest, and that the Jews on meeting heathen should greet them—'Peace be with you,' even on their festival days, when they are mostly engaged in worshipping their idols. It was owing to these laws, which redound to the honour of Gamaliel, that it afterwards became customary to make equal provisions for the poor heathen and Jews, to attend to the sick heathen, to bestow the last honours upon their dead, and to comfort their mourners, in towns which were inhabited by both Jews and Gentiles (Gittin, 59 b, 61, ff.; Jerusalem Gittin, c. v.) This contrasts very strikingly with the conduct of Christians towards the Jews, and towards each other, even in the present day, and accounts for the humane, prudent, and liberal advice which he gave to the Sanhedrin respecting the treatment of the followers of Christ (Acts v. 34, ff.) Gamaliel also exerted himself for the relief of wives and widows from the abuses to which they were exposed on the part of unprincipled husbands and children. Thus, up to his time a husband who had sent a bill of divorce to his wife could recall it at the first court of justice, and thereby subject the woman and the family to great inconvenience. Gamaliel declared this recall as nugatory (Gittin, 32). Owing to the several names by which individuals were called in those days, some Hebrew and some Greek, a designed or undesigned omission of one on the part of a witness, or the husband when signing the bill of divorce, not unfrequently exposed the woman to the mercy of unprincipled men, inasmuch as the divorce in such a case might be invalid. Gamaliel ordered that the clause, 'and every other name which describes the person,' should be added to the signature (Gittin, 34). He also passed a law which protected widows against unscrupulous children who might wish to rob her of the portion due to her from the Kethuba (כתובה).

Gamaliel had so exalted an opinion of his office that he would not delegate to any one the power of declaring the year intercalary. Thus, when he on one occasion went to Syria, the members of the Sanhedrin had to declare the year intercalary, subject to his approval; and when Gamaliel returned, he said, 'I am satisfied therewith: and the year was intercalary' (Mishna, Edujoth, vii. 7; Sanhedrin, ii. 6). The decrees on such occasions Gamaliel would write from the temple, a specimen of which is given Sanhed. Tosif. c. 11; Jerusalem Sanhedrin, 18 a:—'To our brethren the exiles in Babylon, Media, Greece, and all other exiles of Israel, greeting! We make known unto you that the lambs of this year are still tender, the pigeons are not yet fledged, the spring is altogether late; it hath, therefore, pleased me and my companions to lengthen the present year by thirty days.' No wonder that he was the first who was honoured by his brethren with the title of Rabban (רַבָּן), i.e., our master, which henceforth became the appellation of all the presidents (רִבְנֵי), and that the national homage was expressed in the hyperbolic saying, 'With the death of Gamaliel the reverence for the law ceased, and purity and abstinence (Pharisaism) died away' (Mishna, Sota, ix. 15). Gamaliel died about 50 A.D. That he was a secret believer in Jesus, and was openly baptised before his death by St. Peter and St. Paul is now rejected as fabulous by all writers who are acquainted with Jewish history (comp. Thilo, Codex Apocryphus Novi Test., Lipsiæ, 1832, p. 501, and the elaborate footnote; Neander, History of the Planting and Training of the Christian Church, ed. Bohn, vol. i. p. 46, ff.) The 'well-known prayer against Christian heretics,' which we are told by Conybeare and Howson was 'composed or sanctioned by him,' i.e., Gamaliel, and the story about 'Onkelos, the author of the celebrated Targum, raising a funeral-pile of rich materials,' etc. (The Life and Epistles of St. Paul, Lond. 1854, vol. i., p. 62, ff.), are now acknowledged to refer to Gamaliel II., the grandson of the Apostle's teacher (comp. Graetz, in Frankel's Monatschrift, vol. i. p. 320, ff.; Geschichte der Juden, Leipzig, 1856, vol. iii. p. 289, ff.; vol. iv. pp. 114, 152; Jost, Geschichte des Judenthums, Leipzig, 1857, vol. i. p. 281, ff.; and especially the masterly work of Frankel, entitled, Hodegetica in Mischnam, Lipsiæ, 1859, p. 57, ff., where all the fragments about Gamaliel have been studiously collected. See also the article GAMALIEL II.)—C. D. G.

GAMALIEL II. B. SIMON II., also called GAMALIEL OF JABNE, or the younger, to distinguish him from his grandfather Gamaliel I., was born about A.D. 50, succeeded to the presidency or patriarchate about A.D. 80, and died about 116 [EDUCATION]. He was the teacher of both Aquila, the Greek translator of the O. T., and Onkelos, the Chaldee translator of the Pentateuch; and we have records of his encounters with Christians and infidels, which shew the state of Biblical interpretation in the Apostolic age. The great maxim which he propounded to his disciples was, 'Get thee a teacher, eschew that which is doubtful, and do not multiply uncertain tithes' (Aboth. i. 16), and this lesson of being well grounded in the word of God by the aid of regular teachers, had its desired effects, as may be seen even from the conduct of his daughter. Thus, on one occasion a heathen philosopher derided the Biblical account of the creation of Eve, remarking to Gamaliel, 'Your God, in the creation of the woman, went to work like a thief, inasmuch as he secretly abstracted a rib from the man;' whereupon Gamaliel's daughter begged him to secure her redress against robbers who had robbed her of a silver pitcher, and left behind a golden one. The heathen philosopher remarked, 'I should not mind if such a misfortune were to befall me every day.' 'This being the case,' said Gamaliel's daughter, 'Adam ought to be glad that God took a rib and gave him a wife for it.' 'But why did God do it secretly?' 'That Adam,' said she, 'might not see the rough material, but be surprised with the perfected beauty' (Sanhedrin, 39). On another occasion a heathen philosopher remarked to him, 'Your Law says, 'God is a jealous God.' Why, then, does he manifest his jealousy against idolators, and not against the idols?' Whereupon Gamaliel spake a parable. 'There is a king who has a son that delights in calling his dog by the name of his own royal father. Now, with whom will the king be angry, with the dog or with his son?' Then said the heathen philosopher, 'Why does not God destroy these idols if they are such worthless things?' Quoth R. Gamaliel, 'If the heathen simply worshipped useless things, God might do it, but they worship the sun, moon, the water, etc., and shall God destroy the world because of fools?' (Aboda Zara, 54 a, 55 a). On another occasion, again, 'a Christian believing that 'life and immortality are brought to light in the Gospel' (2 Tim. i. 10), extolled the doctrines of the N. T. by questioning Gamaliel, 'How do you know [without the N. T.] that the dead will rise?' To this Gamaliel replied: 'From the words, "the land which the Lord sware unto your fathers to give THEM" (Deut. xi. 21), but as the fathers were dead, the promise must have premised a resurrection when alone the land could be given to these fathers' (Sanhedrin, 90 b). This shews the force of the interpretation and argument used by Christ in Matt. xxii. 32. These frequent attacks upon Judaism by Christians, and the rise of different heretical sects among the Jews, caused to a great extent by heathen philosophers who were now enabled to read the Jewish Scriptures in the Greek version, made this Gamaliel sanction the famous prayer against all heretics which has wrongly been ascribed to Gamaliel I. The vigorous measures, however, which Gamaliel adopted to establish uniformity of faith and practice greatly embittered the Jewish community, and resulted in his temporary deposition from the presidency, and the election of R. Eleazar b. Azzariah in his stead [EDUCATION]. This circumstance, as we shall see, deeply affects the history of the O. T. Canon.

About twenty years before Christ, Shammai, a disciple of Hillel, and others, who entertained opinions upon several subjects adverse to those of their master, founded a separate school, which went by the name of the School of Shammai in opposition to the School of Hillel. The interpretations of Scripture, and the decisions peculiar to each school, were orally transmitted by the respective members. This was all the more easy in the school of Hillel since its presidency became hereditary. When, however, the direct lineal descendant was deposed, and Eleazar inducted as president, the Sanhedrin determined to re-examine all the opinions which Gamaliel affirmed to belong to his ancestral school. For this purpose, the college, which then consisted of the unusual number of seventy-two members, took down most carefully the depositions of upwards of twenty-two persons who were in possession of traditions, and according to these depositions decided which opinions were in harmony with the most ancient traditions irrespective of schools; and to their honour be it said that in the course of this examination the Sanhedrin not unfrequently abandoned some of their own opinions for those of the school of Shammai, which they found more in harmony with the oldest traditions. This collection of depositions is called Edajoth (עדייות collection of witness) or Bechirah (בכירה selection). Among the decisions reconsidered was the opinion about the book of Ecclesiastes and the Song of Songs, which constituted one of the differences between the school of Shammai and that of Hillel, the former excluded them from the Canon as not emanating from the Holy Ghost (מרוח קודש) but from Solomon's own wisdom, whilst the latter included them in the Canon as being inspired productions; and after a minute investigation of the evidence it was found that according to the most ancient traditions these books were regarded as inspired, and hence the former decision of the school of Hillel was confirmed, viz., that the said books should be retained in the Canon (Jadim, iii. 5; Edajoth, v. 3). If we bear in mind that this investigation took place almost in the apostolic age, that the said books were then in the Canon, that the question was whether they should be retained, and that it was then found necessary to retain them in harmony with the ancient traditions, few, if any, will doubt that Ecclesiastes and the Song of Songs were in the Canon anterior to the Christian era.

Gamaliel soon became reconciled with those whom he had offended by his mistaken zeal for uniformity of faith and practice, and was reinstated in his office as president of the Sanhedrin. It must not, however, be supposed that he was an intolerant bigot. The fact that he cultivated Greek literature and that he had free intercourse with both heathen philosophers and Jewish Christians would of itself be a sufficient proof that he was liberal in his sentiments. He even went so far as to bathe at Ptolemais in a bath which was adorned with a statue of the beautiful goddess Aphrodite; and when a philosopher (i.e., a Jewish Christian) asked him how he could reconcile it with his religion, Gamaliel replied that the statue was not to be worshipped but to adorn the building, as is evident from the little regard paid to it, that it had been made for the bath and not the bath for it, and that it would be absurd to be prevented thereby from using the enjoyments of nature (Aboda Zara, iii. 4). The last deed of Gamaliel beautifully illustrates his character. It was customary among the Jews to bury their dead in costly apparel, and to such an extravagant extent was this practised that it became a most serious matter when a burial occurred in a family. Gamaliel ordered in his last will and testament that he should be buried in simple white linen. This had its desired effect, and did away with the obnoxious practice, as no family could henceforth feel it a degradation to have their dead buried in a simple manner when the highest functionary of the Jewish people was interred in such inexpensive shrouds (Kethuboth, 8, b; Tosifta Nidda, towards the end); and the Jews to the present day bury all their dead, high and low, rich and poor, in shrouds made of the same inexpensive white linen. Gamaliel died about A. D. 116, and though he was buried in the simple manner which he desired, yet so great was the regard in which he was held, that Onkelos, his disciple, and Chaldee translator of the Pentateuch, shewed him royal honours, and burned at his funeral costly garments and furniture to the amount of seventy Tyrian mina (שבעים סנה צור), i.e., about twenty-one pounds sterling, such a funeral-pile as was raised at the burial of a king (Aboda Zara, 11 a; Semachoth, c. viii.; Tosifta Sabbath, c. viii.) This incident, as well as several others ascribed to Gamaliel I. in Conybeare and Howson's Life and Epistles of St. Paul (vol. i. p. 61, etc., London 1856), refers to Gamaliel II., comp. GAMES. If by the word are intended mere secular amusements which are the natural expression of vigorous health and joyous feeling, fitted, if not designed, to promote health, hilarity, and friendly feeling, as well as to aid in the development of the corporeal frame, we must look to other quarters of the globe, rather than to Palestine, for their origin and encouragement. The Hebrew temperament was too deep, too earnest, too full of religious emotion, to give rise to games having a national and permanent character.

Games, however, are so natural to man, especially in the period of childhood, that no nation has been or can be entirely without them. Accordingly a few traces are found in the early Hebrew history of at least private and childish diversions. The heat of the climate too in Syria would indispose the mature to more bodily exertion than the duties of life imposed, while the gravity which is characteristic of the Oriental character might seem compromised by anything so light as sports. Dignified ease therefore corresponds with the idea which we form of Oriental recreation. The father of the family sits at the door of his tent, or reclines on the housetop, or appears at the city gate, and there tranquilly enjoys repose, broken by conversation, under the light and amid the warmth of the bright and breezy heavens, in the cool of the retiring day, or before the sun has assumed his burning ardours (Deut. xvi. 14; Lam. v. 14). Even among the active Egyptians, whose games have been figured on their mural tablets, we find little which suggests a comparison with the vigorous contests of the Grecian games. One of the most remarkable is the following (No. 256), shewing what appears to be play with the single-stick.

Zechariah (viii. 5) alludes to the sportiveness of children in the streets as a sign and consequence of that peace and prosperity which are so free from alarm that the young take their usual games, and are allowed entire liberty by their parents:—'and the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof' (comp. Jer. xxx. 19). An interesting passage, illustrative of these street-amusements, is found in Matt. xi. 16:—'This generation is like unto children sitting in the markets and calling unto their fellows, We have piped unto you and ye have not danced, we have mourned unto you and ye have not lamented.'

That the elegant amusement of playing with tamed and trained birds was not unusual may be learnt from Job xli. 5:—'Wilt thou play with him (leviathan) as with a bird?' Commenting on Zech. xii. 3, Jerome mentions an amusement of the young, which we have seen practised in more than one part of the north of England. 'It is customary,' he says, 'in the cities of Palestine, and has been so from ancient times, to place up and down large stones to serve for exercise for the young, who, according in each case to their degree of strength, lift these stones, some as high as their knees, others to their middle, others above their heads, the hands been kept horizontal and joined under the stone.'

Music, song, and dancing were recreations reserved mostly for the young or for festive occasions. From Lam. v. 16, 'the crown is fallen from our head,' it might be inferred that, as among the Greeks and Latins, chaplets of flowers were sometimes worn during festivity. To the amusements just mentioned frequent allusions are found in holy writ, among which may be given Ps. xxx. 11; Jer. xxxi. 13; Luke xv. 25. In Is. xxx. 29, a passage is found which serves to shew how much of festivity and mirth was mingled with religious observances; the journey on festival occasions up to Jerusalem was enlivened by music if not by dancing:—'Ye shall have a song as in the night when a holy solemnity is kept; and gladness of heart, as when one goeth with a pipe to come into the mountain of the Lord, to the mighty one of Israel.' A passage occurs in 2 Sam. ii. 14, which may indicate the practice among the ancient Israelites of games somewhat similar to the jousts and tournaments of the middle ages. On the subject of dancing see Michaelis (Mos. Recht, art. 197). No trace is found in Hebrew antiquity of any of the ordinary games of skill or hazard which are so numerous in the western world.

The Grecian influence which made itself felt after the exile, led to a great change in the manners and customs of the Hebrew nation. They were soon an almost different people from what we find them in the days of their national independence and primitive simplicity. In Macc. i. 14, we find evidence that the Grecian games were introduced; and that a gymnasium was built under Antiochus Epiphanes:—‘They built a place of exercise at Jerusalem, according to the custom of the heathen.’ Comp. 2 Maccab. iv. 12, 13, 14, where special mention is made of the prevalence of ‘Greek fashions,’ and ‘the game of Discus;’ though, as appears clearly from the last passage (v. 17), these practices were considered contrary to the Mosaic institutions, and were hateful to pious Israelites. The Herodian princes had theatres and amphitheatres built in Jerusalem and other cities of Palestine, in which were held splendid games, sometimes in honour of their Roman masters. We cite a remarkable passage to this effect from Josephus (Antiq. xv. 8. 1):—‘Herod revolted from the laws of his country, and corrupted the ancient constitution by introducing foreign practices, while those religious observances which used to lead the multitude to piety were neglected. He appointed solemn games to be celebrated every fifth year in honour of Cæsar, and built a theatre at Jerusalem, as also a very great amphitheatre in the plain—both costly works, but contrary to Jewish customs. He also called men together out of every nation; wrestlers and others, who strove for prizes in these games, were invited by the hope and reward of victory. The most eminent were got together, for the rewards were very great, not only to those that performed their exercise naked, but to musicians also. He moreover offered no small rewards to those who ran for prizes in chariot-races, when they were drawn by two, three, or four pairs of horses. He made also great preparation of wild beasts and even of lions in great abundance, and of such other beasts as were either of uncommon strength or rarely seen. These fought one with another, or men condemned to death fought with them. Above all the rest the trophies gave most displeasure to the Jews, who imagined them to be images.’ (See also Antiq. xvi. 5. 1; xix. 7. 4; xix. 8. 2; Eichhorn, De Judeor. re scenica, in the Comment. Gotting. Ræ.) The drama does not appear to have been introduced, but Jews were in foreign countries actors of plays (Joseph. Vita, sec. 3). The passage already cited (see the original) is full of evidence how distasteful these heathenish games were to the more sound-minded part of the nation.

The fact that, as we have seen, the games of the amphitheatre were celebrated even in Jerusalem, serves to make it very likely that Paul in 1 Cor. xv. 32; iv. 9, alludes to these detestable practices, though it is not probable that the apostle was himself actually exposed to the fury of the raging animals. Contrary to the opinion of some writers, the reference to these combats appears to us very clear, though it was only metaphorically that Paul ‘fought with beasts at Ephesus.’ The word which the apostle (1 Cor. xv. 32) uses is emphatic and descriptive, θηριομαχῆσα. The θηριομαχία or beast-fight (venatio in Latin) constituted among the Romans a part of the amusements of the circus or amphitheatre. It consisted in the combat of human beings with animals. The persons destined to this barbarous kind of amusement were termed θηριομαχοί, bestiarii. They were generally of two classes—1. Voluntary, that is, persons who fought either for amusement or for pay: these were clothed and provided with offensive and defensive weapons.

2. Condemned persons, who were mostly exposed to the fury of the animals unclothed, unarmed, and sometimes bound (Cic. Pro Sext. 64; Ep. ad Quint. Frat. ii. 6; Senec. De Benef. ii. 19; Tertull. Apol. 9). As none but the vilest of men were in general devoted to these beast-fights, no punishment could be more shameful and cruel than what was frequently inflicted on the primitive Christians, when they were hurried away ‘to the lions’ (as the phrase was), merely for their fidelity to conscience and to Christ, its Lord. Ephesus appears to have had some unenviable distinction in these brutal exhibitions (Schleusner, in voc.), so that there is a peculiar propriety in the language of the apostle.

Of these beast-fights the Romans were passionately fond. The number of animals which appear to have been from time to time engaged in them, is such as to excite in the reader’s mind both pity and aversion.

The N. T., in several places, contains references to the celebrated Grecian Games, though it may be allowed that some commentators have imagined allusions where none were designed. As might, from his heathen learning, be expected, it is Paul who chiefly supplies the passages in question; comp. Gal. ii. 2, v. 7; Phil. ii. 16; Heb. xii. 1, xii. 4; Phil. iii. 14; 2 Tim. ii. 5; and especially in 1 Cor. ix. 24-27. In the O. T. two passages contain a clear reference to games; Ps. xix. 5; Eccl. ix. 11.

As tending to illustrate these scriptural allusions, we shall describe some of the exercises in which the competitors engaged in the great games of Greece:—

1. The Gymnastic Exercises.—These were laid down in a well-planned systematic series, beginning with the easier (κοίφα), and proceeding on to the more difficult (βαρέα). Some of these were specially fitted to give strength, others agility; some educated the hands, others the feet. Among the lighter exercises were reckoned running (δρόμος), leaping (ἄλμα), quiting (δρακος), hurling the javelin (ἀκόντιον). When skill had been obtained in these, and the consequent strength, then followed a severer course of discipline. This was two-fold—1, simple; 2, compound. The simple consisted of wrestling (πάλη), boxing (πυγμή): the compound we find in the Pentathlon (the five contests), and the Pankration (or general trial of strength). The Pentathlon was made up of the union of leaping, running, quoiting, wrestling, and hurling the spear; the Pankration consisted of wrestling and boxing. It is not necessary here to speak in detail of the distinctions which Galen makes between the ordinary motions of the body and those which were required in these exercises, since the names themselves are sufficient to make manifest how manifold, severe, long, and difficult the body discipline was, and the inference is easy and unavoidable that the effect on the bodily frame must have been of the most decided and lasting kind.

In 1 Cor. ix. 26 Paul speaks of fighting not as one who beateh the air; alluding to the preludial exercises, trials of individual and of comparative strength, which took place in the course of training. These runnings and boxings had no immediate aim or result, and implied no real competitor; hence the propriety of the terms which the sacred writer employs. Statius (Theb. vi. 587) has given a lively picture of some of the practices by which the runners endeavoured to give suppleness and agility to their limbs:

Explorant, actuante gradus, variasque per artes
Exstimulant docto languentia membra tumultu.
Poplite nunc flexo sidunt, nunc lubrica torti
Pectora collidunt plausu; nunc ignea tollunt
Crura, brevemque fugam necopino fine reponunt.

After the herald had called the competitors into the lists, they sometimes tried their strength and exercised their frames, by running out and back on the course. Virgil (Æn. v. 376) represents Dares as displaying the size and flexibility of his arms prior to his combat with Eryx:

Ostenditque humeros latos, alternaque jactat
Brachia protendens, et verberat ictibus auras, where, in verberat ictibus auras, we have even a verbal agreement with the apostle's phraseology. (Compare Æn. v. 446). Among the proprieties of language for which the passage in 1 Cor. ix. is distinguished, may be placed the term which Paul employs to describe the prize. It is the specific word used in the case, namely βραβεῖον: this was the customary term, the employment of which was rendered proper from the name of the officers, βραβεύων, who gave the conqueror his crown. The entire passage indeed is singularly happy in its phraseology, thereby adding confirmation to the grounds on which the authority of the epistle rests. We cannot, however, think one word well rendered in our English version, ἀδόκιμος, 'castaway'; or, if this be a good rendering, the apostle has at least failed in strict verbal propriety; for who were they in connection with the games who were, or were termed, castaway? Δοκιμασία was the term employed to describe the severe scrutiny which candidates for office underwent at Athens. Persons who were found unfit were termed ἀδόκιμοι, and as this decision was a declaration of civic and social incapacity, not to say of moral turpitude, the word came to mean 'dishonoured.' This, or the word rejected, seems the proper rendering in the last verse of the ninth chap. of 1 Corinthians. The apostle's fear evidently was, lest, after having put others on this noble undertaking, he himself should be at last found unfit to engage therein; for the allusion seems to be derived from the preparatory exercises of which he is immediately speaking, and not from the issue of the contest; and at the end of these preparatory exercises, a very severe examination had to be undergone by such as wished to 'run the race.' This interpretation may perhaps serve to set the apostle's humility in a strong light; since he expresses his fear lest he should not be even admitted to enter the lists for 'the glorious prize.' If, however, any one prefers referring the word to the final issue of the contest of life, then the same meaning remains, and the apostle says, that, after all his striving, he may lose the crown, proving at last unequal to the achievement of the victory.

In writing to the Christians at Corinth there was a special propriety, on the part of the apostle, in making allusions to the public games. Corinth was the place where one of the four Greek national games was celebrated, namely, the Isthmian. These games were so called from being held on the isthmus which joins northern with southern Greece—a spot of land most celebrated in Grecian history, alike in martial and commercial matters.

2. Racing may be traced back to the earliest periods of Grecian antiquity, and may be regarded as the first friendly contest in which men engaged. Accordingly the Olympic and Pythian, probably also the other games, opened with foot-races. Foot-racing, perfected by systematic practice, was divided into different kinds. If you ran merely to the end of the course (στάδιον), it was called stadium; if you went thither and back, you ran the double course (διὰυλος). The longest course was the δολιχος, which required extraordinary speed and power of endurance. What it involved the ancients have left in no small uncertainty. It is sometimes given as seven times over the stadium; at others, twelve times; at others again, twenty; and even the number of four-and-twenty times is mentioned. These lengths will give some idea of the severity of the trial, and serve to illustrate the meaning of the apostle when he speaks of running with patience the race set before him (ὑπομονή, patience, sustained effort). Indeed, one Ladas, a victor at the Olympic games, in the δολιχος or long race, was so exhausted by his efforts that, immediately on gaining the honour and being crowned, he yielded up his breath: a fact which also serves to throw light on Scriptural language, as shewing with what intense eagerness these aspirants (δολιχοδρόμοι, long-runners) strove for perishing chaplets (φθαρτὸν στέφανον). In the preparatory discipline everything was done which could conduce to swiftness and strength. The exercises were performed with the body naked and well oiled. Minute directions were established in order to prevent foul play (κακοτεχνία, κακουργία) of any kind, so that all the competitors might start and run on terms of entire equality—illustrating the words of Paul on the necessity of running lawfully. The contest was generally most severe; to reach the goal sooner by one foot was enough to decide the victory. How true and graphic then the descriptions given by Paul: it was, as the apostle states, ἐν στάδι, in the race-course, that the contests took place; every one striving for the victory was temperate in all things; nay more, he kept under his body and brought it into subjection. A passage is found in the Enchiridion of Epictetus [cap. 29], which shews with what propriety the terms which the apostle employs were chosen by him: 'You wish to conquer at the Olympic games? so also do I; for it is honourable; but bethink yourself what this attempt implies, and then begin the undertaking. You must subject yourself to a determinate course; must submit to dietetic discipline (ἀσκήσις); must pursue the established exercises at fixed hours in heat and cold; must abstain from dainties; must not drink cold water or wine at pleasure; yield yourself unreservedly to the control of the president as to a physician, then go into the struggle; you will have to throw out your hands, twist your ankle, swallow much dust, sometimes be flogged; but so you will conquer.'

It may well be supposed that the competitors employed all their ability, and displayed the greatest eagerness to gain the prize. The nearer, too, they approached to the goal, the more did they increase their efforts. Sometimes the victory depended on a final spring; happy he that retained power enough to leap first to the goal. The spectators, also, used every encouragement in their power, these favouring one competitor, those another:—

'Verbaque dicentum, nunc, nunc incumbere tempus,

Hippomene, propera. Nunc viribus utere totis.'

All these remarks go to shew how wisely Paul acted in selecting the figure, and how carefully he has preserved the imagery which belonged to it. A word employed in the Common Version, 1 Cor. ix. 27, 'Lest when I have preached to others I myself should be a castaway'—namely, preached, mars the figure. The original is κηρύξας—'acted the part of herald,' whose business it was to call the competitors to the contest and proclaim their victory, functions which Paul spent his life in performing.

3. At the Olympic games the prize was simply a chaplet made of wild olive. The crowns were laid on a tripod, and placed in the middle of the course, so as to be seen of all. On the same table there were also exposed to view palm-branches, one of which was given into the hand of each conqueror at the same time with the chaplet. The victors, having been summoned by proclamation, were presented with the ensigns of victory, and conducted along the stadium, preceded by a herald, who proclaimed their honours, and announced their name, parentage, and country.

which ensued. A chaplet won in the chariot-races at Olympia was the highest of earthly honours. What congratulations from friends; how was the public eye directed to the fortunate conqueror; what honour had he conferred on his native city, and for what office was such an one unfit! What intense and deep delight must his bosom have been filled with when the full acclaim of assembled Greece fell upon his ear, coming in loud salutations and applauses from every part of the crowded course! Then came the more private attentions of individual friends. One brought a chaplet of flowers; another bound his head with ribbons. Afterwards came the triumphal sacrifice made to the twelve gods, accompanied by sumptuous feasting. The poet now began his office, gaining, in some cases, both for himself and the happy victor, an unexpected immortality. Music also lent her aid, and his name was sung wherever the noble accents of the Greek tongue asserted their supremacy. In order to perpetuate the memory of these great men, their names and achievements were entered into a public register, which was under the care of suitable officers. A no less privilege was that of having a statue of themselves placed either at the expense of their country or their friends, in the sacred grove of Jupiter. A perhaps still greater honour awaited the victor on his return home. The conquerors at the Isthmian games were wont to be received in their chariots, superbly attired, amid thronging and jubilant multitudes.

One or two other privileges belonged to these victors, such as immunity from public offices, and a certain yearly stipend. If to all this be added the strict scrutiny which competitors were obliged to undergo (in the best ages), so that none could enter the lists but such as were of pure Greek blood, and incorrupt in life, none but such as had undergone the required disciplinary training, and (in the case of the chariot and horse-races) none but those who could afford to possess and train horses in a country in which, as in Greece, horses, particularly in the earlier ages, were very scarce and dear; it will be seen that the distinction of the prize was not over-rated, when it was compared with a Roman triumph, nor that the description of Horace is too highly coloured—

Terrarum dominos evehit ad Deos.

At the Isthmian games the prize was parsley during the mythic periods. In later ages the victor was crowned with a chaplet of pine leaves. Parsley, however, appears to have been also employed. If the conqueror had come off victorious in the three great divisions—music, gymnastics, and racing—he was in the Pythian, as well as in the other sacred games, presented also with a palm-branch. The names of about seventy persons are preserved who gained honours at the Isthmian games, among which occurs that of the emperor Nero, who is recorded to have gained the victory in the character of harper and that of herald. On the subject here treated of see West's Odes of Pindar, 2d edit.; Potter's Antiquities of Greece. By far the best work, however, is Krause's Die Gymnastik und Agonistik der Hellenen; and his Die Pythien, Nemeen und Isthmien, Leipzig, 1841.—J. R. B.

GAMMADIM (גמדים). This word occurs Ezek. xxvii. 11, and various interpretations have been given of it. The LXX. render it by φύλακες, and with this agree the Syr. (ܓܡܕܝܐ et custodiebant), and the Arab.; the Vulg. again renders it by Pygmaei, and this Rashi, Kimchi, and others adopt. Fürst prefers the former of these, tracing the word to an obsolete root גמז, to place or make to stand, allied to the Arab. جند, to be hard or firm, and translates by Besatzung (garrison). Luther also follows this, and gives wächter as the rendering. The interpretation of the Vulg. rests on the supposed derivation of the word from גמז, a span; or cubit; and this Michaelis also follows, suggesting that these warriors were so called because at the height at which they stood they seemed pigmies to those below! Theodoret defends the rendering of Aquila, πυγμαλούς, deriving it ἀπὸ τῆς πυγμῆς, and more rationally explaining it as denoting persons skilled in fight. The Targ. regards it as an ethnological term, and gives קפודוכאים Cappadocians, reading probably גמדים for גמדים. Fuller (Misc. Sac. vi. p. 698) suggests that they may be the inhabitants of Gamala (Plin. N. H. v. 14); and Grotius thinks the inhabitants of Ancon ('nam Ancon est גמז') are intended. All this is purely arbitrary. Hävernick (in loc.), adopts the meaning brave, daring ones, from Syr. ܓܡܕܝܐ;

Hitzig prefers the sense of deserters from neighbouring countries, or exiles (the גמדים of Is. lviii. 7), comparing the Syr. ܓܡܕܝܐ as applied to the obstinacy of the horse or mule, and identifying it with the Arab. جراح warrior; Gesenius contends for 'bellatores fortes hostes arborum instar caedentes,' deriving the word from Arab. جند amputant; and Lee thinks it means short-swordsmen, deriving it from גמז, which he traces to the same Arab. root.—W. L. A.

GANACH. [IBN-GANACH.]

GARDEN [גן, גננה, Sept. and N. T. κήπος]. Several gardens are mentioned in the Scriptures, as the garden of Eden (Gen. ii. 8, 9, 10, 15), Ahab's garden of herbs (1 Kings xxi. 2), the royal garden near the fortress of Zion (2 Kings xxi. 18; xxv. 4), the garden of Solomon (Eccl. ii. 5), the royal garden of the Persian kings at Susa (Esther i. 5; vii. 7, 8), the garden of Joseph of Arimathea (John xix. 41), and the garden of Gethsemane

(John xviii. 1). It is clear, from Is. v. 2, and Lam. ii. 6, that gardens were generally hedged or walled, as indeed Josephus expressly states respecting the gardens near Jerusalem (De Bell. Jud. v. 7). In Job xxvii. 18; Prov. xxvii. 18; Cant. i. 6; viii. 11; and John xx. 15, gardeners and keepers of gardens by occupation are indicated. [They made use also of a species of scarcrow (πρὸς ἀκρόνιον, Bar. vi. 70)].

Gardens were planted not only with fragrant and beautiful plants, but with various fruit-bearing and other trees (Gen. ii. 9; Jer. xxix. 5; Amos ix. 14). Thus we find mention of nut-gardens (Cant. vi. 11), pomegranate-gardens (Cant. iv. 13), olive-gardens (Deut. viii. 8; 1 Chron. xxvii. 28), vine-gardens (Cant. iv. 2; viii. 8), a garden of cucumbers (Is. i. 8). Here, however, we are not to suppose that the gardens were exclusively occupied by these fruits, but that they were severally predominant in the gardens to which they gave name. The distinction, for instance, between a vine-garden and a vine-yard would be, that, in the latter, the vine was cultivated solely for use, whereas in the former it was planted for solace and ornament, to cover walls, and to be trained in arbours and on trellises. [We read also of a 'garden of herbs' (Deut. xi. 10; 1 Kings xxi. 2); in these, vegetables for the table were reared, including such aromatic herbs as were used for seasoning (See FOOD)].

Gardens were, when possible, planted near streams, which afforded the means of easy irrigation. This explains such passages as Gen. ii. 9, sq., and Is. i. 30. But streams were few in Palestine, at least such as afforded water in summer, when alone water was wanted for irrigation: hence rain-water, or water from the streams which dried up in summer, was in winter stored up in reservoirs spacious enough to contain all the water likely to be needed during the dry season. In fact many of our own large nurseries are watered in the same manner from reservoirs of rain-water. The water was distributed through the garden in numerous small rills, which traversed it in all directions, and which were supplied either by a shewn in the Egyptian monuments. These rills being turned and directed by the foot, gave rise to the phrase 'watering by the foot,' as indicative of garden irrigation (Deut. xi. 10). The representation (No. 265) very clearly shews the way in which water was raised, by a balanced lever, from the stream or reservoir, and poured into a trough, whence it flowed into the various canals for irrigation. This method is still in use. There is a curious account of ancient garden irrigation in Pliny (Hist. Nat. xix. 4), which the reader may consult with advantage.

Gardens were dedicated to various uses among the Hebrews, such as we still find prevailing in the East. One most essential difference between them and our own is that they are not attached to or in any way connected with the residence, but are situated in the suburbs. We have known gardens from half a mile to a mile distant from the houses of the persons to whom they belonged. It is manifest that all the gardens mentioned in Scripture were outside the several towns. This is, however, to be understood of regular gardens, for shrubs and flowers were often planted in the open courts of the dwelling-houses.

People repair to their suburban gardens to take the air, to walk, and to refresh and solace themselves in various ways. For their use there is mostly in each garden a kind of summer-house or pavilion, fitted up with much neatness, gaily painted and furnished with seats, where the visitors may sit and enjoy themselves. Here sometimes banquets were and are still given, attended by singing and music, to which there may be an allusion in Is. li. 3. The custom of burying the dead in gardens is indicated in Gen. xxiii. 19, 265. Watering Garden.

266. Garden-houses.

20; 2 Kings xxi. 26; 1 Sam. xxv. 1; Mark xv. 46; John xix. 41, 42; and still occurs sometimes in the east, but is not very prevalent. We find it also among the Greeks (Heliodorus, Æthiop. i. 2, p. 35), and the Romans (Suetonius, Galba, 20).

It is evident that the gardens of the Hebrews were in a very considerable degree devoted to the culture of medicinal herbs, the preparation of which continued stream from the reservoir, or had water poured into them by the gardeners, in the manner

In various ways was a matter of much solicitude with them (Jer. viii. 22). This is still the case in the East, where vegetable simples are as much employed in medicine as they were in this country in the times of Gerarde and Culpepper.

It would seem that the Jews were much in the habit of performing their devotions in gardens (Gen. xxiv. 63; Matt. xxvi. 36; John i. 48; xviii. 1, 2). This interesting practice, however, was idolatrously abused; for the worship of idols in these shady seclusions was not of unfrequent occurrence, and is often mentioned in Scripture (1 Kings xiv. 23; 2 Kings xvi. 4; xvii. 10; 2 Chron. xviii. 4; Is. lxx. 3; lxxvi. 17; Jer. ii. 20; iii. 6; Ezek. xx. 28).

The Jews, in their ceremonial treatises, have frequent occasion to mention gardens, chiefly for the purpose of shewing what plants or seeds might or might not be planted or sown together under the law against heterogeneous propagations (Lev. xix. 19; Deut. xxii. 9, 11). For that law various reasons have been given, on which we are not required to pronounce any judgment: but it appears to us that the economical grounds which may be collected from the effects which appear to result from the interdicted practices, are quite sufficient in themselves, whether others exist or not. Thus we find enumerated among the radical defects of Hindu husbandry—the barbarous system of sowing two or three species of grain in one field The mode of reaping is equally defective; if two or three species of grain are sown in the same field, the Indian husbandman treads down a great part of his crop in order to collect each kind separately; indeed, so fond is he of this method of proceeding that he pursues it even when the crop is all of one kind, that he may select what he deems the ripest' (Tennant's Indian Recreations, in Edinb. Review, iv. 320).

The gardens of the Holy Land have been mentioned by travellers in terms too vague and general to afford the basis of a satisfactory description. Dr. Olin seems to have paid most attention to them. Of the gardens near Shechem he says, 'Upon turning an angle in the steep gorge we found ourselves, as if by enchantment, in the midst of fruitful gardens, filled with vegetables, flowers, and fruit-trees, and all in the highest perfection of luxuriance and beauty. Olives, vines, acacias, pomegranates, figs, mulberries, and several species of trees which I did not recognise, are crowded together in small enclosures, forming an impenetrable shade as well as an impenetrable thicket, and yet the capabilities of the soil seem not to be overburdened. Each separate tree and plant thrives to admiration, and seems rather to profit than suffer from the thick dark canopy of branches and foliage, which entirely excludes the sun's rays from the tangled huddle of trunks and roots. A beautiful mountain stream runs through the midst of this forest of gardens, in a channel mostly artificial and sometimes covered; but the water often rises into small fountains, and forms several cascades' (Travels in the East, ii. 350). The orange and citron trees which abound in these gardens near Shechem (see Schubert, Reise ins Morgenlande, ii. 116) were probably those not recognised by Dr. Olin, from their not being in fruit at the time of his visit.

The mural paintings of the ancient Egyptians afford us much information respecting their gardens and processes of gardening. But the difference of climate, soil, and produce, in Egypt and Palestine, was too material to justify us in expecting much information from this source respecting the gardens of the Hebrews. As, however, some notions on this head must have been common to both countries, we subjoin the observations of Mr. Wathen on the gardens of Egypt (Arts, &c., of Ancient Egypt, p. 108).

The ancient plans of gardens shew that the Egyptians were not less fond than our ancestors of mathematical figures, straight walks, architectural decorations, and vegetable avenues; and that they as thoroughly entered into the idea of seclusion and safety suggested by enclosures within enclosures. It has been remarked that in some old English places there were almost as many walled compartments without, as apartments within doors; and the same may be said of Egyptian country-houses. This principle of seclusion, and an excessive love of uniform arrangement, are remarkably displayed in the plan of a large square garden given in Professor Rosellini's great work (I Monumenti dell'Egitto). Here—

'Grove nods at grove, each alley has a brother,
And half the platform just reflects the other.'

The royal garden must have formed a most enviable retreat from 'the intolerable day' of an Egyptian summer. The whole was shut in by an embattled wall. On one side a canal runs along just without the walls. In the centre of the enclosure is an oblong walled vineyard; the vines, planted in rows or avenues, are trailed above on trellis-work forming shady arched walks. The space on one side this central vineyard exactly corresponds to that on the other. In each there is a row of palms, an oblong tank with water-fowl, four flower-beds on a lawn, and an open summer-house on the margin overlooking the pool; an oblong walled compartment of trees; a second tank with water-fowl and flowers; and all along within the wall of circuit a row of trees of three kinds in regular alternations. At one end of the garden next the entrance is a building containing apparently one large room, perhaps for the royal entertainments; at the other end or back is a house of three stories, which commanded a view of the whole. This garden, with its sheltered walks, its groves and tanks of water, its seclusion and privacy, reminds us of the 'fair garden' of Joacim at Babylon, with its baths, its deep shady coverts, and its 'privy gate,' in the apocryphal story of Susannah.

'Obelisks and pylons, with flagstaves and streamers, seem to have been occasionally introduced as garden decorations. In the parched climate of Egypt a large supply of water is absolutely necessary for a thriving vegetation; hence tanks and canals form a chief feature in these villa scenes. With rows of palms laden with fruit on their margin, they recall Jeremiah's poetical comparison of 'the man that trusteth in the Lord' to a 'tree planted by the waters, and that spreadeth out her roots by the river, and shall not see when heat cometh, but her leaf shall be green; and shall not be careful in the year of drought, neither shall cease from yielding fruit,' contrasted with 'the man who trusteth in man,' who is 'like the heath in the desert, and shall not see when good cometh; but shall inhabit the parched places in the wilderness, in a salt land and not inhabited' (Jer. xvii. 5-8).—J. GAREB (גָּרֵב, reviler). 1. The name of one of David's worthies (2 Sam. xxiii. 38; 1 Chron. xi. 40). He is called 'the Ithrite' הִיִּתְרִי, i.e., a native of Jathir. The rendering Jethrite, Vulg. ipse Jethrites, qu. son of Jether, is opposed to the punctuation, to the Syr. version (in the former clause of the verse)

גָּרֵב, to the Targ., and to the fact that in notices of this sort it is usually the birth-place and not the descent that is mentioned. The Syr. reads in the latter clause 'Arab from Lachish.'

2. The name of a hill near Jerusalem (גְּרֵבָה, Sept. Bovoul Gariβa, Jer. xxxi. 39). As the root גָּרַב signifies to scratch, and the Syr. גְּרֵבָה is the name for leprosy, this hill is supposed to have been the place to which lepers were sent out of the city.—W. L. A.

GARNETT, JOHN, D.D., successively Fellow of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, and Lady Margaret's preacher; Bishop of Ferns, 1752; Bishop of Clogher, 1758. He died in 1782. His principal work is entitled A Dissertation on the Book of Job, its nature, argument, age, and author; wherein the celebrated text, ch. xix. 25, is occasionally considered and discussed; to which are added four sermons, 4to, Lond. 1749. In this work the author 'contends that the Book of Job is an allegorical drama, designed to represent the fall and restoration of a captive Jew, and with a view to recommend the virtue of patience. The author he supposes to have been Ezekiel, and the period of its production subsequent to the Babylonish captivity.' (Orme, Biblioth. Bib. p. 200). The dissertation is ably written and ingeniously reasoned, but the hypothesis it is designed to support is a mere fancy, and the author adds nothing to our resources for understanding the book to which it relates.—W. GARRISON. This term is used in the A. V. as an equivalent for four Hebrew words, all derived from the same root גָּרַב, or גָּרַב; namely (i.) מְצָבָה; (ii.) מִצֵּב; (iii.) נִצִּיב and (iv.) מִצְבָּה. As to the correctness of so rendering the first and second, there has been no difference of opinion. In 1 Sam. x. 5; xiii. 3, נִצִּיב has been thought to mean a memorial pillar or monument (Thenius Exeg. isches Handbuch); but Winer, Gesenius, and Fürst, regard it as synonymous in these passages with מִצֵּב, as appears from comparing 1 Chron. xi. 16 with the parallel passage in 2 Sam. xxiii. 14. It may also be observed that the verb הִצִּיב in 1 Sam. xiii. 3 is very frequently employed in the sense of slaughtering or putting to flight; and, to express the demolition of a pillar, several other words would be more appropriate, such as שָׁרַף, נָחַץ, or עָרַב. The fourth word, מִצְבָּה, translated garrisons in Ezek. xxvi. 11, probably means in that passage pillars; it is very frequently used for idolatrous images, Deut. vii. 5; 2 Kings iii. 2; x. 27, etc., but never for garrisons.—J. GATAKER, THOMAS, B.D., son of Thomas

Gataker, rector of St. Edmund's, Lombard Street, was born in London, Sept. 4, 1574. In 1611 he was appointed to the rectory of Rotherhithe, having filled for ten years previously the office of preacher to the society of Lincoln's Inn. He was a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, and was held in high esteem by his contemporaries for his great learning. He died July 27, 1654. While at Lincoln's Inn he preached a series of sermons upon the use and abuse of lots, and upon the kindred topics of games of chance and divination. The substance of these he subsequently published under the title, A Discourse of the Nature and Use of Lots, a treatise historical and theological, Lond. 1619, 4to. His more important literary labours were undertaken at a later period of his life, and after he had become incapacitated by illness for the discharge of his pastoral duties. Amongst these were—1. Annotations on Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Lamentations, included in the so-called Assembly's annotations, and of which it is by far the most valuable portion. It forms nearly one-fourth of the entire work. 2. De Novi Instrumenti Stylo Dissertatio, Lond. 1648, 4to, which in form is a criticism of the treatise of Seb. Pfochen entitled Diatrise de lingua Græcæ N. T. puritate, and in matter is a defence of the views of the Hebraists against those of the Purists. Bound up with this volume is a translation into Latin of the Jerusalem Targum on the Pentateuch by Francis Tayler, which was published at Gataker's instigation, and has his commendation prefixed. 3. Cinnus, sive Adversaria miscellanea, Lond. 1651, 4to. This contains two only out of the six books which it was the author's intention to publish 'Deo favente.' A further portion was published after his death by his son Charles Gataker, and the nature of the work is sufficiently set forth in the title of this volume, Adversaria Miscellanea in quibus [sic] Sacra Scriptura primò deinde aliorum Scriptorum locis aliquam multis Lux redditur, Lond. 1659, fol. The last three works are included in an edition of Gataker's critical works published by Hermann Witsius, T. Gatakeri Opera Critica, Traj. ad Rhen. 1698, fol.—S. N.

GATAM (גַּתָּם, Ga'tam; Sept. Γαθῶμ; Alex. Γαθῶμ, Γαθά), a descendant of Esau and head of one of the Edomitic tribes, or the name of the (tribe itself Gen. xxxvi. 11-16). Fürst derives the word from גָּתַם and גַּי, and translates it burnt or parched vale, regarding the tribe as taking its designation from its locality. Gesenius identifies it with the Arab. جَعْتَم, puny or thin one. Knobel, referring to the LXX. representation of the word, compares it with جَدَام jodham, the name of a tribe inhabiting the Hisma, a part of Mount Sherah. The omission of the y is an objection to this, but not a fatal one, as this sometimes takes place (Gesen. Thes. p. 976). Rodiger (Ibid. iii. 80) cites from Ibn Duraid, جَعْتَم, jethamah, as the name of an Arab tribe.—W. L. A.

GATE, DOOR (שַׁעַר; Chald. תַּרְוָה; Sept. πύλη, αὐλή, ὑπά; גַּת, דֶּלֶת, valve or folding-door; דְּלָתִים, folding-doors or gates; פֶּתַח, an opening, a door, θύρα, πύλη; סוֹף, sill or threshold, αὐλή, σταθμός), the entrance to enclosed grounds, buildings, dwell ing-houses, towns, etc. Thus we find mentioned—

 1. Gates of cities, as of Jerusalem, its sheep-gate, fish-gate, etc. (Jer. xxxvii. 13; Neh. i. 3; ii. 3; vii. 3); of Sodom (Gen. xix. 1); of Gaza (Judg. xvi. 3). 2. Gates of royal palaces (Neh. ii. 8). 3. Gates of the Temple. The temple of Ezekiel had two gates, one towards the north, the other towards the east; the latter closed (Ezek. xliv. 1, 2), the other must have been open. 4. Gates of tombs (Matt. xxvii. 60). 5. Gates of prisons. In Acts xii. 10, mention is made of the iron gate of Peter's prison (xvi. 27). Prudentius (Illeptorep. Hymn. v. 346) speaks of gatekeepers of prisons. 6. Door (opening) of a cavern (1 Kings xix. 13). 7. Gates of camps (Exod. xxxii. 26, 27; see Heb. xiii. 12). The camps of the Romans had generally four gates; of which the first was called porta prætoris, the second decumana, the third principalis dextra, the fourth principalis sinistra (Rosin. Antiq. Rom. x. 12; Liv. iii. 5; x. 32; xl. 27). The camp of the Trojans is also described as having had gates (Virgil, Æn. ix. 724).

We do not know of what materials the enclosures and gates of the temporary camps of the Hebrews were formed. In Egyptian monuments such enclosures are indicated by lines of upright shields, with gates apparently of wicker, defended by a strong guard.

267. Egyptian Camp-gate.

GATES OF TOWNS.—As the gates of towns served the ancients as places of security [FORTIFICATIONS], a durable material was required for them, and accordingly we find mentioned—1. Gates of iron and brass (Ps. cvii. 16; Is. xlv. 2; Acts xii. 10). It is probable that gates thus described were, in fact, only sheeted with plates of copper or iron (Faber, Archeol. p. 297); and it is probably in this sense we are to interpret the hundred brazen gates ascribed to the ancient Babylon. Thevenot (Voyage, p. 283) describes the six gates of Jerusalem as covered with iron: which is probably still the case with the four gates now open. Other iron-covered gates are mentioned by travellers, such as some of the town gates of Algiers (Pitt's Letter, viii. p. 10), and of the towers of the so-called iron bridge at Antioch (Pococke, vol. ii. pt. 1, p. 172). The principal gates of the great mosque at Damascus are covered with brass (Maundrell, p. 126). Gates of brass are also mentioned by Hesiod (Theog. 732), by Virgil (Æn. ii. 480-81), and by Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 3), and of iron by Plautus (Pers. iv. 4, 21).

2. Gates of stone, and of pearls, are mentioned in Is. liv. 12, and Rev. xxi. 21, which, it has justly been supposed, refer to such doors, cut out of a single slab, as are occasionally discovered in ancient countries. At Essouan (Syene), in Upper Egypt, there is a granite gateway bearing the name of Alexander, the son of Alexander the Great (Wilkinson, iii. 403). The doors leading to the several chambers of the so-called 'Tombs of the Kings,' near Jerusalem, were each formed of a single stone seven inches thick, sculptured so as to resemble four panels: the styles, muntins, and other parts were cut with great art, and exactly resembled those of a door made by a carpenter at the present day—the whole being completely smooth and polished, and most accurate in their proportions. The doors turned on pivots, of the same stone of which the rest of them were composed, which were inserted in corresponding sockets above and below, the lower tenon being of course short. This is one of the modes in which heavy doors of wood are now hung in the East. One of these doors was still hanging in Maundrell's time, and 'did not touch its lintel by at least three inches.' But all these doors are now thrown down and broken (Monconys, p. 308; Thevenot, p. 261; Pococke, ii. 21; Maundrell, sub March 28th; Wilde, ii. 299; Robinson, i. 530). Similar doors are described by Dr. Clarke (Travels, pt. ii. vol. i. p. 252) in the remarkable excavated sepulchres at Telmessus, on the southern coast of Asia Minor; and others were noticed by Irby and Mangles (Travels, p. 302) in the sepulchres near Bysan (Bethshan). There are stone doors to the houses in the Haouran beyond the Jordan (Burckhardt, p. 58); and the present writer has repeatedly seen in the north of Persia the street doors of superior houses composed of a single slab of a kind of slate. In the ancient sepulchre recently discovered, as described by Dr. Wilde (Narrative, ii. 343), the outer door is formed by a single slab, and moves on horizontal pivots that run into sockets cut in the pilasters at the top, in the manner of a swinging hinge.

3. Gates of wood.—Of this kind were probably the gates of Gaza (Judg. xvi. 3). They had generally two valves, which, according to Faber's description (Archeol. p. 300), had sometimes smaller doors, or wickets, to afford a passage when the principal gate was closed—a fact which he applies to the illustration of Matt. vii. 13.

Gates were generally protected by some works against the surprises of enemies (Jer. xxxix. 4). Sometimes two gates were constructed one behind another, an outer and inner one; or there were turrets on both sides (2 Sam. xviii. 24, 33; see Faber's Archeol. p. 301). The gates of the ancients were generally secured with strong heavy bolts and locks of brass or iron (Deut. iii. 5; 1 Sam. xxiii. 7; 1 Kings iv. 13; 2 Chron. viii. 5; Jer. xiv. 2; xlix. 31; Ps. cxlvii. 13). This was probably done with a view to the safety of the town, and to prevent hostile inroads (Harmer's Observations, vol. i. p. 188). The keys of gates, as well as of doors, were generally of wood; and Thevenot observes that gates might be opened even with the finger put into the keyhole—from which Harmer elucidates the passage in the Song of Solomon, v. 4.

The gates of towns were kept open or shut according to circumstances; in time of war they were closed against the inroads of the enemy (Josh. ii. 5), but they were opened when the enemy had been conquered. On festive occasions they were also thrown wide open, to which Ps. xxiv. 7 alludes. This opening of the gates, as well as closing them, was done by means of keys. That near the gates towers were often constructed, serving for defence against attacks of the enemy, may be inferred from Deut. iii. 5; 2 Sam. xviii. 24; Judg. ix. 35, comp. with 52. So Juvenal (Sat. vi. 291) puts the towers of the gates for the gates themselves. Virgil (Æn. vi. 554) represents the infernal gate as having a tower. Enemies, therefore, in besieging towns were most anxious to obtain possession of the gates as quickly as possible (Deut. xxviii. 52; Judg. ix. 40; 2 Sam. x. 8; xi. 23; 1 Kings viii. 37; Job v. 4; Is. xxiii. 7; xxviii. 6); and generally the town was conquered when its gates were occupied by the invading troops (Deut. xxviii. 57; Judg. v. 8). This observation is made also by several Greek and Roman authors (Herodian, Histor. i. 12, sec. 14; Virgil, Æn. ii. 802, seq.) In or near the gates, therefore, they placed watchmen, and a sufficiently strong guard, to keep an eye on the movements of the enemy, and to defend the works in case of need (Judg. xviii. 16; 2 Kings vii. 3; Neh. xiii. 22; see Herodian, Histor. iii. 2, sec. 21; Virgil, Æn. ii. 265 seq., 335).

We read that some portions of the law were to be written on the gates of towns, as well as on the doors of houses (Deut. vi. 9; xi. 20); and if this is to be literally understood, it receives illustration from the practice of the Moslems in painting passages of the Koran on their public and private gates. Various artificial figures and inscriptions were engraved on their gates by the Romans (Virgil, Georg. iii. 26, seq.)

Criminals were punished without the gates (1 Kings xxi. 13; Acts vii. 58), which explains the passage in Heb. xiii. 12. The same custom existed among the Romans (see Plaut. Milit. Glorios. act ii. sc. iv. 6, 7). At Rome executions took place without the Porta Metia or Esquilina. As to the gate through which Christ was led, before his crucifixion, opinions differ; some taking it to have been the dung-gate (Lamy, Apparat. Geograph., c. 13, sec. 3, p. 321); others, following Hottinger (Cipp. Hebr. p. 16) and Godwyn, understand it of the gate of judgment. But for all that concerns the gates of Jerusalem, we must refer to the article JERUSALEM.

Gates are often mentioned in Scripture as places at which were holden courts of justice to administer the law and determine points in dispute; hence judges in the gate are spoken of (Gen. xix. 1; xxiii. 10, 18; xxxiv. 20; Deut. xvi. 18; xvii. 8; xxi. 19; xxv. 6, 7; Josh. xx. 4; Ruth iv. 1; 1 Sam. iv. 18; 2 Sam. xviii. 24; xix. 8; 1 Kings xxii. 10; Job xxix. 7; Prov. xxii. 22; xxiv. 7; Lam. v. 14; Amos v. 12; Zech. viii. 16). The reason of this custom is apparent, for the gates being places of great concourse and resort, the courts held at them were of easy access to all the people; witnesses and auditors to all transactions were easily secured (a matter of much importance in the absence or scanty use of written documents); and confidence in the integrity of the magistrate was ensured by the publicity of the proceedings. There was within the gate a particular place, where the judges sat on chairs, and this custom must be understood as referred to when we read that courts were held under the gates, as may be proved from 1 Kings xxii. 10; 2 Chron. xviii. 9. Apart from the holding of courts of justice, the gate served for reading the law, and for proclaiming ordinances, etc. (2 Chron. xxxii. 6; Neh. viii. 1, 3). We see from Prov. xxxi. 23, Lam. v. 14, that the inferior magistrates held a court in the gates, as well as the superior judges (Jer. xxxvi. 10); and even kings, at least occasionally, did the same (1 Kings xxii. 10, comp. with Ps. cxxvii. 5). The gates at Jerusalem served the same purpose; but for the great number of its inhabitants many places of justice were required. Thus we find that Nehemiah (iii. 32) calls a particular gate of this city the counsel-gate, or justice-gate; which seems to have had a preference, though not exclusive, since courts must have been holden in the other gates also. After the erection of the second temple, the celebrated great Sanhedrim, indeed, assembled in the so-called conclave casura [Gasilth] of the temple; but we find that one of the Synedria of Jerusalem, consisting of twenty-three members, assembled in the east-gate, leading to the court of Israel, the other in the gate looking to the temple mount. The same custom prevails to the present day among other Oriental nations, as in the kingdom of Morocco, where courts of justice are holden in the gate of the capital town (Döpfer, Theatrum panarum, p. 9, sq.) Respecting the Abyssinians and inhabitants of Hindostan, we are likewise assured that they employed their gates for courts of justice. Homer (Iliad, iii. 145, ff.) states of the Trojans, that their elders assembled in the gates of the town to determine causes, and Virgil (Æn. i. 505) represents Dido as dispensing justice at the gates of a temple. We may refer to J. D. Jacobi's Dissert. de foro in portis, Leipzig, 1714, where the custom of holding courts in the gates of towns is explained at large (See also Grævius, Thesaurus Antiq. Roman. tom. x. p. 179.)

In Palestine gates were, moreover, the places where, sometimes at least, the priests delivered their sacred addresses and discourses to the people; and we find that the prophets often proclaimed their warnings and prophecies in the gates (Prov. i. 21; viii. 3; Is. xxix. 21; Jer. xvii. 19, 20; xxvi. 10; xxxvi. 10).

Among the heathen gates were connected with sacrifices, which were offered in their immediate vicinity ; in which respect the hills near the gates are mentioned (2 Kings xxiii. 8). In Acts xiv. 13, the gates of Lystra are referred to, near which sacrifice was offered ; in which passage Camerarius, Dedien, and Heinsius take πυλῶνας to mean the town-gate.

The gate was, further, a public place of meeting and conversation, where the people assembled in large numbers to learn the news of the day, and by various talk to while away the too tedious hours (Ps. lxxix. 12). It was probably with this view that Lot sat under the gate of Sodom (Gen. xix. 1) ; which is more probable than the Jewish notion that he sat there as one of the judges of the city.

Under the gates they used to sell various merchandises, provisions, victuals, e. g., at Samaria (2 Kings vii. 1) ; and for this purpose there were generally recesses in the space under them (see Herodian, vii. 6, sec. 6). The same is stated by Aristophanes (Equit. 1245, ed. Dind.) of the gates of the Greeks. But with respect to the markets at gates, the present writer would note what has often occurred to his own notice in different parts of the East, which is, that the commodities sold at the gates are almost exclusively country produce, animal or vegetable, for the supply of the city, and not manufactured goods, which are invariably sold in the bazaars in the heart of the town. The gate-markets also are only held for a few hours early in the morning.

On an uproar having broken out at Jerusalem, the heads of the people met under the New-gate (Jer. xxvi. 10), where they were sure to find insurgents. The town-gates were to the ancient Orientals what the coffee-houses, exchanges, markets, and courts of law, are in our large towns : and such is still the case in a great degree, although the introduction of coffee-houses has in this and other respects caused some alteration of Eastern man-the palace lounged about ; and where persons having suits to offer, favours to beg, or wishing to recommend themselves to favourable notice, would wait day after day, in the hope of attracting the notice of the prince or great man at his entrance or coming forth (Esth. ii. 19, 21 ; iii. 2).

Gates are put figuratively for public places of towns and palaces. The gates of a town are also put instead of the town itself (Gen. xxii. 17 ; xxiv. 60 ; Deut. xii. 12 ; Ps. lxxxvii. 2).

The gates of death, and of hell, occur in Job xxxviii. 17 ; Ps. ix. 13 ; cvii. 18. Doors and gates of hell are chiefly introduced, Is. xxxviii. 10 ; Matt. xvi. 18 ; Rev. i. 18 ; and the Jews go so far in their writings as to ascribe real gates to hell (Wagenseil, Sota, p. 220). Virgil (Æn. vi. 127) also speaks of the 'atri janua Ditis.' The origin of this metaphorical expression is not difficult to explain ; for it was very common to use the word gates as an image of large empires (Is. xxvi. 2) ; and in pagan authors the abode of departed souls is represented as the residence of Pluto (see Virgil, Æn. vi. 417, sq.) In the passage, then, Matt. xvi. 18, by 'gates of hell' must be understood all aggressions by the infernal empire upon the Christian church.

DOORS OF HOUSES.—Among the ancient Egyptians doors were frequently stained so as to imitate foreign wood. They were either of one or two valves, turning on pins of metal, and were secured within by bars and bolts. Some of the bronze pins have been discovered in the tombs of Thebes, and two of them, after Wilkinson, are figured in No. 270, figs. 2, 3. They were fastened to the wood with nails of the same metal. The stone lintels and floor behind the threshold of the tombs and temples still exhibit the holes in which the pins turned, as well as those of the bolts and bars, and the recess for receiving the opening valves. The folding-doors had bolts in the centre, sometimes above as well as below ; a bar was placed across from one wall to the other ; and in many cases they were secured by wooden locks passing over ners. In capital towns the quidnuncs occasionally sat with the same views near the gate of the royal palace, where also the officers and messengers of the centre (No. 271, fig. 4) at the junction of the two folds. 'It is difficult (remarks Sir J. G. Wilkinson) to say if these last were opened by a key, or merely slid backward and forward like a bolt; but if they were really locks, they were probably upon the principle of those now used in Egypt, which are of wood, and opened by a key furnished with several pins answering to a smaller number that fall down into the hollow movable tongue, into which the key is introduced when they open or fasten the lock.' For greater security they are also occasionally sealed with a mass of clay. This was also a custom of the ancient Egyptians, as appears from Herodotus (ii. 121); from tombs actually so closed at Thebes; and from the sculptures, as in No. 271, fig. 3, where the door is thus closed and sealed. To this custom there is an allusion in Job [CLAY]. At a later period, when iron came into general use, keys were made of that metal, of the shape shewn in No. 270, fig. 4. Of the kind thus indicated were probably the lock and key which fastened the summer-parlour of King Eglon (Judg. iii. 23, 25). In this case Ehud locked the door, and took away the key; but when the servants became alarmed, they easily opened it with another key; which suggests that the lock, as in ancient Egypt or the modern East, was nothing more than a peculiarly constructed open bolt of wood, which the wooden or metal key was adapted to raise and thrust back. The forms of the Egyptian doors may be seen from the cuts. Fig. 1, No. 270, is from a curious ancient model, in the British Museum, of a small ancient Egyptian house, and may serve to shew very clearly how the doors of small houses were formed, hung, and secured. The elegant cornice of the door, fig. 2, No. 271, will not escape observation; fig. 1 is a remarkable instance of a folding-door. The chief entrance to houses was through a pyramidal pylon on a projecting porch of columns, whose capitals were often ornamented with ribbons. Over the doorway was sometimes a brief hieroglyphical legend (Wathen, p. 101). This last circumstance reminds one of the writing on their doors recommended to the Israelites, as already noticed.

A comparison of the ancient Egyptian doors with those now used in the East will probably suggest no incorrect notion of the provision among the ancient Hebrews in this respect. A sort of intermediate idea arising from this comparison will be found to furnish very satisfactory illustrations of most of the passages of Scripture which relate to the subject. The present cuts require little explanation. No. 272 is a very usual form of the street-

door of a private house. The inscription on the central compartment is usually painted in white or black. It means, 'He (i.e., God) is the Creator, the Everlasting,' and brings strongly to mind the Hebrew custom to which we have more than once alluded. In No. 273 (fig. 2) is another street-door of a more simple character. Doors are generally unpainted throughout Western Asia and in Egypt. The other doors shewn in the cuts belong to the internal front of the houses, and not to the external frontage or screen. Fig. 2, No. 273, has an open lattice over the door, and the elegant proportion of the whole entrance claims attention. No. 274 shews different forms of common doors, and the whole piece affords an interesting illustration of the basement of an Eastern house, with the stone steps leading to the gallery, into which all the state rooms and family rooms open. In conclusion, we introduce an engraving intended to illustrate the highly-enriched doorways used in ornamental buildings, such as garden-houses, summer-houses, etc.

In the interior of houses it is not unusual, to see curtains instead of doors, especially in summer. This helps to keep the apartment cool, and also enables servants to enter without noise. This custom originated in the use of tents. Accordingly we find that all the entrances of the tabernacle had curtains, although the framework was of wood (Exod. xxvi. 31-33, 36, 37); and even in the temple a curtain or 'vail' formed the separation between the Holy and the Most Holy place.—J. GATH (גַּת; גֶּת and גֶּתֶה). One of the five royal cities of the Philistines (Josh. xiii. 3). It is first mentioned by Joshua as one of the few places in Palestine in which the giant race of Anak were left after the conquest of Palestine (xi. 22). Goliath, the champion of the Philistines, was a Gittite, and of the Anakim (1 Sam. xvii. 18). Another remarkable man of the same race is mentioned in 2 Sam. xxi. 20-22. When the Philistines captured the Ark of the Covenant they carried it first to the temple of Dagon at Ashdod, thence to Gath, and finally to Ekron (1 Sam. v.) Among the most singular episodes in the history of David was his adventure at Gath, whither he fled from Saul. He thought he would not be recognised, and that as a refugee from the Israelitish court he would be welcomed. But he was at once recognised as the conqueror of Goliath, and his fate appeared to be sealed. However, 'he feigned himself mad in their hands,' and acted so successfully that he deceived Achish the king, and was dismissed (xxi. 10, seq.). To this romantic incident we owe one of the most beautiful odes in the Bible, the 56th Psalm. A few years later David returned to Gath, and was well received by prince and people, probably because they were now fully informed of the deadly hostility which existed between him and Saul (xxvii.) He appears to have succeeded in attaching so devotedly to his person and cause some of the brave Gittites, that they ever afterwards constituted part of his body-guard, and were his staunchest friends (2 Sam. vi. 10; xv. 18-22, etc.) When David came to the throne he captured Gath; but it does not appear to have remained in possession of the Israelites (1 Chron. xviii. 1; 1 Kings ii. 39). Gath was the scene of many a fierce contest during his reign and those of his two successors (2 Sam. xxi. 20). It was captured by Hazael, King of Syria, during the reign of Jehoash (B.C. 856). The most signal victory ever gained by the Israelites over the Philistines was under the youthful king Uzziah, who dismantled Gath with their other principal fortresses (2 Chron. xxvi. 1-7). The city appears to have been in ruins in the time of Amos (vi. 2); and with the exceptions of an incidental allusion to it in a proverb (Mic. i. 10), we hear no more of it in history. It is not enumerated by the later prophets with the other royal cities of Philistia (Zeph. ii. 4; Zech. ix. 5, 6).

The site of Gath has long been a subject of difficulty and controversy among sacred geographers. Its exact position is not indicated in Scripture. There are, however, some incidental references which point with tolerable definiteness to the district in which it must have stood. From its having been the scene of such frequent contests between the Israelites and Philistines, we conclude that it lay upon the border; that is, in the plain, close to the foot of the hills of Judah. This is corroborated by the words of 1 Sam. vii. 14; 'The cities which the Philistines had taken from Israel were restored from Ekron unto Gath.' The former city we know was upon the north-east border of Philistia; and Gath was thus farther south, on the border also. Again, in 1 Chron. viii. 13 it is said that 'Beriah and Shemah were the heads of the inhabitants of Aijalon, who drove away the inhabitants of Gath.' Aijalon lay at the foot of the mountains near the north-east angle of Philistia; and it would seem that Gath was not far distant from it. In 2 Chron. xi. 8, Gath is mentioned in connection with Shochoh and Adullam, which were a few miles south of Bethshemesh. Josephus places Gath within the tribe of Dan, which did not extend much south of Bethshemesh (Antiq. v. 1. 22; Josh. xx. 40). We may also infer that it lay on or near the road leading from Shochoh to Ekron; for when the Philistines fled on the death of Goliath, Saul pursued them by 'the way of Sharaim, even unto Gath and unto Ekron'—the same way led to both cities (1 Sam. xvii. 52).

These various notices point to one district as that in which Gath must have been situated—namely, to the confines of Philistia, lying north-west of Shochoh, and south-west of Bethshemesh. There is, however, one very distinct statement of Jerome which appears to be altogether at variance with this view. In his commentary on Micah he says, 'Geth una est de quibus Pales-tinæ, vicina Judææ confinio, et de Eleutheropoli euntibus Gazam, nunc usque vicus vel maximus' (Opp. v. 1159, Migne's edition). This would locate it on the extreme south of the Philistines' territory. But in another place Jerome writes:— 'Ostenditur vicus (Geth) in quinto milliario ab Eleutheropoli euntibus Diospolim' (Onomast. s. v. Gath); and to the same effect he writes in his note on Jer. xxv. 20 (Opp. iv. 838). Bonfrerius suggests that there were several places of the same name, and this may account for the discrepancies. Eusebius mentions a Gath (or Γεθθά), between Antipatris and Jamnia (Onomast. s. v.); and the Crusaders identified Gath with Jamnia (Gesta Dei, p. 886). Thomson (The Land and the Book, p. 565) tries to shew that Gath was the ancient name of Eleutheropolis; but his arguments are far from being conclusive.

The writer of this article made a journey to Philistia in 1858, one object of which was to identify, if possible, the site of this ancient city. After a careful examination of the country, he was led to the conclusion that Gath stood upon the hill called by the Crusaders Alba Specula, and now Tell es-Safeh. Its position answers in every respect to the notices above referred to. It is about seven miles from Bethshemesh, eight from Shochoh towards Ekron, and six north of Eleutheropolis. The site is a most commanding one, and would form, when fortified, the key of Philistia. It is close to the mountains of Judah. The Tell is about 200 feet high, with steep sides, now in part terraced for vineyards—Gath signifies a 'wine-press.' On the summit are the foundations of an old castle, probably that built, or rebuilt, by the Crusaders; and all round the hill are great quantities of old building stones. On the north-east is a projecting shoulder, and the declivities below it appear to have been scarped. Here stands the modern village. Its houses are all composed of ancient materials, and around it are ruins and fragments of columns. In the sides of the hill, especially towards the south, a great number of cisterns have been excavated in the limestone rock. They are generally large square chambers with circular openings about three feet in diameter. There can be little doubt that this is the site of the long lost city of Gath (Handbook for S. and P., 252; See Reland, Pal. 785).—J. L. P.

GATH-HEPHER (גַּת הַחֶפְרִי, Gath-hahepher; Sept. Γαθαχέφρ); also written (in Josh. xix. 13) Githah-hepher (גִּיתָה הַחֶפְרִי, with ה local; Sept. Γεθθαέφρ), a town on the north-eastern border of Zebulun, situated between Japhia and Ittah-kazin (Josh. xix. 13). There is only one other reference to it in Scripture, where Jonah the prophet is said to be 'the son of Amittai, of Gath-hepher' (2 Kings xv. 25). A very clear topographical notice of Jerome in his preface to the book of Jonah, connected with a local tradition, enables us to identify this ancient town. Jerome says, 'Porro Geth in secundo Saphorim milliario, quæ hodie appellatur Diocæsarea, euntibus Tyberiadem haud grandis est viculus, ubi et sepulchrum ejus ostenditur' (Opp. v. p. 1118, Migne's edition). About three miles north-east of Nazareth, and nearly the same distance east of Sepphoris, stands the little village of Mashhad. It is on the top of a rocky hill, and is divided by a wady from Kefr Kenna, the traditional Cana of Galilee. Beside it is an old tomb, said by both Muslims and Christians to be that of Jonah the prophet. The name Mashhad is always given in Syria to the tomb or shrine of a saint or prophet, where people are accustomed to assemble for worship, and this may probably have supplanted the ancient name Gath-hepher. (See Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 425; Robinson, B. R. ii. 350).—J. L. P.

GATH-RIMMON (גַּת רִמּוֹן; Sept. Γεθρεμμών). 1. A town of Dan, apparently situated in the northern part of the plain of Philistia. It was one of the cities allotted out of that tribe to the Levites (Josh. xix. 45; xxi. 24; 1 Chron. vi. 69). Both Eusebius and Jerome describe it as, in their day, a large village, twelve miles from Diospolis (Lydda), on the road to Eleutheropolis (Onomast. s. v. Gethremmon). Robinson suggests that it may be identified with the town of Geth, which Jerome places five miles from Eleutheropolis on the way to Diospolis, and with the modern village of Deir Dubban, where there are some remarkable caverns (Bib. Res. ii. 67; Onomast. s. v. Geth). Deir Dubban, however, is more than twenty miles from Lydda, and is consequently much too far south for either the notices of the Bible, or the statement of Jerome. The site of Gath-Rimmon has not yet been discovered. It must be sought for near the base of the mountains east of Ramleh.

2. Another town of the same name (but in the Sept. Γεθαθά, Alex. Βαθαθά), is mentioned in Josh. xxi. 25. It was assigned out of the tribe of Manasseh to the Levites. The parallel passage in 1 Chron. vi. 70 reads בלעם instead of גַּת רִמּוֹן; and some have hence inferred that the latter is an error, having crept into the text through oversight from the preceding verse (See Keil on Joshua, in loc.; Winer, Realwörterbuch, s. v.) It is much more probable, however, that these were both names of one place. In a wine producing country it was natural to give the name Gath, 'wine-press,' to a number of places. Bileam, or Ibleam, was situated in the plain of Esdraelon near Megiddo (IBLEAM).—J. L. P.

GAULONITIS. [GOLAN.]

GAZA, or AZZAH (עֲזָא; Sept. Γαζά), one of the most ancient towns of Palestine, and the capital and stronghold of the Philistines. It is situated in a sandy plain three miles from the sea, on the southern frontier of Palestine, in lat. 31° 29', and long. 34° 33' (Van de Velde, Memoir, 66).

Gaza was an important city even before the time of Abraham. We are told in Gen. x. that the border of the Canaanites 'was from Sidon, as thou comest to Gerar, unto Gaza.' Its earliest inhabitants of whom we find any mention, though probably not the aborigines, are the Avim, who appear to have lived in a semi-nomad state, roving over the neighbouring plain and desert. They were attacked and driven northward by 'the Caphtorim, who came forth out of Caphtor, and they dwelt in their stead' (Deut. ii. 23, with Josh. xiii. 2, 3. See Keil's note on the latter passage). The Caphtorim and Philistines were identical, or at least different families of the same tribe who afterwards amalgamated and formed the powerful nation of whom we read so much in the Bible (comp. Deut. ii. 23; Amos ix. 7; Gen. x. 14; Jer. xlvii. 4). CAPHTORIM; PHILISTINES). The time of the conquest of Gaza by the Philistines is not known. It must have been long before Abraham's time; for they were then firmly established in the country, and possessed of great power (Gen. xxi. 32). Gaza was from the first their principal stronghold.

It was the key of Philistia, and was exposed to the attack of every hostile invader from Egypt, and from the warlike Amalekites who roamed over the desert of Tih. Gaza formed the limits of Joshua's conquests on the south-west. Whether he captured the city itself is uncertain, though it would seem from chap. xi. 22 that he did not. Both city and territory fell to the lot of Judah, and were taken by that powerful tribe; but the Philistines even at that remote period had chariots of iron, and the Israelites were unable to withstand the assaults of these in the open plain, and were thus forced to retire to the mountains (Judg. i. 18, 19). Gaza never afterwards came into their possession. Gaza is sometimes employed in Scripture to denote the limits of the Israelitish territory in this direction, just as Dan, and Beersheba, and Kadesh were in other directions (Judg. vi. 4; Josh. x. 41, etc.) Samson visited Gaza in one of his adventurous incursions in Philistia. The story of the attempt to imprison him in the city, and his escape, carrying with him 'gate, posts, bar, and all,' is well known. The tradition still lingers on the spot. A venerable Muslem pointed out to the writer the site of Samson's gate, and the hill-top to which he carried it. There can be little doubt that the latter is correct. It is the highest point of a ridge of hills, a mile east of the town, and commands a wide view over the whole plain away to the distant mountains that encircle Hebron (Judg. xvi. 1, seq.). It was to Gaza the Philistines took Samson when Delilah betrayed him; and the tragic close of his eventful life has given to the city an imperishable fame. Gaza was always included in those terrible judgments pronounced by the later prophets on the great cities of Philistia; and which are deserving of such special notice from the remarkable minuteness with which they have been fulfilled (See Keith on the Prophecies, 37th ed.; Handbook for Sin. and Pal.) 'Baldness is come upon Gaza' (Jer. xlvii. 5); 'I will set a fire upon the walls of Gaza, which shall devour the palaces thereof' (Amos i. 7); 'The king shall perish from Gaza' (Zech. ix. 5). A single glance at the modern town is sufficient to shew how completely its glory, and its power, and its strength, have departed.

After the capture of Tyre, Alexander the Great besieged Gaza. It must have been at that time a place of great strength, for his Greek engineers acknowledged their inability to invent engines of sufficient power to batter its massive walls. Alexander himself was severely wounded in a sortie of the garrison; and it was only after a five months' siege the city was taken (Arrian, Exped. Alexand. ii. 26, 27; Quintus Curt. iv. 6, 7). Strabo states that Alexander destroyed Gaza, and that it remained deserted until his day (Geogr. xvi. p. 522). This however is an error, for the city is often referred to during the wars of the Maccabees. It was visited by Jonathan, and successfully withstood his assault, though he did it much damage (1 Maccab. xi. 61). It remained during these troublous times the principal fortress of southern Palestine (xiii. 43; Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 5. 5). About B.C. 96 it was captured by Alexander Jannæus after a year's siege, and razed to the ground (Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 13. 3). Gabinius, governor of Syria, rebuilt it (xiv. 5. 3); and Augustus gave it to Herod the Great; but at his death it was annexed to the province of Syria (xv. 7. 3; xvii. 11. 4). About A.D. 65 Gaza was laid in ruins by the Jews, in revenge for the massacre of their brethren in Cæsarea (Bell. Jud. ii. 18. 1). It soon recovered again; and was one of the chief cities of Syria during the reigns of Titus and Adrian (Reland, p. 797; Robinson's B. R., ii. 41).

In the N. T. there is only one reference to Gaza, and it has given rise to much controversy. The angel said to Philip: 'Arise, and go toward the south, unto the way which goeth down from Jerusalem unto Gaza, which is desert'—ἀπὸ τῆς ἑρμῆς (Acts viii. 26). The pronoun ἑρμῆς may either relate to ὁδὸν (way) or to Gaza. If the former, then it is the way which is 'desert'; if the latter, it is the city. If we apply it to the city it is difficult to reconcile the statement with the facts of history; except we regard the phrase 'which is desert' as a parenthetic explanation of Luke's, written soon after the destruction of Gaza by the Jews in A.D. 65. Some refer ἑρμῆς to the ancient city destroyed by Alexander, and affirm that the new city occupied a different site. This, however, affords no real solution of the difficulty, for the two sites could not have been so far apart that it became necessary for the angel to specify which was meant (See Alford, in loc.) Whatever may be said about the removal of the city from one site to another, there can be little doubt that the words ἀπὸ τῆς ἑρμῆς were intended to describe the road on which Philip should find the eunuch. There were then, as now, several roads leading from Jerusalem to Gaza. Two traversed the rich plain of Philistia; but one ran to Beit Jibrin, and thence direct through an uninhabited waste to Gaza. The note of Dr. Robinson on the point is most important:—'When we were at Tell-el-Hasy, and saw the water standing along the bottom of the adjacent wady, we could not but remark the coincidence of several circumstances with the account of the eunuch's baptism. This water is on the most direct route from Beit Jibrin to Gaza, on the most southern road from Jerusalem, and in the midst of the country now 'desert,' i.e., without villages or fixed habitations' (B. R. ii. 515).

Though Christianity was early introduced to Gaza, the city long remained a stronghold of idolatry. In the beginning of the 5th century its bishop received authority to demolish its temples, and build a large Christian Church (Sozomon, H. E. ii. 5). In A.D. 634, Gaza was taken by the Muslims; its splendid church turned into a mosque (Elmakin, Hist. Saracen. cap. ii. p. 20). From this period it gradually declined under the blight of Islamism; and the Crusaders found it deserted. They built a castle on the hill, which became the nucleus of a new town (William of Tyre, xvii. 12).

The modern town is called Ghuzzeh, and contains about 15,000 inhabitants. It resembles a cluster of large villages. The principal one stands on the flat top of a low hill, and has some good stone houses, though now much dilapidated. The others lie on the plain below; their houses are mean mud hovels, and their lanes narrow and filthy. The hill appears to be composed in a great measure of the accumulated ruins of successive cities. We can see fragments of massive walls, and pieces of columns cropping up everywhere from the rubbish. The great mosque crowns the hill; and can be distinguished in the distance by its tall minaret and pointed roof. The town has no walls or defences of any kind. Its inhabitants have been long known as a fierce and lawless set of fanatics. Between Gaza and the sea there is a broad belt completely covered with mounds of drifting sand. A mile east of the town a long ridge of low hills runs parallel to the coast line. Between the sand and the hills the ground is very fertile, and supplies the town with abundance of the choicest fruit and vegetables. A large olive grove covers the section to the northward; while orchards of fruit and palm trees encompass the suburbs.

Some have affirmed that ancient Gaza stood nearer the sea than the modern town, and that the site was changed after the destruction of the city by Alexander. Traces of ruins have been discovered at various places among the sandhills to the west, which are supposed to be those of primeval Gaza. There is nothing improbable in this theory; though the proofs of it are not conclusive, and it is not necessary to a sound interpretation of any prophecy or statement in Scripture. The ruins among the sandhills may be accounted for by the fact that Gaza had a harbour, at which a town called Mujma stood; and there would be buildings of various kinds on the road between the two. GAZAM (𐤂𐤆; Sept. καμμη; Vulg. eruca);

Joel. i. 4; ii. 25; Amos iv. 9; in all which the A. V. renders by palmerworm. Bochart observes that the Jews derive the word from 𐤂𐤆 or 𐤂𐤏, 'to shear' or 'clip,' though he prefers 𐤂𐤏 'to cut,' because, he observes, the locust gnaws the tender branches of trees, as well as the leaves. Gesenius urges that the Chaldaic and Syriac explain it as the young unfledged bruchus, which he considers very suitable to the passage in Joel, where the 𐤂𐤏 begins its ravages before the locusts; but Dr. Lee justly remarks that there is no dependence to be placed on this. Gesenius adds that the root 𐤂𐤏 in Arabic, and the Talmud, is kindred with 𐤂𐤏𐤃, 'to shear'—a derivation which, however, applies to most species of locusts. Michaelis follows the Sept. and Vulg., where the word in each most probably means the caterpillar, the larvæ of the lepidopterous tribes of insects (Suppl. ad Lex., p. 290, compared with Recueil de Quest., p. 63). We have, indeed, the authority of Co'mella, that the creatures which the Latins call erucæ, are by the Greeks called καμμαι, or caterpillars:—'Animalia quæ a nobis appellantur erucæ, græcè autem καμμαι nominantur' (xi. 3); which he also describes as creeping upon vegetables and devouring them. Nevertheless, the depredations ascribed to the 𐤂𐤏 in Amos, better agree with the characteristics of the locust, as, according to Bochart, it was understood by the ancient versions. The English word 'palmerworm,' in our old authors, means properly a hairy caterpillar, which wanders like a palmer or pilgrim, and from its being rough, called also 'beareworm' (Mouffet, Insectorum Theatrum, p. 186).

GAZARA (ἡ Γάζα; τὰ Γάζα; Gazara), the name of a town of importance in the history of the wars of the Maccabees. Its site is placed near Azotus (Γάζα ἐπὶ τῶν ὁρίων Ἀζώτου, 1 Maccab. xiv. 34), and it is nearly always mentioned in connection with Joppa and Jamnia (1 Maccab. xiv. 34, xv. 28, 35; iv. 15; Joseph. Antiq. xii. 7. 4; xiii. 6, 6; 9. 2; Bell. Jud. i. 2. 2). The Gaza in 1 Maccab. (xiii. 43) and the Gadara in Josephus (Antiq. v. 1. 22; xii. 7. 4) should doubtless be read Gazara (cf. Prideaux, Connection, lib. iv. p. 267, note; Reland, Palest., s. v. Gadara). It may perhaps be identified with the Gadaris of Strabo (xvi. 2, Didot, ed., p. 646), also described by him as a town not far from Azotus (Reland, Palest. l. c.; Cellarius, Geog., vol. ii. p. 530). Gazara was the scene of many battles in the Maccabæan period, and was alternately possessed by each of the opposing parties. When Gorgias, general of Antiochus Epiphanes, was defeated by Judas Maccabæus, his forces were pursued 'unto Gazara, and unto the plains of Idumæa, and Azotus, and Jamnia' (ἐως Γάζαν, etc., 1 Maccab. iv. 15; μέχρι Γαδάρων, etc., Joseph. Antiq. xii. 7. 4); Nicanor was also defeated by Judas, and pursued from 'Adasa to Gazara' (εἰς Γάζα, 1 Maccab. vii. 45). After the defeat of the Idumæans, Judas went against Timotheus, who fled to Gazara for refuge. Judas, after several days' siege took the city (2 Maccab. x. 32-37; cf. Joseph. Antiq. xii. 8. 1-4); many of its towers were burnt, and Timotheus himself killed (2 Maccab. l. c.). When Bacchides returned to Jerusalem, after the defeat of Jonathan, he fortified several cities, and among them Bethsura and Gazara, and the tower (ἄκρη) of Jerusalem (1 Maccab. ix. 52; Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 1. 3), and it was again fortified by Simon, when it had been recovered by the Jews (1 Maccab. xiv. 7, 33, 34; Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 6, 6; Bell. Jud. i. 2. 2). Simon built himself a house at Gazara, and also made it the abode of his son John, the captain of all his hosts (1 Maccab. xiii. 53; xvi. 1, 19, 21). It is described as being 'a very strong hold' (ὀχύρωμα, 2 Maccab. x. 32; Γάζα . . . ὅσαν ὀχυρὰν φύσει, cf. Joseph. Antiq. viii. 6. 1). Gazara is mentioned with Joppa in the treaty of friendship between Hyrcanus and the Romans after the death of Antiochus VII., Sidetes, B.C. circa 128-9 (Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 9. 2; cf. Clinton, F. H. iii. 332).

It is mentioned by Eusebius (Onomasticon, s. v. Γάζα) as being four miles from Nicopolis [EMMAUS], but it was more probably nearer the sea-coast, as in the Maccabees and Josephus it is nearly always coupled with Joppa, Azotus, and Jamnia (see passages above cited), and again in distinct language as bordering upon Azotus. (1 Maccab. xiv. 34). It appears to have been the same place with GAZER or GEZER, a town frequently mentioned in the O. T. As David chased the Philistines from Geba to Gazer (2 Sam. v. 25; 1 Chron. xiv. 16; ἀρχὴ πλῆθους Γαζάρων, Joseph. Antiq. vii. 4. 1), so Judas defeated Gorgias at Emmaus and pursued him to Gazara (1 Maccab. iv. 15). Pharaoh, the father-in-law of Solomon, took Gazer (Γεζάρ, 1 Kings ix. 16; Γάζα, 17), then a Canaanitish city, burnt it, slew the Canaanites that were in it, and gave it in dowry to his daughter, Solomon's wife (1 Kings, l. c.; Γεζάρ, LXX., Josh. xvi. 10; cf. Judges i. 29; Γαζάρὰ τὴν τῆς Παλαιστίνης χώρας ὑπάρχουσαν, Joseph. Antiq. viii. 6. 1). This must have occurred during the reign of David, or early in that of Solomon, and it seems out of the question to suppose that Pharaoh, when the Israelite kingdom was so powerful, could have advanced far into the interior of the country. The site near the sea-coast is therefore confirmed by this circumstance.

Gazara may be identified with the modern village of Yasur, three miles and a half to the east of Joppa, though as a coast-town and a place of strength in the time of the Maccabees, it is unlikely that it should have so entirely lost its importance (cf. Kitto, Palestine, vol. i. p. 695, note). It must however be remembered that names sometimes linger in the neighbourhood of sites.—F. W. M.

GAZELLE. [ANTELOPE.]

GAZER. [GEZER.]

GAZEZ (גָּזֵז; Sept. Γεζουφ), the son of Haran and grandson of Caleb. He is first called the son of Caleb, and then more definitely the son of Haran (1 Chron. ii. 46).—†.

Geba (גֶּבָא; Sept. Γαβὰδ). Considerable confusion has arisen from the close similarity in the names of three towns of Benjamin; Geba (גֶּבָא), Gibeah (גִּבְעָה), and Gibeon (גִּבְעוֹן). It would even appear that the names were regarded as interchangeable; for in Judg. xx. 10 and 33, we find Geba where Gibeah is meant, and in 1 Chron. xiv. 16 Gibeon is given instead of Geba (comp. 2 Sam. v. 25; 2 Kings xxiii. 8). Still more confusion has been caused by a want of uniformity in our E. V. Thus the Hebrew גֶּבָא is rendered in different passages Geba (Josh. xxi. 17), Gaba (xviii. 24 גַּבָּע, on account of the pause accent), and Gibeah (1 Sam. xiii. 16; xiv. 5). Geba, Gibeah, and Gibeon, are shewn to be distinct places in Is. x. 29 and Josh. xviii. 24, 25.

The position of Geba is so clearly indicated in several passages of Scripture that we have no difficulty in identifying it with the village of Geba, which stands on the top of a rocky ridge overlooking the whole eastern declivities of the mountains of Benjamin. It is about six miles north of Jerusalem, and a mile south of Michmash. The latter occupies another ridge; and the wild glen of Suweinit separates it from Jeba. Jeba is a small village, and most of its houses are half-ruinous. A few remains of antiquity can be traced in the large bewn stones that appear in the foundations and walls of the modern houses.

The story of Geba is soon told. It was allotted to Benjamin and given to the priests (Josh. xviii. 24). It was held for a time by the Philistines; but Jonathan, the son of Saul, took it; and the Philistines soon afterwards assembled in great force at Michmash (1 Sam. xiii. 3, 16). The Israelites under Saul took up a strong position at Geba. The two armies were separated by the deep ravine called the 'passage of Michmash.' This difficult pass became the scene of Jonathan's daring and successful adventure. Accompanied only by his armour-bearer, he went down into the ravine, clambered up the northern cliff 'on his hands and on his feet,' and attacked the enemy. They were taken by surprise. The shock of an earthquake occurring at the moment increased their terror. Saul from the opposite ridge saw the turmoil, and heard the cries of distress. The Philistines fled in confusion, and were driven from the mountains (1 Sam. xiii. 17-xiv. 23). The writer was greatly struck on visiting Jeba, and crossing the ravine to Michmash, with the minute topographical accuracy of the Scripture narrative (see Handbook for S. and P., 215). Geba lay on the northern border of the kingdom of Judah, and hence we can understand why it was fortified by Asa (2 Kings xxiii. 8; 1 Kings xv. 22). It is one of those towns mentioned by Isaiah in describing the march of Sennacherib on Jerusalem (Is. x.) The topography of the district throws some light on that beautiful passage. When the army reached Michmash they left their baggage there; and the troops, thus disencumbered, were able to cross the ravine and bivouac on the heights of Geba. The town was occupied by the Benjamites after the captivity (Ezra ii. 26). It appears to have been unknown to Eusebius and Jerome (Onomas. s. v. Gaba and Geba; Reland, Pal. 768. sq. See Robinson, B. R. i. 440, sq.; and Stanley, S. and P., pp. 210, 489, sq.)—J. L. P.

GEBAL (גִּבְלָה; Sept. Γεβὰλ), a province only once mentioned in Scripture, and in connection with Moab, Amalek, and the Hagarenes (Ps. lxxiii. 7). This shews that it is distinct from the Gebal of Lebanon (vid. infra). It was evidently situated in the south-eastern border of Palestine; and there can be no doubt that it is identical with Gebalene, a district embracing the northern section of the mountains of Edom. Its name (גִּבְלָה, 'mountain') is descriptive of its character. The Jerusalem Talmud reads Mount Gabla (מֹרֶא הַגְּבָלָה) instead of Mount Seir; so also does the Samaritan in Deut. xxxiii. 2. Seir, however, was the ancient name of Edom; whereas Gebal was only a part of it. Josephus calls it Gobolitis (Γοβολίτις), and Eusebius Gabalene (Γαβαλήνη). These writers, with Jerome and Stephen of Byzant., agree in locating it around or beside Petra (Antiq. iii. 2; Onomast. s. v. Idumaea, Mabarr; Reland, p. 84).

To the accurate observations of Burckhardt and Robinson we are chiefly indebted for our knowledge of this ancient province. The latter says; 'This tract of mountains south of the district of Kerak (the ancient country of Moab), and separated from it by the Wady el-Ahsey, is at the present day spoken of as divided into two districts. The northern bears the name of Gebal, 'mountains,' beginning at Wady el-Ahsey, and terminating towards the south, according to Burckhardt, at Wady el-Shuweir. Yet the southern boundary would seem not to be very definitely assigned; for esh-Shobek, although it lies south of that Wady, was sometimes spoken of to us as belonging to Jebal' (B. R. iii. 154; Burckhardt, Travels in Syr. 410). The chief towns in Gebalene were Tophel, Bozrah, Arindela, and Shobek (the Mons Regalis of the Crusaders). For fuller notice, see IDUMÆA.—J. L. GEBAL AND GIBLITES (גִּבְלָה and גִּבְלִי; Sept. Γαλδθ, Alex. Γαβλὶ Φυλιστινίαι). A very ancient city of Phœnicia, situated on the coast, at the foot of Lebanon, 24 Roman miles north of Beyrout. Joshua speaks of 'the land of the Giblites' (xiii. 5) in such a way as to shew that the territory then attached to the city was large, apparently including the whole ridge of Lebanon north of Sidon. The Giblites were celebrated for their skill in architecture, and they were employed by Solomon in building the temple, probably on the recommendation of Hiram, king of Tyre, whose subjects they were. In 1 Kings v. 18 the word הַגְּבִלִים, 'The Giblites,' is wrongly translated 'stone-squarers.' Ezekiel, in describing the glories of Tyre, says, 'The ancients of Gebal, and the wise men thereof, were in thee thy calkers (xxvii. 9); from which it appears that the Gibletes were also famous as naval architects.

The Greeks changed the name Gebal into Ryblas, Βίβλος (Büβλος, Stephan. Byz.); hence the Septuagint give in 1 Kings v. 18, and Ezek. xxvii. 9, Βίβλος. Among the heathen the town was noted as the birth-place and principal sanctuary of Adonis (Strabo, xvi. p. 520; Lucian, de Dea Syria, c. 6; Reland, 269). In the time of Alexander the Great it possessed a fleet of war vessels (Arrian, Expedit. Alex. ii. 20). It continued to flourish for many centuries (Pliny, H. N. v. 17; Ptolemy, v. 15), and became the seat of a bishop in the early ages of Christianity (Car. S. Paul. Geog. Sacr. p. 293). Under Arab rule it resumed its ancient name, but soon lost all its ancient power and splendour. The modern name Jebeil is the diminutive of the Hebrew Gebal.

Jebeil stands on a spur of Lebanon, close to the shore. Below it is the ancient harbour, now so choked up with sand and ruins as to be only capable of sheltering a few fishing-boats. The old ramparts are in ruins; but the castle or citadel is still an object of special interest. Its substructions are formed of massive bevelled masonry, and afford one of the best specimens of mural architecture extant, well worthy the fame and skill of the ancient Gibletes. Some of the stones are nearly 20 feet long. The traces of a Roman theatre remain; and great numbers of granite columns are strewn through the streets and ruins, and even over the surrounding fields, shewing how splendid the city once was. Now a poor village, of some 600 inhabitants, is its only representative (Maundrell, in Bohn's Early Travels, p. 410; Pococke's Travels, ii. 98; Burckhardt, Trav. in Syr., 179; Bibliotheca Sacra, vol. v., p. 6, seq.; Wilson, Lands of the Bible, ii. 400, seq.)—J. GEBER (גֶּבֶר; LXX. Γαβέρ; Vulg. Gaber; Joseph. Γαβάρης, Antiq. viii. 2. 3), son of Uri, and one of the twelve officers (נְצִיבִים) appointed by Solomon to superintend the supply of provisions for his table and household (1 Kings iv. 7, 19, 27). These officers probably correspond to the twelve שְׂרֵי הָרֵכֶשֶׁת, rulers of the substance, of the preceding reign (1 Chron. xxvii. 25-31), but with a more orderly distribution of service, and an enlarged jurisdiction. It may be inferred from 1 Kings iv. 5, that they were placed under the direction of a superior officer, one of the chief ministers of the king. To each a distinct district was assigned; but we are not told whether they drew their supplies from the royal flocks and demesnes, as appears to have been the case in the reign of David, 1 Chron. xxvii. 31; or from levies on the inhabitants, as is suggested by 1 Sam. vii. 11-17. The district over which Geber presided is described (1 Kings iv. 19) as the country of Sihon, king of the Amorites, and of Og, king of Bashan, that is, the whole of the East-Jordanic division of Palestine. A difficulty has hence arisen in connection with the concluding clause of the verse just cited. As rendered in A. V., it reads, 'and he was the only officer which was in the land'; whereas parts of the same district were assigned to two others of the twelve officers, viz., Ben-Geber, or the son of Geber (whether of this Geber or of some other, is not known), whose head-quarters were in Ramoth Gilead, and Ahinadab, who was stationed at Mahanaim (vv. 13, 14). It is not, however, easy to determine the exact meaning of the clause. As there is nothing in the Hebrew corresponding to the words 'he was,' Abarbanel and others after him have explained the clause, 'there was also a superior officer in the land.' Against this lies the objection, that the inferior officer would be mentioned by name, whilst the superior was nameless, and mentioned only incidentally. The explanation of Grotius appears a better one, 'unus procurator regis in terra quae fuerat duorum regum,' understanding by 'the land,' all the country of Sihon and Og except the parts which had been previously mentioned.—S. N.

GEBIM (הַגְּבִים; LXX. Γιββίμ; Vulg. Gabim), a town or village in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, mentioned only in Is. x. 31. Eusebius (Onomast. Γιββίμ) and Jerome wrongly identify it with Geba, a village five miles from Gophna, on the road to Neapolis. The passage in Isaiah is a vivid description of the approach of the king of Assyria towards Jerusalem, and the several places, as far as they can be identified, are named in the order of their increasing proximity to the city. It is therefore scarcely possible to avoid the conclusion that the same rule applies to the rest, and as Gebim is the last but one in the series, its site must be placed about two or three miles from Jerusalem towards the north-east, between Anathoth (Anāta) and Nob (el-Isawīyeh), (Robinson, B. R., ii. 149, iii. 81). The village appears to have derived its name from its proximity to some wells or cisterns (הַגְּבִים=the wells, see Jer. xiv. 3).—S. N.

GEBIROL [IBN GEBIROL]

GEDALIAH, FAST OF. [FASTS.]

GEDALIAH or GEDALIAHU (גְּדַלְיָהּ, גְּדַלְיָהוּ, God-educated; Sept. Γεδολίας), son of Ahikam, appointed by Nebuchadnezzar governor of Judaea after the destruction of Jerusalem. He was probably of the number of those who quitted the city at the instance of the prophet, justly despairing of the successful defence of a place which God had abandoned. Gedaliah had inherited his father's respect for Jeremiah (Jer. xl. 5, seq.), and was moreover enjoined by Nebuzardan to look to his safety and welfare. Gedaliah was in every way worthy of the difficult post he had to fill; and he adopted as the principle of his conduct that submission to existing circumstances which was requisite in one who believed that Judah had, according to the declared will of God, been justly doomed and punished for her iniquities, and who yet believed that his loving-kindness had not utterly departed from her. He established the seat of his government at Mizpeh in the tribe of Benjamin; and there the Jews, who had fled at the advance of the Chaldean armies, or when the troops of Zedekiah were dispersed in the plains of Jericho, quitting their retreats, began to gather around him. Gedaliah wisely counselled them to submission and quietness; and he promised on that condition to ensure them the undisturbed enjoyment of their possessions, and of the produce of the ground. In this hope the labours of the field were resumed, and the extraordinary returns of that season secured, as if specially given to repa-

the recent injuries of war. But this calm was of short duration. Among those who returned was a member of the royal family, named Ishmael, who had taken refuge with Baalis, king of the Ammonites. He appears to have been irritated at seeing one who was not of the house of David seated upon even the shadow of David's throne; and some of the friends of Gedaliah believed him to be in a plot with Baalis to take away his life. But the noble-minded governor refused to entertain such a suspicion, and rejected with horror the proposal of an over-zealous friend, who offered to assassinate Ishmael. The suspicion which he thus generously repelled was, however, correct. He was murdered in the midst of a repast by this very Ishmael, whom he had received as a friend. This event happened about two months after the destruction of Jerusalem, and by the present ruin of Judæa seemed to be consummated, B.C. 588 (2 Kings xxv. 22-26; Jer. xxxix. 14; xl. 5; xli. 18).—J. K. [Four others of this name are mentioned in the O. T., viz., 1. The son of Jeduthun, who played the harp in the service of God (1 Chron. xxv. 3, 9); 2. A priest in the time of Ezra (Ezra x. 18); 3. The son of Pashur (Jer. xxxviii. 1); 4. The grandfather of Zephaniah the prophet (Zeph. i. 1)].

GEDDES, ALEXANDER, was born in the parish of Ruthven, Banffshire, Scotland, 1737. He was first educated in a private family at Aberdeen, and next at the Roman Catholic seminary of Scalán. At the Scotch College at Paris he studied six years (1758-1764); and returning to his native land became a priest at Dundee, and afterwards in Banffshire. Being suspended by Bishop Hey for liberality, he left Scotland in disgust, and went to London, 1779. The University of Aberdeen, to its honour, conferred on him the title of LL.D. In London he found a generous and kind patron in Lord Petre. He died the 26th February 1802, aged sixty-five.

Geddes published a translation of the O. T. in two volumes 4to, 1792, 1797, containing the books from Genesis to Ruth. In 1800 appeared the first volume of Critical Remarks on the Hebrew Scriptures. Death prevented him from finishing what he had begun. His version of the Psalms, printed as far as Psalm cxviii. at his death, was not published till 1807.

The Bible, as edited by Geddes, contains a new translation, with a corrected text of the original, various readings, explanatory notes, and critical observations. The work itself was preceded by a Prospectus, 151 pages 4to, 1786; by a supplement to the prospectus in the form of a letter to the Lord Bishop of London, 87 pages, 4to, 1787; by a general answer to the queries, counsels, etc., which had been offered to him, etc., 1790. An address to the public, 25 pages 4to, was issued in 1793, in consequence of the severe remarks made upon his work and himself. In 1794 he published a reply to the pastoral letter of the vicars apostolic who had condemned his translation, in the form of a letter to Bishop Douglas, 55 pages 4to. It is necessary to read these pamphlets in order to form a just estimate of the man, and the way in which he was treated.

The work by which he is known shews great learning, taste, and ingenuity. Besides being an excellent Greek and Latin scholar, as numerous publications attest, Geddes was familiar with the Italian, French, German, and Spanish languages. He was well versed in Hebrew, knew the principles of Biblical criticism, and was able to apply them. His character was that of a warm-hearted, independent, honest man, who followed truth, as far as he thought he saw it, with a fearless mind. It is matter of regret that he should have indulged here and there in remarks which betray a levity and scepticism calculated to wound the feelings of others. His own church persecuted him as a heretic. Protestants looked upon him in the same light and stood aloof; or they attacked a man far their superior in attainments. His life was written by Mason Good, 1803, 8vo.—S. D.

GEDEON. [GIDEON.]

GEDER (גִּדְרָה; Sept. Γαδρά), one of the ancient cities of Canaan captured by Joshua (Josh. xii. 13). It appears to be identical with Gederah or Gederothaim (גִּדְרֹתַיִם and גִּדְרֹתַיִם), situated in the Shephelah, and allotted to Judah (xv. 36). It probably stood in or near the valley of Elah, as it is joined with Socoh; but the site has not been identified. It would seem also to be the same place written Gedor (גִּדְרָה) in 1 Chron. iv. 39, and Gederoth (גִּדְרֹתַיִם) 2 Chron. xxviii. 18. Eusebius mentions Gedur (Γεδούρα) a large village ten miles from Diospolis on the road to Eleutheropolis (Onomast. s. v.). This, however, is too far north. It may be that which he speaks of in the region of Aelia (Jerusalem), 'at the Terebinth.' If we interpret this with Raumer 'Vallis Terebinthi,' 'Valley of Elah,' the situation will agree exactly with that of Geder. See, however, Keil on Josh. xv. 36.—J. L. P.

GEDERAH, properly THE GEDERAH (גִּדְרָה; Sept. Γαδρά), a town in the low country of Judah (Josh. xv. 36), probably the place described in the Onomast. (s. v. Gahedur) as 'hodie vocatus Gedrus, vicus pergrandis in decimo milliaro Diospoleos pergentibus Eleutheropolim;' for all the other cities mentioned in the context, the site of which has been discovered, stand between Diospolis and Eleutheropolis. The Gentile name from this is גִּדְרֹתַיִם, Gederathite (1 Chron. xii. 4).—†

GEDEROTH (גִּדְרֹתַיִם; Sept. Γεδρόθ), a city in the plain country of Judah (Josh. xv. 41), and one of those which the Philistines took from king Ahaz (2 Chron. xxviii. 18).—J. K.

GEDEROTH (גִּדְרֹתַיִם; Sept. Γαδρόθ). A town of Judah in the Shephelah, but lying south of the preceding, and probably not far from Eleutheropolis. Josabab the Gederathite was one of David's followers; but he was a Benjaminite, and could scarcely be from this place (1 Chron. xii. 4). The site is unknown.—J. L. P.

GEDEROTHAIM (גִּדְרֹתַיִם), a town in the low country of Judah (Josh. xv. 36). The LXX. regard the word as connected with the preceding word Gederah, and render it by καὶ δι' ἐπαιρέας αὐτῆς. Winer looks on it as an ancient gloss, on the ground that the number of the cities is given as fourteen, whereas, if Gederothaim be reckoned one, the number will be fifteen; but the same discrepancy occurs elsewhere (comp., for a glaring instance, ver. 32), and is best explained by supposing that some names were added by a later hand without a corresponding change being made in the number (Keil on Joshua, p. 379).—†

GEDI (גִּדִּי), the young of the goat, a kid. The name is derived by Fürst from the obsolete verb גִּדָּה, to cast forth, so that it is equivalent to the Latin foetus, but was afterwards restricted to one kind, that of the goat. Gesenius traces it to גִּדָּה, to crop, and supposes the name was given to it from its cropping the herbage. Both etymologies are purely conjectural. The phrase גִּדִּי הָעֵינִים, kid of the goats, is frequently used. The reason of this Kimchi finds in the generic sense of גִּדִּי, as applicable originally to the young either of the sheep or goat, so that it required the addition of הָעֵינִים to specialise its meaning, until it came by usage to denote only the latter. Ibn Ezra thinks the addition was made because the gadi, being yet tender, could not be separated from its mother. The flesh of the kid was esteemed a delicacy by the Hebrews (Gen. xxvii. 9, 14, 17; Judg. vi. 19; xiii. 15, etc.)—W. L. A.

GEDOR (גִּדּוֹר; Sept. Γεδωρ). A town in the mountains of Judah, grouped with Halhul and Bethzur (Josh. xv. 58). Its site is doubtless marked by the ruined village of Gedâr, situated on the top of a bleak ridge, eight miles north of Hebron, and about two west of the road leading to Jerusalem. This was the native place of some of David's followers (1 Chron. xii. 7). It seems doubtful whether it be the Gedor of 1 Chron. iv. 39; for it is there said that some Simeonites 'went to the entrance of Gedor, unto the east side of the valley' (גִּדּוֹר); but there is no valley at Jedûr [GEDER]. See Robinson's B. R., ii. 13; Van de Velde, Memoir, 313.—J. L. P.

GEHAZI (גִּיזַי, vision-valley; Sept. Γεσιζ), a servant of Elisha, whose entire confidence he enjoyed [ELISHA]. He personally appears in reminding his master of the best mode of rewarding the kindness of the Shunamite (2 Kings iv. 14); he was present at the interview in which the Shunamite made known to the prophet that her son was dead, and was sent forward to lay Elisha's staff on the child's face, which he did without effect (2 Kings iv. 31); and when Elisha, with a noble disinterestedness, declined the rich gifts pressed upon him by the illustrious leper whom he had healed, Gehazi, feeling distressed that so favourable an opportunity of profiting by the gratitude of Naamaan had been so wilfully thrown away, ran after the retiring chariots, and requested, in his master's name, a portion of the gifts which had before been refused, on the ground that visitors had just arrived for whom he was unable to provide. Having deposited his spoil in a place of safety, he again appeared before Elisha, whose honour he had so seriously compromised. His master, knowing what had happened, denounced his crime, and passed upon him the terrible doom, that the leprosy of which Naaman had been cured, should cleave to him and his for ever (2 Kings v. 20-27); B.C. 894.

We afterwards find Gehazi recounting to king Joram the great deeds of Elisha, and, in the providence of God, it so happened that when he was relating the restoration to life of the Shunamite's son, the very woman with her son appeared before the king to claim her house and lands, which had been usurped while she had been absent abroad during the recent famine. Struck by the coincidence, the king immediately granted her application (2 Kings viii. 1-6). As lepers were compelled to live apart outside the towns, and were not allowed to come too near to uninfected persons, some difficulty has arisen with respect to Gehazi's interview with the king. Several answers occur. The interview may have taken place outside the town, in a garden or garden-house; and the king may have kept Gehazi at a distance, with the usual precautions which custom dictated. Some even suppose that the incident is misplaced, and actually occurred before Gehazi was smitten with leprosy. Others hasten to the opposite conclusion, and allege the probability that the leper had then repented of his crime, and had been restored to health by his master [LEPERS].—J. K.

GEHENNA. [HINNOM, VALLEY OF.]

GEIER, MARTIN, a Lutheran theologian, was born at Leipzig, April 24th, 1614. He was educated at his native place, and at the universities of Strasburg, Jena, and Wittenberg. In 1639 he became professor of Hebrew at Leipzig, and subsequently pastor, superintendent, and professor of theology. In 1665 he reluctantly removed to Dresden as Oberhof-prediger and Kirchenrath. He died at Freyburg, August 22d, 1681. Geier published a Commentary on the Psalter, 1666, 4to, 2 vols.; on Daniel, 1660, 4to; on Proverbs, 1663, 4to; and on Ecclesiastes, 1665, 4to. De luctu Hebraeorum appeared at Leipzig, 1656, 8vo. These works are now forgotten, having been superseded long ago by briefer and better treatises.—S. D.

GELILOTH (גִּלְלוֹת, pl. of גִּלְלוּת, literally circles or circuits, from the root גָּלַל, to roll). It occurs in the Hebrew Bible five times (the sing. form once besides), twice in reference to the Philistines, Josh. xiii. 2, A. V. 'borders of the Philistines,' LXX. ὅρια Φυλιστινῶν; Joel iv. 3 [A. V. iii. 4], 'coasts of Palestine,' LXX. Γαλιλαία ἀλλοφύλων—where Henderson remarks that the Geliioth 'were properly provinces,' i.e. the five of the Philistines;—twice in relation to the Jordan, Josh. xxii. 10, 11; A. V., 'borders of Jordan,' LXX. Γαλαὰδ τοῦ Ἰορδάνου;—once absolutely, Josh. xviii. 17; where alone the word appears in the A. V.; the border of the tribe of Benjamin 'was drawn from the north and went forth to En-Shemesh, and went forth toward Geliloth, which is over against, גִּלְלוֹת, the going up of Adummim.' The LXX. has here Γαλιλῶθ; the Vulg. tumulos. As in the description of the northern boundary of Judah, which was identical at this part with the south of Benjamin, Gilgal is substituted for Geliioth, with the same specification as over against, גִּלְלוֹת, Adummim (Josh. xv. 7); and as Geliioth never occurs again in this locality (?) it has been concluded by some that Gilgal is the correct reading (See Smith's Dict. of the Bible). But Canon Stanley remarks: 'A place called Geliioth is mentioned (Josh. xviii. 17), which, as far as the imperfect indications of the text allow, seems to be close to the Arabah or Jordan valley' (Sin. and Pal., 489, 3d ed.). The singular form of the word occurs Ezek. xlvii. 8—'These waters flow forth גִּלְלוֹת, towards the circle, or border, the eastern (namely, of the Jordan), and descend on the Arabah, and come to the sea, and having come into the sea, its waters shall even be healed' [ARABAH]. Here we gladly avail ourselves of Dr. Stanley's aid :—'Ciccar and Geliloth. These two curious terms (in the E. V. rendered 'plain,' or region, though occasionally with a wider application), usually denote the Jordan valley, applied respectively to its lower and upper stage. It is tempting to derive this usage (with Reland, p. 274) from the windings of the stream; and it is not, at any rate, impossible that this may have suggested or confirmed the invariable use of 'ciccar' for the circular oasis of Jericho and the five cities. In later times, no doubt, the words were taken merely as provincial terms for 'region,' and as such were translated in the LXX., and in the N. T., ἡ περιχώρος, 'the surrounding neighbourhood' (Sin. and Pal., p. 284). 'Geliloth is distinguished from Ciccar, which will rather mean the circle of vegetation or dwellings, gathered round the bends and reaches of the river. The word may perhaps find an analogy in the Scotch term 'links,' which has both the meanings of Geliloth, being used of the snake-like windings of a stream, as well as with the derived meaning of a coast or shore' (Sin. and Pal., p. 489).—I. GEMARIAH (גמריה, God-perfected; Sept. Ταμπίης), the son of Shaphan, and a scribe of the temple in the time of Jehoikim. Baruch read aloud the prophecies of Jeremiah to the people at the official chamber of Gemariah, which was attached to the new gate of the temple built by king Jotham (Jer. xxxvi. 10; comp. 2 Kings xv. 35). Gemariah's son Michaiah having reported this to his father, Baruch was invited to repeat the reading at the scribes' chamber in the palace, before Gemariah and other scribes and councillors, who gave an account of the matter to the king (Jer. xxxix. 10-26). He also took charge of a letter from Jeremiah to the Jewish captives at Babylon, warning them against the false prophets who deluded them by promises of a speedy return to their own land (Jer. xxix. 3, 4). GEMS. [STONES, PRECIOUS, vol. iii. p. 1171.]

GENEALOGY. A thread of genealogy runs through the Bible, beginning from Adam and ending in Jesus Christ. But while this principal line through God's Providence has been preserved entire, the branches which spread out from it are for the most abruptly cut off, and although we often find several such threads running parallel to each other for a time, their connection with the principal line is often invisible, and their order in many places is tangled and disturbed, so that, generally speaking, we must be content to gather some notion of the genealogy of the Hebrews from a broken and imperfect tissue.

That such an acknowledgment should be made respecting matter contained in the Bible may seem surprising, but the compilation and preservation of genealogical tables is a matter which God has evidently been pleased to leave in the hands of man; as He has invested him with various powers for his personal preservation and comfort, so He has endued him with a disposition to keep a record of the lines of ancestry from which he is descended, and He has made this disposition subservient to His great purpose of mercy towards mankind, by letting it afford proof of the fulfilment of prophecy in the birth of Jesus Christ, but we have no reason to believe that He has made these matters the subject of a special revelation or interfered miraculously to preserve them. If, however, we make allowance for the errors which may have introduced themselves into these records, the occasional ambiguity of their form, and their liability to mutilation and displacement, holding with some of the most pious and respected commentators* that these are things which the Holy Spirit allowed the inspired penman to 'take as he found them,' and if we bring to bear upon them those principles of criticism which we apply to other ancient documents, we may find in their study much to interest and enlighten us.

The subject presents itself to our consideration in two great divisions. The one reaching from the creation to the settlement of Jacob's sons in Egypt, the other from the settlement in Egypt to the birth of Christ.

FIRST DIVISION. The matter of the first division is full and complete, and remarkably confirmed by general history and the present state of the world. But we notice in limine a wide difference between the Septuagint and the Hebrew Bible in one important particular: viz., the length of the generations,† both of the antediluvian and the postdiluvian patriarchs, the Hebrew text making six of the antediluvians, and seven of the postdiluvians, one hundred years younger than the Septuagint at the birth of their respective sons, the effect of which curtailment of the generations is to shorten the whole time from Adam to Terah by 1300 years. Without entering upon the discussion of the question, it may be stated that although the reckoning of the Hebrew Bible is the one adopted in our A. V., the best modern authorities concur with Eusebius and other Fathers of the Church in holding that the Septuagint expresses what was originally recorded by the inspired penman, and that the text of the Hebrew Bible was purposely altered within the first century after the death of Christ. Whatever other reasons there may be for accepting the longer in preference to the shorter generations, there can be no doubt that, viewed with reference to the long lives of the patriarchs, they are the more natural. The longer the life, the longer would be the period of attaining to maturity, and it would seem as unlikely for a man whose natural duration of life was 900 years, to have a son at 90, as for one whose natural duration of life is 80 to have a son at 8. If this principle holds good, the Septuagint account must be preferred, especially in reference to the postdiluvian patriarchs, as the disproportion between their ages at begetting sons, and the length of their lives is still greater, according to the Hebrew text, than in the case of the antediluvians. Viewed in relation to the usefulness of the study of genealogy this is an important consideration, for, if a reasonable time is fixed as the probable length of a generation, it supplies us with a rough but very useful time-measure to settle on the one hand the probable number of years between one event and another, if we know the number of generations between them, or on the other, to form a probable opinion as to the number of generations if we know the number of years.

The fact of highest importance which the Bible records in reference to the antediluvian race, besides the death of Abel, the translation of Enoch, and the inventive genius of the sons of Lamech, is the grand contrast between the families of Seth and of Cain, the one being called children of God, the other children of men—a contrast which runs through the whole history of man, and is the great subject matter of divine revelation. It also gives us the account of the moral degeneracy of the sons of God in consequence of the alliances which they formed with the daughters of men. But we obtain some interesting traditions respecting this time from Arabian and other sources, as, for instance, that the family of Seth, under the name of Egregori or Watchers, inhabited the mountainous regions of Armenia; that Enos, the son of Seth, in whose time men began to call themselves by the name of the Lord (Gen. i. 26, marg.) was a great philosopher and astronomer, and forbade the mixture of his race with that of Cain; that Cainan his grandson was a king, sage, and prophet, who foretold the flood, and left his prophecy written on tables of stone; that Mahaleel, the next in descent, made his children swear by the blood of Abel that they would not descend from their mountainous abode to form alliances with the posterity of Cain, who dwelt in the plains of Chusistan or Susiana, and that about 1070 years after the creation, in the days of Jared, and in spite of his remonstrances, 100 Sethites descended from their hills, and by their union with the female Cainites, became the fathers of that violent and heaven defying race* which was eventually swept away by the deluge.

We have also various statements respecting this early time in the fragments of Sanchoniathon and Berosus. The former, whose writings, however, are of doubtful authenticity, tells us that Genos, the Cain of Scripture, with Genea his wife, used in seasons of drought to raise their hands to the sun as Lord of Heaven, thus indicating the existence among the antediluvians of that idolatrous worship of the heavenly bodies, the revival of which not long after the flood Job regarded with such abhorrence (Job. xxxi. 26). He also speaks of the corruption of manners, the birth of giants, and the adoration of the images of deceased heroes, but takes no notice of the deluge. Berosus, whose authenticity is undoubted, and who drew the materials of his history from archives preserved in the temple of Belus, being himself priest of Belus in the time of Alexander the Great, gives an account of the creation and the early ages of the world corresponding with that of Moses; and after enumerating a dynasty which reigned in Babylonia before the deluge, and which some recognise as the race that sprang from the union of the sons of God with the daughters of men, tells of the building of an enormous ark by the pious Xisuthrus, who, with a few companions, was preserved alive, while the rest of the world perished in the waters. Berosus, like Moses, makes the ark rest after the deluge on the mountains of Armenia, from whence the companions of Xisuthrus descended again by his direction to Babylonia, he himself being taken up to dwell with the gods.

The 10th and 11th chapters of Genesis carry on the patriarchal genealogies from the deluge to the call of Abraham. The first of these chapters, which the reader should have before him in studying this page, is called Toldoth B'nei Noah, a wonderful historical record, which has extorted the admiration of all modern ethnologists, who continually find in it anticipations of their greatest discoveries.

1. For instance, in the first generation of the sons of Japhet, eldest son of Noah, the Iapetus of Greek mythology, we find Gomer, whence the Cimmerii, Cimbri, and Cymry or Welsh, whence also the names Cambria and Cumberland; and according to many great authorities cited by Faber, the whole Celtic race—Magog the probable ancestor of the Moguls—Madai of the Medes—Javan of the Ionians or early Greeks, as well as of the Hindu Yavanas. In this conjunction of the Medes with the Cimbri and the Greeks, we have a sufficient indication of the great discovery of Schlegel, expressed in the word Indo-European, regarding the affinity of the principal nations of Europe with the Aryan or Indo-Persic stock. Tubal has been recognised in Tobolsk, Mesheck in Muscovy and Moscow, Tiraz in Thrace.

The name of Ashkenaz, the eldest son of Gomer, has been traced in Sacagena, or Sacassena (a province of Armenia), whence perhaps Saxons—in the Ascanitici of the Palus Mæotis—in Axenus, the ancient name of the Euxine—in Scandia or Scandinavia—and in Scania, a modern province of Sweden. It may also be observed that Germany is now called Ashkenaz by the Rabbis. Elishah, the eldest son of Javan, may have given his name to Elis, a city of the Peloponnessus, Tarshish to Tarsus of Cilicia, or Tartessus in Spain. The Kittim, or Chittim, were the inhabitants of the coasts of Greece and Italy, the Dodanim were perhaps the Dardani.

2. Ham is the next mentioned son of Noah. It has been usual to consider all his descendants as affected by the curse pronounced on his youngest son Canaan, but neither the facts of history nor the words of Scripture bear out this view. Cush, his eldest son, settled in Ethiopia, from whence his descendants spread through the south of Arabia upwards to Chusistan or Susiana. This, which has always been the traditional belief respecting the descendants of Cush, has received the fullest confirmation from the recently discovered cuneiform inscriptions, which clearly establish an ethnic connection between the Ethiopians or Cushites, who adjoined Egypt, and the primitive inhabitants of Babylonia. The names of the sons of Cush, Seba, Havilah, etc., and of his grandsons Sheba and Dedan, may be traced in Ethiopia, Arabia, and Idumea, and fall in with the discovery that there are two races of Arabs, the one Cushite, which colonised Arabia from Ethiopia, and were known in after ages as the Homerites or Himyerites, the other, as we shall see hereafter, descended from Shem. Cush is also believed to be the progenitor of the Goths, the Scythians, and the Scots. Mizraim, or Mizr, the second son of Ham, was the ancestor of the Egyptians, and, in the names of his sons, Ludim, Ananim, etc., we recognise the inhabitants of various parts of Egypt or the adjoining regions of Africa, following a general direction from the Mediterranean southwards. The most recent opinion respecting the descendants of Phut is that they were the Budii of Herodotus, a distinct Median tribe of Scyth, the Putiyá of the Persian, and the Budu of the Babylonian inscriptions. Among the sons of Canaan we recognize as well the names of places on the coast of Syria as of the tribes with which the people of Israel were brought into conflict after they entered the promised land, and some of them appear to be rather local designations than names of persons. The general direction of these settlements is from south to north.

The only names of men given in the third generation of Ham's posterity are Sheba and Dedan, the sons of Raamah, and the object of naming them, according to Dr. Hales, was to introduce Nimrod, who, he doubts not, was the son of Sheba, and great-grandson of Cush, and supports his opinion by the testimony of Abulfargi. He also supposes the name Nimrod (meaning the rebel), to be a parody on his true name Nin, which we recognise in Ninus and Nineveh, of which he was the builder, according to the marginal reading of Gen. x. 11. He appears to have subdued in succession the descendants of Arphaxad, settled in Babylonia, and the descendants of Asshur, settled in the country which afterwards became the centre of the Assyrian empire. He is considered to be the Orion of Greek mythology, the Belus of history, and the Bala Rama of the Hindus. This coincides with the view taken above of his descent from Raamah.

We also class with this generation the Philistim, said (Gen. x. 14) to have come out of the Casluhim. But they are also said to have come from Caphtor (Amos ix. 7), and are called Caphthorim (Deut. ii. 23). Hence it has been supposed that there may have been a transposition of the words Casluhim and Caphtorim in Gen. x. 14. But there is nothing in any of these passages which implies lineal descent either from Casluhim or Caphthorim, and if the seat of the Casluhim were, as is commonly supposed, to the east of the Isthmus of Suez, the Philistim would necessarily pass through and 'come out of them,' in coming from Caphtor into Palestine. Hales tells us that Palestine in the Sanscrit is Pali-sthan, and signifies shepherd-land, and he argues from Herodotus, Manetho, and the sacred books of the Hindus, that the Philistim were a branch of the Palibothri (the name given by Pliny to the Paliputras of the Hindus), who passed from India through Arabia into Egypt, where they established a dynasty, and were called Hycsos or shepherd-kings, but were eventually expelled a short time before the settlement of Jacob's family in Goshen.

3. The sons of Shem are also enumerated in geographical order, the first named being Elam, who gave his name to Elymais, a district on the Choaspes to the east of the Tigris, whose chief city, Susa, was afterwards the head of the Persian empire. One of his descendants, Chedorlaomer (the Kudur Mabbuk, ravager of the west, of the recently discovered inscriptions), conquered Canaan—Lightfoot says, in reliance on the prophecy which made Canaan the servant of Shem—and was himself conquered by Abraham. Asshur occupied the country which became the nucleus of the Assyrian empire, and the testimony of the inscriptions confirms the reading of the text (rather than the margin) of Gen. x. 11, that Lower Babylonia having been the original seat of Semitic power, it spread northwards and westwards, Asshur going forth out of Shinar to build Nineveh, Abraham passing from Ur by Charran into Syria. Arphaxad occupied the plain of Shinar east and west of the Tigris. Bochart recognises the name in the Assyrian district of Arrapachitis. Josephus says the Chaldees were anciently called after him Arphaxadeans (i. e., their old name Chasdim is derived from the final letters of Arpachshad).^{*} This appears more reasonable than to derive their name from Chesed, the nephew of Abraham. Lud is supposed to have given his name to Lydia; Aram certainly gave his to the high table-land extending eastward from the Jordan to the Euphrates, which was afterwards the seat of the kingdom of Syria. His son Uz was the founder of Damascus, and Gether is supposed to be the father of the Itureans.

The 11th chapter of Genesis gives the lineal descent of the patriarchs from Shem to Abraham. In this line the LXX. inserts a second Cainan between Arphaxad and Sala. Here, however, the Hebrew text is generally preferred, though that of the LXX. is adopted by St. Luke. In the days of Peleg, fourth in descent from Shem, 'the earth was divided' by that great migratory movement which took place in consequence of the confusion of tongues, and the results of which are given in the 10th chapter, and it is argued, in favour of the longer generations of the Septuagint, that the inhabitants of the world could hardly have been numerous enough to require this dispersion so soon as 100 years after the deluge, and also that the influence of Noah and Shem, who, according to the Hebrew account, were both alive in Peleg's days, must have been sufficient to restrain their posterity from that godless conduct which brought upon them the confusion of tongues.

The first thing to notice in the genealogical table, extending from Abraham to the sons of Jacob, is the age of Terah at Abraham's birth. It is stated in Gen. xi. 26 that 'Terah lived seventy years, and begat Abram, Nahor, and Haran;' afterwards, at verse 32, it is said, 'the days of Terah were two hundred and five years, and Terah died in Haran;' and again (Gen. xii. 4), 'and Abram was seventy and five years old when he departed out of Haran.' Now we collect from Acts vii. 4 that Abram did not leave Haran till after the death of Terah, when, had he been born when Terah was 70, he must have been 135 years old. But this difficulty disappears at once, if we adopt the solution of it, which has been universally received by the best commentators since it was first pointed out by Archbishop Usher, viz., that Abraham was not the eldest, but in all probability, as is acknowledged by several of the Rabbis, the youngest son of Terah, and born when he was 130 years old, and possibly by another wife. This is quite in accordance with the opinion of many of the earliest Rabbinical and Christian expositors that Sarah was the same as Ischah (the grand-daughter of the father of Abraham, Gen. xx. 12). Another point of interest is the time of Jacob's marriage with Leah. If we suppose with some that this marriage did not take place till after the expiration of his first seven years' servitude, it would be impossible for him to have had great-grandchildren (Gen. xvi. 12, 17) at the time of his going down into Egypt. Hence those who hold this opinion have imagined that he remained at Padan-Aram for two periods of twenty years (see Adam Clarke on Gen. xxxi. 38). There is, however; no sufficient authority for this supposition, and we infer that he married both Leah and Rachel in the first year of his residence at Padan-Aram, and that his wives were given to him in consideration of an engagement to serve, not of service done. This gives fifty-three years* from the time of his marriage till Scale of years, B.C.

Dates of principal events.

* This supposes Judah to be about 47 years old when he came into Egypt, a supposition partly based on the authority of Abulfaragi, who places Levi's birth in the sixth year of Jacob's servitude, and consequently Judah's not before the sixth. But, if we dispense with the authority of Abulfaragi, we may suppose Judah to be born in the fourth year of Jacob's servitude (Gen. xxix. 31), in which case he would be 49 at the descent into Egypt, and there would be two years more for the occurrence of the events above stated. It is necessary to direct attention to this point on account of the severe attack which Bishop Colenso has just made on the Pentateuch, and which he has grounded, among other things, on the assumption that Judah was only 42 years old, and that therefore Hezron and Hamul could not possibly have been born, at the time of the descent into Egypt. This assumption is grounded by Bishop Colenso on the supposition that Joseph was born in the seventh year of Jacob's double marriage (Critical Examination, p. 18), whereas the simplest inference from the passages to which he refers is that he was born in its fourteenth year, as it is there stated that immediately after Joseph's birth—"when Rachael had borne Joseph" (Gen. xxx. 25, 26)—Jacob applied for leave to return to his own country as having fulfilled his—"fourteen years" (Gen. xxxi. 41)—service. The sum of the time from Jacob's marriage to the descent into Egypt is thus made up according to our theory:—From marriage to birth of Joseph 14 years, from Joseph's birth to his becoming Governor of Egypt, 30 years (Gen. xli. 46), 7 years of plenty and 2 years of famine, 9 years, in all, 53 years. Bishop Colenso shortens this time, as we have seen, by 7 years, and makes it 46. Therefore, if Judah was born in the fourth year of Jacob's marriage, he was, according to our theory, 49, and, according to Bishop Colenso's, 42, when Hezron and Hamul are stated in Genesis to have been born.

his migration to Egypt, and allows his sons, Judah and Asher, to have grandchildren, but only on the supposition that Judah was not more than fifteen at the birth of his son Er, nor Er more than fifteen at his marriage with Tamar, nor Pharez more than fifteen at the birth of Hezron and Hamul. Asher and his son Beriah must also have been under twenty at their respective marriages. It has been argued from this that the period of maturity could not have been later in the days of the patriarchs than it is at present. But it must be remembered that a very considerable and rapid diminution in the length of human life had taken place by this time, and this may have been accompanied by a corresponding change in the period of maturity. The total number of Jacob's issue that came with him into Egypt was sixty-six, add to this four, for himself and Joseph and his two sons, and we have seventy (Gen. xlv. 27), add to it nine for the surviving wives of himself, and the eleven sons that accompanied him, and we have seventy-five (Acts vii. 14) for the whole number that went into Egypt.

We must now glance at the great offshoots from the patriarchal line. 1. The western and southern regions of Arabia were colonized by the thirteen sons of Joktan (Gen. x. 26). Of this there is ample evidence both in the traditions of the Arabians themselves and in the names of places in their country. Uzal and Sheba were two of Joktan's sons, Asal and Sheba were the ancient names of Sana and Mareb, the two chief cities of Yemen. In another of its cities, Zafari, or possibly in Dhafar, on the south-west of Arabia, we recognize Sephar, one of their boundaries. According to the sacred historian—'their dwelling was from Mesha as thou goest unto Sephar, a mount of the East' (Gen. x. 30). The position of Mesha has not been settled, though some have thought it to be Mecca. Sheba was probably the ancestor of the rulers of the kingdom of Sheba (the modern Yemen), whose queen came to hear the wisdom of Solomon. Hazarmaveth, Joktan's third son, gave his name to the province of Hadramaut, and the district of Khawlan in the Yemen preserves an evident trace of Havilah, his twelfth. His eldest son, Almodad, must have been the original of the Mudads of the Arabian genealogists, one of them being reputed seventh, and the other ninth in descent from Joktan.

2. A daughter of this second Mudad is said by the Arabs to have been the wife of Ishmael, and there is every reason to believe that the Egyptian given to him by his mother Hagar was not his only wife, for his daughter Mahalath, who became the wife of Esau, is called the sister of Nebaioth, Gen. xxviii. 9, which seems to intimate that his other sons were by a different mother. Thus a matrimonial connection between the first and second, as well as between the second and third offshoot from the patriarchal line is not improbable. The Nabatheans who at one time occupied the country about Petra were probably descended from Nebaioth, as their neighbours the Cedreans were from Kedar. His twelve sons (Gen. xxv. 13) 'dwelt from Havilah unto Shur, which is before Egypt, as those goest toward Syria,' i. e., across the Arabian desert from the north shore of the Persian Gulf (Havilah) to the north point of the Gulf of Akaba (Shur). The descendants of two of them, Jetur and Naphish, occupied that part of the desert bordering on the Jordan, and were in the course of time defeated with great slaughter and dispossessed by the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh (1 Chron. v. 18).

The sons of Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2) by Abraham were sent by their father with gifts 'eastward into the east country.' In a desert 600 miles across there was room both for them and the children of Ishmael, and there, like the children of Ishmael, they led the half-warrior half-shepherd life which has ever characterised the sons of the desert. Zimram, the eldest, may perhaps be recognised as the ancestor of the Zamaremiens of Pliny. Jokshan, the second, had two sons, Dedan and Sheba, the same names as the sons of Raamah. It has already been stated as probable that Nimrod was the grandson of Raamah, and there is evidence of a migration of Cushites about his time from Ethiopia to the neighbourhood of the Persian Gulf. There are also indications of the names Dedan and Sheba both in the Persian Gulf and in the neighbourhood of Idumea, whence it has been conjectured that Jokshan, the son of Keturah, when he went 'eastward into the east country' may have intermarried with a daughter or descendant of Dedan, the son of Raamah, thus the recurrence of the names Dedan and Sheba would be accounted for as well as the existence of places called by these names both on the borders of Idumea and in the Persian Gulf. The sons of Dedan are said to have been Ashurim, Letushim, Leummim, which Onkelos interprets as persons dwelling in camps, tents, or islands, and it may be noticed in connection with this, that the traces of the names Sheba and Dedan are to be found in two islands of the Persian Gulf.

3. We pass on to the family of Esau, the third offshoot from the patriarchal line. While Abraham and Isaac were wanderers in the land of Canaan, the descendants of Seir were occupying the heights and cultivating the fertile glens and terraces of Mount Seir, a lofty highland that stretched away to the east from the side of the valley of Akaba. This chief and his people were called Horites from their dwelling in caves, and one of his descendants, Aholibamah, became a wife of Esau. By another wife, Adah, the daughter of Elon the Hittite, Esau had a son, Eliphaz, who afterwards became the father of Amalek by Timna, the daughter of Seir. It is a singular thing that the son should have taken Seir's daughter for his concubine (Gen. xxxvi. 12), when the father had married his great-granddaughter (ver. 2); but it may probably be accounted for by the long lives of men at that time. And Timna, who is called the sister of Lotan, and was therefore probably not by the same mother as Seir's other sons, may have been the daughter of his old age, while the grandfather of Aholibamah was the child of his youth. One of the sons of Eliphaz, by another wife, was Teman, whence we may infer that Eliphaz the Temanite was his descendant. The seven sons of Seir, the Horite, are called 'dukes' in our translation. Each probably dwelt in some mountain fastness, and was the chief or shiekh of a particular tribe; and we see how completely the old Horite power was displaced by that of Esau, in the fact that seven of Esau's sons and six of his grandsons (nine of them sprung from females of Seir's house) had this title when it was no longer borne by Seir's male descendants. This is technically called the first aristocracy of dukes, and is followed in the Bible by a list of eight elective kings, who are said to have reigned in Edom 'before there was any king in Israel.' If this enumeration of kings is in its right place, the king of Israel at whom the statement points must have been Moses, and the whole dynasty must have come to an end before the Exodus. Some are, however, of opinion that this passage was not originally in Genesis, but was copied into it from Chronicles. After the list of kings there follows another list of dukes, apparently descended from the former ones, as there is a recurrence of three of the names of the earlier family. This has been called the second aristocracy of dukes, and is supposed to have succeeded the kings in order of time. The better opinion, however, seems to be that the dukes or heads of tribes were contemporaneous with the kings or paramount chiefs of the collective body.

SECOND DIVISION. Up to the settlement of the Israelites in Egypt under Joseph, the genealogical records of their ancestry, and of mankind in general, are very complete. The descent from father to son is fully given, and the chronology of the several descents, if not minutely stated, may be easily inferred. But at the settlement in Egypt there is a great break in the continuity of these records, a circumstance not unlikely to occur among a people who so soon fell into a state of oppression and servitude, and continued in it so long.

We are not, however, to suppose, because these records are not inserted in the sacred volume, that the knowledge of their descent was not committed to memory or to writing, and transmitted either orally or in written documents from father to son in their respective tribes and families, both during their servitude in Egypt and during the heroic period of their history after they had settled in Canaan. Indeed we may imagine such details to have formed the chief subject-matter of their traditional knowledge. And we have an interesting example of the careful maintenance of such genealogical records in modern times among the New Zealanders, whose chiefs to this day can each trace their descent to the commander of one of the canoes which brought their ancestors from Hawaiki about 400 years ago, and who in the social system, and in the geographical distribution of their tribes, bear a considerable resemblance to the condition of the children of Israel after their settlement in Canaan. But interesting as these documents would be to the several tribes and families of Israel, and important as they would be for civil use, as registers of rights of inheritance, they would, except in the particular instance of the genealogy of the Messiah, have little bearing on that great scheme for the regeneration and salvation of mankind which is revealed to us in the Bible.

The first instance, indeed, of anything like a genealogical sketch of the whole people is that which occurs in the first chapters of the Book of Chronicles, and it has every appearance of being a collection of fragments more or less perfect, gathered together from a great variety of different sources, public and private,* portions of records easily intelligible perhaps at the time when they were written, and when the names which they recorded were household words in the mouths of their contemporaries, but now, and probably also at the time when they were collected, presenting the appearance of a mass of fossil remains, which it has baffled the skill of the ablest genealogical analysts, from the earliest times, to arrange in perfect form.

Nor is it very surprising that this should be the case when we consider the time and circumstances under which this collection was made. The complete dissolution of the whole social system which had taken place in the kingdoms of Judah and Israel at the time of their respective captivities, the national ruin which had preceded them, and the evident design of their conquerors utterly to destroy and blot out their nationality (a design attended with such complete success in the case of the kingdom of Israel), makes it surprising that even these fragments of tribal history should have remained, while their collection and embodiment in a portion of sacred history immediately after the return of the Jews from their captivity, indicates the high importance which was attached to them, as testifying their connection with the patriarchs, and was probably the beginning of that perfect system of genealogical registration which, according to the testimony of Josephus, prevailed at the time of our Lord's nativity. In this collection we find here a pedigree of seven or eight individuals without any visible connection with the ancestors of their tribe, there a few great names designated as the heads or chiefs of their respective houses, in some instances individuals named as the fathers, not of men and families, but of towns and districts, and very plainly suggesting the inference that enrolment in the sacred genealogy did not in all cases involve a blood relationship between the individual named and the ancestor of the house among whose members he was classed. Thus a resemblance is established between Bible genealogy and the principle which prevails among the Highland clans and in the New Zealand Hapus. Many, it is well known, use the name, and are reckoned in the clan of the Highland chief, who are not actually descended from his stock, so in New Zealand the captives taken in war enter as slaves into the victorious tribe, and are incorporated with it; nor can it be doubted that many English names are more widely spread than they would be had not nameless retainers assumed in early times the names of the lords of whom they held. And, besides all this, there are evident mistakes and inconsistencies,—mistakes and inconsistencies which a very little more knowledge of facts and of the style and manner of the genealogist might enable us to rectify and reconcile, but which leave the modern commentator in a state of hopeless uncertainty.

We shall not, then, attempt to set forth the contents of the various genealogies to be found in the book of Chronicles and other parts of the O. T.,* but merely give some instances in illustration of

* The several numberings of the people, two of which were made in the wilderness and one by David, would give an opportunity for recording the genealogies of the chief houses (determined either by primogeniture or by descent from some 'mighty man of valour'), as well as the number of the whole people. Besides, we read of 'the book of Iddo the seer concerning genealogies' (2 Chron. xii. 15), and there is a reference in 1 Chron. v. 7 and 17 to a reckoning by genealogies which was made in the reigns of Jeroboam II. and Jotham, kings of Israel, and which were probably something similar to our heralds' visitations of the 16th and 17th centuries.

* An interesting display of Bible pedigrees may be seen in Anderson's Royal Genealogies, and the subject is minutely and elaborately treated in Bar the foregoing general views, and of the use which, notwithstanding their imperfect state, may be made of these records.

We have an instance of the way in which men of one tribe might be reckoned as belonging to another, in consequence of a possession or inheritance coming to them within the district of that other, in the case of Jair, the grandson of Hezron, the head of one great branch of the tribe of Judah. His grandfather had married a daughter of Machir, the grandson of Manasseh; and Jair had assisted the tribe of Manasseh in their conquest of Gilead on the east side of Jordan before the entrance of the great body of the Israelites into the Promised Land. He consequently obtained as his possession the towns which he had conquered, and which he called Havoth-Jair, and was reckoned as of the tribe of Manasseh, and was called the son of Manasseh (Num. xxxii. 40; Deut. iii. 14), though by paternal descent of the tribe of Judah. That of which we here see a special instance may very well have happened in many other cases, and probably did happen in the case of Caleb, the son of Jephunneh, otherwise called the Kenezite. We read that Joshua appointed him an inheritance in the tribe of Judah: from this expression it is reasonable to infer that he did not actually belong to the tribe of Judah, and we are confirmed in this opinion by noticing that, in the pedigree of the tribe of Judah, where the name of Caleb frequently occurs, there is no statement which distinctly connects Caleb the son of Jephunneh by paternal descent with that tribe, no mention of Kenaz his grandfather, or of Jephunneh his father, as so connected. A very probable inference is, that Caleb was not by birth of the tribe of Judah, or of any of the tribes of Israel at all, but one of those men of Esauite or Ishmaelite descent who married Israelitish women (as Ithra the Ishmaelite, who married Abigail the sister of David; and Jarha the Egyptian, who married the daughter of Sheshan, 1 Chron. ii. 17-35), and so became incorporated with the tribe of their wives. Here, then, would be a source of ambiguity in consequence of the double genealogy of such persons—the one connecting them with their paternal ancestry, the other classifying them with the tribe to which they had become affiliated, and with which they might be really connected by marriage or maternal descent. There would be no doubt about the matter if the fact of such marriage or maternal connection were stated; but where grandsons or great-grandsons are recorded as sons, and mothers' names omitted, there is no security against mistake.

Another source of uncertainty is the manifest corruption of the text, and dislocation of the order of the genealogies. A most remarkable instance of this is to be seen in 1 Chron. vi. That chapter contains several pedigrees of the tribe of Levi, but on examination it becomes perfectly evident that the longest of these (ver. 33-38), is made up of two of the others (ver. 22-28), and yet contains particulars which are not to be found in either of them. Here, then, is room and necessity for the exercise of criticism, and such criticism has been exercised with great ingenuity by Lord Arthur Herve, to whose labours we are indebted for a great deal of light on this difficult subject. We cannot better shew the use that can be made of the kindred studies of chronology and genealogy for clearing doubtful points of history, than by laying before our readers one or two of his valuable and instructive suggestions.

One of the great difficulties which beset this subject is the apparent contradiction between St. Paul's assertion (Acts xiii. 20)—after that he gave them judges for the space of 450 years—and the small number of generations recorded as occurring in the family of David during this long period of time. Nahshon was 'the Prince of Judah' at the time of the Exodus, and between him and David there intervene but four generations, those of Salmon, Boaz, Obed, and Jesse. This, which would give from 100 to 120 years to each generation, is impossible. Hence some have thought that several names have dropped out in the list of David's ancestors between Salmon and Boaz. But the genealogy is given in four places without variation in the names, and St. Matthew says particularly Salmon begat Boaz of Rachab. Moreover, this genealogy of David is not the only one by which we may judge of the time that elapsed between the Exodus and Samuel. We have the genealogies of seven of David's contemporaries traced up to Jacob, and the number of generations in the longest of them only exceeds the number in David's line by four. Thus, from Jacob to David there are 11 generations, to Zadoc 14, to Heman 14, to Ahimoth 15, to Asaph (leaving out one name, which seems inserted by mistake) 15, to Ethan 14, and, as nearly as can be calculated, to Abiathar 14, and to Jonathan 11. All this seems to indicate that we have no reason to suspect the loss of any links in David's pedigree, especially considering that David, Obed, and Pharez were each born in the old age of their respective fathers.

Everything, therefore, points to a curtailment of the time allotted to the rule of the Judges. The period of 450 years named by St. Paul is nowhere given in so many words in the O. T., but it is made up of the several periods of servitude and rest which are enumerated in the book of Judges and the beginning of the 1st book of Samuel. It is also supported by Jephtha's statement to the King of Ammon, that the Israelites had been in possession of certain towns and cities in Heshbon rington's genealogical tables. There is also a small edition of the Bible, Prayer-book, Psalter, etc., printed at Edinburgh in 1636, containing a curious and interesting set of tables of 'The genealogies recorded in the Sacred Scriptures according to every tribe and family.'

A learned and valuable collection of genealogies illustrative of sacred history and prophecy, by the Rev. Fred. Martin, M.A., rector of South Somercotes and prebendary of Lincoln, has been printed at the University press, Cambridge, 1855. The first four tables contain genealogies taken from the Bible, and exhibit continuously—'I. Adam, Noah, Terah; II. Abraham, Job, Ruth, and Judges; III. The kings of Israel and Judah (including our Lord's descent according to the flesh), with the contemporary prophets, and Tobit, Damascus, Tyre; IV. The high-priests till the Maccabees, with Asaph, Heman, and Ethan or Jeduthun.' The other five tables give from general sources the genealogies of the ruling families of various countries connected with Bible history. The work also contains tables of parallel years, and other useful and interesting matter.

and Aroer, and along the coast of Arnon, 'three hundred years' (Judg. xi. 26). Now, not to speak of the frequent substitutions of one number for another in the Masoretic text, from the great similarity of the letters by which the numerals are expressed (Kennicott), it is impossible to doubt that many of the events which are recorded one after another in the book of Judges occurred simultaneously in different parts of the land, and the 300 years of Jephtha are logically and grammatically inappropriate to the connection in which they stand, while the sense would be rendered clear and consistent with history by reading 300 cities. This reading, then, is adopted, and enables us to place Jephtha where the general course of the sacred narrative would make him stand. In Judg. xi. 1 it is said Gilead begat Jephtha. This is not inconsistent with the supposition that he may have been the grandson of Gilead; but it is irreconcilable with the view that he was a much more remote descendant, when we consider that his immediate predecessor in the Judgeship was Jair of Havoth Jair, who was the grandson of Gilead's sister. We find a further genealogical argument for giving a shorter time to the book of Judges, and for supposing the order of its narrative to have been disturbed, in the facts that the Levite who acted the part of priest first to Micah and then to Dan, was the grandson of Moses (the correct reading, and not Manasseh, Judg. xvii. 30. See Adam Clarke's commentary and Lord A. Hervey on the Genealogies, pp. 234, 257); that Phineas the son of Eleazar, the son of Aaron, was a sharer in the transactions recorded in the 20th chapter, and that no high-priest is mentioned during the whole of the time from the entrance into Canaan till the birth of Samuel, except Eleazar, Phineas, and Eli. If we are led by these and other considerations to shorten the period assigned to the Judges by about 200 years, reading 280 instead of 480 years in 1 Kings vi. 1, and assenting to the testimony of the MSS. which omit St. Paul's statement, Acts xiii. 21 (Wordsworth), we not only make Scripture consistent with itself, but clear away some of the difficulties which embarrass its relations with profane history (Sir Gardner Wilkinson, Manners and Customs of Egyptians; Dr. Lepsius, Letters from Egypt).

The genealogy of Joshua given in 1 Chron. vii. 20 represents Ephraim with only one of the three sons who are assigned to him in Numbers—Shuthelah. From him descends a single line of six individuals, terminating in another Shuthelah, with whom are named Ezra and Elead, who may be either his sons or brothers, more probably the latter. The historian then states that one or both of these was slain by the men of Gath, 'because they came down to take away their cattle,' indicating at first sight a hostile foray on the men of Gath by the posterity of Ephraim, in which the Ephraimites were repulsed and put to death. He then goes on to say that after this event the brethren of Ephraim came to condole with him in his sorrow, and that in process of time he had another son, Beriah, from whom sprung a second line of eight descendants—nine, reckoning Beriah—terminating in the great hero, Joshua, the son of Nun. Here is a strange tissue of anachronisms and incongruities. The Jewish commentators say that the Ephraimites, reckoning the time appointed for their occupation of Canaan from the sacrifice of Abraham (Gen. xv. 10), not from the birth of Isaac, went out of Egypt in a body of two hundred thousand men, under the conduct of their leaders, 30 years before the right time, and that after their slaughter by the Philistines of Gath, Ephraim had a son whom he called Beriah (= in evi), because he was born in the time in which this evil happened to his house. But they say nothing of the incongruity of Ephraim, having a son after the death of his descendant in the seventh or eighth generation, or of the still greater incongruity of making Joshua descend by a line of eight generations from an ancestor born 30 years before the Exodus. Indeed, it must be considered that the record, as an exact enumeration of descents, is utterly valueless.

On this assumption, which is obviously correct, Lord A. Hervey has approached the text with a bold and skilful hand. The first two descendants of Shuthelah's line, Bered and Tahath, he makes sons of Ephraim, corresponding and identical with the Becher and Tahan of Numbers, instead of being his grandson and great-grandson. He then shews that the name of the great-great-grandfather of Joshua, as given in Chronicles (Laadan), bears, when written in the Hebrew character, so strong a resemblance to that of Ephraim's grandson by Shuthelah as given in Numbers (Eran), that the names may be considered identical with one another, while they are also nearly identical as written in Hebrew with Eladah (who appears as Shuthelah's son in Chronicles, when Bered and Tahath are made, as above, sons of Ephraim), and with Elead the hero, slain by the men of Gath. He makes the two Shuthelah's of the first line of descent from Ephraim, and the Telah of the second, stand for one and the same individual, Ephraim's eldest son, according both to Numbers and to Chronicles, while Eran, Shuthelah's son, according to Numbers, is the Eladah, the Elead, and Laadan of Chronicles, and consequently at one and the same time the great-great-grandfather of Joshua, the grandson of Ephraim, and the individual after whose death by the hands of the men of Gath, Ephraim had another son whom in memory of the event he named Beriah. On a remark by Dr. Lepsius, that the march of the men of Ephraim to Gath could not have been from Egypt, since they went down, he grounds the important suggestion, which is perfectly consistent with the text, that the attack was made, not upon, but by the men of Gath, who came down from Palestine to Egypt to steal the cattle of the Ephraimites as they fed their flocks in Goshen. This would account for the terror felt for the Philistines by the people of Israel at the time of the Exodus, their long circuitous journey to avoid them, and the dismay which was spread by the unfavourable report of the spies. Thus, by the aid of some very reasonable conjectures, a little displacement of names, and a few bold alterations of a text manifestly corrupt, he brings out of its obscurity a most interesting fact of the early history of Israel, and gives to Joshua his natural place among his contemporaries, instead of making him live some hundreds of years after his true time.

GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST. Importance of the subject.—There is an observable difference in the genealogical documents of the two Testaments. While the O. T. abounds in pedigrees of every extent and variety, the Christian Scriptures contain but one lineage. This, however, bears on its surface such signs of completeness as to present at the very threshold of the N. T. a strong presumption of the finality and perfection of its sacred revelation. It is impossible to overrate the importance of the genealogy of our Lord—indicating as it does the connection and fulfilment of many prophecies,* and binding together in closest union and interest the most separate and various dispensations of men in the evidence which it affords of the Redeemer's relation, not only to the human race as a whole, but to its successive† generations, 'up to the fulness of time.'

Various objections and theories.—Proportioned to its importance has been the attention bestowed on the subject. From Celsus, in the 2d century, to Strauss in the present one, the manifold objections of hostile critics have elicited learned defences, which, by various methods and processes, have solidly vindicated the sacred record. The objections of the Epicurean philosopher were rather external; he charged the two genealogists of Christ with having fabricated their records. The Manichean Faustus, and the apostate Julian, afterwards attacked them for 'the inconsistency' (Dissonantium Evangelistarum; S. Hieronymi Opera, Comment. in Matt. i. 16) in their two lines of our Lord's descent. Strauss's objections are a combination of both; he charges the genealogy with both mythic fabrication and discrepancy. Reserving the details, we proceed to state the two leading interpretations by which it has been sought to reconcile the discrepancy, and vindicate the correctness of the two genealogical tables, of St. Matt. i., and St. Luke iii. Lord Arthur Hervey (Genealogies of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and art. Genealogy of J. C., in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible) propounds one of these interpretations. Closely resembling his statement is that of Dr. W. H. Mill, the late Professor of Hebrew in the University of Cambridge (Observations on Pantheistic Principles [section on the Genealogies]), and that of the learned F. X. Patritius (De Evangelistis, lib. iii. diss. 9). The first of these authors thus states the salient points of his system—(1.) The genealogies in St. Matthew and St. Luke are both the genealogies of Joseph; i.e., of Jesus Christ as the reputed and legal son of Joseph and Mary. (2.) The genealogy of St. Matthew is Joseph's genealogy as legal successor to the throne of David; i.e., it exhibits the successive heirs of the kingdom, ending with Christ, as Joseph's reputed son. St. Luke's is Joseph's private genealogy, exhibiting his real birth as David's son, and thus shewing why he was heir to Solomon's crown; so that in St. Matthew we have only legal descent, in St. Luke 'the true stem of birth,' or lineal pedigree. (3.) On the failure of issue to Jechonias in Solomon's line, the succession is replenished from the collateral line of Nathan in the person of Salathiel. (4.) Abiud, the third below Salathiel, had two children; the elder of whom stands in St. Matthew at the head of six generations, which fail in Eleazar; while the younger in St. Luke was the ancestor of Matthan, who becomes the second instance of restoring the failing line of the other branch, by transferring to it his eldest son Jacob, who however occasions a third interruption to the line of St. Matthew, by himself dying childless, leaving his inheritance to his brother Heli's son, Joseph, the husband of the Virgin Mary. (5.) Mary the mother of Jesus was, in all probability, the daughter of Jacob, and first cousin to Joseph her husband. So that in point of fact, though not of form, both the genealogies are as much hers as her husband's. In these five theses lies the substance of a theory for which its advocates claim the support of an uninterrupted tradition from the earliest times (Dr. Mill, p. 182; Lord A. Hervey, The Genealogies, p. 9, note; Patritius, Dissert. ix. p. 92). This scheme, in its main features, has been adopted by Dr. Wordsworth (Greek Test.), who has given a remarkably perspicuous statement of the details in a short space, in his note on Matt. i. 1. Dean Alford (Greek Test., vol. i. p. 444) and Bp. Ellicott (Historical Lectures on the Life of Christ, p. 96) express, without fresh argument, their concurrence.

Our own Theory—agreeable to Primitive Opinion.—Notwithstanding the suffrages of so many learned men, we cannot shake off the impression that, while apparently representing the literal Scripture of the Genealogies with greatest fidelity, this scheme does great violence in fact to both it and

* Dr. South (Sermons [Ox. ed.], vol. ii. p. 211), by no means exaggerates the importance of this subject, when, in reference to it, he says; 'That the Christian religion be true is the eternal concernment of all who believe it, and look to be saved by it; and that it be so, depends upon Jesus Christ's being the true promised Messias; (the grand and chief thing asserted by Him in His Gospel); and lastly, Christ's being the true Messias depends upon his being the son of David, and king of the Jews. So that unless this be evinced, the whole foundation of Christianity must totter and fall.'

† If we accept Tischendorf's important reading, ὡς υἱός, ὡς ἐνομίζετο, τοῦ Ἰωσήφ, τοῦ Ἠλεῖ, κ. τ. λ., in Luke iii. 23, the much derided interpretation of this passage which connects Jesus directly with each preceding link of His ancestry as 'the son' of the patriarch of each several generation, becomes not only not a fanciful and far-fetched speculation, but the true and grammatical explanation of the Evangelist's words. The vouchers for the reading, according to T., are B. H. P. 1. 33. 118. 131. 209. ^{scf.}; Euseb.*; Athanas (Serm. mai. de fid.); Epiphani.* (n. 10. 29. n. 31. 10. sqq.); Cyr. (ad 4. 22. el kal ul. ἦν ὡς ἐνομίξ, τοῦ Ἰωσ.). The influence of this reading on this construction of Luke iii. 23, which was advocated by F. Gomar (de Genealogiâ Christi, p. 45), by Lightfoot (Horæ Hebr. [ed. Gandell], vol. iii. p. 54), and by G. J. Vossius (de Jesu Christi Gen., p. 30), as well as by Yardley (on the Genealogies of Christ), may be inferred from the remarks of Dr. W. H. Mill (on the Genealogies, in Pantheistic Principles, p. 185). See also De Wette (Kurze Erklärung, Lukas iii. 23).

* Julius Africanus succinctly expresses the distinction by φύσει, natural descent; and νόμῳ, legal succession. Routh's Rel. Sacr., vol. ii. p. 231.

other passages; nor can we concede to its zealous defenders the traditional support of the Fathers to anything like the extent they claim for it. It will clear the way, and at the same time illustrate the subject, if we briefly examine, first, the patristic opinions on the genealogies. It will lighten the invidiousness of our task in venturing (in the face of so much learned opposition) to contend for the theory, which, while assigning St. Matthew's genealogy to Joseph, gives that of St. Luke to the Blessed Virgin—a theory which, it is admitted, has been maintained by many eminent men since the Reformation—if we shew that it was very far from being unknown to the early writers of the Church, that in fact it is sustained by earlier testimony of Fathers than the rival theory which has been lately recovering ground amongst us. Though Celsus was, we believe, the earliest impugner of the genealogies of the Gospel whose name we know, there seem to have been yet earlier gainsayers, whom Origen taunts his adversary for being ignorant of. These had brought against the evangelists even then the censure of incoherence and δισσημασία, which was afterwards revived by Faustus, Julian, and others (ὅτι τῶν ὡς ἐκλήματα προσαγγόμενα τῇ διαφωνίᾳ τῶν γενεαλογιῶν, οὐδαμῶς ἀνέμασαν, Origenis Opera, De la Rue, vol. i. p. 413). Celsus then derides the notion, that through so lowly a woman as the carpenter's wife (ἡ τοῦ τέκτονος γυνή) Jesus should trace his lineage through the Jewish kings and up to the first man! Does not this indicate that, even in the former part of the 2d century, the opinion that St. Luke's genealogy [for that of course is alluded to by Celsus] was assigned to the mother of Jesus, and that, commonly enough, to reach the observation of this rude detractor of Christianity? And Origen's reply, so far from correcting this idea of Celsus, confirms it: 'Does it follow, then, that Jesus cannot be derived from the first man and those ancient kings of the Jews because of his mother's low estate? Does Celsus think that the poor must needs have poor ancestors, and kings royal ones? Is it not even in our own day a patent fact that persons poorer than Mary have had wealthy and illustrious ancestors in their pedigree?' (Contra Celsum, ii. 32.) We claim this as unquestionable evidence, all the stronger because of its popular and informal cast, in favour of the position we mean to defend, that St. Luke gives us the lineage of the Virgin mother of Christ. It tends to the same conclusion that, later in the same century, Irenæus (Adv. Hæres., lib. iii. c. 29 [G. W. Harvey]) when arguing against the Cerinthians, who alleged that Jesus was the son of Joseph, contended that then He would not be a king. And he used an argument which destroys one of the bases on which Dr. Mill and Lord A. Hervey found their theory; 'If Jesus were Joseph's son He would be neither king nor heir, according to Jeremiah. For Joseph is plainly shewn by Matthew in his genealogy to be the son of Jehoiakim and Jeconiah. Now, these princes and all their descendants were shut out from the throne by the prophet's denunciations (Jer. xxii. 24, 25; 28-30; xxxvi. 30, 31).' We regard Irenæus, then, as a competent witness to the opinion, that in the 2d century the genealogy contained in the first gospel was held to record Joseph's lineal descent from David through Solomon; and it is difficult, in an unstrained interpretation of other passages of the same ancient writer, not to gather that, in his view, the genealogy of St. Luke* represents the lineal ancestors of the Virgin (See especially lib. iii. c. 32; where the comparison between Eve at one end of the list, and Mary at the other, would be unmeaning on any other principle). The only alternative open to him, of supposing St. Luke to trace the legal descent of Joseph, is quite at variance with Irenæus's argument and tone of thought. We might add Tertullian (De Carne Christi, capp. 21, 22), for though not expressly bearing on the genealogies, still such language as 'An quia ipse est flos de virga profecta ex radice Jesse, etc.' and 'Jam nunc carnem Christi non tantum Mariæ, sed et David per Mariam, et Jesse per David, etc.' and again, 'Utique non aliam quam Abraham, nec aliam quam Jesse, nec aliam quam David, nec aliam quam ex Maria, et adhuc superius, nec aliam quam Adam, etc.' does most naturally seem to connect Christ with His remotest ancestry by means of his mother, precisely as we have said the genealogy of St. Luke does. Before we proceed to consider the case of those later fathers, who are quoted as a catena of testimony in favour of the theory, which, we have just seen, was certainly not the primitive one, we will advert to some remarkable words of St. Athanasius, which are best explained on the supposition that in the third gospel the Virgin Mary's descent is given, and her husband's in the first; Μαρία μόνη ἐκ τοῦ Ἀδὰμ καταγομένης, καὶ ἐκ τοῦ Ἀβραάμ καὶ ἐκ τοῦ Δαβὶδ γενεαλογουμένης σὺν τῷ Ἰωσήφ τῷ μεμνηστεινέμῳ αὐτῆς. . . . γεννᾶται σὺν ὁ Χριστὸς ἐν Βηθ-λεὲμ τῆς Ἰουδαίας, τὸν Ἰωσήφ πατέρα καλῶν, ταυτὸν τῇ Μαρίᾳ συγγενόστα τοῦ Δαβὶδ. Here is a clear declaration (1) that 'Mary alone has her descent deduced from Adam' [i.e., St. Luke's register belongs to her only]; while (2) in that genealogy, which is traced both from Abraham and from David [and what is this but Matthew's list?] she shares her descent with Joseph, her betrothed husband; (3) Jesus accordingly is born at Bethlehem, calling Joseph His father, inasmuch as he had one and the same origin as Mary from David [as the union of the two pedigrees simply shews]. How plain is this sentence in the light of the theory we have as yet but adumbrated! How tortuous its interpretation on the terms of the rival opinion (see S. Athanasii Opera, ed. Benedict, vol. ii. p. 738, in the tract Contra Apollinarium i. 4).

How opposed by later Fathers.—With respect to the support which this rival opinion receives from ancient writers, we cannot but think that it is accepted at more than its worth by modern commentators. We claim some diminution, on the strength of the quotations we have just adduced. And if we admit that among the later fathers who have noticed the question (for the majority of those we have consulted omit its discussion), there is an undoubted agreement to assign the genealogical

* Some have seen in the words of the primitive St. Ignatius (Epist. ad Ephes. vii.), Καὶ ἐκ Μαρίας καὶ ἐκ Θεοῦ . . . 'Ἰησοῦς Χριστός, an allusion to St. Luke's genealogy in its proximate and ultimate steps: but we think this construction too strained for the simple style of the venerable martyr. It is worth observing, however, that neither in him nor any other of the Apostolic Fathers occurs a trace of the complicated theory which we in this article oppose.

lists of both evangelists to Joseph alone, we think it not unreasonable to suggest a further diminution from the weight of their authority on two grounds—(1) Because it is doubtful whether they, in all cases, really meant to exclude Mary from the possession of one of the genealogies, when they assigned both nominally to her husband. St. Chrysostom, for instance, in his fourth homily on St. Matthew, says that the two evangelists make out their lives both in the name of Joseph, because Jewish usage excluded the names of women from such documents [this is strongly insisted on by many writers (Hilary of Poitiers, St. Jerome, and Theophylact on St. Matt. i.; St. Augustine, Sermo de Concord. Matt. et Luc.; Theodoret, on Romans ix.; Bede, on St. Luke iii., etc.)]; but he adds these significant words: Ἐλπίων τούτων τοὺς προγόνους πάντας, καὶ τελευτήσας εἰς τὸν Ἰωσήφ, οὐκ ἔστιν μέχρι τούτου, ἀλλὰ προσέθηκεν, Ἰωσήφ τὸν ἀνδρὰ Μαρίας· δεικνύς, ὅτι δι' ἐκείνην καὶ τούτου ἐγενεαλόγησεν, as much as to say that, although from Jewish usage the evangelist inserted the name of Joseph, he yet constructed the genealogy for the Virgin's sake (Opera [ed. Bened.] vii. 48). (2) There is an avowed deference on the part of some of the Fathers to the conclusions of Julius Africanus, who in the 3d century constructed an elaborate scheme of reconciling the genealogies of SS. Matthew and Luke (see fragments of Africanus Ep. ad Aristid. de Geneal. Servatoris, in Routh's Rel. Sacr. ii. 228-237). This deference appears in St. Augustine, who changed his view on the subject* and ascribed the change to the work of Africanus, which, he says, 'he had not read when he wrote his own work against Faustus' (Retract. lib. ii. c. 7). Other Fathers express like deference to the treatise, which seems to have been accepted for several centuries as having settled the question. (Hujus nodum questionis Africanus de consonantia evangeliorum scribebat apertissime solvit.' Bede, l. c.; Eusebius i. 7; vi. 31; St. Ambrose's explanation is given in almost the words of Africanus (Exposit. in Luc. lib. iii. c. 15); St. Jerome refers to the same authority for his own views (in Matt. i. 16); and so Theophylact (in Matt. i.); John Damascene in the 8th century reproduced the scheme of Africanus with slight modifications (De Orthodoxa Fide, iv. 14). We shall have occasion to refer to this scheme again; we here remark that the author put it forth as a well-meant contribution towards solving a Biblical difficulty; frankly avowing that though it was the best explanation he could offer, he was not sure of his data (Routh, ii. 237; Lord A. Hervey, 44). To us the whole facts of the case detract considerably, it may not be indeed from the mental character of the Fathers, who in the mass of their subjects accepted the help on a knotty point which was close at hand, but at least from the value of that patristic catena

* We might claim St. Augustine in support of our view, if the remark of the Rev. Is. Williams (Nativity, p. 120) be well founded; he says—'Indeed St. Augustine mentions it as an opinion, which he did not disapprove of, that Heli, recorded by St. Luke, was the father-in-law of St. Joseph and the father of the blessed Virgin.' We have, however, searched in vain for this passage; Mr. Williams gives no reference. We may safely gather that St. Augustine's opinion of the point varied at different times.

which has been lately recommended so warmly to us.

Effects of our Theory.—We proceed to consider that explanation of the two genealogies of our Lord which appears to us most closely coincident with the various portions of Holy Scripture connected with the subject. We have already stated it to be our thesis that in St. Matthew we have the genealogy of Joseph, and in St. Luke that of the blessed Virgin Mary. The effect of this is to connect Jesus Christ (1) with his royal ancestor David by the tie of natural descent (φύσει) through His only human parent Mary; and by legal succession (νόμῳ) by means of his reputed father Joseph, the last lineal heir of Solomon; (2) with the great patriarch of the Jewish nation, Abraham—a connection which St. Matthew especially develops, as suited his purpose, in writing his gospel for Jewish readers; (3) with the father of the human race, Adam—as St. Luke alone demonstrates, consistently with his character as the friend of St. Paul and the evangelist of the Gentiles.

The structure of the two lines both ending in Joseph, who is the terminus ad quem in Matthew and the terminus a quo in Luke, is accounted for by both Jewish and Christian writers, on that most prominent maxim of Israelite law, that genealogies must be reckoned by fathers and not mothers (Ἐκ πατέρων γὰρ, ἀλλ' οὐκ ἐκ μητέρων ἔδος γενεαλογεῖν τῇ θείᾳ γραφῇ, Theodoret Opera, by Sirmond, iii. 23).*

On St. Matthew's Genealogy.—In the first gospel Joseph is related to his predecessor by birth; in the third by law. This distinction is evident from the language of the two documents, Ἰακώβ ἐγέννησεν τὸν Ἰωσήφ ('Jacob begat Joseph,' Matt. i. 16), and Ἰωσήφ, τοῦ Ἡλὶ (literally, Joseph of Heli; Luke iii. 23). To all, who have no theory to serve, it must be clear that the former statement connects Jacob with Joseph in a parental relationship. The words are precise: with all deference to the learned men who take a different view (see Dr. Wordsworth, Gr. Test. vol. i., p. 1, note 2; Lord A. Hervey, Genealogies, etc., pp. 48-56; and Dr. W. H. Mill, p. 173), we must demur to their including under the word ἐγέννησε any relationship but that which arises from lineal descent, whether of the first degree (which is by far the most usual) or a remoter one (as in Matt. i. 8, Ἰωρὰμ δὲ ἐγέννησε τὸν Ὀβὰδ, where the descent is strictly lineal). We have examined the usage of the Hebrew Scriptures, the LXX., and the Greek Testament, and we cannot but deem that criticism worse than precarious, and absolutely rash, which is for extending the verb γεννᾷν and its Hebrew equivalent הָלַךְ [or Hiphil הָלַךְ] to mere legal connection. We have

* Hence comes the oft-repeated maxim of the Talmudists מִשְׁפַּחַת הָאֵם אֵין קָרִיבָה (Juchas. fol. 55-2). The mother's family is not to be called a family; that is, it has not the force of a civil family in property succession. See R. Bechai, ad Numeros, fol. 193, col. 2; Jarchi, ad Judie, xvii. 7; and Jacob Bar Solomon, in Oculo Israel, p. ii., fol. 89, col. 1. The same thing is meant by the dictum of the very ancient author of the Siphri, fol. 23, col. 92. מִשְׁפַּחַת הַלְכוּת אַחֲרֵי אָבוֹת, Familie seu cognationes sequuntur patres. Such maxims are constantly occurring. Selden, de Successionibus ad leg. Ebræor., c. xii.

patiently gone through the long columns of Bruder, Trommius, and Wigram, and have examined the copious references of Stephen's Thesaurus, and cannot discover the slightest trace of a usage which justifies such extension.* Throughout St. Matthew's genealogy, then, ἐγέννησε indicates natural descent; hence we can at once accept the 12th verse in its literal sense ('After they were brought to Babylon, Jechonias begat Salathiel'), as strictly parallel with 1 Chron. iii. 17 ('The sons of Jechoniah in his captivity, or a captive, יְדִנְיָ [not 'Assir']—a proper name; see Luther's Version of O. T., l. c.; Abarbanel, in Haggurum, ii. 23; Surenhusius, Cuncil. de Geneal. f. c. ביִּשְׁלָא. קא-ראָלל; Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr., in loc.; and Hug's Introduction, by Wait, vol. ii. 268] 'Salathiel, his son, etc.'). By the help of these literal and plain statements, we assign to the denunciation of Jer. xxii. 30, the sense which it will bear without violence, namely, that the burden put upon Jechonias by the Lord was (1) the loss of his present children, if he had any (like the case of Zedekiah, 2 Kings xxv. 7, or of Hiel in 1 Kings xvi. 34); hence we read not of his children, but only of his mother and his wives accompanying him to Babylon, 2 Kings xxiv. 15; (2) the loss of his own royal 'prosperity' or power; and (3) the deposition of his seed, which might be born to him in captivity, from the throne of David for ever [comp. the remarkable words of Irenæus, which we have quoted above].† To insist that Jechonias was childless, on the strength of a prophetic passage of dubious meaning, and in the face of two clear historical statements, is an unsafe method of handling Scripture; and yet this is the main prop on which the theory rests, which makes St. Matthew's genealogy nothing more than Joseph's legal descent [νόμος οὐ φύσει] in spite of the frequent repetition of the expressive ἐγέννησε and the emphatic ἐγεννήθη with which the apostle concludes his line. Surely this weighty word at the end, and the twice told υἱός at the beginning must be held to afford a strong clue to the author's meaning suggested by himself, as intending to furnish his readers with the stem of Joseph's progenitors* from David through Solomon.

This is the place to notice the prominent position which has been assigned to Solomon, as an indispensable link, binding Jesus with David, and with the great cluster of promises which God was pleased to hang around him. 'Whoever expunges Solomon from Christ's genealogy,' says Calvin (Harm. Evang. on the Genealogies), 'does, at the same time, obliterate and destroy those promises by which he must be acknowledged to be the son of David.' (See also the less emphatic indeed, but equally eminent use of Solomon's name in the modern advocates of the theory; Lord A. Hervey, Geneal. ch. iii. sec. 1; Smith's Dict. vol. i. p. 666; Patrius, Dissert. ix. cap. 9). This view, as it appears to us, is not consistent with the entire case which Holy Scripture presents to us. Between the great promise made to David (2 Sam. vii. 11, 16) and so frequently referred to afterwards (1 Kings xi. 34, 38; Ps. lxxxix. 20-37; Is. lv. 3; Acts xiii. 34) and so beautifully described by the sweet Psalmist of Israel himself, as 'an everlasting covenant ordered in all things and sure' (2 Sam. xxiii. 5); and the promise made to Solomon (1 Kings iii. 14) and renewed to him afterwards more impressively (1 Kings ix. 4-9), and alluded to by David (1 Kings ii. 4); there is this great difference, that the former was absolute, partaking of the unconditional character of the protevangelic assurances made in Eden (Gen. iii. 15) and to the patriarchs (Gen. xvii. 7; xviii. 18; xxii. 18; xxvi. 4; xxviii. 14; Ps. cv. 8); whereas the latter was strictly conditional, resem-

* It may be worth while to remark, that Africanus and the Fathers which follow him (mentioned above), with the remarkable exception of St. Ambrose (loc. cit.), do all hold with us in the opinion that St. Matthew gives the natural line of Joseph. St. Gregory Nazianzen (Carmina [ed. Bened.] vol. ii. p. 268), succinctly states the traditional view on this point; Εὐαγγελιστὴν δ' ὃς μὲν εἶπε τὴν φύσιν, Ματθαῖος, ὃς δ' ἔγραψε Λουκᾶς τὸν νόμον. In respect of patristic opinion, the only subject on which it approaches to an influential unanimity is this very point of the purport of St. Matthew's genealogy—a point in which Lord A. Hervey (Geneal. and Smith's Dict.) differs from the whole catena, except St. Ambrose. Calvin, who is usually so exact in his exegesis, is singularly uncertain here. 'Matthew,' he says, 'departing from the natural lineage of Joseph, which is followed by Luke, reckons up the legal genealogy' [in spite of the perspicuity of the ἐγέννησε, etc.]. He then adverts to the opinion of Africanus and Eusebius as differing from his own, and placidly adds: 'But it amounts to the same thing—for he means nothing more than this, that the kingdom which had been established in the person of Solomon passed in a lawful manner to Salathiel; only it is more correct and appropriate to say that Matthew has exhibited the legal order' (!) How astonishing is such laxity in a writer who is so peremptory in another thesis of his context: 'If Solomon is struck out of Mary's genealogy, Christ will be no longer Christ' (!) One would have thought that a point deemed so indispensable would not have admitted the slightest weakness, vacillation, or uncertainty in its mode of defence and proof. [But touching this opinion of the paramount place of Solomon in the line; see the text above.]

* The metaphorical uses of γενῆς and יֶלֶד, such as 2 Tim. ii. 23 (εἰδὼς ὅτι γεννώσι μάχας, 'gender strifes'), and Prov. xxvii. 1 (יִסְדֵּי יוֹם, 'what a day may bring forth'), or Zeph. ii. 2 (בְּיָמֶיךָ, 'before the decree bring forth') [like Euripides' Ὅπως ἔτεκεν ἄν . . . Ἀητῶ τοσαύτην ἀμαθίαν, Iphig. Taur. 386], and the spiritual sense of such expressions as 1 Cor. iv. 15 (ἐν γὰρ Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ διὰ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου ἐγέννησάς ὑμᾶς ἐγέννησα—'I have begotten you through the gospel') hardly come in to consideration here; they do not, however, at all weaken—but rather, analogically, confirm—our view of the literal meaning of the words.

† The advocates of the theory under examination, ought, as it seems to us, to have taken warning from the prophecy about Jehoiaquim, the father of Jechonias (Jer. xxxvi. 30), instead of adducing it in corroboration of their explanation of Jer. xxii. 30. They cannot, as is stated in the text above, educe absolute childlessness of Jechonias from the latter prophecy in the face of 1 Chron. iii. 17 and Matt. i. 12, nor can they predicate a like doom of Jehoiaquim in the face of 2 Kings xxiv. 6.

blng that which God made to Jeroboam through Ahijah the Shilonite (1 Kings xi. 38), and that which is mentioned in 1 Sam. ii. 30 respecting Eli and his family, and again that referred to in Judg. ii. 1-2, 20, 21.

The promise of perpetuity was only made to the house of David, who is eminently the father of Christ; not to the particular branch which immediately inherited the throne, whose iniquity might suspend or forfeit the promise; accordingly, the writer of the Psalm lxxxix. most pathetically laments, in the stanza between verses 38 and 45, the too sure accomplishment of that wrath, which the dynasty of Solomon provoked, by those impieties of which Solomon had himself set the first example (see 1 Kings xi. 6-10). To us, therefore, there appears a wonderfully minute exactness in the fulfilment of prophecy on the house of David. Solomon himself is nowhere included in the direct ancestry of Messiah. Great things are, doubtless, said of him; but the utmost issue of them was, that he was near to David, and near to Christ, in his last lineal descendant, the blessed Virgin's husband. But he attained not to the glory of his elder brother Nathan, who, through his 'highly favoured' (Luke i. 28) daughter, became the link which connected the royal David with David's Lord and Son (Matt. xxii. 45, etc.). We disparage not the dignity and privilege of the excellent Joseph, the foster-father and legal father of Christ; on the contrary, we believe that in a great and real sense, as the husband of His only parent, the lowly-conditioned but high-souled carpenter of Bethlehem did (in strict and unrepcaled Hebrew law) convey to Christ the residuary legacy of the 'diadem and crown,' which had remained unworn since the days of Ezekiel's 'profane wicked prince of Israel,' waiting for 'Him to come, whose right it is' (Ezek. xxi. 25-27). But great as was the prerogative of Joseph, he could not impart to his foster-son that 'right,' for there is a complete hiatus and separation in descent between him and Jesus Christ. St. Matthew must be understood to intimate such when he adds to the name of Joseph the words which give weight and validity to his preceding genealogy, τὸν ἄνδρα Μαρίας, ἐξ ἧς ἐγεννήθη Ἰησοῦς ὁ λεγόμενος Χριστός (Matt. i. 16). We look on this sequel as itself suggesting an answer to the question, which has been (in ancient times especially) often asked: Why is there a second genealogy of our Lord in the N. T.? Since Joseph's lack of parental relation to Christ incapacitated him from so connecting Christ with His royal ancestor David as to satisfy the great prophecies* which made Him his son, as St. Paul says, ἐκ σπέρματος Δαυὶδ κατὰ σάρκα ('of the seed of David according to the flesh,' Rom. i. 3); or, as St. Peter says, in perhaps still stronger terms, ἐκ καρποῦ τῆς σάρκός αὐτοῦ [i.e., τοῦ πατρὸς αὐτοῦ Δαβὶδ] τὸ κατὰ σάρκα ('of the fruit of his [David's] loins according to the flesh,' Acts ii. 30); it was required (in order to complete the proof which the N. T. was designed to give of the exhaustion of the promises of the O. T. in Jesus Christ, Rom. xv. 8, 9; 2 Cor. i. 20) that another genealogical record should be added which should indicate our Saviour's lineal descent (φύσει ὁ νόμος) from David; hence the genealogy of the third Gospel.

On St. Luke's Genealogy.—If it be objected that this table is made out as literally as the other, in Joseph's name, and that we violate the literal statement of the Evangelist if we transfer the line to Mary; we answer that as Joseph cannot have had two fathers [which yet the genealogies seem literally to assign to him (Matt. i. 16; Luke iii. 23)] some explanatory accommodation is necessary to all theories. Lord A. Hervey makes Joseph Jacob's nephew, and so violates St. Matthew, i. 16. Dr. W. H. Mill seems to agree with Africanus and his copiers; and not only makes Jacob and Heli uterine brothers, thus deviating from the letter of Matt. i. 14 and Luke iii. 24, but adds a second explanatory accommodation by making Joseph the son of Heli, against the letter of Matt. i. 16; St. Ambrose, on the other hand, while closely embracing the *uterine theory of Africanus, inverts the

* Africanus' theory is that Jacob and Heli were brothers by the same mother, 'Estha' (Euseb. H. E. i. 7), who was successively married to Matthan and Melchi [the names which precede their own on the two genealogies], so as to make room for a levirate marriage [LEVIRATE LAW], whereby the survivor, Jacob, on the death of his brother, 'raised up seed' to Heli, even Joseph the husband of Mary. To say nothing of the error of Africanus in accounting 'Joseph the son of Jacob,' instead of making him the son of Heli, according to the express provision of the levirate statute (Deut. xxv. 6), he is no doubt wrong on the general principle. The levirate law was inadmissible in the case of uterine brothers, for, as they might be of different tribes even, through their fathers, it might happen that through them the very purpose of the statute might be defeated. Maimonides (Jabom Vechalitzah, c. 1) has succinctly stated the Jewish law; he says, אחין מן האם אינן חשובין אחין לענין יירשה או לענין יבום וחליצה ודרי הן כמו שאין יירשה או לענין יבום וחליצה ודרי הן כמו שאין יירשה (אחין), i.e., 'brothers only on the mother's side [uterine] are not regarded as brothers, either in the matter of inheritance, or in that of marrying the widow of a deceased brother and loosing of the shoe. They are, indeed, just as if they were not [brothers] at all. For that constitutes not fraternity which proceeds not from the father's side.' Selden, from whom this quotation is taken (De Successionibus, etc., c. 14), confirms it by the authority of the Babylonian Gemara, c. 11, tit. Jabimoth, fol. 17, b.; also, tit. Baba Bathra, c. 8, fol. 110, b.; Hilcoth gidaloth, num. 31; and Moses Cotensis, præcept. affirm. 51, and many other Talmudic authorities. We cannot but regard Dr. W. H. Mill's laboured effort to evade the force of this legal objection (Pantheistic Principles, Genealogies, pp. 191-202) as the weakest part of his learned and valuable treatise. Lord A. Hervey, who rejects the details of Africanus' theory while accepting its conclusion, gives full weight to the objection

* Nothing short of natural descent can satisfy such expressive prophecies as Is. xi. 1, interpreted by St. Paul to the Jews of Antioch (Acts xiii. 22, 23; Rom. xv. 8, 12), and by Christ Himself, Rev. xxii. 16—also Jer. xxii. 5, 6; and xxxiii. 15, applied by St. Paul to Jesus Christ in such passages as Rom. i. 3—also [which we think conclusive] St. Luke i. 32, as if the Evangelist would sound a key-note of interpretation to his own genealogy, so soon to be given. The common expectation of the Jews looked for Christ to be naturally sprung from David (John vii. 42) application of it to Jacob and Heli, and so still more strongly violates the text of the evangelists, inasmuch as he affirms Joseph to be the true son of Heli, and only son-in-law of Jacob, contrary again to the letter of Matt. i. 16. Any way, then, some violence must be done, and is done, to the literal statements of the evangetic stems. Our proposal involves the very least amount of explanatory accommodation, for we only make Joseph the son-in-law of Heli; and can this indeed be regarded as any deviation at all from the letter of the original, Ἰωσήφ τοῦ Ἠλὶ, Joseph of Heli? We think not. How, then, is Joseph son-in-law of Heli? Simply by marrying the daughter of Heli—the blessed Virgin.* No brothers are mentioned in Scripture as belonging to the Virgin; and this silence (the more remarkable because the name of her sister is given; see John xix. 25) has led to the reasonable opinion that Mary was an *heir*ess (ἐκκληρος παῖδρος),† and as such came under the law of Num. xxxvi. 8, which she complied with by marrying her kinsman Joseph, the heir of the collateral branch of her own most illustrious, though now much reduced family.

The opinion that Mary was an heir^{ess} is strongly corroborated by the circumstance that she found it necessary, contrary to the custom of women, to travel to Bethlehem to be registered (Luke ii. 5). She must, therefore, have had an inheritance at Bethlehem, although it may have been mortgaged till the year of jubilee; and, consequently, her husband Joseph must have belonged to the same tribe with herself, and probably been of the very same family, i. e., a descendant of David's (Michaelis, Laws of Moses, art. 78). The effect of Joseph's marrying his kinswoman, the heir^{ess} Mary, would legally be just what the genealogy of St. Luke discloses; those who married heir^{esses} were obliged to pass into the family of their fathers-in-law, and let themselves be reckoned their sons. The principle of inheritance among the Israelites implied as much; for the inheritance was given to daughters in order that the name of their father might not become extinct in the tables of succession, and, consequently, the sons of such marriages were necessarily connected with the name of their maternal grandfather‡ (Michaelis, ut antea). It is some-

(which we have insisted upon, after Maimonides) founded on the inapplicability of the levirate law to uterine brothers (Ogeneal. p. 47).

* Mr. Greswell (Dissertations on the Harmony, vol. ii. p. 85 [2d edit.]) puts this very well, thus: 'The genealogy of Christ as descended from Mary would not be formally exhibited as His genealogy through Mary [because of Jewish usage excluding female names]; but rather as His genealogy through some one most closely connected with Mary; that is to say, through some one who stood, or might be considered to stand, in the same relation to the father of Mary as Mary herself. Now this could be none but her husband Joseph; to whom she was already contracted before the birth of Christ; and to whom she was actually united in marriage at the time of it.'

† So designated in Athenian law. An Athenian heir^{ess} was required to marry her nearest kinsman (see Smith's Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiqu., s. v. Epiclesus).

‡ In this, as in several other particulars, the Athenian law on the rights and duties of heir^{esses}

times said that the laws of Moses had by this time fallen into desuetude. This might have been often the case, but we believe that a conscientious observance of the still unrepealed Mosaic institutions was precisely that which distinguished from their laxer countrymen such worthy characters as the members of 'the Holy Family,' from whom was so soon to spring He whose delight it was to 'fulfil all righteousness' (comp. Matt. i. 19; Luke i. 6, 28, 30; Matt. iii. 15). We cease to wonder, then, with this view of Hebrew law, at the appearance of Joseph's name as the son of Heli, as well as the putative father of Jesus, for he was thus the legal link between Jesus and Heli, and all his ancestry (Luke iii. 23). In every respect but one the register is drawn up with legal precision; and the one exception does not vitiate the usage, but arises ex abundanti cautela, and from the special nature of a unique case. We refer to the inserted parenthesis ὡς ἐνομίζετο. The sacred writer thereby leaves room for the miraculous conception of our Lord, which it is very remarkable the Evangelists of the genealogies alone describe, thus stultifying emphatically the objection of Celsus and Strauss, who asked tauntingly, in the unity of the same unbelief, how Christ could be both the son of Joseph and the object of an immaculate conception? The same clause, ὡς ἐνομίζετο, serves (as it seems to us) another important purpose. As the ἐγέννησε of St. Matthew gave us the clue of our interpretation there, and assured us of Joseph's natural connection with that ancestry, so here the ὡς ἐνομίζετο colours, as it were, the entire pedigree, and gives to Joseph nothing but a legal relation both to Jesus and the long line which follows. And this suggests an argument, which in our view is irresistible, in proof that St. Luke gives us, in fact, the Virgin's lineage, although under the name of her husband. For as the parenthesis sets forth our Lord to be merely the reputed and not the actual son of Joseph, it thereby clearly implies that the genealogy which ensues cannot be the natural genealogy of both Jesus and Joseph; in other words, if it be a real genealogy in respect of either of them, it can only be an imputed one in respect of the other. But the clause ὡς ἐνομίζετο impresses a putative character on Joseph's place in it. Christ's, then, must be a real one, i. e., the genealogy must be his, connecting him naturally with all the names (except the single expressly putative one), which compose the stem. Now, how this natural connection with His ancestors is effected, no reader of St. Luke's two preceding chapters can fail at a glance to see. The real link is Mary, and her genealogy in chap. iii. is, in fact, nothing else than a document strictly correlative with the foregoing record of the immaculate conception.

Convergence of the two Genealogies.—The fifth of Lord A. Hervey's theses given above we accept in its conclusion, though of course not in its premiss. 'In point of fact' [he says], 'though not of form, both the genealogies are as much Mary's as her husband's.' Only, instead of inferring this from conjecture, we would conclude it from the facts of the genealogies themselves. In all the great names of the Lord's ancestry, the two lines converge—in Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and all the Fathers down to David, and again very remarkably in Salathiel and Zorobabel, and ultimately in Christ. The case of Salathiel we regard to be similar to that of Joseph. The son of Jechonias by birth (1 Chron. iii. 17; Matt. i. 12), he is yet called the son of Neri by St. Luke (iii. 27), in a legal sense, as having married the daughter of Neri. The two Evangelists represent Zorobabel as the son of Salathiel. They herein are agreed with Ezra iii. 2; Hagg. i. 14, and ii. 2. An unnecessary difficulty, as it seems to us, has arisen from the fact that in 1 Chron. iii. a Zerubbabel is mentioned as the son of Pedaiah, and consequently nephew of Salathiel, who was Pedaiah's elder brother. Lord A. Hervey supposes Salathiel had no son, but adopted his nephew (Genealogies, p. 100); others apply the expedient of a levirate marriage, as if Pedaiah 'raised up seed' to his deceased elder brother (Dr. W. H. Mill, p. 165). But what need is there of any such indirect interpretation? It cannot be unreasonable to take the literal scriptures concerned, and to assign, as they do, sons of the same name to the brothers Salathiel and Pedaiah. Surely you will not dim the lustre of the great 'governor of Judah' by entertaining the very simple and natural supposition that he had a first cousin called after his own name! How often family names run alike in proximate branches of a family is clear to any student of the genealogies, both of the Chronicles and the Gospels [the cases of the two Jehoram's and the two Ahaziah's, of the allied families of Ahab and Jehoshaphat, are some illustration of the tendency to repeat family names among near connections]. But a convincing evidence that two Zerubbabel's do occur in these passages arises from the completely different names, not only of their fathers, but also of the children, attributed to them (comp. 1 Chron. iii. 19, 20, with Matt. i. 13 and Luke iii. 27), and again of the remoter descendants (comp. 1 Chron. iii. 21-24 with Matt. i. 13-15, and Luke iii. 24-26).^{*} St. Jerome (Quest. Hebr. in lib. Paralip.), resorts to the expedient, which is as violent as it is unnecessary, of making Salathiel and Pedaiah one and the same person—a vir binominis. The divergence of the descent into the lines of Abiud (in St. Matt. i. 13), and of Rhesa (in St. Luke iii. 27), carries with it, to our mind, greater difficulty than the last point. Lord A. Hervey (Genealogies,

p. 111), supposes that Rhesa is not a proper name, but a designation of Zorobabel as 'head,' or prince of the captivity [חֹדֶק הַשָּׁבוּעַ], and thus, by identifying the Abiud of Matt. i. 13 with the Juda of Luke iii. 26, and by supposing Joanna to be omitted in the list of the first gospel, he effects a convergence of four generations [in Salathiel, Zorobabel, Joanna, Juda, or Abiud], in the two lines. There is no ground for this but the ingenuity of the writer, which is fond of making excursions among the Scripture genealogies. His characteristic weakness, in our judgment, is the readiness with which he seizes on like or identical names (or even elements of names), and thence concludes the identity of persons; forgetful of a fact, strongly attested in the genealogies, that similarity or sameness of names by no means implies identity, but only family relationship in those that bear them. Rhesa was always regarded as a man's name by such of the ancient writers as treated of the details of this subject. It occurs in St. Jerome's version (Opera, ed. Bened., vol. x.), and in St. Gregory Nazianzen (Carmina, vol. ii. p. 270, ed. Beued.), Τοῦ δ' ἀπο, Σαλαθιήλ, Ζοροβάβελ, Πησά, Ἰωάν; and in the Syriac version thus—ܠܗܝܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ, Resa filii Zorobabel; and so in the old Gothic, 'Rēfins, sunāus Zaurāubilis,' Massmann's Ulphilas, p. 200. If Πησά be a late form [ܡܫܐ or ܡܫܐ] of the Hebrew word שָׂרָא, which occurs as a proper name in Gen. xlii. 21, it may possibly indicate here that the bearer of this name was the eldest son of Zorobabel, the head of the family, which was now to be divided. (In Simonis Onomast. the word is defined by caput, i.e., primarius.) If so, he fitly hands on to his posterity and to the last of them, 'Mary's blessed Son,' the inheritance of David's elder son Nathan (1 Chron. iii. 5); leaving to his younger brother Abiud the function of transferring the younger Solomon's heritage to Mary's husband Joseph. According to a recent scheme (Smith's Dict. of Bible, i. 668) the genealogies converge in the third name above Joseph, which occurs in St. Matthew (i. 15) as Matthan, and in St. Luke (iii. 24) as Matthal, who are supposed to be from the similarity of the names one and the same person. We dismiss so precarious an hypothesis without discussion, and observe that Africanus (in Epist. ad Aristid. l. c.) and Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. i. 7) omit both Matthal's name and that of his father Levi, and make Melchi the father of Heli and grandfather of Joseph (Κατὰ Λουκᾶν ὁμοίως τρίτος ἀπὸ τέλους Μελέχι, οὗ υἱὸς δ' Ἡλὶ ὁ τοῦ Ἰωσήφ πατὴρ).^{*} St. Ambrose agrees

* Elaborate efforts are made by Dr. Mill (Panth. Prin. pp. 151-154), and Lord A. Hervey (Genealogies, pp. 115-127), to identify the proper names of the two families which occur in the passages respectively of the Chronicles and the Evangelists referred to in the text. These efforts seem to us to be failures. Pedaiah's 'obscure' line, as Dr. Mill calls it, is, after all, undoubtedly a different line from the illustrious one of Salathiel. St. Augustine (Quest. xlii. in Deut.), and Walafrid Strabo, suggest two Zorobabels also. Hottinger (De Geneal. Jesu Christi, Dissert. post., c. xx.), makes three Zorobabels. We think this equally repugnant to the plain statements of the Scripture which relates to this subject. Since writing the above we find our view substantially corroborated in a carefully argued Dissertation of Natalis Alexander (H. E. Vet. Test. ad Aetat. V., Diss. ix.), who cites Tostatus and Cajetan as agreeing with what we have advanced above.

* These two names, Μαρθὰρ τοῦ Λευὶ, occur again higher up the line, in ver. 29, and have been by some supposed to have passed by transcription erroneously from one place to the other. But all existing MSS. and versions read them in both places. 'It is strange,' says Dr. W. H. Mill (p. 188, note), that of the many ancient writers who follow Africanus and make Heli the son of Melchi, none before Bede should have remarked the omission: but that this did not proceed from their copies of St. Luke wanting these two names, we know for certain in the case of two of them at least; and may, therefore, not improbably suppose with Africanus, it would seem, in omitting these names; for he says (lib. iii. in Luc.), 'Lucas vero Joseph filium Heli, Heli autem filium Melchi esse descripsit.' Under this section of the convergence of the two Genealogies, we cannot but mention the addition to the two genealogies of SS. Matthew and Luke made by John Damascene (Orthod. Fid. iv. 15) in the first instance, and long afterwards modified by Grotius (Annot. in Luc. iii.) Damascene, omitting Matthat, and putting Melchi in his place, gives to this last a brother called Panther, whose son Bar-Panther begat Joakim, the father of the blessed Virgin Mary, second cousin, according to this view, of Joseph. The scheme includes the name Levi (omitted by Africanus) only as the father of Melchi, thus—

Grotius makes Matthan, Estha's first husband, die childless; Melchi, the second husband of Estha, is represented as the father of Jacob, Heli and Levi. Jacob the eldest is reckoned by levirate law as the son of Matthan, while the second Heli becomes the father of Joseph, who is transferred to Jacob (childless) as his legal son and heir. Levi, the third son of Melchi, has a son called Barpanther, who is the father of Panther [strange perversion of names!], whose son Joakim is the father of the Virgin Mary. Notwithstanding the high authority of Grotius with the promoters of the theory we have throughout been opposing, and in spite of our respect for his learning, we cannot help censuring this genealogical scheme of his as a fantastic conceit. We derive, however, from both it and that of which it is a parody (Damascene's) a confirmation of our theory, that one of the lines is undoubtedly Mary's—these writers prove the necessity of such an interpretation by actually devising a supplemental branch-genealogy, in order to include the mother of our Lord. How much more simple and congruous to apply to her at once one of the sacred originals!

Structure of the Genealogies.—St. Matthew formally divides his table into three sections, each containing fourteen names (i. 17). These sections of all. For Nazianzen gives St. Luke's genealogy complete, its last line being, Μελχι καὶ Δεὺλ καὶ Ματθᾶν, 'Heli, 'Iwothp (Carmina, as referred to in the text); St. Augustine also (Quaest. 46 in Deut., Opp., tom. iii. p. 573) equally mentions Matthat and Levi as the second and the third progenitors of Joseph.' Some have found a conjectural authority for the omission of these two names from Luke iii. 24 in Irenæus' enumeration of only seventy-two generations from Adam to Christ, which can only be verified by the omission of three names—these two and the post-diluvian Cainan (Iren. adv. Hær. iv. 15). Though the two names occur in all the now known MSS., and are read by the best editors, Bernard Lamy (Harm. p. 28, 31), as quoted by Galland in his great Bibl. Patr., tom. ii., supposes that the MSS. of the 3d century, when Africanus lived, did not contain them. This, however, is precarious conjecture.

are really chronological marks of the growth, power, and decline of the Jewish nation; progressing (1) from the great patriarch Abraham, to whom the promises were first made, to the great king David, to whom they were renewed; (2) from the consolidation of the royal power in David and Solomon, and its being put on its trial, to its overthrow by the Babylonians in the days of Jechonias (Jehoiachin); and (3) from the removal of the captive king to Babylon, to Jesus the Messiah, the fulfiller of the promises and the restorer of the kingdom. There are two ways of making up the three fourteens. The first (see the table in Dr. Robinson, Harm. of Gosp. [Tract Soc. ed.], p. 197) traces the first fourteen from Abraham to David inclusive, the second fourteen from David to Josiah inclusive, and the third fourteen from Jechonias to Jesus. The second method traces the first fourteen as before, but heads the second fourteen with Solomon, and ends it with the Jechonias of the 11th verse (whom some suppose to be Jehoiakim*), making the third fourteen commence with the Jechonias of the 12th verse and terminate in our Lord (For the list, see Dr. A. Clarke's Commentary, vol. v. p. 38). 'Because from Abraham to David inclusive the number of recorded names in the O. T. genealogies is exactly fourteen, the sacred author, parting from this main purpose of his genealogy, adopts a very common

* Though the great mass of MSS. gives the ordinary reading of the 11th verse as translated in our A. V., there are some indications that a very early text must have admitted the name of Jehoiakim previous to that of his son Jechonias; for Irenæus, in the passage we have already referred to (adv. Hær. iii. 29), seems to imply that Jehoiakim was inserted in his copy of St. Matthew; 'Joseph enim Joacim et Jechoniae filius ostenditur, quemadmodum et Matthæus generationem ejus exponit' [Codex D in Luke reads τοῦ Ἰεχωίου, τοῦ Ἰωακίμ, κ. τ. λ.]. Porphyry taunts the church for omitting the name; Eusebius says of Jechonias and Joacim, εἰς δὲ τῶν καὶ ὁ αὐτὸς διωνυφία χρόμενος; Hilary read the name of Joacim, and codices MU, and some thirty cursives (See Griesbach, Tischendorf [ed. 1859], and Alford [ed. 4]).

Hebrew usage . . . in making this remarkable double hebdomad of generations the measure of the period that follows from David to Christ—an interval which is twice as long as the other, and which divides itself into two periods, each equal to it.' Dr. W. H. Mill, from whom this last sentence is quoted, has a masterly vindication of this structural character of St. Matthew's genealogy from the aspersions of Strauss. He adduces instances of the Jewish usage of abridging and regulating pedigrees from the Scriptures and other works; and well argues that, as the omissions in genealogical lines have no tendency 'to deceive or to presume on the reader's ignorance,' they cannot be objectionable when resorted to for convenience, symmetry, or even graver reasons * [Panth. Prin. pp. 105-23]. Of the instances he adduces, we will only mention the abridged table of his own descent which Ezra gives [comp. Ezra vii. 1-5 with 1 Chron. vi. 3-15], in which he contracts the twenty-two generations intervening between Aaron and himself into sixteen; and the example produced by Schoettgen [Horæ Hebr. et Talm. vol. i. p. 1] thus: 'Synopsis Sohar, p. 132, n. 18, Ab Abrahamo usque ad Salomonem xv sunt generationes; atque tunc luna fuit in plenilunio. A Salomone usque ad Zedekiam iterum sunt xv generationes, et tunc luna deficit, et Zedekiae effossi sunt oculi.' Here we have the compression of actual generations into symmetrical sections, and a reason alleged, which, though fanciful, was meant to express (historically) a moral purpose. St. Matthew's genealogy being meant only to indicate Christ's legal descent, is not compromised by any omissions—the salient points of the line as developed in the history are carefully given, and they suffice to trace the legal connection of our Lord with his ancestors. St. Luke's purpose being to illustrate Christ's natural descent, omissions would have been fatal. This evangelist, therefore, supplies us with every generation in the ancestry of Jesus Christ, not only up to the primordial sources of the Jewish nation and its royal glory in Abraham and David, but up to the very origin of mankind, thus indicating the common interest of all in Him who came as 'a light to lighten the Gentiles, and to be the glory of His people Israel' (as Luke himself records His style, ii. 32). On the principle of this complete enumeration required in the third gospel, we prefer [with Lord A. Hervey] to obviate the great difficulty of the period between the Exodus and David containing but four generations, Salmon, Boaz, Obed, Jesse (comp. our Geneal. with Ruth iv. 18-22), by supposing the common chronology to be at fault, rather than [with Drs. Mill, Hales, and Kennicott and other writers] by assuming that the genealogies are defective,—defectiveness not being characteristic of St. Luke's register, which, in this period of more than 400 years (according to the ordinary chronology), contains no more names than St. Matthew's list. (See Lord A. H.'s Genealogies, chap. ix. pp. 204-276, a valuable portion of his learned work; comp. therewith Dr. W. H. Mill, pp. 123-137.) The following scheme represents the genealogy of our blessed Lord from David, after whom the divergence first begins:—

The descending mode of St. Matthew, and the ascending mode of St. Luke, have parallels in

* For example, it has been constantly held (See St. Jerome on Matt. i., and Ebrard, Wissens. Kritik d. Ev. Gesch. p. 192, as instances of ancient and modern authorities) that the omission of the three generations between 'Joram and Ozias' in Matt. i. 7, is in consequence of their issuing from the idolatrous Athaliah of the house of Ahab; as if, on the principle of Deut. vii. 3, 4, and Exod.

the genealogies of the O. T., which are largely enumerated by Surenhusius (Βίβλος Καταλλαγῆς, Thesis xxx., pp. 109, 110); one instance of each has been already adverted to above. The sacerdotal line in 1 Chron. vi. 3-15 is given in the descending form; whilst that in Ezra vii. 1-5 is recorded in the ascending method. Surenhusius'

xx. 3, the sacred genealogist would indicate the curse to the third and the fourth generations by erasing their names out of the lineage of Messiah.

concluding words are worth quoting here: 'Secundum duplicem hunc modum genealogia Jesu Christi quoque recensetur in Nov. Test. a Matthæo dextrum, a Luca autem sursum. Matthæus quidem dextrum recensuit, ut Judæis ad questionem responderet, qua illi quærebant an Jesus esset ex familia Davidis cui promissiones factæ erant, quique propterea erat veluti basis: Lucas vero sursum, quia persona Christi erat subjectum de cujus splendore, cap. ii. vers. 21-23, magnifice locutus erat.' On the import (in a theological sense) of the position of the Genealogy [in St. Matthew, before Christ's nativity; in St. Luke, at the threshold of his ministry], the reader is referred to Origen, Homil. 28 in Luc. (Opera [ed. Ben.], vol. iii. pp. 965, 966), among the ancients, and Bp. Cowper, Genealogie of Christ (Works, pp. 587-594), among the moderns. The unique word ἀγενεαλόγητος (Heb. vii. 3), and the equivalent phrase, μὴ γενεαλογούμενος (ver. 6), describe a point in the sacerdotal 'order of Melchisedec,' which is intended to illustrate one element of the superiority of Christ's priesthood over that of Aaron. These phrases mean without a pedigree [see margin of A. V.]; q. d., not standing in the public genealogical registers of the Levitical priests. Hence it is added (ver. 14): 'It is evident that our Lord sprang out of Judah; of which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priesthood.' 'The Messiah is high-priest, and yet not of the tribe of Levi; consequently the Messianic idea as such [and so far] involves a going beyond the law.' Ebrard on the Hebraeus [Clark], p. 224. Among the more eminent writers of recent times who have treated on this important subject, are—(1.) on the side of the theory that both genealogies belong to Joseph, Calvin, Grotius, Schleiermacher, Hug, Meyer, Patritius, De Costa, Mill, Alford, Ellicott, Lord A. Hervey; while (2.) in favour of the opinion which we have advocated, as most consistent with Holy Scripture, and with primitive opinion [Dr. Mill's reprobation of it, as 'a modern gloss,' is a blot in his valuable treatise], are Luther, J. J. Hottinger, Calmet, Spanheim, G. J. Vossius, South, Lightfoot, Surenhusius, Kidder, Michaelis, Kuinoel, Bengel, Olshausen, Wieseler, Ebrard, Kurtz, Lange, Auberlen (in Herzog), Hales, Greswell, Kitto, Robinson.—P. H.

GENERATION. Considerable obscurity attends the use of this word in the English Version, which arises from the translators having merged the various meanings of the same original word, and even of several different words, in one common term, 'generation.' The remark is too just that, in the literal translations of the Scriptures, the word 'generation' generally occurs wherever the Latin has generatio, and the Greek γενεά or γένεος (Rees's Ency., art. 'Generation'). The following instances seem to require the original words to be understood in some or other of their derivative senses—Gen. ii. 4, 'These are the generations' (יְהוֹרֵד; Sept. ἡ βίβλος γενέσεως; Vulg. generationes), rather 'origin,' 'history,' etc. The same Greek words, Matt. i. 1, are rendered 'genealogy,' etc., by recent translators; Campbell has 'lineage.' Gen. v. 1, 'The book of the generations' (סֵפֶר תּוֹלֵדֹת; Sept. as before; Vulg. liber generationis) is properly a family register, a history of Adam. The same words, Gen. xxxvii. 2, mean a history of Jacob and his descendants; so also Gen. vi. 9, x. 1, and elsewhere. Gen. vii. 1, 'In this generation' (בְּיָמֵינוּ; Sept. ἐν τῇ γενεᾷ ταύτῃ, Vulg. in generatione hac) is evidently 'in this age.' Gen. xv. 16, 'In the fourth generation' (דּוֹר; Sept. γένεδ; Vulg. generatio) is an instance of the word in the sense of a certain assigned period. Ps. xlix. 19, 'The generation of thy fathers' (דּוֹר אֲבוֹתָיו; Sept. γενεὰς πατέρων αὐτοῦ), Gesenius renders 'the dwelling of his fathers,' i. e., the grave, and adduces Is. xxxviii. 12. Ps. lxxiii. 15, 'The generation of thy children' (דּוֹר בְּנֵי; Sept. γενεὰ τῶν υἱῶν σου) is 'class,' 'order,' 'description,' as in Prov. xxx. 11, 12, 13, 14. Is. liii. 8, 'Who shall declare his generation?' (דּוֹר; Sept. τὴν γενεὰν αὐτοῦ τίς διηγήσεται; Vulg. generatio) Lowth renders 'manner of life,' in translation and note, but adduces no precedent. Some consider it equivalent to וָרֵי, ver. 10: γενεὰ (Sept.) answers to וָרֵי, Esther ix. 28. Josephus uses πολλὰν γενεάν, Antiq. i. 10. 3 (Hengstenberg, Christology of the Old Testament, vol. ii. p. 290, Edin. 1856; Pauli, Analect. Hebraicæ, p. 162, Oxford, 1839). Michaelis renders it, 'Where was the providence that cared for his life?' Gesenius and Rosenmüller, 'Who of his contemporaries reflected?' Seiler, 'Who can describe his length of life?' In the N. T., Matt. i. 17, γενεαί is a series of persons, a succession from the same stock; so used by Josephus (Antiq. i. 7. 2); Philo (Vit. Mos., vol. i. p. 603); Matt. iii. 7, γεννήματα ἐχιδνῶν, is well rendered by Doddridge and others 'brood of vipers.' Matt. xxiv. 34, ἡ γενεὰ αὕτη means the generation or persons then living contemporary with Christ (see Macknight's Harmony for an illustration of this sense). Luke xvi. 8, εἰς τὴν γενεάν τὴν αὐτῶν, 'in their generation,' etc., wiser in regard to their dealings with the men of their generation; Rosenmüller gives, inter se. In 1 Pet. ii. 9, γένος ἐκλεκτόν, is a 'chosen people,' quoted from Sept. Vers. of Is. xliii. 20. The ancient Greeks, and, if we may credit Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, the Egyptians also, assigned a certain period to a generation. The Greeks reckoned three generations for every hundred years, i. e., 33½ years to each. Herod. ii. 142, γενεαί τρεῖς ἀνδρῶν ἑκατὸν ἐτεδ' ἐστί, 'three generations of men make one hundred years.' This is nearly the present computation. To the same effect Clem. Alexandrinus speaks (Strom. i. 2); so also Phavorinus, who, citing the age of Nestor from Homer (Il. i. 250), τῷ δ' ἤδη δύο μὲν γενεαί, 'two generations,' says, it means that ὑπερβῆν τὰ ἐξήκοντα ἐτῆ, 'he was above sixty years old.' The Greeks, however, assigned different periods to a γενεά at different times (Perizonius, Orig. Egypt., p. 175, seq.; Jensiuis, Fercul. Literar., p. 6). The ancient Hebrews also reckoned by the generation, and assigned different spaces of time to it at different periods of their history. In the time of Abraham it was one hundred years (comp. Gen. xv. 16, 'in the fourth generation they shall come hither'). This is explained in verse 13, and in Exod. xii. 40, to be four hundred years. Caleb was fourth in descent from Judah, and Moses and Aaron were fourth from Levi. In Deut. i. 35, ii. 14, Moses uses the term for thirty-eight years. In later times (Baruch vi., in the Epistle of Jeremiah, ver. 2) γενεὰ clearly means ten years. In Matt. i. 17, γενεὰ means a single descent from father to son. Homer uses the word in the same sense (N. i. 250); also Herodotus (i. 3).—

GENESIS (Sept. Ἔνεσις), the first book of the Pentateuch is, in Hebrew, called בראשית, from the word with which it begins. This venerable monument, with which the sacred literature of the Hebrews commences, and which forms its real basis, is divided into two main parts; one universal, and one special. The most ancient history of the whole human race is contained in chapters i.-xi., and the history of Israel's ancestors, the patriarchs, in chapters xii.-l. These two parts are, however, so intimately connected with each other that it would be erroneous to ascribe to the first merely the aim of furnishing a universal history. The chief aim which pervades the whole is to shew how the theocratic institution subsequently founded by Moses was rendered possible and necessary. The book, therefore, takes its starting-point from the original unity of the human race, and their original relation to God, and proceeds thence to the interruption of that relation by the appearance of sin, which gradually and progressively wrought an external and internal division in the human race for want of the principles of divine life which originally dwelt in man in general, but which had subsequently been preserved only among a small and separate race—a race which in progress of time became more and more isolated from all the other tribes of the earth, and enjoyed for a series of generations the special care, blessing, and guidance of the Lord. The Mosaic theocracy appears, therefore, by the general tenor of Genesis, partly as a restoration of the original relation to God, of the communion of man with God, and partly as an institution which had been preparing by God himself through a long series of manifestations of his power, justice, and love. Genesis thus furnishes us with the primary view and notion of the whole of the theocracy, and may therefore be considered as the historical foundation without which the subsequent history of the covenant people would be incomplete and unintelligible.

The unity and composition of the work, which is a point in dispute among the critics in regard to all the books of the Pentateuch, have been particularly questioned in the case of Genesis. The question was raised whether the sources from which the writer of Genesis drew his information were written documents or oral tradition. Writers as early as Vitranga (Obs. Sac. i. 4), Richard Simon, Clericus, and others, though they were of opinion that Genesis is founded on written sources, did not undertake to describe the nature and quality of those sources. Another opinion, advanced by Otmar, in Henke's Magaz. ii., that Egyptian pyramids and other monuments of a similar nature were the sources of Genesis, was but transient in the critical world; while the attempt of some critics not only to renew the previous assumption that Genesis is founded on written sources, but also to determine more closely the character of those sources, has gained more lasting approval among the learned. Why different names of God are prevalent in different portions of Genesis is a question much discussed by early theologians and rabbis. Astruc, a Belgian physician, in his Conjectures sur les Mémoires originaux, etc., Bruxelles, 1753-58, was the first to apply the two Hebrew names of God, Jehovah and Elohim, to the subject at issue. As-truc's demonstration had many feeble points. He assumed that there had originally existed a number of isolated documents, which had subsequently, by the fault of transcribers, been joined and strung together in the present form of Genesis. Eichhorn's critical genius procured for this hypothesis a favourable reception almost throughout the whole of Germany. Eichhorn pruned away its excrescences, and confined his own view to the assumption of only two different documents, respectively characterised by the two names of Jehovah and Elohim. Other critics, such as Ilgen (Urkunden des Jerusalem Tempel-Archivs, 1798), Gramberg (Adumbratio libri Geneseos secundum fontes, 1828), and others, went still farther, and pre-supposed three different documents in Genesis. Vater went much beyond Eichhorn. He fancied himself to be able to combat the authenticity of the Pentateuch by producing a new hypothesis. He substituted for Eichhorn's 'document-hypothesis' his own 'fragment-hypothesis,' which obtained great authority, especially on account of its being adopted by De Wette. According to this opinion Genesis, as well as the greater part of the Pentateuch, consists of a great number of very small detached fragments, internally unconnected with each other, but transcribed seriatim, although originating in very different times and from different authors. This 'fragment-hypothesis' has now been almost generally given up. Even its zealous defenders, not excepting De Wette himself, have relinquished it. In its place the former 'document-hypothesis' has been resumed by some critics, simplified however and supported by new and better arguments. There is at present a great variety of opinion among divines concerning this hypothesis. The leading features of this diversity may be comprised in the following summary. According to the view of Stahelin, De Wette, Ewald, Von Bohlen, Tuch, and others, Genesis is founded on two principal original documents. That of Elohim is closely connected in its parts, and forms a whole, while that of Jehovah is a mere complementary document, supplying details at those points where the former is abrupt and deficient, etc. These two documents are said to have been subsequently combined by the hand of an editor so ably, as often to render their separation difficult, if not altogether impossible. But Kanke, Hengstenberg, Drechsler, Havernick, and others, maintain that Genesis is a book closely connected in all its parts, and composed by only one author, while the use of the two different names of God is not owing to two different sources on which Genesis is founded, but solely to the different significations of these two names. The use of each of the two names, Jehovah and Elohim, is everywhere in Genesis adapted to the sense of the passages in which the writer has purposely inserted the one name or the other. This point of view is the more to be considered, as it is the peculiar object of the author to point out in Genesis the gradual and progressive development of the divine revelations. The opponents have in vain attempted to discover in Genesis a few contradictions indicative of different documents in it; their very admission, that a fixed plan and able compilation visibly pervade the whole of the book, is in itself a refutation of such supposed contradictions, since it is hardly to be conceived that an editor or compiler who has shown so much skill and anxiety to give unity to the book should have cared so little about the removal of those contradictions. The whole of Genesis is pervaded by such a freedom in the selection and treatment of the existing traditions, such an absence of all trace of any previous source or documents which might in some measure have confined the writer within certain limits of views and expressions, as to render it quite impracticable to separate and fix upon them specifically, even if there were portions in Genesis drawn from earlier written documents.

That first question concerning the unity of the book is closely connected with another question respecting its authenticity, or whether Moses was the author of Genesis. We confine ourselves here to only a few remarks on the authenticity of Genesis in particular, and refer the reader for further information to the article PENTATEUCH. Some critics have attempted to ascertain the period when Genesis was composed, from a few passages in it which they say must be anachronisms, if Moses was really the author of the book (v. ex. gr. Tuch, Commentar über Genesis, p. lxxxv. sq.) Among such passages are, in particular, Gen. xii. 6; xiii. 7; 'And the Canaanite was then in the land.' This remark, they say, could only have been made by a writer who lived in Palestine after the extirpation of the Canaanites. But the sense of the passage is not that the Canaanites had not as yet been extirpated, but merely that Abraham, on his arrival in Canaan, had already found there the Canaanites. This notice was necessary, since the author subsequently describes the intercourse between Abraham and the Canaanites, the lords of the country. According to the explanation given to the passage by the opponents, such an observation would be quite a superfluous triviality. Also the name Hebron (Gen. xiii. 18; xxiii. 2), they say, was not introduced till after the time of Moses (Josh. xiv. 15; xv. 13). This, however, does not prove anything, since Hebron was the original Hebrew name for the place, which was subsequently changed into Arba (by a man of that name), but was restored by the Israelites on their entrance into Canaan. The opponents also maintain that the name of the place Dan (Gen. xiv. 14) was given only in the post-Mosaic period (Josh. xix. 47; Judg. xviii. 29). But the two last passages speak of quite a different place. There were two places called Dan; Dan-Jaan (2 Sam. xxiv. 6), and Dan-Laish, or Lehem. In Genesis, they further add, frequently occurs the name Bethel (xii. 8; xxviii. 19; xxxv. 15); while even in the time of Joshua the place was as yet called Luz (Josh. xviii. 13). But the name Bethel was not first given to the place by the Israelites in the time of Joshua, there being no occasion for it, since Bethel was the old patriarchal name, which the Israelites restored in the place of Luz, a name given by the Canaanites. Another passage in Genesis (xxxvi. 31), 'Before there reigned any king over the children of Israel,' is likewise supposed to have been written at a period when the Jews had already a king over them. But the broachers of these objections forget that this passage refers to those promises contained in the Pentateuch in general, and in Genesis in particular (comp. Gen. xxxv. 11), that there should hereafter be kings among the Israelites as an independent nation. In comparing Israel with Edom (Gen. xxxvi.), the sacred writer cannot refrain from observing that Edom, though left without divine promises of possessing kings, nevertheless possessed them, and obtained the glory of an independent kingdom, long before Israel could think of such an independence; and a little attention to the sense of the passage will shew how admirably the observation suits a writer in the Mosaic period. The passage (Gen. xv. 18) where the land of Israel is described as extending from the river of Egypt (the Nile) to the great river (Euphrates), it is alleged, could only have been penned during the splendid period of the Jews, the times of David and Solomon. Literally taken, however, the remark is inapplicable to any period, since the kingdom of the Jews at no period of their history extended so far. That promise must, therefore, be taken in a rhetorical sense, describing the central point of the proper country as situated between the two rivers.

The historical character of the contents of Genesis forms a more comprehensive subject of theological discussion. It is obvious that the opinions regarding it must be principally influenced by the dogmatical views and principles of the respective critics themselves. Hence the great variety of opinion that still prevails on that subject. Some, such as Vatke, Von Bohlen, and others, assert the whole contents of Genesis to be unhistorical. Tuch and others consider Genesis to be interwoven with mythical elements, but think that the rich historical elements, especially in the account of the patriarchs, can be clearly discerned. Some, again, limit the mythological part to the first two chapters only; while others perceive in the whole book a consistent and truly historical impress. The field of controversy is here so extensive, and the arguments on both sides are so numerous, that we must content ourselves in this article with a very few remarks on the subject. Genesis is a book consisting of two contrasting parts; the first part introduces us into the greatest problems of the human mind, such as the Creation and the fall of man; and the second into the quiet solitude of a small defined circle of families. In the former, the most sublime and wonderful events are described with childlike simplicity; while in the latter, on the contrary, the most simple and common occurrences are interwoven with the sublimest thoughts and reflections, rendering the small family circle a whole world in history, and the principal actors in it prototypes for a whole nation, and for all times. The contents in general are strictly religious. Not the least trace of mythology appears in it. Consequently there are no mythical statements, because whatever is mythical belongs to mythology, and Genesis plainly shews how very far remote the Hebrew mode of thinking was from mythical poetry, which might have found ample opportunity of being brought into play when the writer began to sketch the early times of the Creation. It is true that the narrations are fraught with wonders. But primeval wonders, the marvellous deeds of God, are the very subject of Genesis. None of these wonders, however, bear a fantastical impress, and there is no useless prodigality of them. They are all penetrated and connected by one common leading idea, and are all related to the counsel of God for the salvation of man. This principle sheds its lustrous beams through the whole of Genesis; therefore the wonders therein related are as little to be ascribed to the invention and imagination of man as the whole plan of God for human salvation. The foundation of the divine theocratical institution throws a strong light upon the early patriarchal times; the reality of the one proves the reality of the other, as described in Genesis.

The separate accounts in Genesis also manifest great internal evidence of truth if we closely examine them. They bear on their front the most beautiful impress of truth. The cosmogony in Genesis stands unequalled among all others known in the ancient world. No mythology, no ancient philosophy, has ever come up to the idea of a creation out of nothing. All the ancient systems end in Pantheism, Materialism, Emanation-theory, etc. But the Biblical cosmogony occupies a place of its own, and therefore must not be ranked among, or confounded with, any of the ancient systems of mythology or philosophy. The mythological and philosophical cosmogonies may have been derived from the Biblical, as being later deprivations and misrepresentations of Biblical truth; but the contents of Genesis cannot, vice versa, have been derived from mythology or philosophy. Moreover, only with the Biblical fundamental idea of the relation of God to his creatures, consequently only with the doctrine of creation out of nothing, is it possible to furnish an historical representation of creation. Every system deviating from this contains an internal contradiction against history, because it necessarily substitutes the idea of eternity for that of time; and consequently does not admit of any history, but only of either mythology or abstract reflection. The historical delineation also of the Creation and of the fall of man does not bear the least national interest or colouring, but is of a truly universal nature, while every mythus bears the stamp of the national features of the nation and country where it originated and found development. All mythi are subject to continual development and variations, but among the Hebrews the accounts in Genesis stand firm and immutable for all times, without the least thing being added or altered in them for the purpose of further development, even by the N. T. What a solid guarantee must there be in this foundation of all subsequent revelations, since it has been admitted and maintained by all generations with such immovable firmness! The ancient heathen traditions coincide in many points with the Biblical accounts, and serve to illustrate and confirm them. This is especially the case in the ancient traditions concerning the Deluge (Gen. vi. 9), and in the list of nations in the 10th chapter; for instance (Gen. x. 4), Tarshish is called the son of Javan. This indicates that the ancient inhabitants of Tarshish or Tartessus in Spain were erroneously considered to be a Phœnician colony like those of other towns in its neighbourhood, and that they sprang from Javan, that is, Greece. That they were of Greek origin is clear from the account of Herodotus (i. 163). Also (ver. 8), Nimrod, the ruler of Babel, is called the son of Cush, which is in remarkable unison with the mythological tales concerning Bel and his Egyptian descent (comp. Diodor. Sic. i. 28, 81; Pausan, iv. 23. 5). Sidon alone is mentioned (ver. 15), but not Tyros (comp. xlix. 13), which arose only in the time of Joshua (Josh. xix. 29); and that Sidon was an older town than Tyros, by which it was afterwards eclipsed, is certified by a number of ancient reports (comp. Hengstenberg, De Rebus Tyrionum, pp. 6, 7).

With the patriarchal history (xii. sqq.) begins an historical sketch of a peculiar character. The circumstantial details in it allow us to examine more closely the historical character of these accounts. The numerous descriptions of the mode of life in those days furnish us with a very vivid picture. We meet everywhere a sublime simplicity quite worthy of patriarchal life, and never to be found again in later history. One cannot suppose that it would have been possible in a later period, estranged from ancient simplicity, to invent such a picture.

The authenticity of the patriarchal history could be attacked only by analogy, the true historical test of negative criticism; but the patriarchal history has no analogy; while a great historical fact, the Mosaic theocracy itself, might here be adduced in favour of the truth of Genesis. The theocracy stands without analogy in the history of the human race, and is, nevertheless, true above all historical doubt. But this theocracy cannot have entered into history without preparatory events. The facts which led to the introduction of the theocracy are contained in the accounts of Genesis. Moreover, this preparation of the theocracy could not consist in the ordinary providential guidance. The race of patriarchs advances to a marvellous destination; the road also leading to this destination must be peculiar and extraordinary. The opponents of Genesis forget that the marvellous events of patriarchal history which offend them most, partake of that character of the whole, by which alone this history becomes commensurate and possible.

There are also many separate vestiges warranting the antiquity of these traditions, and proving that they were neither invented nor adorned; for instance, Jacob, the progenitor of the Israelites, is introduced not as the firstborn, which, if an unhistorical and merely external exaltation of that name had been the aim of the author, would have been more for this purpose.

Neither the blemishes in the history of Abraham, nor the gross sins of the sons of Jacob, among whom even Levi, the progenitor of the sacerdotal race, forms no exception, are concealed.

The same author, whose moral principles are so much blamed by the opponents of Genesis, on account of the description given of the life of Jacob, produces, in the history of Abraham, a picture of moral greatness which could have originated only in facts.

The faithfulness of the author manifests itself also especially in the description of the expedition of the kings from Upper to Western Asia; in his statements concerning the person of Melchizedek (Gen. xiv.); in the circumstantial details given of the incidents occurring at the purchase of the hereditary burial-place (ch. xxiii.); in the genealogies of Arabian tribes (ch. xxv.); in the genealogy of Edom (ch. xxxvi.); and in many remarkable details which are interwoven with the general accounts. In the history of Joseph the patriarchal history comes into contact with Egypt; and here the accounts given by ancient classical writers, as well as the monuments of Egypt, frequently furnish some splendid confirmations. For instance, the account given (xlvi. 13-26) of the manner in which the Pharaohs became proprietors of all the lands, with the exception of those belonging to the priests, is confirmed by Herodotus (ii. 109), and by Diodorus Siculus (i. 73). The manner of embalming described in Gen. i., entirely agrees with the description of Herodotus, ii. 84, etc. For other data of a similar kind, compare Hengstenberg (Die Bücher Moses und Aegypten, p. 21, sq.)

GENEVA BIBLE. [ENGLISH VERSIONS.]

GENNESARETH, LAKE OF. [SEA.]

GENNESARETH, THE LAND OF (ἡ γῆ Γεννησαρέτ; Josephus, Γεννησαδῶ; later Hebrew, גִּנְנִיסָה). A small district of Galilee lying on the western shore of the lake, near Capernaum. Its situation is indicated by the narratives in John vi. 15-25, and Mark vi. 45-56. Jesus sent away the disciples from the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee to Capernaum. When on their passage He came up with them walking on the sea; they land about dawn (the fourth watch) on the plain of Gennesareth; and that morning the multitudes follow him in boats to Capernaum, and find him there. Josephus gives so graphic a description of Gennesareth that we have no difficulty in identifying it, though the name has long disappeared. 'Extending along the Lake of Galilee, and bearing also its name, lies a tract of country admirable both for its natural properties and its beauty. Such is the fertility of the soil that it rejects no plant, and accordingly all are here cultivated by the husbandman; for so genial is the air that it suits every variety. The walnut grows luxuriantly, together with the palm; and here there are figs and olives. It produces the grape and the fig during ten months without intermission, while the other varieties ripen the year round; for besides being favoured by the genial temperature of the air, it is irrigated by a highly fertilising spring called Capernaum. The tract extending along the shore of the lake which bears its name is thirty furlongs in length and twenty in breadth (Bell. Jud. iii. 10. 8).

On the west side of the Sea of Galilee is a crescent-shaped plain, extending along the shore from the cliffs at Ain et-Tin, the site of Capernaum, upon the north, to the hill behind Mejdal, the ancient Magdala, on the south, a distance of about three geographical miles. Its greatest breadth is nearly two. It is shut in by a semicircle of steep and rugged hills. Its soil is of extraordinary fertility; but only small patches of it here and there are cultivated. The rest is covered with tangled thickets of lote-trees, oleanders, dwarf palms, and gigantic thistles and brambles. The melons and cucumbers grown on the plain are still the best and earliest in Palestine. They are always the first in the markets of Damascus, Acre, and Beyrout. This may be accounted for by the great depression of the plain, it being almost on the level of the adjoining lake, and thus more than 600 feet below the ocean. (Robinson, B. R. ii. 400, seq.; Wilson, Lands of the Bible, ii. 136, seq.; Thomson, The Land and the Book, 347; Stanley, S. and P. 368).

Various conjectures have been made regarding the origin of the name Gennesareth. Some affirm that it is a corruption of the ancient Hebrew Chinnereth (כִּנְרֶת), the כ being changed to ג, and נ inserted by the Chaldee paraphrasts. Hence in the Targums we find גִּנְנִיסָה used instead of כִּנְרֶת (Lightfoot, Opp. ii. 222); and in the Apocryphal books and Josephus Γεννησαδῶ (1 Maccab. xi. 67). Others derive the name from גִּי, 'a valley,' and נָצַר, 'a flower or shoot;' and it would thus signify 'valley of flowers' (Hieronym. Opp., vii. p. 103, ed. Migne). Others again, and perhaps with more probability, derive it from גִּי and נֶזֶר, 'the gardens of the prince' (Lightfoot, i. 498).—J. L. P.

GENTILES (Heb. גוֹיִם; Sept. ἔθνη). The word גוֹי, a people, is derived from the obsolete verb גָּזַן, confusio, and was originally used in a general sense of any nation, including the Jews themselves, both in the singular (Gen. xii. 2 • Deut. xxxii. 28; Is. i. 4), and in the plural (Gen. xxxv. 11). It is also used poetically (like the Greek ἔθνη, Hom. Il. ii. 87, Od. xiv. 73, and the Latin gentes, Virg. Georg. iv. 430) of insects and animals (Joel i. 6; Zeph. ii. 14).

But as the sense of a peculiar privilege dawned on the minds of the Jewish people, they began to confine the word גוֹי to other nations, and although at first it did not connote any unpleasant associations, it began gradually to acquire a hostile sense, which never attached itself to the other terms, לְשׁוֹנוֹת, 'tongues' (Is. lxi. 18), or הָעַמִּים, 'the peoples.' In proportion as the Jews began to pride themselves upon being 'the first-born of God' (Exod. iv. 22), 'the people of the covenant,' 'a holy nation, and a kingdom of priests' (Exod. xix. 4), they learned to use the indifferent expression 'Goyim' to imply that all other nations were more or less barbarous (Ps. ii. 1, 8; ix. 6; x. 16; cvi. 47), profane (Jer. xxxi. 10; Ezek. xxxiii. 30), idolatrous, uncircumcised, and unclean (Is. lii. 1; Jer. ix. 26). So that age after age the word became more invidious, and acquired a significance even more contemptuous than that of the Greek βάρβαρος, which, being an onomatopoeia to imitate the strange sound of foreign tongues, is paralleled by the Hebrew לָעַן, לָעַן, 'a stammerer,' applied to foreigners in Ps. cxiv. 1, Is. xxviii. 11, xxxiii. 19. The word גוֹי gains its last tinge of hatred as applied by Jews to all Christians. Other expressions, intended to point out the same distinction, are used with a shade less scorn; such, for instance, as הַחֲצוֹנוֹת, οἱ ἕξω, 'those without,' which is Hebraistically used in the N. T. (1 Tim. iii. 9. See Otho, Lex. Rab. p. 111; Schoettgen, Hor. Hebr. in 1 Cor. v. 12. In Mark iv. 11 it is applied to the incredulous Jews themselves); and מַמְלָכוֹת, 'kingdoms' (1 Chron. xxix. 30). The Jews applied the terms אֲרָצוֹת, 'lands,' and, according to some Rabbis, מִיֵּינֵת הַיָּם, 'region of the sea,' to all countries except Palestine, just as the Greeks distinguished between Hellas and ἡ βάρβαρος (2 Chron. xiii. 9; xvii. 10; Ezra ix. 1; Luke xii. 30; Lightfoot, Centuria Chorogr. i., ad init.). Although the Jews thus separated between themselves and other nations, they hesitated as little as the Romans did to include themselves in the Greek term βάρβαρος (Joseph. Antiq. xi. 7. 1; cf. Justin Mar. Apol. i. 46. See BARBARIAN).

In the N. T. ἔθνη (although sometimes used in the singular of the Jewish nation, Acts x. 22; Luke vii. 5) is generally opposed, τῷ λαῷ Θεοῦ, to Israel, God's people (Luke ii. 32). But the most frequent rendering of גוֹי is (not ἔθνη, but)

Ἕλληνες, which is distinguished from Ἑλληνισταί (Acts vi. 1), and means 'Gentiles' rather than Greeks (except in Acts xviii. 17; Rom. i. 14), because of the general prevalence of the Greek language (Rom. i. 16, and passim; 1 Cor. i. 22; Gal. iii. 28, etc.). Thus Timothy, who was of Lystra, is called 'Ελλην (Acts xvi. 1, 3), and a Syrophœnician woman 'Ελληνίς (Mark vii. 26), and the Jews of the Dispersion, ἡ διασπορά τῶν 'Ελλήνων (John vii. 35). This usage is even found in the apocryphal writings, where ἑλληνισμός is made a synonym to ἀλλοφυλισμός (2 Maccab. iv. 13), and τὰ ἑλληνικά ἦθη are pagan morals (Id., vi. 9); and even so early as the LXX. version of Is. ix. 12, Ἕλληνες is adopted as a rendering of פְּלִשְׁתִּים, 'Philistines.' In the Greek fathers 'Ἕλληνισμός is used for the Pagan, in contradistinction to the Christian world (Justin Mart. Resp. ad Quest. 42, etc.), and they call their Apologies λόγοι πρὸς Ἕλληνας, or κατὰ Ἕλληνας (Schleusner, Lex. N. T., ii. 759).

It was perhaps impossible for the Jews, absorbed as they were in the contemplation of their own especial mission, to rise into any true or profound conception of the common brotherhood of all nations. Hedged round by a multitude of special institutions, and taught to regard the non-observance of these customs as a condition of uncleanness, embued, too, with a blind and intense national pride,—they often seem to regard the heathen as only existing at all for the purpose of punishing the apostasy of Judæa (Deut. xxviii. 49; 1 Kings viii. 33, etc.), or of undergoing vengeance for their enmity towards her (Is. lxiii. 6). The arrogant, unreasoning hatred towards other nations generated by too exclusive a brooding upon this partial and narrow conception, made the Jews the most unpopular nation of all antiquity (Tac. Hist. v. 2; 'gens deterrima,' Id. v. 8; Juv. Sat. xiv. 103; Quint. Just. iii. 7. 21; Plin. xiii. 9; Diod. Sic. Ecl. 34; Dio Cass. 68. 32; Philostr. Apolog. v. 33; Ammian. Marcel. xxii. 5, 'fœdentes Judæi,' etc., 'contrary to all men,' 1 Thes. ii. 15; see Winer, s. v. Juden). This disgust and scorn unfortunately fell on the early Christians also, who were generally confused with the Jews until the time of Bar Cochba (Tac. Ann. xv. 44; Suet. 16; Claud. 25). To what lengths the Jews were carried in reciprocating this bitter feeling may be seen in the writings of the Rabbis; the Jews did not regard the Gentiles as brethren, might not journey with them, might not even save them when in peril of death (Maimon. Rozach. c. 4, 12, etc.), and held that they would all be destroyed and burned at the Messiah's coming (Otho, Lex. Rab., s. v. Gentes, p. 231; Eisenmenger, Entdeckt. Judent. ii. 206, seqq.) There is the less excuse for this violent bigotry, because the Jews not only held that all nations sprung from one father (Gen. x.), but had also received abundant prophecies that God was but leaving his heathen children in temporary darkness (Acts xiv. 16), and intended hereafter, in His mercy, to bring them under the Messiah's sceptre, and make them 'one fold, under one shepherd' (Is. lx. 2, and passim; Mic. iv. 1; Zeph. iii. 9; Ps. xlv. 18; cx. 1, etc.) The main part of the N. T. history is occupied in narrating the gradual breaking down of this μεσότοιχον τοῦ φραγμοῦ (the strong barrier of immemorial prejudice which separated Jew and Gentile, Eph. ii. 14), first in the minds of the Apostles, and then of their converts. The final triumph over this obstacle was mainly due to the inspired ministry of him who gloried in the title of διδάσκα-λος τῶν ἔθνων (1 Tim. ii. 7; see Conybeare and Howson, i. 219, seqq.), who has also given, in a few pregnant sentences, the most powerful description of the blessings which God had granted to the Gentiles, the means of serving Him which they possessed, and the shameless degeneracy which had ensued on their neglect of the natural law, written on their consciences (Rom. i. 18-32).

In one or two places the words ἔθνη and ἔθνη are used as proper names. Thus we have 'Tidal, king of nations,' i.e., of several conquered tribes (Gen. xiv. 1, 2; Kalisch, ad loc.) In Josh. xii. 23 we find 'the king of the nations of Gilgal,' where Goyim is possibly the name of some local tribe (βασιλεὺς παμφύλλας, Interpr. Anon.) In Judg. iv. 2, 'Harosheth of the Gentiles' probably received its name from the mixture of races subjugated by Jabin, and settled in the north of Palestine (Donaldson, Jashar, p. 263). The same mixture of Canaanites, Phœnicians, Syrians, Greeks, and Philistines, originated the common expression

'Galilee of the Gentiles,' Γαλιλαία ἀλλοφύλων, LXX. Γ. τῶν ἔθνων, Is. ix. 1; Matt. iv. 15 (Strabo xvi. 760; Joseph. Vit. 12; Euseb. Onom. s. v., Winer, s. v. Galilæa).

On the various meanings of the phrase 'Isles of the Gentiles' (ἡ νῆσος ἡ τῶν ἔθνων, Gen. x. 5; Zeph. ii. 11; Ezek. xxvii. 15, etc.), see Gesenius, Thesaurus i. 38, and ISLE. On the Court of the Gentiles, see TEMPLE, and Joseph. De Bell. Jud. vi. 3.—F. W. F.

GENUBATH (גִּנְבָּת; Sept. Γαρβάθ), the son of Hadad the Edomite, by the sister of Tahpenes, queen of the Pharaoh of Egypt, to whom Hadad had fled when but a child to escape the vengeance of Joab (1 Kings xi. 14-20). [HADAD.] The name Genubath has been variously explained; some connecting it with the Heb. root גָּנַב, to steal, and supposing an allusion either to his being the product of a furtive amour (Clericus) or to his existence being owing to his father's having stolen away from the destructive fury of the Israelites (Thenius); others, with greater probability, finding in it an allusion to the Egyptian deity Cneph or Cnuphis. Genubath was weaned in the royal palace by the queen herself, and was brought up as one of the royal house. He is not again mentioned.—W. L. A.

GEOGRAPHY. Every student of God's Word will acknowledge the importance of sacred geography. All the historic narratives of the Bible, and most of its doctrinal truths, are closely connected with the countries in which they were enacted, and the places where they were revealed. Locality has given a peculiar tone and colouring to the whole literature and language of the Bible. Dr. Stanley has well said that, 'from Genesis to the Apocalypse there are—even when not intending, nay, even when deprecating, any stress on the local associations of the events recorded—constant local allusions, such as are the natural result of a faithful, and, as is often the case in the Biblical narrative, of a contemporary history.' Nor is this all. Many statements are incidentally made in Scripture which appear to indicate that the authors were acquainted with the leading facts of geographical science, both physical and political. While, on the other hand, passages have been cited from Job, Isaiah, Psalms, and Proverbs, which it has been thought betray a total ignorance of the simplest elements of geography. How are we to understand, and how are we to reconcile these seemingly conflicting passages? What view are we to take of the geographical knowledge of the inspired writers, and by what canons are we to interpret their words? Are we to believe, as some affirm, that they were ignorant of even the elements of geographical science, and are we to interpret their statements accordingly? Or are we to believe, as others state, that, whatever may have been their own knowledge, they conformed in their writings to the popular opinions and fallacies of their age? Or are we to believe that, under the teaching of the Spirit, they embodied scientific truth sometimes in popular, sometimes in poetic, and sometimes in highly figurative language? We shall best prepare the way for a satisfactory answer to these questions, by laying down one or two general principles.

It must be borne in mind that no part of the Bible was ever intended to furnish a systematic treatise on any of the physical sciences. The object of revelation is to convey to mankind truths which they could not of themselves discover, and which are essential to their salvation. In revealing these truths, the facts of science are often alluded to. Thus, in shewing that God is sole Creator, the history of creation is given; in shewing the origin of sin, a description of Eden is given; in shewing that God is a universal and just ruler, the history of the deluge, of the dispersion of the human family, of the destruction of Sodom, and of the Exodus, is given. In illustration of the same truth, allusions are made to the motions of the heavenly bodies, to the changes of the seasons, to the formation of rain and dew, to the clouds, lightnings, and tempests. Knowing the object of revelation, we should not expect such topics to be introduced in a purely scientific manner, or in strictly technical language; but, on the contrary, in a popular manner, and in such language as would be easily intelligible to those immediately addressed.

It must further be borne in mind that the Bible is from God, and that every sentence of it, when rightly interpreted, must be in absolute accordance with fact. We are warranted in concluding that wherever the heavenly bodies are spoken of, and wherever the structure, physical convulsions, and topography of the earth are alluded to, perfect accuracy is observed. It will not do to say that because the first principles of astronomy and geography were unknown to the ancient Hebrews, the inspired writers adopted popular fallacies. It will not do to plead that false views on scientific matters were permitted in the Bible, because true views would have been unintelligible. It will not do to argue that the sacred writers were inspired on points of doctrine, but not on points of science. It is true, they used popular language, just as scientific men use it now; and we must interpret such language in the Bible as we interpret it in popular treatises on astronomy, geography, or general subjects. It is true the ancient Hebrews may have attached to many passages meanings widely different from those the scholar attaches to them now—they may have thought that the sky was a solid vault, that the earth has foundations, that the sun rises and sets; but we are not concerned with the false interpretations of ignorant men; we have only to do with the ideas the Spirit of God intended to convey. It is well known that modern science has corrected the opinions of men in regard to many natural phenomena. The term which conveyed one idea in former times, conveys another and a widely different one now; and yet the term may be as proper and as definite now as it was then.

These principles afford the key to passages in Scripture often misunderstood and misrepresented. The statements in the Bible bearing upon science are not systematic, or technical; they are incidental, fragmentary, and popular. We can interpret them all in accordance with true systems of science; but we could not construct a complete system out of them. The sacred writers set forth incidentally some of the leading facts of geographical science.

1. The form of the Earth.—In one or two passages the true form of the earth appears to be indicated. Thus, in Is. xl. 22, 'He sitteth upon the circle (חֲוִי) of the earth' (also Prov. viii. 27). Rosenmüller (Biblical Geography), Kalisch (on Genesis), Gesenius (Thesaurus), and others, have concluded from a collection of sublime images from the Hebrew poets, that they believed the earth to be circular, rising out of surrounding ocean, and having the heavens spread over it as a canopy. They have argued that, because the sacred writers speak of the 'rising' and 'setting' of the sun, the 'foundations' of the earth, the 'pillars' of heaven, of Jerusalem being in the midst of the nations, they could have known nothing of the very rudiments of geography. Now such reasoning as this is opposed to all canons of sound criticism. If the writings of our own poets were dealt with in a similar manner, what would be the result?

2. The cardinal points.—Isaiah terms them 'the four corners (כַּנְפוֹת) of the earth' (xii. 11); Jeremiah, the 'four quarters (קְצוֹת) of the heaven' (xlix. 36). The east is קֶדֶם, 'before,' or פָּנִים, 'in front of,' because the person is represented as facing the east. The west is then אַחֲרֵי, 'behind,' also יָם, 'the sea,' because the sea was on the west of Palestine. The south was תֵּימָן, 'the right;' also נֹגַב, 'the dry.' The north was שְׂמָאל, 'the left.'

3. The division of the earth into land and sea.—This is indicated in Gen. i. 10. The ocean, containing great monsters, is often referred to; as in Ps. civ. 25, 26; Job xli. 1. Continents and islands are distinguished, Esther x. 1; Gen. x. 5; Ps. lxxii. 10; Is. lxvi. 19.

4. The great physical features of mountains, valleys, and deserts.—The mountains of Ararat, Lebanon, and Sinai, are specified; the valleys of Lebanon, and the Jordan; the 'great and terrible wilderness' (Deut. i. 19).

5. The difference of climates.—Job speaks of 'cold out of the north' (xxxvii. 9); and the heat of the south is alluded to by Job (xxxvii. 17), and by Luke (xii. 55).

6. The cradle of mankind was Central Asia.—The situation of Paradise is not known, but there can be no doubt as to the spot where the family of Noah settled after the flood. The ruins of Babylon still exist (Gen. xi.); and the seats of the great primeval kingdoms have recently been identified (Gen. x.; See Layard's Nineveh, etc.; Loftus, Chaldea, etc.)

7. The division of mankind into three branches, and the colonization of the various countries of the earth by them.—The 10th chapter of Genesis shews what a clear and comprehensive view Moses obtained, under Divine teaching, of the political geography and history of the whole ancient world. The great advances recently made in ethnography and comparative philology illustrate at once the completeness and the accuracy of the masterly sketch given by the Hebrew Lawgiver (See Muller's Science of Language; Rawlinson's Herodotus). The seven families of the Japhethites who peopled Europe and Northern Asia have been identified (Kalisch on Gen. x.) Ham is the ancestor of all the southern nations of the ancient world. The numerous tribes that spring from him have found a name in history (Kalisch, l. c.) The Shemites were concentrated in Western Asia, chiefly between the Euphrates and the Mediterranean.

In the whole compass of ancient literature there is nothing to be compared with the 10th chapter of Genesis. The most extensive research in the world's earliest history, and among its earliest monuments, and the most scientific investigation of the peculiarities of its modern nations and languages, alike form illustrative commentaries upon that remarkable passage (See Bochart's Geogr. Sac.; Kenrick's Phœnicia; Vaux's Nineveh and Persepolis; Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians; and especially Rawlinson's Herodotus).

The Bible also abounds in topographical details regarding Palestine and the countries adjoining. These are, in many instances, minute and singularly graphic. Sacred geography may be said to embrace the whole world. It belongs, however, especially to Mesopotamia, Egypt, Asia Minor, Greece, and Italy; while its main interest is concentrated on Palestine and the Peninsula of Sinai (Stanley, S. and P., x.) Those Oriental travellers and residents who have had the fullest opportunities of judging, and who have become distinguished for their powers of accurate observation, have repeatedly testified to the faithfulness of Bible descriptions, and the minute accuracy of Bible topography (See Robinson, B. R., preface; Wilson, Lands of the Bible, dedication; Stanley, S. and P.; Thomson, The Land and the Book, preface). The writer of this article can bear personal testimony to the same facts; and as he has visited nearly every known Scripture site in Syria and Palestine, and most of those in Asia Minor and Europe, he can speak with some degree of confidence. For fulness of detail in topography, for graphic sketches of scenery, for minute accuracy in the description of natural products, peculiarities of climate, and manners and customs, no history, ancient or modern, can be compared with the Bible.

While geographical allusions are spread over the whole Bible, there are a few books which demand special notice. Genesis, in addition to the narrative of creation, sketches the establishment of the primeval empires and cities, and then the travels of the patriarchs in Canaan. In Numbers and Deuteronomy we have accounts of the peninsula of Sinai, Edom, Moab, Gilead, and Bashan. Joshua is geographically one of the most remarkable books in the Bible. Ten chapters of it are devoted to a description of Palestine, in which not only are its general features and boundaries carefully laid down, but the names and situations of its towns and villages enumerated with a precision of geographical terms which invites and almost compels a minute investigation* (Stanley, Prof.) In Daniel we have a few notices of Babylon, and a prophetic allusion to the Babylonian, Persian, Grecian, and Roman empires. The first three gospels contain notices of the towns, people, and products of Galilee. The topographical notices of John are confined chiefly to Judæa. The references in the Acts of the Apostles extend to Northern Syria, Asia Minor, Greece, and Italy.

The Hebrews do not seem to have devoted any attention to geography as a science, though they were widely scattered at the commencement of our era, and occupied a distinguished place in literature. The Greeks probably led the way in systematic geography. The first map is said to have been constructed by Anaximander, about B.C. 600. Nearly a century later Hecataeus of Miletus wrote a geographical work entitled Πελοδος γῆς (Ukert, Geographie des Heec. und Damasces). These were followed by Strabo and Ptolemy. The Phœnicians and Egyptians were likewise distinguished as geographers. Ptolemy acknowledges that his great work was based on a treatise written by Marinus of Tyre (Heeren, Commentatio de Fontibus Geographicorum Ptolemæi, etc.) Pliny, the only Roman writer deserving of special mention in this place, was a mere compiler. As a geography his book is of little value (See Ukert, Geographie d. Griech. u. Römer; Mannert, Geographie, etc.) Sacred geography was not reduced to a system until a comparatively recent time. The Onomasticon of Eusebius and Jerome is an alphabetic list of places, with brief descriptions. The Tract of Brocardus, written in the 13th century, is little more than an itinerary. To Samuel Bochart, a French Protestant minister (born 1599), belongs the honour of writing the first systematic work on Biblical geography. His Geographia Sacra is a storehouse of learning from which all subsequent writers have drawn freely. Well's wrote his Historical Geography of the O. and N. T. in the beginning of last century. Reland's Palæstina, published in 1714, remains to this day the standard classic work. Dr. Robinson's Researches opened a new era in Biblical geography. It, however, is neither complete nor systematic; it is only a book of travels, with most important historical and geographical illustrations. Ritter's Palästina und Syrien aims at system and completeness, but it is too diffuse. It gives a résumé of everything that has been written on Bible lands. A systematic and thorough treatise on Biblical geography is still a great desideratum in our country's literature.

It is of importance to the Biblical student to have placed before him a condensed list of the more important works bearing on the subject of sacred geography. Such a list will now be given. It has been compiled with much care. To enumerate all the books written on Bible lands would be practically useless. Many of them have no value beyond the entertainment they may afford. Many are mere repetitions of their predecessors. The works given below are such only as the writer has found really useful. The dates attached are those of the editions in his possession, and to which reference is made in the geographical articles prepared for this work. More extended lists may be seen in Robinson's B. R. ii.; Kitto's Physical Geography of Palestine. For facility of reference the list is divided into three classes.

1. Ancient and Medieval writers who have incidentally furnished information on Sacred Geography. (1) Jewish—The Apocrypha; Josephus, Opera, ed. Hudson, 2 vols. fol. 1720; Traill's translation of the Wars (2 vols. 1851) contains important notes and illustrations. (2) Heathen—Herodotus, especially Rawlinson's translation, 4 vols. 1858-60; Strabo, Geographia, ed. Casaubon, 1587; Pliny, Historia Naturalis, ed. Sillig, 5 vols. 1831-36. Dio Cassius (1752, Hamburg) gives some short notes on Palestine. The few remarks in Tacitus and Livy are of little value. (3) Christian—Eusebius, Socrates, Sozomon, and Theodoret, in Historia Eccles. Scriptores Græci, 3 vols. fol. 1695; Jerome, Opera, ed. Migne, 9 vols. 8vo; Theodoret, Opera, ed. Migne, 5 vols. In the exegetical writings of Jerome and Theodoret are some useful notes; they both resided in Palestine. William of Tyre, Historia Belli Sacri; James de Vitry, Historia Orientalis, etc.—These two works, with several others, are contained in Bongers's Gesta Dei per Francos, fol. 1611. Chronicles of the Crusades, ed. Bohn, 1848, containing Richard of Devizes, Geoffrey de Vinsauf, and De Joinville.

2. Geographical Works and Itineraries.—Ptolemy, Geographia, fol. 1535; Tabula Pentingeriana, a rude chart of the Roman empire, made in the 3d century. Reland gives the part including Palestine. Eusebius and Jerome, Onomasticon Urbium et Locorum S. Scripture, ed. Clerico, fol. 1707 [last ed. by Larsow and Parthey, Ber. 1862]; Vetere Romanorum Itineraria, ed. Wesselingio, 1735, containing the important itineraries of the Bourdeaux pilgrim, and of Antonine, with Synecdæmon of Hierocles; Edrisi, Geographia Universalis, in Rosenmüller's Analecta Arabica, 1828; Topographical Index in Bohadinii Vita et Res Geste Saladani, ed. Leusden et Villemandy, 3 vols. fol. 1712; Sanson, Geographia Sacra, ed. Clerico, fol. 1704; Caroli A. S. Paulo, Geographia Sacra, ed. Holsten, fol. 1704; Cellarius, Notitia Orbis Antiqui, 2 vols. 4to, 1701-5; Wells, Historical Geography of the O. and N. T., 2 vols. 1819; Reland, Palestina ex monumentis veteribus Illustrata, 2 vols. 4to, 1714; Busching, Erdbeschreibung Palästina, Arabien, etc., 1785; Winer, Biblisches Realwörterbuch, 2 vols. 1847-48; Rosenmüller, *Bib. Maps.—The best small maps are those in Robinson's Researches and Porter's Handbook; Van de Velde's large map of Palestine is the most complete and accurate hitherto published.—J. L. P.

GEON. [GIHON.]

GEORGI, CHRISTIAN SIEGMUND, born at Luckau in 1702, was professor of theology at Wittenberg, where he died, September 2, 1771. He took a prominent part in the controversy between the Purists and the Hebraists, and published a considerable number of dissertations in support of the views maintained by the former party. Of these the most important are included in the following works:—1. Vindiciarum N. T. ab ebraismis libri tres quibus quidquid ebraismi a Thomâ Gatakero, Io. Vorstio, Io. Oleario reliquis græcæ novæ fœderis dictioni est adjectum, tum argumentis, tum testimoniiis ex probatissima antiquitate græcæ erutis diluitur, Francof. et Lips. 1732, 4to. 2. Hierocriticus N. T. sive de stylo N. T. libri tres, quibus dialectus novæ fœderis attica a Phrynichii, Thomæ magistri, Cl. Salmasii, etc., reliquorum depravati- omibus liberatur atque ab idiotismis, ionismis, doris-mis, æolismis, bæotismis, syro-chaldaïsmis, rabbinis-mis et persismis vindicatur, Witt. et Lips. 1733, 4to. 3. Hierocritici novi fœderis pars secunda, sive controversiarum de latinismis N. T. libri tres., Witt. et Lips. 1733, 4to. Of his other Biblical works the following may be mentioned: 4. An edition of the Greek Testament with theological and philological notes, Witten. 1736, 8vo. 5. Dissertatio de beati Lutheri versione biblicorum germanica omnium optima, Witt. 1737. 6. De corruptione canonis sacri impossibili, Witt. 1742, 4to. 7. Apparatus theologicus, philologicus ad Evangelia, 4 vols. Lips. Vol. I. 1745; ii. 1747; iii. 1750; iv. 1757; 4to. This work is highly commended by Walch (Bibl. Theol. iv. p. 1043).—S. N.

GEORGIAN LANGUAGE. The Georgian language, which is also spoken by the Mingralians, Lazians, and the Suani, belongs to the Iberian family. The chief characteristics of it are as follows. Its alphabet consists of thirty-five letters, it has no articles, the substantives have eight cases and no genders, the adjectives, when associated with nouns, are indeclinable, but when they stand by themselves are declined; the comparative is formed by the prefix u and the suffix si, and cardinals are obtained by prefixing me to the ordinals. It possesses eight conjugations with several minor subdivisions, and the different persons are indicated by terminations and personal prefixes; it has several forms for the preterite and the future tenses, and only one form for the present tense; three modes, viz., indicative, imperative, and the participle, and supplies the place of the infinitive by a nomen verbale; it has postpositions governing different cases, in addition to the prepositions, and can multiply verbs to any extent by the terminations deba and da, form abstracts from adjectives by the terminations oba and eba, as well as active personal nouns, adjectives—both active and passive—and diminutives, by various terminations and prefixes, and its construction allows many liberties. From the venerable old Georgian language a dialect developed itself, in the course of time, by the introduction into it of many Armenian, Greek, Turkish, and other foreign words, and by the viciation of the pronunciation and spelling of many expressions. The two dialects have distinct alphabets, the alphabet in which the old Georgian is written is called Kuzuri, i.e., the sacred, and consists of the letters invented by Miesrob, and the alphabet of the modern Georgian is called K'uduuli, and is supposed to have been invented by the Georgians themselves in the 14th century. The old language is the ecclesiastical or literary, and is employed in all sacred and literary writings, whilst the modern is the civil dialect, or the dialect of common life (lingua vulgaris); comp. Ersch und Gruber's Encyclopædie, s. v. Georgier, p. 192; Eichhorn, Allgemeine Bibliothek der biblischen Literatur, vol. i., p. 156, ff.—C. D. G.

GEORGIAN VERSION, THE, is one of the oldest versions of the Bible extant.

1. Name, date, and source of this version.—The Georgians call their Bible by different names—1. Bibbia, i.e., the Bible. 2. Zminda Zerili, the Holy Scripture. 3. Samkto Zerili, the divine Scriptures. 4. Zighni Zuclisa da akalio aghikmisa, the books of the O. and N. T.; and 5. Dabadaba, Genesis, after the first book of the Bible. The version is supposed to have been made about A.D. 570, when the Georgians, stimulated by the example of the Armenians [ARMENIAN VERSION], sent young men of talent to Greece to study the Greek language, who, on their return, translated the Scriptures and liturgical books of the Greek Church. The translation of the O. T. is made from the Septuagint, and of the N. T. from Greek MSS. of the Constantinopolitan family, and is composed in the ecclesiastical or ancient dialect [GEORGIAN LANGUAGE].

2. Text and editions of the version.—This venerable version has shared in all the troubles to which Georgia has been subject. The entire books of Maccabees and Ecclesiasticus were lost in the many revolutions of the country, passages disappeared from different parts of the volume, and the whole text got into a state of confusion. It was only in the beginning of the 18th century that Prince Vaktangh published at Tiflis the Psalms, the Prophets, and the New Testament, and split up the text into chapters and verses. Shortly after Prince Arcil, uncle of Prince Vaktangh, who fled from Kartel to Russia, undertook a revision of this version, making it conformable to the Russian translation as it then was, and divided it only into chapters, because the Russian translation was divided into chapters only. But this prince only lived to carry through the revision from Genesis to the Prophets, and to translate from the Russian Bible the lost books of Maccabees and Ecclesiasticus. His son, Prince Vakuset, was, however, induced by the solicitations of his brother, Prince Bachar, and the Georgian clergy resident in Russia, to continue the work of revision. He made the text conform still more to the Russian translation, newly revised according to the command of Peter the Great, supplied from this translation all the passages which were wanting in the Georgian version, made also the portions which his father had published conformable to this translation, and divided the whole into chapters and verses. He had Georgian types cast at Moscow, and at once began printing in that city; the correction of the press he committed to four native Georgians, and the first edition of the entire Georgian Bible appeared in 1743, Prince Bachar, brother of the editor, defraying the entire expense. From this edition the Moscow Bible Society reprinted the N. T. in 1816 under the superintendence of the Georgian Metropolitan Ion and of Archbishop Pafnut, with types cast from the very matrices which had been used for the former edition, and which had escaped the conflagration of the city at the time of Napoleon's invasion. Another edition was published in 1818 in the civil character. It is said that there have appeared more recent additions of various portions of this version both at Tiflis and in Russia, but there is no particular account of them.

3. Critical value of the version.—The value of this version, in a critical point of view, has been greatly impaired by the corruptions which it has suffered during the centuries of political changes to which the country has been exposed, and especially by the endeavour of its editors to make it conform to the Russian translation. It must not, however, be supposed that its value is entirely gone. Both Tischendorf (N. T. Græc. ed. 2d, præf. p. lxxviii.) and Mr. Malan regard it as a good auxiliary to the criticism of the Greek text. Indeed Mr. Malan, who has published an English translation of the Georgian version of St. John's Gospel, goes so far as to say that 'it differs from the Slavonic in many places in which it might be expected to agree, it has a character of its own, is a faithful version, and valuable for criticism' (The Gospel according to St. John, translated from the eleven oldest versions, etc., by the Rev. S. C. Malan, M.A., Lond. 1862, p. ix. note 3).

4. Literature.—A very interesting treatise on this version, containing a brief account of its history and publication, from the preface of Prince Vaktangh, was communicated by Professor Adler of Copenhagen to Eichhorn, who published it in his Allgemeine Bibliothek der biblischen Literatur, vol. i. p. 153 ff., and afterwards reprinted it in his Einführung in das Alte Testament, vol. ii. sec. 318, b, etc. Dr. Henderson, who had visited both Georgia and Russia, could do no more in his Biblical Researches and Travels in Russia, Lond. 1826, p. 518, etc., than give a literal translation of this account. A valuable work has also been published by Franz Carl Alter, entitled Ueber Georgische Literatur, Wien, 1798, in which is given an extensive collation of the various readings from both the O. and the N. T.—C. D. G.

GEPHEN. [VINE.]

GERA (גֵּרָא; Sept. Γῆρα), one of the Eney-Bin-yamin enumerated Gen. xlv. 21, as alive at the time of Jacob's going down into Egypt. In this list he appears as if collateral with Bela, but from 1 Chron. viii. 3 it appears that he was Bela's son, and so the LXX. correct it here. In this latter list the name Gera occurs three times among the sons of Benjamin (ver. 3, 5, 7). The whole passage is somewhat confused, and it has been supposed that all the three are to be resolved into one, the son of Bela. There was, however, a Gera later than this one among the descendants of Benjamin, Gera, the father of Ehud (Judg. iii. 15); and he may be one of the three here mentioned. In the list of Benjamin's posterity given (Num. xxvi. 38-40), Gera does not appear; an omission which some have accounted for on the ground that he had no children, others on the ground that he was not the head of a house, and so is included in the Belaites, both of which reasons may be coalesced into one. On the discrepancies in the Benjamite rolls see art. BECHER.—W. L. A.

GERAH (גֵּרָח; Sept. ὀβολός), the smallest piece of money among the Hebrews. Twenty made a shekel; one of them would therefore be worth three halfpence, according to the present value of silver (Exod. xxx. 13).

GERAR (גֵּרָר; Sept. Γέραρα), a town and district on the southernmost borders of Palestine, in the country of the Philistines, and not far from Gaza. It was visited by Abraham after the destruction of Sodom (Gen. xx. 1), and by Isaac when there was a dearth in the rest of Canaan (Gen. xxvi. 1). The incidents of their sojourn shew that the district was very fertile. It was the seat of the first Philistine kingdom we read of, and gave name to it. The intercourse, differences, and alliances of the Hebrew fathers with the king and people of Gerar form a very curious and interesting portion of patriarchal history. It was still an important place in later times, as we may gather from 2 Chron. xiv. 13, 14. According to the ancient accounts Gerar lay in or near a valley, which appears to be no other than the great Wady Sheriah (or one of the branches of it), that comes down from Beersheba; besides we know that it was in the land of the Philistines, and that it was not far from Beersheba when Isaac resided there (Gen. xxvi. 1, 20, 23; 26-33; comp. xx. 1). The name continued to exist (perhaps as a matter of tradition) for several centuries after the Christian era. Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast., s. v. Gerara) place it twenty-five Roman miles southward from Eleutheropolis; and Sozomen (Hist. Eccles. vi. 32; ix. 17) reports that a large and celebrated monastery stood there near a winter torrent. The abbot Silvanus resided there towards the end of the 4th century, and the name of Marcion, bishop of Gerar, appears among the signatures of the council of Chalcedon in A.D. 451. The name seems to have been afterwards lost, and Dr. Robinson was unable to discover any traces of it in the locality. Some local information respecting it may be seen in the Chevalier Van de Velde's Narrative of a Journey through Syria and Palestine.—J. K.

GERARD, GILBERT, D.D., was a native of Aberdeen, and received his education there. After spending some time as pastor of the Scotch Church at Amsterdam, he became Professor of Greek in King's College, Aberdeen, and in 1795 he became Professor of Divinity. He died in 1815. He wrote Institutes of Biblical Criticism; or Heads of the Course of Lectures on the subject read in the University, King's College of Aberdeen, 2d ed. Edin. 1808. The greater part of the first edition of this work was lost at sea. For the time at which it appeared this was a remarkable work. Bp. Marsh, says 'of general and elementary treatises there is none which is more to be recommended either for perspicuity or correctness than the Institutes of Biblical Criticism' of Dr. Gerard (Lectures, p. 169). A still more recent writer ascribes to it 'learning, ability, reflection, and research. His positions,' it is added, 'are generally sound and judicious, the arrangement good, the examples appropriate' (Davidson, Hermeneutics, p. 710). It may be added that the work contains very numerous references to authorities, which greatly enhance its value.—W. L. A.

GERASA, now JERASH (not named in the Bible*), was in the Decapolis, and formed the eastern boundary of Peraea. It lay on elevated ground, according to Ptolemy, in 68° 15' = 31° 45'. Its inhabitants were mostly heathen (Joseph. De Bell. Jud. i. 4. 8; iii. 3. 3; comp. iv. 9. 1; ii. 18. 5). Origen speaks of it as a city of Arabia (Γέρασα τῆς Ἀραβίας ἐστὶν πόλις), which arose from the fact that it was a border city of Peraea, and lay next to Arabia. After the Roman conquests in the East, the country in which Garasa lies became one of their favourite colonies, and ten principal cities were built on the east of the Jordan, giving the name of Decapolis to the land in which they stood. Garasa was one, but not the greatest of these. The place was taken by storm by Alexander Jannæus, who was actuated by a desire of gaining a large treasure (Joseph. De Bell. Jud. i. 4. 8; Antiq. viii. 2. 3). Alexander died near it while besieging Regaba

(Antiq. xiii. 15. 5). Before the place had time to recover from this calamity, it was included among the number of those cities which were burnt by the enraged Jews in their vengeance on the Syrians, and on the Roman power generally, for the massacre of a number of their nation at Cæsarea (Joseph. De Bell. Jud. ii. 18. 1). A terrible revenge was taken by other cities, but Gerasa is honourably excepted (De Bell. Jud. ii. 18. 5). Annianus, general under Vespasian, took the city; 'after which he set fire to their houses,' 'and what was remaining was all burnt down' (De Bell. Jud. iv. 9. 1). Gibbon enumerates this city among the line of fortresses from Bosra to Petra, which formed the frontier of the Syrian provinces in the lower empire. Baldwin II. of Jerusalem destroyed its castle in the year 1122 (Will. Tyr. p. 825; Histor. Hierosol. p. 615). This was the native place of Nicomachus Gerasenus. Coins of Gerasa may be seen in Eckhel (Num. Vet. iii. 350). Its ruins were first discovered by Seetzen, and have often been subsequently visited. They have been pronounced superior to those of Palmyra.

On approaching Gerasa on the southern side, Buckingham first saw a triumphal gateway, nearly entire, which was of the Corinthian order. Within this gateway, on the left, he observed a fine naumachia for the exhibition of sea-fights, the channels for filling which with water were still visible. Corn was growing near it. Passing on amid heaps of ruined fragments, he came to a second gateway. Entering the city through this its southern gate, he came into a large and beautiful circular colonnade of the Ionic order, having passed a peripteral temple, above which, on the left, was an open theatre. A long avenue of columns of the Corinthian order led through the whole length of the city. Climbing over huge masses of falling columns and masonry he noticed four columns on each side of the way of much greater size and height than the rest. Beyond this he came to a square, apparently once lined on both sides by an avenue of columns. He afterwards came to a portion of a semi-circular temple. A broken altar was near the ruins, on which was made out the name of Marcus Aurelius. Beyond this again were temples, colonnades, theatres, bridges, aqueducts, etc. These remarks will give an idea of the magnificence of these ruins, particularly when we add that the northern exit is a mile apart from the southern entrance. A necropolis lies not far from the northern wall, in which were found nearly a hundred sculptured sarcophagi above ground, having the appearance of having been ransacked for treasure. Near the necropolis were the remains of a small temple. The city stood on the facing slopes of two opposite hills, but, from the neighbouring heights, it appears to be seated in the hollow of a deep valley, encircled on all sides by lofty and verdant mountains. Near this spot is the modern village of Aioode. Some inscriptions found on the ruins may be seen in Buckingham's Travels in Palestine, p. 405.—J. R. B.

GERGESA (Γεργеса; Γεργασήνους). The reading of the Textus Receptus in Matt. viii. 28 is Γεργασήνους; 'and when he was come . . . into the country of the Gergesenes.' Origen says a city called Gergesa anciently stood on the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee (Opera, ed. 'De la Rue, iv. 240); and that beside it was shewn the precipice down which the swine rushed. The nature of Origen's argument makes this statement very doubtful. It looks like a bold hypothesis to get over a difficulty (See Alford, in loc.) Gergesa, however, is also mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome. The latter thus writes:—'Hodieque super montem viculus demonstratur juxta stagnum Tyberiadis in quod porci præcipitati sunt' (Onomast. s. v.) Thomson thinks he has discovered Gergesa at a ruin called Kersa or Gersa, on the bank of Wady Semak, east of the lake. He describes it as 'within a few rods of the shore, and an immense mountain rises directly above it, in which are ancient tombs. . . . The lake is so near the base of the mountain, that the swine rushing madly down it could not stop, but would be hurried on into the water and drowned' (The Land and the Book, p. 375). It has been stated above (s. v. GADARA) that the reading Γαδαρηνών has the highest authority, and consequently these conjectures are very doubtful (see, however, Elliott's Lectures on the Life of our Lord, 188, note; Van de Velde, Memoir, 311; Reland, 502, 807).—J. GERGESENES. [GADARA.]

GERHARD, JOHN, a learned Lutheran theologian of the 16th century, was born at Quedlinburg, the 17th October 1582. After receiving much benefit from the spiritual instructions of John Arndt at a time of mental depression and bodily disease, he repaired to the university of Wittenberg in 1599, where he studied philosophy and attended theological lectures; but was afterwards induced to study medicine contrary to his own inclination. His decided bent towards theology, however, soon prevailed. From Wittenberg he went to Jena, and devoted himself to the study of the Scriptures, the fathers, and Hebrew. Some time after he repaired to Marburg, then the most famous university for Lutheran theology. Leaving Marburg he returned to Jena, and was appointed superintendent of Heldburg in his twenty-fourth year. In 1615 he accepted a call to Jena, where he lived and laboured as theological professor and author during the remainder of his life. Great was his theological activity, and distinguished the reputation he acquired. Kings, princes, and dukes did him honour, consulting him on all matters, ecclesiastical and others. He received no fewer than twenty-four invitations to other places, but declined them all. His death took place on the 20th August 1637, when he was but fifty-five years of age. His health was never good; and he led a life of incessant activity, exercising great influence over the religious history of his own country. Gerhard was a modest, pious, peace-loving man, who had largely imbibed the spirit of his divine Master. Passing by his works on doctrinal and practical theology, which are very numerous, we may mention those belonging to the department of exegesis, of which the chief is his Commentarius in harmoniam hist. evangel. de passione et resurrectione Christi, 1617, 4to, a completion of the work begun by Chemnitz and continued by Lyser. His Commentarius in Genesin was published after his death, 1637, 4to; his Commentarius in Deuteronomium, 1638, 4to; Adnotationes in Epistolam ad Romanos, 1666, 4to; in Epistolam ad Colossenses, 1660, 4to; in utramque Epistolam ad Timotheum, 1643, 4to; Adnotationes in evangelium Matthæi, 1663, 4to; in Acta apostolorum, 1669, 4to; Adnotationes in Psalmos v. priores et in prophetas Amos et Jonam, 1663, 4to; Adnotatt. in Epistolam Judæ, Adnotatt. in Epistolam ad Hebræos, 1641, 1661, 4to; Comment. super 1 et 2 Epistolam Petri, 1641, 4to; De Sacra Scriptura interpretatione, 1610, 4to; Exegesis locorum theologicorum, 1625, 4to. He collected his correspondence with scholars and royal or distinguished persons in twelve large volumes.—S. D.

GERIZIM (גֵּרִיזִים; Sept. Γαριζὴν, Alex. Γαριζήν).

This mountain has obtained great celebrity from the fact of its having been the sanctuary of the Samaritans from about the fourth century B.C. till the present time. In the O. T. it is only referred to in connection with two events. When the Israelites entered Palestine the tribes assembled, in obedience to the commands of the Lord given by Moses, in the valley between the mountains of Ebal and Gerizim. There the law was read in the presence of the whole people, with the blessings and the curses attached to it. Six tribes, ranged along the slopes of Ebal, when the curses were read, pronounced with one voice the response, AMEN. Six tribes, ranged along the slopes of Gerizim, facing the former, when the blessings were read, responded AMEN. Moses had said, 'Thou shalt put the blessing upon Mount Gerizim and the curse upon Mount Ebal' (Deut. xi. 29; xxvii. 12; Josh. viii. 33). The difficulties, geographical and topographical, connected with this event, have been stated and solved in the article EBAL; and there, also, a description of the features of the mountain is given. The only other episode in O. T. history with which the name of Gerizim is connected, is the striking parable of Jotham, in which he exposes the folly of the Shechemites in choosing Abimelech for their ruler, and predicts the judgments in store for them on account of their ingratitude to the family of Jerubbael his father. The city of Shechem stood in the valley close along the base of Gerizim, the side of which rose over it in bold precipices of naked limestone. On the crest of one of those cliffs Jotham took his stand; and there, in the hearing of the people below, he spake his parable. The ascent is so difficult that ere any of the followers of Abimelech could climb the hill, he would be far away among the defiles of the neighbouring mountains (Judg. ix.)

Canon Stanley and others have attempted to prove that Gerizim was one of the very earliest sanctuaries in this country. He says, 'It is in the highest degree probable that here, and not at Jerusalem, was the point to which the oldest recollections of Palestine pointed as the scene of Abraham's encounter with Melchizedek, and the sacrifice of Isaac' (S. and P. 234). His arguments in favour of the former are far from being conclusive. The traditions of the Samaritans have little weight; and one cannot see why Abraham should have brought the rescued women and children, flocks and herds, and heavy plunder of the cities of the plain, all the way round to Gerizim. His natural route from Dan or Damascus was along the east bank of the Jordan to the plain of Sodom. And the narrative leads to the conclusion that he was going direct towards Sodom when the king 'went out to meet him.' This would place the 'valley of Shaveh' near, or in, the Jordan valley (Gen. xiv. 17; compare 2 Sam. xviii. 18; see, however, Stanley, S. and P. 246).

That Gerizim was the mountain in 'the land of Moriah,' on which Abraham was commanded to offer up Isaac, seems to be simply impossible. Abraham was undoubtedly at Beersheba when he received the command (compare Gen. xxi. 33, and xxii. 1-3, 19). It appears from the narrative that, on the third day, he reached the place, offered the sacrifice, and returned to the spot where he had left his servants. The distance from Beersheba to Gerizim is about 70 geographical miles, as the crow flies; which, in such a country, will give 90 of actual travel. Abraham's servants were on foot, carrying wood; Isaac was also on foot, and Abraham rode an ass; they could not, therefore, have travelled such a distance (see MORIAH).

The subsequent history of Gerizim is intimately connected with that of the Samaritans (SAMARITANS). The circumstances which led to the choice of this mountain as a holy place are alluded to by Nehemiah (xiii. 28), and fully stated by Josephus (Antiq. xi. 8. 2). A son of Joiada the high-priest had married a daughter of Sanballat the Persian Satrap, and was consequently excluded from the priest's office, and expelled from Jerusalem. Sanballat thereupon built a temple on Gerizim, and made his son-in-law high-priest there. He thought thus to divide the Jewish nation; and though unsuccessful in that, he attached the Samaritans to Gerizim, and excited a lasting enmity between them and the Jews (cir. B.C. 420). This temple was destroyed by the Jews under John Hyrcanus (Antiq. xiii. 9. 1, cir. B.C. 129). There is no evidence that it was ever rebuilt, though the Samaritans continued to worship on the spot. This illustrates our Lord's discourse with the woman of Sichar at Jacob's well. The well is situated in the opening of the valley between Ebal and Gerizim, close to the base of the latter; and from its mouth, where Jesus sat, the ruins of the temple on the summit were visible. How natural was the woman's question on finding He was a prophet, 'Our fathers worshipped in this mountain, etc.?' pointing, doubtless, both to the mountain and to the ruined sanctuary on its summit (John iv. 20). Gerizim continued to be both a stronghold and holy place to the population of Shechem for several centuries; as upon the coins of the city we find both mount and temple depicted (Reland, 1006). In A.D. 487 the Samaritans were driven from Gerizim, and a Christian church was erected on the site of their holy place. This building was frequently attacked by the enraged people, and the emperor Justinian, in order to defend it against them, caused it to be surrounded by a fortress (Procopius, de Edific. Justin. v. 7; Reland, l. c.) It appears that after the Mohammedan conquest both church and fortress fell to ruin; and the Samaritans were permitted to return to their old sanctuary, where they have ever since continued to worship, though there is neither temple nor altar on the spot.

The top of Gerizim is now covered with massive ruins, at one corner of which is a small Mohammedan Wely, with a white dome, visible over a large section of central Palestine. The ruins are evidently those of Justinian's fortress. The walls are thick, the masonry massive, and at the angles are square towers. In the foundations of the western wall there are some ten or twelve large stones, and beneath these tradition places the 'twelve stones' brought up by the Israelites from the bed of the Jordan (Josh. iv.) A little to the south of the ruins is a smooth surface of natural rock, oval-shaped, and declining towards an excavated pit. This is the Samaritan 'Holy of Holies,' toward which they turn in prayer. The spot where they assemble to eat the passover is about 200 yards distant down the western slope of the mountain. The writer was present at their feast in 1858. The whole community were assembled. The lambs, previously selected, were killed. A deep circular pit, lined with rude masonry, was then heated with wood like an oven. The lambs were taken and suspended to a stick laid across the mouth of the pit. The whole was then covered over and allowed to remain so till the flesh was roasted (Exod. xii. 9). All the Samaritans, men, women, and children, except such as are ceremonially unclean, partake of the flesh. They eat it 'in haste, with their loins girded, their shoes on their feet, and their staves in their hand (ver. 11). GERLACH, OTTO VON, born at Berlin in 1801; became in 1834 pastor of the St. Elizabeth Church in the suburbs of that city; was advanced to be Consistorialrath and Domprediger in 1847; and died 24th Oct. 1849. His energies were expended principally on the practical duties of his office; but he found time also for some literary effort. His most important work is his Heilige Schrift nach Luther's Uebersetzung mit Einleitungen und erklärenden Anmerkungen, 6 vols. 8vo, 1847-53, of which the 4th vol., concluding the O. T., is the production of Dr. Schmieder of Wittenberg. This work, intended chiefly for family use, has been extensively circulated in Germany, and a portion of it has been translated into English (Commentary on the Pentateuch, Edin. 1860). He published also Vollständige Auswahl der Hauptschriften Luther's mit Anmerkungen, Einleitungen und Registern, 24 vols. 1848, 2d edit.—W. L. A.

GERMAN VERSIONS. There is no certain trace of any attempt to translate the Scriptures into the vernacular dialects of the German people previous to the latter half of the ninth century. Though Charlemagne enjoined upon his clergy the study of the Bible and the delivering of expositions of it to the people in the vulgar tongue, there is no evidence for the assertion hazarded by Ussher (De Script. Vernac., p. 109) and others that German versions of the Bible were made by his order; nor is the statement that a Saxon poet had, by order of his son Lewis, versified the whole Bible (Flacius Ill. Catal. Test., p. 93) better supported. It is to the poetical narratives of the life of our Saviour which appeared after the middle of the 9th century, that the beginnings of Biblical translation among the Germans are to be traced. The Krist of Otfried of Weissenburg (ab. 860); the Heliand, by an unknown author, and perhaps about the same time, are the earliest documents of which anything certain can be said. Of both of these editions have been printed; the best are, of the Krist, that by E. G. Graff, Kön. 1831; and of the Heliand, those of J. A. Schmeller, with a glossary, Münch. 1840, and J. R. Köne, with a translation, Münst. 1855. Some fragments of a very ancient translation of Matthew have been published by St. Endlicher and H. Hoffmann, 1834, and by J. F. Massmann, 1841, from a codex in the library at Vienna; the dialect in this version is very rude, and, if not provincial, would seem to point to an earlier date than the ninth century. Versions of the Psalter seem to have been executed in considerable numbers in the tenth century; one of these by Notker Labeo, abbot of St. Gall, is given by Schilter (Thes. vol. i.), and others anonymous are to be found in Graff's Deutsche Interlinear versionen der Psalmen, Quad. 1839. A paraphrase of the Song of Songs in Latin verse and German prose, by William of Ebersberg in Bavaria (ab. 1080), has been edited in Schilter's Thes. i., and separately by Merula, Leyd. 1598, Freher, Worms 1631, and recently, with additional fragments of other parts of Scripture, by Hoffmann, Ber. 1827. This scholar has also edited, in the 2d vol. of his Fundgruben, a metrical translation of Genesis and part of Exodus, belonging to the same period or a little later. To the 13th century belongs the chronicle of Rudolf von Hohenems, which is a sort of poetical version of the historical parts of the O. T.; of this many MSS. exist, and an edition has been published, but from a bad text, by Schütze, Hamb. 1779. Several works of a similar kind, in which the Biblical narratives are set forth, sometimes with apocryphal additions, were produced about this time; of these one, which exists in various dialects and in numerous codices, is a version of the historical parts of Scripture in prose, composed partly from the poetical versions already extant, partly translated from the Vulgate (Massmann, Die Kaiserchronik, iii. 54). Formal translations from the Vulgate began now to be multiplied; of these MSS. exist, though the names of the authors have for the most part perished (Reiske, De Verss. Germ. ante Lutherum, 1697; Schœber, Bericht von allen Deutschen geschriebenen Bibeln, 1763; Rosenmüller, Hist. Interpr. v. 174, etc.) Out of these, though by what process we are unable to describe, came the complete version of the Bible in German, which was in the possession of the people before the invention of printing, and of which copies were multiplied to a great extent as soon as that art came into operation. Before 1477 five undated editions, the four earlier at Mayence and Strasburg, as is believed, the fifth at Augsburg, as the book itself attests, had been printed; and between 1477 and 1522 nine editions, seven at Augsburg, one at Nuremberg, and one at Strasburg, were issued. Several editions of the Psalter also appeared, and one of the Gospels, with the Pericope from the Epistles. Collectors tell also of a translation of Ruth by Böschenstain, 1525; of Malachi by Hetzer, 1526; of Hosea by Capito, 1527, and other similar attempts (Riederer, Nachrichten II., 80, ff.). An important place must be also assigned to the translation of the N. T. into Danish by Hans Mikkelsen, Leips. 1524; which, though avowedly 'ret efter latinen vdsatthe,' bears numerous traces of independence of the Vulgate, and of being made directly from the Greek (Henderson, Dissertation on Hans Mikkelsen's N. T., Copenh. 1813). Of translations into low German one was printed at Cologne 1480, another at Lubeck 1498, and a third at Halberstadt 1522.

2. Luther's Version.—The appearance of this constitutes an epoch, not only in the history of the church, but also in that of German literature and of the German people. Luther's version is a permanent monument of the author's ability and indomitable perseverance. Luther had few helps in his arduous work. His exegetical aids were limited to the LXX., the Vulgate, a few Latin fathers, the N. T. of Erasmus, and such Hebrew as could be learned from the imperfect elementary books then extant. He had, however, valuable coadjutors in Melancthon, Bugenhagen, Jonas, Aurogallus, and Creuziger, whom he constantly consulted, especially when any difficulty occurred. He had access also to the rabbinical expositions through some learned Jews. But the main burden of the work rested with himself, and it was to his own resources he had chiefly to trust for success. Of the patient toil he bestowed upon it some idea may be formed from what he himself says of his labours on the book of Job:—'On Job, M. Philip, Aurogallus, and I, worked so that sometimes in four days we had hardly succeeded in accomplishing three lines.' With what anxious care he sought to perfect his work may be seen from the MS. of the third part of his translation, containing Job, Psalms, and the writings of Solomon, still preserved in the Royal Library at Berlin, written in his own hand, and exhibiting the corrections which he made in the style and expression before sending it to press. Not unfrequently as many as three forms of expression, and sometimes more, occur, between which he hesitated before finally fixing on the one which he would print. He spent on the work in all twelve years. The N. T., completed by him in the Wartburg, appeared in 1522; the five books of Moses (Das Alte Testament. Deutsch. Th. I.) in 1523; the other historical books as far as Esther (Das A. T. Deutsch. Th. II.) in the close of the same year; Job, Psalms, and the Solomonic writings (Das A. T., Th. III.) in 1524; between 1526 and 1531 several of the prophetic writings were issued, and in 1532 appeared the collective body of the Prophets as Th. IV. of Das A. T. Deutsch. The Book of Wisdom was issued in 1529, and the rest of the Apocryphal books in 1533 and 1534. The whole Bible was thus completed, and appeared under the title BIBLIA: d. i. die ganze heilige Schrift. Deutsch. Martin Luther. Wittenberg. Gedruckt durch Hans Lufft, 1534. (Pischon, Die hohe Wichtigkeit der Uebersetz. der

H. S. durch Dr. M. Luther, Berl. 1834). Of this work thirty-eight editions were printed in Germany before 1580, besides seventy-two of the N. T., and innumerable reprints of other smaller portions (Panzer, p. 336).

3. Zürich Bible.—This is a combination of Luther's translation of the other books with a new translation of the prophetic writings by Con. Pellican, Leo Judæ, Theod. Bibliander, etc. It appeared in 1524, and was reprinted in 1527, and twice in 1530. In 1531 another edition appeared with a new translation of the poetical books (Panzer, p. 260). The Worms Bible, 1529, is a work of the same kind as the Zürich Bible.

4. Versions from Luther's Bible in the other Teutonic dialects.—1. Low German, by J. Hodderesen, 1533 and often; 2. Danish, N. T., 1524, Bible, 1550; this is found also in Hutter's Polyglott; 3. Swedish, N. T. 1526, by Laurentius Andreæ, Bible, 1541, by Laurent and Olaus Petri; 4. Islandic, N. T. 1540, Bible 1584, by Gudb. Thorlakson, Bishop of Holum; Dutch, N. T. 1526, Antw., printed by Liesvelt, whence this is called the Liesvelt N. T.; the whole Bible was translated anew after Luther into Dutch by Ad. Vischer in 1648, and this is the existing authorised version for the Dutch Lutherans; 5. Pomeranian, 1588.

5. Versions of the Reformed Church.—Of these the first was the production of David Pareus, and appeared in 1579. It was superseded by that of J. Piscator in 1602, of which many editions have appeared. A translation of the N. T., by Amandus Polanus, appeared in 1603. In 1665 a new translation for the use of the Swiss Churches appeared at Zurich, the authors of which were Hottinger, Suicer, Füsslin, and others. In Holland various attempts were made to produce versions direct from the originals. In 1556 J. Uitenhoven issued the N. T., and in 1562 the whole Bible; and in 1587 appeared the Bible translated by J. Hackius, which chiefly follows the Geneva [French] Bible.

6. Authorised Versions.—In the year 1618 the Synod of Dort appointed a commission of 22 members to prepare a new version; this appeared in 1637, and received the authorisation of the States General. This is the authorised Dutch version. The Danish version was completed in 1607 by P. J. Resen, and in 1647 appeared with the royal sanction, after it had been carefully revised by Hans Svaning, Archbishop of Zealand. The Islandic version received its permanent form in 1644 from Thorlak Skuleson, the grandson of Thorlakson, and his successor in the episcopate. The authorised Swedish version was completed under the auspices of Gustavus III.; it consists of a revised edition of the work of Andreæ and Petri, and appeared in 1618.

7. Roman Catholic Versions.—The earliest of these is the N. T. of Emser, 'nach lawt der christliche Kirchen bewerten Text, etc.', sine loc. 1527, fol., Leipz. 1529, 8vo, and often since. In 1534 the Bible of Dietsenberger appeared at Mayence [DIETENBERGER]; and in 1537 that of Eck at Ingoldstadt [ECK.] Previous to these, Casper Ulenberg had translated the Bible in accordance with the Sixtine text of the Vulgate, and this translation, revised by the Jesuits at Mayence in 1661, appeared as Die Catholische Bibel. Revised editions were issued by Ehrhard in 1722, and by Cartier in 1751; and it has been often reprinted both with and without the Latin text. More recent versions by Roman Catholics are those of Salzmann, Lux. 1770; Wittola, Vien. 1775; Weitenauer, Augs. 1777; Fleischutz, Fuld. 1778; Rosalino, Vien. 1781; Fischer, Prag. 1784; Braun, Vien. 1786; Lauber 1786; Mutschelle, Mun. 1789; Weyl, May 1789; Krach, Augs. 1790; Brentano, Dereser and Scholz 1790-1833 [see these names]; Babor 1805; Van Ess 1807 [Ess L. VAN]; Schnappfinger 1807; Widemann 1809; Kistemaker 1825; Scholz 1828. Of these the majority are confined to the N. T. The translations of Fischer, Braun, Van Ess, and Scholz, have been repeatedly issued. Gossner, pastor of the Bohemian Church in Berlin, published a translation of the N. T. from the Greek in 1815, which has often been reprinted.

8. Other Versions.—In 1630 J. Crell issued a German translation of the Bible in the interests of Socinianism; and in 1660 another, in the interests of Arminianism, was published by Jer. Felbinger. The Remonstrant party in Holland published a translation in Dutch, made by Chr. Hartsoecker, in 1680. In 1666 a Jewish translation of the O. T. into German was published by Joseph Athias; this, along with the versions of Luther, Piscator, Caspar Ulenberg, the Dutch A. V., and a version of the N. T. by J. H. Reitzen, printed in parallel columns, was published under the title of Biblia Pentapla, in 3 vols. 4to, Hamb. 1711. Of German versions of more recent date there are many. Those of Triller 1703; Reiz 1712; Junkherrot 1732; Heumann 1748; Bengel 1753; Michaelis 1769-85; Sillig 1778; Seiler 1783; Stolz 1795; the Berleburg Bible 1726, etc., belong to the Lutheran Church; those of Grynaeus, 3 vols. 8vo, Bas. 1776, and Voegelin Zur. 1781, to the Reformed. Belonging to the present century are the translations of Preiss 1811; Schafer 1816; Meyer 1829, [Richter and Pleissner] 1830; Boeckel 1832; Alt 1837; von der Heydt 1852; chiefly of the N. T. only. But all these yield in importance to the work of De Wette, prepared originally in conjunction with Augusti, 6 vols., Heidelb. 1809-14, subsequently wholly by himself, 3 vols., 1831-33, 4th edit. 1858. The Jewish version by Arnheim, Fürst, and Sachs, under the editorship of Zung, Berl. 1838, is also deserving of notice.

GERRHENIANS (Γερρηνῶν). The inhabitants of a town which is mentioned (2 Maccab. xiii. 24) as one of the limits of the territory over which Judas Maccabæus was appointed governor by Antiochus Eupator. As the other limit, Ptolemais, is in the extreme north of Palestine, it seems as if some town in the south must be here referred to. This conjecture is confirmed by a parallel passage in 1 Maccab. xi. 59, where it is stated that Simon was appointed governor from the Ladder of Tyre (a mountain so called on the north of Ptolemais) unto the borders of Egypt, ἕως τῶν ὁρίων Αἰγύπτου. The requirements of the passage seem, therefore, to be fully met by the town between Pelusium and Mount Casius, called Γέρρα by Strabo (xvi., p. 760), Γέρρον by Ptolemy (iv. 5. p. 103), Gerro by Pliny (N. H. vi. 29), and Γέρα by Sozomen (H. E. viii. 19), who states that it was about 50 stadia from Pelusium. Mr. Grove (Smith's Dict. of the Bible) objects to this identification on the ground that Gerrha and the neighbouring coast was at this time in the possession of Egypt. To this it may be replied that the expression ἕως τῶν Γερρηνῶν does not imply that the Gerrehnians were included in the district described, as is shewn both by the passage already referred to (1 Maccab. xi. 59), and by the corresponding passage in Josephus (Antiq. xiii. 5. 4), where the expression used is ἕως Αἰγύπτου.—S. GERSHOM (גֶּרְשֹׁם, a stranger here; * Γηρσάμ).

1. One of the two sons (the other was Eliezer) who were born to Moses in the land of Midian by Zipporah (Exod. ii. 22; xviii. 3). These sons of the great lawgiver held no other rank than that of simple Levites, while the sons of their uncle Aaron enjoyed all the privileges of the priesthood (1 Chron. xxiii. 14). The glory of being the children of such a father doubtless availed them more than the highest dignities; while the fact of Moses making no public provision for them is a collateral evidence of the divine authority under which he acted. [It is the same Gershom who is mentioned Judg. xviii. 30 as the father of Jonathan; the original reading there is Jonathan ben Gershom, ben Moshe; the substitution of Manasse for Moshe is accounted for in the Talmud (Baba, Bathra, f. 109, b) on the ground that Jonathan did the works of Manasseh, and so was ranked in his family. 2. (Γηρσώμ; Alex. Γηρσώμ) The descendant of Phinehas, and representative of his family in the time of Ezra (viii. 2).

GERSHON (גֶּרְשֹׁן, banisher; Sept. Γηρσών, Γερσών), eldest son of the patriarch Levi, born in Canaan before the going down into Egypt. He is only known from his name having been given to one of the three great branches of the Levitical tribe. The office of the Gershonites, during the marches in the wilderness, was to carry the vails and curtains of the tabernacle, and their place in the camp was west of the tabernacle (Gen. xlii. 11; Exod. vi. 16; Num. iii. 17). [In several passages this is spelt Gershom (1 Chron. vi. 16, 17, etc.; xv. 7).

GERSON, JOHN CHARLIER DE. One of the most celebrated men of the 15th century, and a great forerunner of the reformation, was born December 14, 1363, at Gerson, a small village in the diocese of Rheims. He was the eldest of twelve children, and was brought up by his parents in strict piety. Three of his brothers and four of his sisters took monastic vows. His paternal name was Charlier, but having entered at fourteen the College of Navarre in Paris, he adopted the addition de Gerson, in memory of his birth-place, and in token of the new life he embraced. He soon acquired distinction, and rose rapidly in the church. In 1392 he received from Pierre d'Ailly the degree of doctor; in 1395 he was appointed Bishop of Puy; in 1396 he became Bishop of Cambray, and subsequently Chancellor of the University of Paris.

Gerson took an active part in most of the controversies of the troublous times on which he was cast, for the most part aiming at promoting peace and healing the divisions of the church. He took a leading part in the council of Constance; and the greatest blot on his character is the share he had in the condemnation of Huss. At the close of the council, finding his efforts at reformation baffled, and disheartened by his repeated failures, Gerson retired as a pilgrim into Bavaria and the Tyrol, and finally visited Vienna, where Frederick of Austria made him a professor in the university. Here he wrote his treatise De Consolatione Theologiae, which has been often reprinted, and his monotessaron, a harmony of the gospels. In 1419 he quitted Austria and returned to France, on the death of the Duke of Burgundy, to seek an asylum in the monastery of the Celestines at Lyons. Here he wrote his commentaries on the Psalms, and spent his time in the education of young children, saying that it was with little children that the reformation of the church should commence. He instructed them in the rudiments of Latin and the gospels, and taught them to say in their prayers, 'O Lord, have mercy on thy poor servant John Gerson.' After completing a commentary on the song of songs, he died July 12, 1429, aged 66. Sursum corda was engraved on his tomb. The De Imitatione Christi has been ascribed to him from the fact of its first appearing appended to a manuscript of his De Consolatione Theologiae. It is still a matter of dispute; and France, Italy, and Germany, contend for the authorship of this famous work. Gerson was a noble character, eloquent, earnest, and of deep piety. His great aim was the reformation of abuses, discipline, and manners, the corruption of the clergy, the ignorance and venality of the prelates. The infallibility and inviolability of the Pope, were in his idea, gross superstition. He believed that the power to bind and to loose belonged to a general council, not to the Pope; he condemned the self-flagellation of fanatics, and strove to abolish annates, and extirpate simony. The best edition of Gerson's works is that by Du Pin, in 5 vols. folio, Antwerp, 1706.—S. L.

GERZITES. [GEZIRITES.]

GESENIUS, WILHELM, the eminent Hebrew scholar, was born at Nordhausen, in Hanover, 3d Feb. 1786, and died at Halle, 23d Oct. 1842. From the Gymnasium of his native town he passed to the University of Helmstadt, now defunct, and subsequently to that of Göttingen, where he studied theology. After fulfilling the functions of a Privatdocent at Göttingen for three years, he was appointed in 1809 Professor at the Gymnasium of Heiligstadt; and in the following year he was elevated to a theological professorship at Halle, where he continued to the end of his life. He devoted himself with great zeal to the duties of his chair, and became the most popular teacher of Hebrew and O. T. exegesis in Germany. He continued to prosecute with much diligence the study of Hebrew, and directed his attention to the preparation of works adapted to promote familiarity with that language. His earliest aim was directed to the improvement of Hebrew lexicography; before leaving Göttingen he had turned his mind to this subject; and he was no sooner settled in Halle than he set himself in earnest to accomplish what he had proposed. In 1810 appeared the first volume of his Hebräisch-deutsches Handwörterbuch des Alten Testaments, which was followed by the 2d vol. in 1812. This work, fol-duced between the author's 22d and 26th year, he was accustomed himself to regard in later years as a juvenile performance; but it was such a performance as secured for him at once a foremost place among Hebrew philologists, and its appearance constitutes an era in the history of Shemitic learning. In this field Gesenius continued to labour to the last; in 1815 he issued his Neues Heb. Deutsch. Handwörterbuch für schuler, of which new editions appeared in 1823, 1828, and 1834, under the title of Heb. und Chald. H. W. B. ueber das A. T.; and in 1833 appeared his Lexicon Manuale Heb. et Chald. in V. T. libros; but his great work in this department, and in which he was occupied at the time of his death, is the Thesaurus Philologicus Criticus Ling. Heb. et Chald. V. T., of which the first fasciculus appeared in 1829, the fifth in 1842, and which, completed by Rödiger, who added a sixth fasciculus (1853), occupies 3 vols. 4to. Of these works the first has been translated into English by Christopher Leo, 2 vols. 4to, Camb. 1825, the second by J. W. Gibbs, Andover 1824, and the third, with corrections furnished by the author, by Dr. E. Robinson, 1841. To the improvement of the grammar of the Hebrew also Gesenius set himself with much diligence and perseverance; and in this department issued the following works:—Hebräische Grammatik, Halle 1813, 13th ed. 1842, translated from the 11th ed. by Prof. Conant of New York, 1839 (3d ed. 1842, reprinted in London 1840); four editions, superintended by Rödiger, have appeared since the author's death, from one of which the translation by Mr. Tregelles is made; Heb. Lesebuch, Halle 1814, 6th ed. 1834; Geschichte der Heb. Sprache und Schrift 1815; Lehrgebäude der Heb. Sprache, 1817. Gesenius was the author also of the following works:—Versuch ueb. die Malterische Sprache, 1810; De Pentateuchi Samaritani Origine, Indole et Auctoritate, 1815; Der Prophet Jesaja, übersetzt, und mit Comment. begleitet, 2 vols. 1820 21; De Samaritanorum Theologia ex fontibus inditis, 1822; Carmina Samaritana interp. Lat. cum comment. Must. 1824; Palaeographische Studien ueb. Phönisische und Punische Schrift, 1835; Scriptura Linguaeque Phœnicia Monumenta quotquot supersunt, 1837; besides many articles on Biblical subjects in the Encyclopædie of Ersch and Gruber. Amongst those by whom service has been rendered to the cause of O. T. philology, no name stands higher than that of Gesenius. All he has written bears marks of careful study, is characterised by sound judgment and good sense, and is presented in a style remarkably pellucid and simple. It may be objected to his grammatical system that it is too artificial, and presents rather the grammarian's device than a scheme of the actual phenomena of the language—his multiplication of the declensions, for instance, to nine, and his distinction between masculine and feminine declensions is without support from the actual facts of the language; but there can be no doubt that his grammars are an immense improvement on all that preceded them, and have done more to facilitate and encourage the study of Hebrew than any that have appeared since. To his lexicographical works the only objection that can be offered is that they are confined exclusively to the Biblical Hebrew, and so still leave us without a complete Thesaurus of the Hebrew tongue. As an exegete Gesenius is strong only in philology and the other adjutorial branches of interpretation; he affords valuable help in reaching the meaning of the prophet's words, but often sadly fails in apprehending the significance of his thoughts. During his later years he gave much attention to paleography, and his contributions to this branch of inquiry are of first-rate excellence, and leave behind them all preceding works in the same department.—W. L. A.

GESHEM (גֶּשֶׁם), carcase; Sept. Γῆσδμ), one of the enemies of the Jews under Nehemiah (Neh. vi. 16). He was probably a Samaritan, although on some account or other designated an Arabian (Neh. ii. 19), and appears to have been a subaltern officer at Jerusalem. He opposed the designs of the Jewish governor, talking of them as seditious, and turning them into ridicule. Eventually he took part in the plots of Tobiah against the life of Nehemiah (Neh. ii. 19; vi. 2-9), about B.C. 445.—J. K.

GESHUR (גֶּשׁוּר; Sept. Γαρυαδ, Γεργαδ, Γεσφρ, Γεσφρ, Γεσφρ, and Γεσφρ), a small kingdom on the north-eastern border of Palestine beyond the Jordan. The inhabitants are called Geshurites and Geshuri (גֶּשׁוּרִי). The position of this little principality is clearly indicated in Scripture. It lay within the kingdom of Bashan and province of Argob, and was at the northern extremity of both (Deut. iii. 14; Josh. xii. 5). It was independent of Og's sovereignty; and the Israelites did not conquer it, though they appear to have so far subdued the people as to make them render a nominal allegiance. We read that Machir, the Manassite, 'took Geshur' (1 Chron. ii. 23), 'nevertheless the children of Israel expelled not the Geshurites; but the Geshurite dwell among the children of Israel until this day' (Josh. xiii. 13). This may account for the fact that while Geshur was geographically within Bashan, politically it was reckoned to Aram (2 Sam. xv. 8). It seems from the various references in Scripture that the Geshurites occupied a territory of great natural strength; and that thus, though small in number, they were able to defend themselves against all assailants. Reland thinks that Geshur of Bashan (Josh. xii. 5) was distinct from the Geshur of Aram (2 Sam. xv. 8). For this, however, there is no authority; and the whole tenor of the Scripture narrative seems opposed to it (Reland, 77, sq.). The view of Keil (on Josh. xii. 5), Rosenmüller (Bib. Geogr. ii. 227), and Gesenius (Thesaurus, s.v.), that Geshur lay along the east bank of the upper Jordan is opposed to the topographical details of the Bible, in which it is closely connected with Argob. Their chief argument is that Geshur signifies 'a bridge,' and there is a bridge on the upper Jordan; but this can have little weight.

The writer, after a careful survey of the whole country was led to the conclusion that Geshur embraced the northern section of the wild and rocky province now called Lejah, and formerly Trachonitis and Argob. It probably also took in the neighbouring plain to the north as far as the banks of the Pharpar, on which there are several important bridges; but on the approach of the Israelites, the people may have concentrated themselves in their rugged stronghold, where the Israelites deemed it more prudent to leave them than to attempt to expel them. The wild tribes that now occupy that region hold a somewhat similar position; being really independent but nominally subject to the

The Geshurites appear to have maintained friendly relations with the Israelites east of the Jordan; probably from mutual interest, both being extensive cattle owners. The community of occupation may have led to the alliance between David and the daughter of Talmi, king of Geshur (2 Sam. iii. 3). Absalom was the fruit of this marriage; and the wild acts of his life were doubtless to some extent the results of maternal training. After murdering his brother he fled to his uncle in 'Geshur of Aram,' and dwelt amid its rocky fastnesses till Joab came to take him back to his father (2 Sam. xiii. 37; xiv. 23; see Handbook for S. and P., 506).

2. Geshurites, a people who dwelt on the south-western border of Palestine, adjoining the Philistines (Josh. xiii. 2). They appear to have been nomads, and to have roamed over the neighbouring desert; though occupying permanently a portion of Philistia. 'David went up and invaded the Geshurites, and the Gézrites, and the Amalekites; for those nations were of old the inhabitants of the land as thou goest to Shur, even unto the land of Egypt' (1 Sam. xxvii. 8). Nothing more is known of them.—J. L. P.

GETHER (גֶּתֶר; Sept. Γατέρ), the name of the third of the sons of Aram (Gen. x. 23). The name does not elsewhere occur; nor have we any information as to the tribe that descended from him. Josephus (Antiq. i. 6. 4) makes him the ancestor of the Bactrians, and in the traditionary legends of the Arabs, one Ghathir (غاثير) appears as the source of the Thamudites (تَمُود), in Hedjaz and the Jadisites (جديس) in Jemama (Abulf. Hist. Antisl., p. 16). The Arab. vers. of the Polyglott has الجرامدة, the Geramaqa, a tribe which in the time of Mohammed must have inhabited the district of Mosul (Winer, s. v.). Bochart asks whether the river Centrites, mentioned by Xenophon (Anab. iv. 3, 1), and Diodorus Sic. (xiv. 27), and which lay between the Carduchians and Armenians, may not have derived its name from Gether; and Le Clerc finds a trace of the name in Cathara, a town on the Tigris (Ptol. v. 18). But all this is purely conjectural.—W. L. A.

GETHSEMANE (Γεθσημανή and Γεθσημανεί), a garden (ἀγρος, John xviii. 1), or field (χωριον, Matt. xxvi. 36), to which Jesus retired with his disciples on the night of his betrayal (Mark xiv. 32). Its name is mentioned by only two of the evangelists, Matthew and Mark. John describes its situation—'Jesus went forth with his disciples over the brook Cedron, where was a garden, into the which he entered, and his disciples (xviii. 1). The Cedron runs in the bottom of a deep glen, parallel to the eastern wall of Jerusalem, and about 200 yards distant. Immediately beyond it rises the steep side of Olivet, now, as formerly, cultivated in rude terraces. Somewhere on the slope of this mount Gethsemane must have been situated. The name Gethsemane appears to be derived from the Aramaic words, גֶּת שֶׁמָנָה, an 'oil press.' The garden probably contained a press for the manufacture of oil from the olives of the mount. Other etymologies have been suggested, but they are not so natural as the preceding (Poli Synopsis, in loc.) We learn from Luke that our Lord had been in the habit of retiring to this spot for prayer. He merely calls it (xxii. 40) ὁ τόπος, 'the place,' in allusion to κατὰ τὸ ἔθος of the preceding verse. John tells us that Judas 'knew the place; for Jesus oftentimes resorted thither with his disciples' (xviii. 2). We may conclude from this that it was a retired spot, at a sufficient distance from public thoroughfares to secure privacy, and yet easy of access.

Proceeding from the gate now called St. Stephens, a very ancient road winds down the bank to the bottom of the Kidron, crosses the dry bed by an old bridge, and then branches. One branch turns to the right, and sweeps round the shoulder of Olivet to Bethany and Jericho; the other runs straight up to the village on the summit. In the angle formed by these roads is situated the traditional Gethsemane. There can be little doubt that it is the identical spot mentioned by Eusebius in the 4th century, as 'a place of prayer for the faithful'; and by Jerome, as lying 'at the roots of the Mount of Olives, with a church erected upon it' (Onomast. s. v.; see also Itin. Hieros. ed. Wessel., p. 594; Reland, p. 587). The church is again mentioned in the 7th century; and the garden is spoken of by various writers during the middle ages (Robinson, B. R. i. 235). The tradition cannot be traced back beyond the time of Eusebius. To keep up the memory of 'holy places' was contrary to the spirit of the apostolical writers and their immediate successors. There is room for doubt whether the knowledge of the exact spot would be retained during the troublous times of the first three centuries. It was perhaps selected, like many other holy places, during the time of the Empress Helena. The site is not even a likely one—at the junction of two public roads within a few yards of each. The garden has recently been enclosed with a high wall. It is nearly square, about fifty yards on each side. Within it are eight venerable olive trees, whose massive trunks, now in many places decayed, and knarled arms, and sparse foliage, have all the marks of great age. These trees have been referred to by some writers as evidences of the genuineness of the site; but there are others a little farther up the valley of at least equal age. The garden is the property of the Latin monks; and the guardian pauvre unfortunately thinks it requisite to shew all pilgrims the 'grotto of the agony,' the spot where Judas betrayed Jesus, and the place on which the three disciples slept! GEZER and GAZER (גִּזְרִים, and with the pause accent, גִּזְרִים; Sept. Γαζέρ and Γαζηρά), an ancient royal city and stronghold of the Canaanites. When Joshua besieged Lachish, the king of Gezer came to aid that city, but was defeated (Josh. x. 33), and apparently slain, as his name is among those enumerated in Joshua xii. (ver. 12). The situation of Gezer is clearly indicated in several passages of the Bible. It lay on the northern border of Benjamin, between Bethhoron-the-nether and the sea; consequently in the Shephelah or maritime plain (Josh. xvi. 3). It was within the allotted territory of Ephraim, and was assigned from that tribe to the Levites (xxi. 21). The Ephraimites were not able to expel the Gezerites (xvi. 10); and the city remained a frontier fortress of the Philistines for some centuries. It became, like Gath, the scene of many a fierce contest between them and the Israelites (2 Sam. v. 25; 1 Chron. xx. 4). The Philistines were usually victorious on the plain, and the Israelites in the mountains. Gezer thus probably stood at the foot of the hills. We find David smiting the Philistines 'from Geba until thou come to Gezer' (2 Sam. v. 25); that is, till they got into the plain. At length, however, Pharaoh, king of Egypt, captured and burned Gezer, and gave it 'for a present to his daughter, Solomon's wife' (1 Kings ix. 15-17). After Solomon rebuilt it we hear no more of it in Scripture.

Gezer is sometimes written in the Septuagint Γαζάρα (Josh. xxi. 21, Cod. Vat.); and consequently we find this form adopted by the Apocryphal writers and Josephus. The city is frequently referred to in the wars of the Maccabees. In one place it is connected with Joppa (1 Maccab. xv. 28, 35); in another it is said to border on Azotus (Ashdod; xiv. 34). Josephus, who sometimes calls it Γαζάρα (Antiq. xii. 7. 4), locates it on the south-western border of Ephraim (v. i. 22). Eusebius and Jerome state that in their day it was a village (κώμη), four miles north of Nicopolis (Onomast., s. v. Gezer); and Van Senden has suggested its identity with the modern village of Kubâb, which stands on the top of a rocky tell. There is no ground for this beyond conjecture. Van de Velde thinks the royal city of Gezer must have been much farther south (Memoir, 315). If so, there must have been two Gezers, one in southern and the other in northern Philistia. It is possible, also, that the Gazara near Azotus may have been distinct from the Gezer of the Bible, for Azotus is twenty miles south-west of Nicopolis. No village or ruin has hitherto been discovered whose name would suggest identity with the ancient Gezer.—J. L. P.

GEZRITES. This is now the reading in the A. V. of 1 Sam. xxvii. 8; and from this it might be concluded that the inhabitants of Gezer were alluded to. The Hebrew text, however, has גִּרְזִיתִים, 'the Girzites'; and the context states that the Girzites, with the Geshurites and Amalekites, 'were of old the inhabitants of the land as thou goest to Shur, even unto the land of Egypt.' They are thus located on the extreme southern border of Philistia, and unless we suppose that the royal city of Gezer stood in that region, the Girzites could scarcely have had any connection with it [GEZER]. The spoil which David took from them would seem to indicate a pastoral people (ver. 9). They were probably a small nomad tribe who roamed over the southern desert, but who were either exterminated or dispersed by the repeated assaults of the Philistines, and eventually by David.—J. L. P.

GIANTS. The notices in the Bible of persons of unusual size and stature respect either individuals or races. We shall take the latter first.

1. The Nephilim. In Gen. vi. 4 it is said, in reference to the times preceding the flood, 'And there were giants (נפלים) in those days.' This word Nephilim the LXX. render by γίγαντες, and in this the vast majority of the versions concur. Aquila, however, gives οὐρανιότατες, οὐ βλαῖος, and Symmachus, οὐ δούλων, βλαῖος, as the meaning; and this has found many advocates (See Suicer, The. Eccles. in voc. Πῦας; Poole, Synops. in loc., etc.) Those who adopt this interpretation in general deny that the Nephilim were remarkable for excessive size or stature, and regard them simply as men fierce, bellicose, lawless, and oppressive. To this, however, there are two objections, which seem decisive. The one is that Moses evidently intends, by the statement in question, to set forth a peculiarity of the times of which he writes. 'In those days were the Nephilim (הנפלים, the well-known race so called) upon the earth;' phraseology which would not have been used had he merely meant to state that there were rude, ferocious, overbearing men on the earth, for such there have always been. The other objection is that where the word Nephilim again occurs, Num. xii. 32, 33, it undoubtedly designates a race of men of surpassing stature; so that this seems to be the proper sense of the word. In adopting this, however, the other is not necessarily excluded; rather, may we say, that the probability is, that their gigantic stature, their strength, and their pride, conspired to render them overbearing, cruel, and lawless. Nothing decisive can be gathered as to the meaning of the word from an appeal to etymology; for if, with the majority, we trace it to נפל, to fall, it remains uncertain with which of the meanings of this word it stands connected; whether that of falling upon, irruere as Aquila takes it, or that of falling away, apostate (comp. Syr. ܢܦܠ, or that of causing men to fall (Ibn Ezra, Kimchi). Hävernick (Einleit. i. 2, p. 264, ff.; E. Tr. p. 345, ff.) proposes to connect it with the mutually related roots, פל, פלל, פלל, which would suggest the meaning of something extraordinary marvellous, huge; and with this Fürst substantially concurs, comparing Sansc. balā, strength; pāla, Pers. balā, Lord; pīlu the elephant, Arab. فالا, to be thick or fat.* As to the common notion that these Nephilim were the fruit of the intercourse between the B'ney Ha-Elohim and the B'noth Ha-Adam, it may suffice to say that nothing of this is asserted by Moses; on the contrary, from the form of his expression, when he says 'also after that the sons of God had come in unto the daughters of men, etc.,' he would seem to intimate that the Nephilim were a distinct race from the children of such intercourse,

* In Job ix. 9 the Targ. gives נפלה, Niphla, as the rendering of the Heb. נכסל, and this has been held to support the meaning of giant attached to the word נפיל (Gesen.) But this proceeds on the assumption that Kesil there designates Orion, which is more than doubtful [ASTRONOMY]. The Syriac, however, uses the term ܓܒܪܐ, gaboro,

which had existed before them, and continued to exist after they appeared (see Calvin, in. loc.)

The progeny of these marriages the sacred writer describes as הנפלים. This the LXX. render by οὐ γίγαντες, and this has been urged as a reason for identifying them with the Nephilim. But the meaning which the LXX. have in this instance attached to the word נפיל is not the true meaning of that word. It occurs repeatedly in the O. T., and invariably signifies elsewhere one endowed with strength—a hero, a strong bold warrior—with the implication of violence or fierceness as connected with strength and power (comp. Judg. xi. 1; Ps. lii. 2; cxx. 4, etc.) There is nothing, therefore, in the use of this word to sustain the opinion that the giants were the fruit of intercourse between the sons of God and the daughters of men; the historian simply states that their children were the heroes of antiquity, men of violent and proud spirit. [For the meaning of B'ney Ha-Elohim here, see GOD].

2. The Rephaim (רפאים). These are mentioned along with the Zuzim and the Emim as among the inhabitants of Canaan at the time of Abraham's immigration, and as having their principal site at Ashteroth-Karnaim (Gen. xiv. 5). By the time of Moses the race was hastening to decay, for Og, king of Bashan, is mentioned as among the last remnants of it (Deut. iii. 11; Josh. xii. 4; xiii. 12). In the second of these passages Edrei is mentioned as also a site of the Rephaim. This once mighty race embraced different families, each of which had its own distinctive name. Thus, though in the earliest notice the Emim are mentioned as if distinct from the Rephaim, we read subsequently that the Emim were accounted Rephaim, though called Emim by the Moabites (Deut. ii. 11); we read also of the Zamzummim (Deut. ii. 19-21), probably the same as the Zuzim of Gen. xiv. 5 in the land of the Ammonites, as Rephaim; the Anaqim, also, belonged to this race (Deut. ii. 11), and probably, also, the Avim (Deut. ii. 23; comp. 2 Sam. xxi. 15-22) and the Horites (Gen. xiv. 6; Deut. ii. 12). Or these may be only different names of the same race viewed under different aspects. As to the meaning of the word Rephaim, if, on the strength of Deut. ii. 11, we take רפאים as a dialectic variety having the same signification, we shall attach to it some such meaning as awful, terrible, tremendous. The word רפאים occurs in the sense of terrific object (Ps. lxxxviii. 16), hence an idol as an object of dread (Jer. i. 38), and for the same reason disembodied spirits, ghosts (Job xxvi. 5; Is. xiv. 9; xxvi. 14, 19; Prov. xxi. 16). In this case רפאים may be traced to a root רפה, to terrify, and may be simply a designation, as applied to men, of such as are from any cause formidable to their fellow-men. From the manner, however, in which they are referred to in Scripture, and especially from theirs being ranked along with other national or tribal appellations, there seems little reason for doubting that there was a race of men bearing Rephaim as their distinctive name, and each of whom was a Rapha (רפה, comp. 2 Sam. xxi. 16, ff.) That they were men above the ordinary stature is evident from Deut. ii. 10, for though רם (A. V. 'tall') there used may be taken as describing mental rather than physical elevation—hauteur rather than height—this is not its proper meaning; and as the Anaqim were undoubtedly chiefly remarkable in the eyes of the Israelites from their great height (comp. Num. xiii. 32, 33; Deut. i. 28; ix. 2), the probable inference is that the Rephaim were men of gigantic stature; though it does not follow from this that the word Rephaim means giants.

Referring to the articles under the names of these tribes respectively for ethnological and general details, we confine ourselves here to the consideration of their claim to be regarded as giants. This claim there seems an unwillingness in many quarters to admit, chiefly on the ground that the existence of gigantic races of men has not been sufficiently established. If by this it be meant that no evidence exists of a size equal to that ascribed to Og, king of Bashan, Goliath of Gath, and other giants mentioned in Scripture being possessed by entire tribes, and propagated from generation to generation, the position must be at once admitted. But in asserting that the Rephaim were giants, it is not needful to claim for them a height and size approaching to monstrosity. A man six feet and a half high is a man greatly surpassing in height the average of mankind, and a whole community of men ranging from this height to that of seven feet would be universally regarded and spoken of as gigantic. But is the possibility of such a race incredible or without evidence? That tallness may be propagated from father to son no one can doubt; and that if tall men are matched with tall women a race of tall persons will be the result is equally certain; indeed it has often been remarked as one of the wise arrangements of Providence, that very tall persons do not incline to intermarry, so that, notwithstanding individual exceptions, the average height of the community remains steady. Wherever this disinclination is either by compulsion or by usage and family pride overcome, a race surpassing ordinary men in height is the result; as is seen in the descendants of the grenadiers whom Frederic of Prussia took so much pains to collect and to marry to tall wives, and in the chiefs of the Polynesian tribes (Cook's Voyager; Williams's South Sea Islands). Tribes of men exceeding considerably the average height are reported by travellers and naturalists; the Patagonians, whose height varies from six to seven feet, the Guayaquils and Paraguas, whose height is six feet and a half, and the Carabees of Cumana (Prichard, Researches, vol. i. bk. ii., ch. iv. sec. 8; vol. v. p. 489). These instances sufficiently prove that races above the average height exist, and may be propagated; so that there is no ground for denying the Biblical statement concerning the Nephilim and the Rephaim as physiologically unsupported. There seems truth and point in the remark with which Augustine concludes his observations on this part of Scripture: "Nec mirandum est quod gigantes nasci potuerunt. . . . Quos propterea creare placuit Creatori ut etiam hinc ostenderetur non solum pulchritudines, verum etiam magnitudines et fortitudines corporum non magnitudines esse sapienti, qui spiritalibus atque immortalibus, longe melioribus atque firmioribus et bonorum propriis, non bonorum malorumque communibus, beatificatur bonis" (De Civit. Dei xv. 23, Opp., vol. v. col. 853, ed. Basil. 1569).

The individual giants mentioned in Scripture are —

1. Og (אֹג, comp. ix. king, royal in Tkows ap. Manethon.), king of Bashan, one of the last (Deut.

iii. 11; Josh. xiii. 12) of the Rephaim, whose bedstead of iron (or rather perhaps his sarcophagus of ironstone or basalt) was preserved at Rabbath Ammon, and measured nine cubits in length by four in breadth. From this, however, no exact measure of Og's own height and size can be obtained, as these sarcophagi were made much beyond the actual size of the body they were designed to hold. [OG].

2. Goliath (גִּלְיָת) of Gath, of the tribe of the Anaqim; his height is said to have been six cubits and a span, and the staff of his spear like a weaver's beam (1 Sam. xvii. 4; 2 Sam. xxi. 19) [DAVID].

3. LACHMI (לַחְמִי), the brother of Goliath, slain by Elhanan (1 Chron. xx. 5) [ELHANAN].

4. ISHBI-BENOB (יִשְׁבִּי-בִנְנֹב), whose spear weighed 300 shekels of brass, and who was slain by Abishai (2 Sam. xxi. 16). He is described as בִּלְיָד, one of the descendants of the Rapha (שֵׁן עַקֵּי עַל תּוֹסֵי אֶקְרָבוֹסֵי טוֹט 'Paphd, Sept.), i. e., one of the Rephaim.

5. SAPH (סַפִּי) or SIPPAT (סִפַּי), also of the Rapha race, slain by Sibbechai in a battle between the Israelites and the Philistines (2 Sam. xxi. 18; 1 Chron. xx. 5).

6. A Philistine of great stature, whose fingers and toes were twenty and four, six on each hand and six on each foot, slain by Jonathan, the nephew of David (2 Sam. xxi. 20; 1 Chron. xx. 6). He also was a Rephaite.

All these are mentioned as peculiar cases, indicating that though the Rephaites had continued among the Philistines down to the time of David, it was only occasionally that the original type of the family showed itself. Such occasional monstrosities, both in individuals and in families, are recorded not only as belonging to ancient times, but even down to our own day. Porus, the Indian king, was five cubits in height (Arrian, Exped. Alex. v. 19); Columella (De Re Rust. iii. 8) and Solinus (Bk. i., ch. 9) tell us of a Jew who was taller than the tallest of the Romans; Pliny (Nat. Hist. vii. 16), says, 'our age has seen, during the reign of Claudius, the tallest of men, an Arab of the name of Gabbara [doubtless جبار, giant, which Pliny mistook for the man's name], who was nine feet and as many inches in height; and he goes on to speak of some still higher, whose bodies were preserved, 'ejus miraculi gratia,' in the cemetery of the gardens of the Sallusts. Josephus (Antiq. xvii. 5. 5) mentions a Jew named Eleazer, sent by Artabanus to Tiberius, who was seven cubits in height, and had on that account the cognomen of Gigas. Delrio (Not. ad Senec. Edipum, p. 39) says he saw in the year 1572 a man from Piedmont whose height exceeded nine feet. Parsons, porter to James I., was seven feet two inches, and a servant of Prince Charles at the same time was seven feet seven inches, and had not yet reached his full height (Hakewill, Apology, p. 189). Many similar instances, belonging to still more recent times, might be added; so that, without resorting to the dubious testimony of bones which have been disinterred, but which may have belonged to some of the larger mammalia, we have evidence sufficient to corroborate the statements of Scripture in the cases it adduces of individuals of gigantic stature (Huet, Demonstr. Evan-

GIBBETHON (גִּבְתֹּן; Sept. Γαβαθών), a city of the Philistines which was included in the territories of the tribe of Dan (Josh. xix. 44), and was assigned to the Levites (Josh. xxi. 23). It was still in the hands of the Philistines in the time of Nadab, king of Israel, who besieged it, and was slain under its walls by Baasha, one of his own officers (1 Kings xv. 27; xvi. 15). Nothing is known of its site.—J. K.

GIBEA (גִּבְעָא; Sept. Γαιβάλ; Alex. Γαιβὰδ), is mentioned (1 Chron. ii. 49), along with Macbenah, as places of which Sheva, the son of Caleb, was father or possessor [AB.] This is probably Gibeah of Judah, the modern Jeb'ali (Robinson, B. R., ii. 327).—†

GIBEAH (גִּבְעָה; Sept. Γαβὰδ and Γαβαών; also written גִּבְעָה in Judg. x. 10, 33). There were several cities of this name, which can only be distinguished by a specific title added, or by the scope of the context. The word signifies 'a hill,' and is always descriptive of the site.

1. Gibeah of Saul; also called Gibeah of Benjamin. The attention required to distinguish this city from two others in the territories of the same tribe, whose names are nearly similar, has already been pointed out [GEB]. During the time of the Judges, when the country was almost in a state of anarchy (Judg. xix. 1), Gibeah became the scene of one of the most abominable crimes, and one of the most awful tragedies, recorded in Jewish history. The story of the unfortunate Levite, the siege and destruction of Gibeah, and the almost total annihilation of the tribe of Benjamin, are well known (xix.-xxi.). The city soon rose again from its ashes, and had the honour of giving Israel its first king. It was the native place of Saul (1 Sam. x. 26; xi. 4), and the seat of his government during the greater part of his reign (xiv. 2; xxii. 6; xxiii. 19); hence its appellation 'Gibeah of Saul' (xv. 34). It was in Gibeah the Amorites of Gibeon hanged the seven descendants of Saul in revenge for the massacre of their brethren. The city was then the scene of that touching exhibition of maternal love and devotion, when Rizpah, the mother of two of the victims, 'took sackcloth and spread it for her upon the rock, from the beginning of harvest, until water dropped upon them out of heaven, and suffered neither the birds of the air to rest upon them by day, nor the beasts of the field by night' (2 Sam. xxi.). The last reference to Gibeah in the Bible is by Isaiah in his vision of the approach of the Assyrian army to Jerusalem (x. 29). The city appears to have lost its place and power at a very early period. Josephus mentions it as 'a village named Gabath-Saul, which signifies 'Saul's hill,' distant from Jerusalem about thirty furlongs' (Bell. Jud. v. 2. 1). Jerome speaks of it as 'usque ad solum diruta' (Opp., ed. Migne, i. 883). From that period, until discovered by Dr. Robinson, its very site remained unnoticed, if not unknown.

Four miles north of Jerusalem stands a bare conical hill called Tuleil el-Fâl ('the little hill of Beans'). It is made conspicuous over the whole country by a heap of ancient ruins forming a knoh upon its summit. The view from it is wide and wild, embracing the rugged table-land lying north of Jerusalem, and the whole eastern slopes of Benjamin and Judah. Upon this hill stood Gibeah. The arguments by which Dr. Robinson established this fact are given at length in his Biblical Researches (i. 577, seq.), and need not be repeated here. The ancient road from Jerusalem to Bethel and Shechem passes close along its western base, and Ramah is in full view on another hill two miles farther north (Handbook for S. and P., 325). The narrative of the Levites' journey is thus made remarkably graphic. He left Bethlehem in the afternoon to go home to Mount Ephraim. Two hours' travel (six miles) brought him alongside Jerusalem. Evening was now approaching. His servant advised him to lodge in Jebus; but he declined to stop with strangers, and said he would pass on to Gibeah or Ramah. The 'sun went down upon them when they were by Gibeah,' and they resolved to pass the night there (Judg. xix.).

The site of Gibeah was well adapted to form the capital of Israel during the troublous times of Saul, when the whole country was overrun by the hostile hands of the Philistines. It was naturally strong; it was on the very crest of the mountain range, and it commanded a wide view, so that Saul's watchmen could give timely notice of the approach of the enemy.

2. Gibeah of Judah. This city is only mentioned in Josh. xv. 57, and from the context we conclude that it lay north-west of Hebron. We may then identify it with the little village of Jeha, situated on an isolated hill in the midst of Wady-Musurr. Dr. Robinson suggests that it may be the Gabatha mentioned by Eusebius as twelve miles from Eleutheropolis (Bib. Rev. ii. 6; Onomast., s. v.); it is more probably that which Jerome refers to as near Bethlehem, in the tribe of Judah (Onomast., s. v. Gabathen).

3. Another Gibeah, in the tribe of Benjamin, is spoken of. In Josh. xviii. 28, it is joined in the enumeration with Kirjath; and in 2 Sam. vi. 3 we read, 'They set up the ark of God upon a new cart, and brought it out of the house of Abinadab that was in Gibeah (גִּבְעָה, Geba; Sept. Γαβαών). The same place is referred to in 1 Sam. vii. 1, where it is said the men of Kirjath-jearim brought the ark from Bethshemesh, and placed it in the house of Abinadab, in Gibeah (גִּבְעָה, A. V. 'in the hill'). The context shews that this Gibeah must have been so close to Kirjath-jearim as to be reckoned part of it (cf., ver. 3; 2 Chron. i. 4). Kirjath-jearim stood on the slope of a hill, and probably on the summit there may have been a suburb, or a small detached village called from its position Gibeah.

4. Gibeah of Phinehas. In Josh. xxiv. 33 we read that 'Eleazar, the son of Aaron, died; and they buried him in Gibeah of Phinehas (גִּבְעַת פִּינְחָס), A. V. 'In the hill that pertaineth to Phinehas') his son, which was given him in Mount Ephraim.' The Sept. (cod. Alex.) renders it rightly ἐν Γαβαὰθ Φινεάς. Eusebius and Jerome mention a Geba five miles north of Gophna, wrongly identifying it with the Gebim of Is. x. 31. It is probably the Gibeah of Phinehas (Onomast., s. v. Gebin). About three miles north of Gophna there is now a small village called Jibia, situated beside a glen of the same name. It is doubtless the Geba of Eusebius, and perhaps also Gibeah of Mount Ephraim (Robinson, B. R. ii. 205; Van de Velde, Memoir, 315; Stanley, S. and P., 489).—J. L. P.

GIBEON (גִּבְעֹן; Sept. Γαβαών), a town celebrated in the O. T., but not mentioned in the New. It was 'a great city,' as one of the royal cities; and to its jurisdiction originally belonged Beeroth, Chephirah, and Kirjath-jearim (Josh. ix. 17; x. 2). It is first mentioned in connection with the deception practised by the inhabitants upon Joshua, by which, although Canaanites (Hivites), they induced the Jewish leader not only to make a league with them, and to spare their lives and cities, but also, in their defence, to make war upon the five kings by whom they were besieged. It was in the great battle which followed, that 'the sun stood still upon Gibeon' (Josh. x. 12, 1-14). The place afterwards fell to the lot of Benjamin, and became a Levitical city (Josh. xviii. 25; xxi. 17), where the tabernacle was set up for many years under David and Solomon (1 Chron. xvi. 39; xxi. 29; 2 Chron. i. 3), the ark being at the same time at Jerusalem (2 Chron. i. 4). It was here, as being the place of the altar, that the young Solomon offered a thousand burnt-offerings, and was rewarded by the vision which left him the wisest of men (1 Kings iii. 4-15; 2 Chron. i. 3-13). This was the place where Abner's challenge to Joab brought defeat upon himself, and death upon his brother Asahel (2 Sam. ii. 12-32), and where Amasa was afterwards slain by Joab (2 Sam. xx. 8-12). None of these passages mark the site of Gibeon; but there are indications of it in Josephus (De Bell. Jud. ii. 19. 1), who places it fifty stadia north-west from Jerusalem; and in Jerone (Ep. 86 ad Eustoch.): which leave little doubt that Gibeon is to be identified with the place which still bears the name of El-Jib; for Jib, in Arabic, is merely a contraction of the Hebrew Gibeon. The name Gabaon is indeed mentioned by writers of the time of the Crusades as existing at this spot, and among the Arabs it then already bore the name of El-Jib, under which it is mentioned by Bohaedin (Vita Saladin, p. 243). Afterwards it was overlooked by most travellers till the last century, when the attention of Pococke was again directed to it.—J. K.

Adendum.—The village of El-Jib stands on the top of a low, isolated hill, composed of horizontal strata of limestone, which in places form regular steps, or small terraces, from bottom to top. At other points, especially on the east, the hillside breaks down in rugged irregular precipices. Round the hill is spread out one of the richest upland plains in central Palestine—meadow-like in its smoothness and verdure, covered near the village with vineyards and olive groves; and sending out branches, like the rays of a star-fish, among the rocky acclivities that encircle it. The houses are scattered without any attempt at order over the broad summit of the hill; and the slopes beneath them, where not too steep, are formed into terraces for vines and fig-trees. The houses are almost all, in whole or in part, ancient; but are sadly out of repair. One massive building remains nearly entire, and was probably a castle or citadel. The lower rooms are vaulted; and the whole workmanship indicates an age of prosperity and architectural skill. At the eastern base of the hill, beneath a cliff, is a fine fountain. The source is in a large chamber hewn out of the rock. Not far below it, among venerable olive trees, are the remains of an open reservoir or tank, into which the surplus waters flow.

The site of Gibeon is strong and imposing, such as suited the warlike tribe originally inhabiting it, and such as subsequently made a fit gathering place for the tribes of Israel (1 Kings iii.) In the plain that encircles the hill the Amorites assembled to take vengeance on the Gibeonites; and from among the defiles on the east the Israelites rushed down upon them with the first beams of the morning sun. The reservoir among the olive trees is doubtless the 'Pool of Gibeon' where Abner and Joab met, and where the twenty-four champions fought and died (2 Sam. ii. 12-17). On the summit of a hill, a mile south of Gibeon, and rising some 500 feet over it, is the site of Mizpeh of Benjamin. It is probable that the great assemblies of the people referred to in Judg. xx., 1 Sam. vii. and x., took place on the slope of the hill between Mizpeh and Gibeon.—J. L. P.

GIBLITES. [GEBAL.]

GIDDALTI (גִּדְלָתִי; Sept. Γοδλλαθί; Alex. Γεδλλαθί), one of the sons of Heman appointed to take part in the service of the sanctuary with the rest of his brothers; their office was to sound the horn (1 Chron. xxv. 4). This was a Kohathite family (vi. 33). Giddalti was at the head of the 22d course (xxv. 29).—†

GIDEON (גִּדְעֹן, destroyer; Sept. Γεδεών), surname of JERUBBAAL or JERUBBESHETH, fifth Judge in Israel, and the first of them whose history is circumstantially narrated. He was the son of Joash, of the tribe of Manasseh, and resided at Ophrah in Gilead beyond the Jordan.

The Midianites, in conjunction with the Amalekites and other nomade tribes, invaded the country every year, at the season of produce, in great numbers, with their flocks and herds. They plundered and trampled down the fields, the vineyards, and the gardens; they seized the cattle, and plundered man and house, rioting in the country, after the manner which the Bedouin Arabs practise at this day. After Israel had been humbled by seven years of this treatment, the Lord raised up a deliverer in the person of Gideon. He was threshing corn by stealth, for fear of its being taken away by the Midianites, when an angel of God appeared before him, and thus saluted him:—'The Lord is with thee, thou mighty man of valour.' Gideon expressed some doubt whether God was still with a people subject to such affliction, and was answered by the most unexpected commission:—'Go in this thy might, and thou shalt save Israel from the hand of the Midianites: have not I sent thee?' Gideon still urged, 'Wherewith shall I save Israel? Behold my family is poor in Manasseh, and I am the least in my father's house.' The 'Wherewith' was answered by 'Surely I will be with thee.' He then demurred no more, but pressed his hospitality upon the heavenly stranger, who, however, ate not of what was set before him, but directing Gideon to lay it out upon the rock as upon an altar, it was consumed by a supernatural fire, and the angel disappeared. Assured by this of his commission, Gideon proceeded at once to cast down the local image and altar of Baal; and, when the people would have avenged this insult to their false god, their anger was averted through the address of his father, who, by dwelling on the inability of Baal to avenge himself, more than insinuated a doubt of his competency to protect his followers. This was a favourite argument among the Hebrews against idolatry. It occurs often in the prophets, and was seldom urged upon idolatrous Israelites without some effect upon their consciences.

Gideon soon found occasion to act upon his high commission. The allied invaders were encamped in the great plain of Jezreel or Esdraelon, when he blew the trumpet, and thus gathered round him a daily increasing host, the summons to arms which it implied having been transmitted through the northern tribes by special messengers. The inquietude connected with great enterprises is more sensibly felt some days before than at the moment of action; and hence the two miraculous signs which, on the two nights preceding the march, were required and given as tokens of victory. The first night a fleece was laid out in the middle of an open threshing-floor, and in the morning it was quite wet, while the soil was dry all around. The next night the wonder was reversed, the soil being wet and the fleece perfectly dry (Judg. vii.).

Encouraged by these divine testimonies, Gideon commenced his march, and advanced to the brook Harod, in the valley of Jezreel. He was here at the head of 32,000 men; but, lest so large a host should assume the glory of the coming deliverance, which of right belonged to God only, two operations, remarkable both in motive and procedure, reduced this large host to a mere handful of men. First, by divine direction, proclamation was made that all the faint-hearted might withdraw; and no fewer than 22,000 availed themselves of the indulgence. The remaining 10,000 were still declared too numerous: they were therefore all taken down to the brook, when only those who lapped the water from their hands, like active men in haste, were reserved for the enterprise, while all those who lay down leisurely to drink were excluded. The former numbered no more than 300, and these were the appointed vanquishers of the huge host which covered the great plain (Judg. vii. 1-8).

The overheard relation of a dream, by which Gideon was encouraged (Judg. vii. 9-14), and the remarkable stratagem with pitchers and torches, by which he overcame (ver. 15-23), are well known.

The routed Midianites fled towards the Jordan, but were pursued with great slaughter, the country being now roused in pursuit of the flying oppressor. The Ephraimites rendered good service by seizing the lower fords of the Jordan, and cutting off all who attempted escape in that direction, while Gideon himself pursued beyond the river those who escaped by the upper fords. Gideon crossed the Jordan a little below where it leaves the lake of Gennesareth, in pursuit of the Midianitish princes Zeba and Zalmunna. On that side the river, however, his victory was not believed or understood, and the people still trembled at the very name of the Midianites. Hence he could obtain no succour from the places which he passed, and town after town refused to supply even victuals to his fatigued and hungry, but still stout-hearted troop. He denounced vengeance upon them, but postponed its execution till his return; and when he did return, with the two princes as his prisoners, he by no means spared those towns which, like Succoth and Penuel, had added insult to injury (Judg. vii. 4-17).

In those days captives of distinction taken in war were most invariably slain. Zeba and Zalmunna had made up their minds to this fate; and yet it was Gideon's intention to have spared them, till he learned that they had put to death his own brothers under the same circumstances; upon which, as the avenger of their blood, he slew the captives with his own hand (Judg. viii. 18-21).

Among the fugitives taken by the Ephraimites were two distinguished emirs of Midian, named Oreb and Zeeb, whom they put to death. They took their heads over to Gideon, which amounted to an acknowledgment of his leadership; but still the always haughty and jealous Ephraimites were greatly annoyed that they had not in the first instance been summoned to the field; and serious consequences might have followed, but for the tact of Gideon in speaking in a lowly spirit of his own doings in comparison with theirs (Judg. vii. 14; viii. 1, sq.)

Gideon having thus delivered Israel from the most afflictive tyranny to which they had been subject since they quitted Egypt, the grateful people, and particularly the northern tribes, made him an offer of the crown for himself and his sons. But the hero was too well acquainted with his true position, and with the principles of the theocratical government, to accept this unguarded offer: 'I will not rule over you,' he said, 'neither shall my son rule over you: JEHOVAH, he shall rule over you.' He would only accept the golden ear-rings which the victors had taken from the ears of their slaughtered foes [EAR-RINGS]; and a cloth being spread out to receive them, the admiring Israelites threw in, not only the ear-rings, but other ornaments of gold, including the chains of the royal camels, and added the purple robes which the slain monarchs had worn, being the first indication of purple as a royal colour. The ear-rings alone weighed 1700 shekels, equal to 74 pounds 4 ounces, and worth, at the present value of gold, about £3300. With this 'Gideon made an ephod, and put it in his city, even in Ophrah; and all Israel went thither a whoring after it, which became a snare unto Gideon and to his house.' An ephod, at least that of the high-priest, was an outer garment like a sleeveless tunic, to which was attached the oracular breast-plate, composed of twelve precious stones set in gold, and graven with the names of the twelve tribes. Another plainer description of ephod was worn by the common priests. The object of Gideon in making an ephod with his treasure is not very clear. Some suppose that it was merely designed as a trophy of Israel's deliverance: if so, it was a very strange one. It is more probable that as Gideon had, on his being first called to his high mission, been instructed to build an altar and offer sacrifice at this very place, he conceived himself authorised, if not required, to have there a sacerdotal establishment—for at least the tribes beyond the river—where sacrifices might be regularly offered. In this case the worship rendered there was doubtless in honour of Jehovah, but was still, however well intended, highly schismatical and irregular. Even in his lifetime it must have had the effect of withdrawing the attention of the people east of the Jordan from the Tabernacle at Shiloh, and thus so far tended to facilitate the step into actual idolatry, which was taken soon after Gideon's death. The probability of this explanation is strengthened when we recollect the schismatical sacerdotal establishments which were formed by Micah on Mount Ephraim, and by the Danites at Laish (Judg. xvii. 5-13; xviii. 29-31).

The remainder of Gideon's life was peaceable. He had seventy sons by many wives, and died at an advanced age, after he had 'ruled Israel' for forty years; B.C. 1249 to 1209. He is mentioned in the discourse of Samuel (1 Sam. xii. 11), and his name occurs in Heb. xi. 32, among those of the heroes of the faith.

GIDOM (גִּדּוֹם, Gid' om; Sept. Γεδωμ, Alex.

Γαλαδδ), the place to which the Benjamites were pursued by the rest of the Israelites after the battle of Gibeah (Judg. xx. 45). The site is unknown.

GIER-EAGLE. [RACHAM.]

GIFT, or SACRIFICE TO GOD. [See OFFERING.]

GIFTS, SPIRITUAL. [See vol. iii. p. 884.]

GIFT (PRESENT, BLESSING). One of the most ancient and most widely prevalent customs is that of bestowing on certain occasions some object of real or imaginary value upon superiors, equals, or inferiors: as a token of respect or gratitude; as a propitiatory or conciliatory offering; as a sign of grace and favour; as a reward or as alms; as an expression of good-will or affection; or, finally, as a fee, a bribe, and the like. Up to this day, presenting gifts is, next to the salutation, the highest mark of honour throughout the East. The origin of the custom has, gratuitously it would appear, been traced to the self-imposed taxes proffered to the first kings who were in indigent circumstances, by their subjects (Cf. Jahn, Bibl. Arch., sec. 202). Considering that it was principally surpassing prowess in the hunting and battle-field, both pregnant with spoil, which raised men to the dignity of a chief, it is not easily seen how they should ordinarily have been thrown on the community for support. It seems far more natural to trace the custom to the innate propensity for manifesting sentiments of a courteous and kindly nature by the spontaneous offering of some useful or ornamental object to the person who has inspired the sentiment. Accounts of presents, varying according to the relative position of donor and receiver, and their individual circumstances, as well as to the occasion which called them forth, are very numerous in the Bible, and proportionately great is the number of different terms employed for them in the text. In some few cases these have retained, as will appear in the following list, a special and distinct meaning, indicating not only the respective relation of giver and receiver, but even the spirit in which the gift is offered; while in others they have, in the course of time, become mere synonyms.

Etymologically nearest to our own word Gift (Luth. Gabe) come the following four, derived from the root נָתַן, to give:—

a. מֶתֶן, Mattan; Gen. xxxiv. 12, together with מוֹהָר, Mohar, dowry:—Sichem to the irate brethren of Dinah, 'Ask ye never so much dowry and gift' Prov. xviii. 16, in the sense of שְׂחָד, bribe, 'A man's gift (מֶתֶן אָדָם) maketh room for him. Ib. xxi. 14, 'A gift in secret (מֶתֶן בְּסֵתֶר) pacifieth anger.'

b. מַתָּנָה, Mattana; Gen. xxv. 6, the 'portion' bestowed by Abraham upon the children of his concubines; 2 Chron. xxi. 3, by Jehoshaphat upon his younger sons; a reward or bribe, like the foregoing: Prov. xv. 27, 'he that hateth gifts shall live'; Eccles. vii. 7, 'a gift destroyeth the heart'; further, an offering to the sanctuary and the priests, Exod. xxviii. 38, 'which Israel shall hallow in their gifts' (cf. Lev. xxiii. 38, etc.); to idols (Ezek. xx. 31), 'When ye offer your gifts you pollute yourselves'; finally: alms, מַתָּנִים לְאֲבִיּוֹנִים, 'Gifts to the poor' (Esth. ix. 22).‡

* The name given, in a different sense, to the charity-boxes in synagogues.

† It may not, perhaps, be out of place here to give [ad voc.] מַתָּנָה a striking specimen of the manner in which the Midrash occasionally makes use of the scriptural words for its poetical homiletics. In the passage, Num. xxi. 18, 20, descriptive of the wanderings of Israel: 'And from the desert (מִדְבָּר) they went to Mattanah (מַתָּנָה); and from Mattanah to Nahaliel (נַחֲלִיאֵל); and from Nahaliel to Bamoth (בָּמוֹת); and from Bamoth in the valley, that is in the country of Moab, to the top of Pisgah, which looketh toward Jeshimon,'—the proper nouns of the stations are taken in a literal sense, and מַתָּנָה is assumed to refer to the Gift kar 'εξοχή, viz., the Law. This was bestowed upon Israel in the desert, because there they were all equal, and no tribe could hereafter claim any preference on account of the Thorah having been given in its own special territory. . . . 'Again, why was the Thorah given in the desert? Because, as in the desert, there is no sowing and no tilling of the soil; so he who takes upon himself the yoke of the Divine Law, is free from the yoke of earthly rule, and of the fetters of society. And as in the desert no taxes (מַתָּנִים, ἑσπασον) are raised, so are the Learned (the sons of the Thorah) free in this world.' . . . 'Another explanation: Who fulfils the Thorah? He who makes himself like a desert by himself, apart from every one.' . . . Again, the three stations are referred to the three different Courts of Law in Jerusalem; and further to the migrations of the Sanhedrin: 'from Mattanah to Nahaliel—these are the Sanhedrin on the Mount of the Temple (בְּהַר הַבַּיִת); from Nahaliel to Bamoth—these are the Sanhedrin in the Azarah at the side of the altar (בְּצֵד הַמִּזְבֵּחַ); and from Bamoth in the valley, in the country of Moab—these are the Sanhedrin in the 'Paved Hall' (לִשְׁכַּת הַנִּיזִית). [See SANHEDRIN.] Another allegorical interpretation refers these four words to Moses, who complained that after the gift had been bestowed in the desert through his mediation, (עַל יְדֵי נַחֲלִיאֵל), death should overtake him, נַחֲלוֹ אוֹתוֹ:—בָּמוֹת, Ba-Moth [comes death]. . . . 'And from Bamoth to the valley which is in the field of Moab'—that is Moses' burial, as it is said (Deut. xxxiv. 6), 'And he buried him in a valley in the land of Moab' (Tanchuma, Num. xxi., cf. Midr. Rabba ad. loc.; Gem. Nedar. 58 a; 103 d, fi.; Erub. 54 a; Jalkut ad. loc., etc.)

xiv. 7, offered by Jeroboam to the man of God for the healing of his hands; 'a false gift,' Prov. xxv. 14; a divine gift, Eccles. iii. 13, etc., מַתָּה יד, Ezek. xlv. 5 = מַתָּה יד, Deut. xvi. 17, 'according to a man's means.' It may be observed here that both מַתָּה and מַתָּה occur frequently as compounds with יהוה or יהוה (God) in the sense of Theodorus: Mattanjah, Mattithjah, Mattith-jahu = Jonathan.

d. נָתַן, Nathun; (Pass. part. Kal of נָתַן), 'one who is given'; used Num. viii. 19, etc., with respect to the Levites; 'given (A. V. gifts) to Aaron and to his sons from among the children of Israel,' i.e., specially singled out and consecrated for the holy service. In close connection with this word stands the plur. tant. נְתִינִים, the designation of the lowest menials of the temple (Josephus: ἱεροδούλοι), mentioned together with the Levites, Ezra ii. 34, etc., who, prisoners of war perhaps, had been presented by David and his successors (in a capacity somewhat similar to that of the Gibeonites with whom they are often confounded), for the use of the sanctuary (cf. Ezra viii. 20).

The sense of Oblation is chiefly inherent in those words which are derived from נָשָׂא (cf. Ar. نَسَأ, نَسَع, to raise, lift up:—

a. מַסָּא, Massa; 2 Chron. xvii. 11, מִנְחָה וּכְסָף, 'some of the Philistines brought Jehoshaphat presents and tribute-silver, and the Arabians brought him flocks, etc.' hence more commonly used in the sense of regular tribute or taxes, cf. Hos. viii. 10; 2 Chron. xxiv. 27, etc.

b. מִסָּאֵת, Mass'eth, honorary gift, Esth. ii. 18, 'Ahasuerus gave gifts according to the state of the king.' The word is further used for the 'dish of honour' sent to guests during a feast (Gen. xliii. 34); for tax, fixed contribution towards the sanctuary, 2 Chron. xxiv. 6, etc., cf. Exod. xxx. 12, ff., also for first-fruits, sacrificial offerings, Ezek. xx. 40.

In Phœnician the use of מִסָּאֵת for 'sacrifice' in a general sense (or tax from a sacrifice to be given to the priest or priests), is quite common. The word occurs frequently on the well-known Sacrificial Tablet of Marseilles; and the second Sacrificial Tablet recently found in Carthage—now in the British Museum—in which the beginning of the epigraph is preserved, goes far to shew that in all these regulations of taxes due to the priests from the single offerings, some such words as בַּעַת (Phœn. plur. בַּעַת), 'At the time of the sacrifices,' and אִשׁ טָנָא, 'which fixed' [certain Suffetes scil.] were used as introductory formulas.

sending portions (מִנְחָה, see below), one to another, and gifts to the poor, are based the following ordinances (Orach Chajim, sec. 649):—a. 'Every man must give at least two presents to two poor people [in accordance with the two plurals of מִנְחָה and אֲבוֹנִים]. b. The money destined for Purim-alms must not be used for any other charitable purpose. The poor themselves, however, are at liberty to use the money received according to their own pleasure. c. The Purim-money must not be scrupulously divided; but whosoever stretches out his hands to receive, to him shall be given.'

נָתַתְּ בָּעֵל...נָתַתְּ אֶשְׁמִי...נָתַתְּ עֵת...בָּעֵל הַשֶּׁמֶט בְּדַעַת בִּן בֶּרֶךְ

That of the Brit. Mus. has distinctly (as above):

בַּעַת הַמִּשְׁאֵת אֶשְׁמִי

[See PHOENICIA; OFFERING.]

c. נִשְׁתָּה, Nisseth (Part. Niph.), royal gift, 2 Sam.

xix. 43. 'Has he [the king], given us any gift?'

To our word 'Blessing' corresponds:—

בִּרְכָה, Berachah (from בָּרַךְ, to kneel down, to pray, to bless [curse], to favour with a gift, to accompany one's good wishes by a present, etc.), originally an offering from an inferior to a superior, from a client to a patron, a conciliatory or propitiatory gift. Cf. Gen. xxxiii. 11, Jacob to Esau, 'Take now my blessing, which has been brought unto thee;' 1 Sam. xxv. 27, Abigail to David, 'Take now this blessing which thy handmaid hath brought; Naaman to Elisha, 2 Kings v. 15, 'Take now the blessing from thy servant.' [The presents of popes to kings, were likewise called 'Benedictiones,' cf. Du Cange Lex. ii. 1110; ap. Ges. s. v.] Further: the results of the Divine blessing—presents from above, in the sense of riches (בִּרְכָה), Gen. xlix. 25; Is. xix. 24, etc.; cf.

נֶפֶשׁ בִּרְכָה, a munificent man, Prov. xi. 25.

From the cognate roots מָנַח (obsol.; ar. مَنَّح), to portion out, to present [not from נָחָה, to carry near, as Kimchi, or נָחַ, to rest, causal: pacify by gifts, as others would have it], to divide, count, allot, assign, are derived the following two words respectively:—

מִנְחָה, Mincha. Chiefly a present of a conciliatory or propitiatory nature, as that with which Jacob wished to pacify Esau, Gen. xxxii. 14, ff. (see above), or which Joseph's brethren brought to Joseph, Gen. xliii. 11; an offering to a king;—Israel to Eglon, Judg. iii. 15; hence also a tribute, מִנְחָה יָמ, 'bearers of a Mincha,' became a euphemistic phrase for 'tributary subjects,' Moab to David, 2 Sam. viii. 2; the Philistine kingdoms to Solomon, 1 Kings viii. 1. Further, an offering to God, Gen. iv. 3; Is. i. 13. In the Mosaic books this word is chiefly used for unbloody sacrifices, in contradistinction to זֶבַח (LXX. θυσία, θυσιασμα, προσφορά); also of sacrifices offered to idols, Is. lvii. 6; lvii. 3. [OFFERING.]

In this sense of sacrifice, מִנְחָה occurs also on the Phœnician sacrificial tablet of Marseilles, line 14: ...ועל כל זבח אדם לזבח במנחה; and on that of the British Museum, line 10, ועל זבח, ...במנחה.—From עֶרֶב מִנְחָה, 'the evening sacrifice,' Dan. ix. 21, Ezra ix. 4, the word מִנְחָה has, after the cessation of the sacrifices, gradually come to signify the afternoon prayer, on the time of which (and the divisions of מִנְחָה, the great Mincha, and מִנְחָה קטנה, the small Mincha); see Orach Chajim, sec. 232.

מִנְחָה, Manah; a portion, such as Elkanah gave on the occasion of his annual sacrifice to his wives and children, 1 Sam. i. 4, 5. 'Send portions (of eatables) to those who have nothing ready,' Neh. viii. 10; cf. Esth. ix. 23.—The custom referred to in the last passage of sending mutual presents of eatables, and of giving alms, on the Purim-festival, has been adopted by the Mohammedans on their two Eeds; principally on the minor festival, which follows immediately upon the Ramadan, and which lasts three days.—In Phœn. מִנָּה, plur. מִנָּם (Sidon.

Inscr., v. iv. viii.), means treasures, riches (= Ar.

مِن). Perhaps מִנָּה, मामनस (money), may be traced to the same root as מִנָּה.

We have further to mention the following Hebrew equivalents for Gift:—

שֵׁי, Shaj, only used in connection with הוֹבִיל, a present ('respect') offered to God, Josh. xviii. 7; Ps. lxxviii. 30; lxxvi. 12.—Five different derivations have been proposed for this word: שֵׁי, Ar. شى, to will; שֵׁה, Ar. شها, to desire; שוה, to make equal; שֵׁי, Ar. شى, to flow out; and שוה, to stretch out—but none appears completely satisfactory.

תְּשׁוּרָה, Teshurah (שׁוּר, Ar. سار, offero), obligation: a present to a 'man of God,' 1 Sam. ix. 7; Aram. נְבִינָה, Dan. ii. 6; v. 17, a present (together with מַתָּנָה) to a diviner.

שׁוּדָּה, Shohad; (Aram. שׁוּדָּה, Syr. هسدم, Talm. שׁוּדָּה), from שׁוּדָּה, to make a present for the purpose of buying off a penalty, Job vi. 22; chiefly in the sense of a bribe, Exod. xxiii. 8; Deut. x. 17; Ps. xxvi. 10, etc.

אֶשְׁכֹּר, Eshkor (שָׁכַר, Ar. שכر = שכور, to hire, buy, reward), Price, Tribute; Ezek. xxvii. 15 together with מְכָרָה, merchandize.—'The men of Dedan were thy merchants. . . . They brought thee for a present horns of ivory and ebony;' Ps. lxxii. 10, parall. with מְכָרָה, tribute.—[Hitzi's derivation from אֶשְׁכֹּר, a certain coin (Aram. Aspar), is not tenable.]

Words of an entirely special signification are:—דְּוִרָה, 'dowry' (Gen. xxx. 20).

כְּהָר, 'dowry,'—paid by the bridegroom to the parents of the bride (עֲדָר; Arab. مهر; Syr.

מַסְנֵן) (Gen. xxxiv. 12; Exod. xxii. 16).

נֶדֶחַ, Nedeh, 'gift to a whore' (Ezek. xvi. 35).

The N. T. chiefly employs the following words:—Δῶρον (דוֹרֶן, in Talmud and Midrash), principally a gift of honour, Matt. ii. 11, Sacrificial offering (cf. II. vi. 293, viii. 203), Matt. v. 23, 24; viii. 4; Mark vii. 11 (קָרְבָּן); etc., charity (cast into the poor-box of the Temple), Luke xxi. 1, ff.

Δωρεά (דוֹרִיָּה, Talmud, Midrash) (ἐπουδνιος), Heb. vi. 4, 'heavenly gift,' Holy Ghost; scil. τοῦ πνεύματος, Acts ii. 38, etc.; τοῦ Θεοῦ, John iv. 10; Acts viii. 20, etc. (cf. Æsch. Prom. 619; Soph. Al. 1032, Plato, Rep. v. 468).

Δῶρημα, gift of life, Jam. i. 17, τέλειον, a complete, perfect, because Divine Gift (cf. Soph. Tr. 668; Ar. Nub. 305; Xen. Hier. ii. 4).

Χάρις, Χάρισμα, a gift bestowed through the grace of God, without any merit on the receiver's part (like the Gnosis), 1 Cor. i. 7; vii. 7; Rom. v. 15, 16; 1 Tim. iv. 14, etc.; a special gift, Rom. xi. 29; xii. 6, etc.

Ἀνάθημα = ἱερὸν, a gift consecrated to God, and deposited in the Temple for its special use and ornament (Suid., πᾶν τὸ ἀφιερωμένον θεῷ), Luke xxi. 5. (2 Macc. v. 16; 3 Macc. iii. 17, etc.; Joseph. Bell. Jud. i. 2. 7; Antiq. xiii. 8; xvii. 6, etc.)

No less various than the occasions which called them forth, were the gifts themselves. Sometimes consisting of the simple produce of the soil and pastures, or prepared food (Gen. xiv. 53; xxxii. 13; 1 Kings x. 25; 2 Chron. xvii. 11, etc.), they at other times took the more convenient or ambitious form of money, silver, gold, jewels, garments, arms, and other articles of use and ornament (1 Sam. ix. 8; 2 Sam. xviii. 11; 1 Kings x. 25; Job xlii. 11, etc.),—the value naturally corresponding to the respective position of donor and receiver, and the complimentary or interested purpose they were to serve. Thus, while 1 Sam. ix. 8, Saul's present to the prophet, amounts to one-fourth of a Shekel only, the Philistines promise Delilah for the capture of Samson no less than 1100 Shekels (Judg. xvi. 5). It was, and still is, the custom among friends in the East to offer a present to each other on the occasion of a visit; be it only a flower or a fruit (Lane, Mod. Egypt.; Notes to Arab. Nights; Jahn, Bibl. Arch., sec. 202). On feasts—private or religious—friends send each other eatables, placed in a dish or tray, covered with a richly embroidered handkerchief or napkin (ib.). Inferiors, again, pay their respects to their superiors, clients to their patrons, subjects to their rulers, the conquered to the conqueror (1 Sam. x. 27; Judg. iii. 15, 17; 2 Kings xvii. 3, ff.; Ps. xlv. 13, etc.; cf. Cyrop. v. 15, 12; Buckingham Mes. iv. 39), by offering the most costly gifts, in order to ensure a good reception (cf. Prov. xviii. 16), since a present which should fall short of the receiver's expectations is sent back and a better one asked for (Tavern. i., p. 207; Pococke, iii., p. 481, etc.) [Cf. Mal. i. 8. 'Would thy governor receive such unworthy gifts?']. The presents bestowed by kings upon those they wished to honour (Gen. xlv. 22, etc.), military and civil officers (Esth. ii. 18), ambassadors, distinguished strangers, and others, consisted of money, rings, chains, and principally garments (Kaftan, Chala), Gen. xlv. 22, ff.; Dan. v. 16, 29; Esth. vi. 8, 15; Zach. iii. 4, etc. Cf. Cyrop. viii. 3: Cyrus presenting all his officers with Median Robes. II. xxiv. 226: Priam distributing garments of honour to his guests (Freytag, Hist. Hal. 33, 38; Ælian. V. H.; II. i. 32, etc.)

These garments, חֲלִיפֹת, were principally bestowed before a feast (Gen. xlv. 22; Is. iv. 6; li. 10; Rev. iii. 5), it being a great breach of etiquette not to appear in them on the occasion, Chard. iii., p. 325. Sometimes to enhance the value of his gift, the king presents his favourite with the garment he has worn himself (1 Sam. xviii. 4; Cyrop. i. 4, 26; v. 1, 1). Distribution of food among the people on festive occasions is mentioned 2 Sam. vi. 19 (= the Roman congiaria, viscerationes, Liv. xxv. 2, Cic. Off. ii. 16). It is but natural to the East that the greatest pomp and circumstance should be connected with the presentation of gifts. As many men and beasts of burden—each perhaps carrying a ridiculously small piece of the offering—as can possibly be mustered, are pressed into the dignified procession which is to carry it; thus forty [if the reading be correct] camels' load of presents are sent by Ben Hadad to Elisha (2 Kings viii. 9). Abundant examples of this often gratuitous show are furnished by the Assyrian and Persepolitan sculptures. The reception of the present, chiefly from a superior, is no less accompanied with all the customary signs of reverence and respect, such as kissing it, touching it with the forehead, or laying it upon the head (cf. Jahn, B. A., sec. 203). That the refusal of a present constituted a great insult need hardly be added.—E. D.

GIHON (גִּיחֹן and גִּיחֹן; Sept. Γαῶν and Γεῶν).

This word is from the root גִּיחַ, and signifies 'a bursting forth'; and hence it may be applied either to a fountain or a stream flowing from it. In the Bible it is used as a proper name.

1. Gihon, one of the rivers of Eden, Gen. ii. 13 (PARADISE). Arab geographers apply the name Gihon, جیحون, to the river Oxus.

2. Gihon, a fountain, stream, and valley, beside Jerusalem. This name has given rise to not a little controversy among topographers. We shall first state the several theories which have been advanced regarding it, and then endeavour to shew its real import and locality. (1) Some affirm that Gihon was the ancient name of the Valley of Jehoshaphat, and that it is compounded of the words גִּיחַ, 'a valley,' and חֵן, 'beauty.' The Fountain of the Virgin, which rises at the bottom of the valley, had originally flowed into the brook Kidron, but was artificially carried by a conduit across the ridge of Sion (?) to the pool of Siloam. This was the lower water-course of Gihon. More to the north was anciently another spring, called the upper water-course of Gihon, which was stopped or sealed in the time of Hezekiah, and conveyed to the west side of the City of David (Lewin, Jerusalem, p. 11, seq.) It will be seen that in this theory the 'City of David' is identified with Moriah. (2) Others state that Gihon was the old name of the Tyropoean valley; that the Pool of Siloam was the 'lower Gihon'; and that the 'upper Gihon' was on the table-land north of the Damascus gate (Williams, Holy City, i. 124, supplement). (3) Others state that Gihon was a name sometimes given to the valley of Hinnom, and that the 'upper outflow' was at the head of that valley west of the city (Robinson, B. R., i. 346). (4) An English engineer, recently sent out to survey the waters of Jerusalem, has reported that there are not, and from the position of the city, and the character of the strata, there could not be any perennial fountain in or around Jerusalem. The so-called Fountain of the Virgin, he says, is supplied by the leakage from the great cisterns under the temple area; and the peculiar taste of its water is occasioned by stagnation and filth (MS. Report). If this be so, then Gihon could neither be a fountain nor a perennial stream.

Gihon is first mentioned in connection with the coronation of Solomon. Its direction is not specified; we only learn that it was without the city, and that there was a descent to it from Mount Zion. David said 'Bring him down' (הורדום) to Gihon (1 Kings i. 33). The natural supposition from the whole of this narrative would be that Gihon was a valley in which the people were accustomed to assemble. Josephus calls it a fountain (Antiq. vii. 14. 5). In 2 Chron. xxxii. 30 we read that Hezekiah stopped the upper fountain (מוֹצֵא מִיָּמִין) of Gihon, and brought it straight down to the west side of the city of David. This is evidently connected with ver. 3. He took counsel 'to stop the waters of the fountains (הַעֲיִנֹת) which were without the city' . . . and they 'stopped all the fountains, and the brook that ran through the midst of the land.' From these passages it appears that Gihon was a fountain, and that a stream from it originally ran through a valley of the same name; and farther, that the fountain was so situated that its waters could be conducted by a subterranean channel into the city of David on the west side. The position of the city of David has been disputed (JERUSALEM); being convinced, however, that it stood on the western hill, we are forced to conclude that the fountain of Gihon lay at the head of the valley of Hinnom; because from no other place could water be brought to the west side of the city of David. It would seem, from a comparison of the above passages with 2 Kings xviii. 17; Is. vii. 3; xxxvi. 2; xxii. 9, that there was also an 'upper' and a 'lower' pool in the valley of Gihon. There is one passage which at first sight appears to militate against the above conclusions, as it would bring Gihon within one of the city walls—'And after this he (Manasseh) built a wall without the city of David, on the west side of Gihon, in the valley, even to the entering in at the fish-gate' (2 Chron. xxxiii. 14). The Hebrew, however, may, with equal accuracy, be rendered, 'He built an outer wall to the city of David on the west, to (or 'towards') Gihon in the valley, and to the entering,' etc. (See Bertheau, in loc.; Robinson, B. R., iii. 245). The son of Sirach thus refers to Hezekiah's work: 'He fortified his city, and brought in water into the midst thereof; he digged the hard rock with iron, and made wells (cisterns) for water' (Ecclus. xlviii. 17). Josephus also speaks of water brought into the tower of Hippicus, which could only have come from the west (Bell. Jud. v. 7. 3).

The results of our examination of authorities may be thus stated. The upper fountain of Gihon was in the head of the valley of Hinnom, and a stream from it ran down through that valley. The fountain was covered by Hezekiah, and the water brought into the city of David by a concealed channel, partly hewn in the rock. There was an 'upper' and a 'lower' pool in this valley. A close examination of the place tends to confirm these views. No fountain has yet been discovered, nor could it be without extensive excavations; but a section of an old aqueduct was laid bare when sinking the foundations of the new church on the northern summit of Zion. It was 20 feet beneath the surface, in places excavated in the rock, and its direction was from west to east (Bartlett, Walks about Jerusalem). This may be a portion of Hezekiah's aqueduct from Gihon; and it may have carried the water to the temple area as well as to Zion. In the valley of Hinnom are still two great 'pools,' one at its head called Birket el-Mamilla; another west of the present Sion gate in the bottom of the glen, called Birket-es-Sultân. The above is the only place that can be assigned to Gihon, unless we remove the City of David to the Temple Mount, as has been done by Williams, Lewin, and others. GIKATILLA or GEKATILIA (נקטיליא) about A.D. 1020. נקטלה is the Spanish Chiquitilla for the Hebrew appellation חֲכִימָהּ, i.e., parvus or junior, which the Jews, from a very early date, affixed to their names as an expression of modesty (comp. Mark xv. 40; Eph. iii. 8; Jerusalem Sota, iv. 9; Megilla, 32 a; Steinschneider, Jewish Literature, Lond. 1857, p. 343, note 24). The fact that he was the teacher of the celebrated philologist Ibn Ganach, whose taste for lexicography he helped to develop, renders Gikatilla specially interesting to the student of Biblical exegesis, and makes us all the more regret that none of his linguistic treatises have as yet come to light. His pupil Ibn Ganach quotes his rendering of נִפְתִּי (Ps. lxxviii. 10), and of the difficult expression נִפְתִּי (Prov. vii. 17), by to moisten. Kimchi quotes him in Michtal, art. נִפְתִּי, and Ibn Balam refers to him in his commentary on the Pentateuch. Comp. Steinschneider, in Hechalutz, Lemberg 1853, vol. ii. p. 61; Ewald and Duke's Beiträge zur Geschichte der Ältesten Auslegung, etc., Stuttgart 1844, vol. i. p. 127, note 1, vol. ii. p. 167.—C. D. G.

GIKATILLA, MOSES HA-COHEN, B. SAMUEL, also called IBN GIKATILLA, of Cordova, flourished about A.D. 1070 to 1100, and was a pupil of the celebrated Ibn Ganach, whose liberal spirit he largely imbibed in his expositions of Scripture. Though M. Gikatilla was one of the most extensive commentators and grammarians, and one whose liberal criticisms must have exercised a most powerful and salutary influence upon interpreters and lexicographers, yet none of his numerous productions have as yet come to light. All that we now possess of his exegetical and linguistic labours are small fragments which have been preserved in the works of the most eminent commentators. But these fragments are too precious to be lost sight of. For the sake of the Biblical student, we shall therefore give the places where they are quoted in the enumeration of M. Gikatilla's works. His exegetical works are as follows:—

1. A Commentary on the Pentateuch, fragments of which are given by Ibn Ezra in his commentary on Gen. i. 26; xxxvii. 25; xli. 48; xlii. 25; xlix. 6; Exod. ii. 4; x. 12; xii. 2; xiii. 9, 17; xiv. 4; xv. 2; xvi. 15; xix. 1; xxii. 30; Lev. iv. 23; vi. 20; Num. viii. 7; xiv. 45; xx. 8; xxi. 30; xxii. 13; xxviii. 4, 11; Deut. viii. 8.

2. A Commentary on Isaiah, fragments of which are given by Ibn Ezra on Is. i. 6, 22; ii. 6; iv. 2; vi. 9; viii. 10; ix. 17; x. 3; xi. 1, 11, 14; xxvii. 2, 7; xxv. 1; xxvi. 20; xxvii. 1, 3, 5;

xxviii. 6, 15, 29; xxx. 25, 28; xxxiii. 8; xxxiv. 2; xxxv. 1, 3; xl. 1; xlv. 19; xlix. 8; li. 2; lii. 1, 18; liv. 1, 11; lvi. 1; lxi. 1; lxii. 2; lxv. 11; lxvi. 5, 11; by Samuel Ibn Tibbon in his Yekon ha-Mimim, ed. Presburg 1839, p. 44; and by Joseph Albo in his Ikarim, part i. sec. 1.

3. A Commentary on Ezekiel, quoted by D. Kimchi in his commentary on Ezek. iii. 13, and by Menasseh ben Israel in his Nishmath Chajim.

6. A Commentary on Job, the MS. of which is in the Bodleian, Oxford [Uri, p. 45], i. p. 75. Ewald has given extracts of this commentary in his Beiträge zur Geschichte der Ältesten Auslegung, Stuttgart 1844, vol. i. p. 77, ff; fragments of it are also given by Ibn Ezra in his commentary on Job iv. 10; v. 5, 12; vii. 5; xi. 17; xvii. 12; xxxvi. 31; D. Kimchi in his Lexicon, art. עֹר, and by Maimonides in his Treatise on the Resurrection.

M. Gikatilla also wrote a grammatical work, entitled סֵפֶר זִכְרֵי וְנִקְיֻת, which treats on the use of the gender in Hebrew nouns, and which is frequently quoted by Ibn Ezra, and translated from the Arabic into Hebrew the grammatical work of Chajug, called סֵפֶר אֲזוּתֵי הַנֶּחֱם. [CHAJUG.]

From the fragments preserved of his exegetical works, we see that Gikatilla was both a profound and liberal critic. Unlike most of the interpreters of his time, he endeavoured to explain away all the Messianic prophecies of the O. T. (comp. Ibn Ezra on Is. xi.), and assigned the authorship of some Psalms to the Babylonish captivity (comp. Ibn Ezra, Pr. xlii.) at the time when both the Synagogue and the Church believed that the whole Psalter proceeded from David. Like Saadia he frequently departed from the Massoretic division of the text. Thus לִמְכַבֵּר, at the end of verse 31 in Job xxxvi. 1, he took over to עַל כַּפַּיִם in the following verse, i.e., 'He giveth meat in abundance, covering the hands with light' (comp. also Habak. iii. 2. The influence which this critic must have exercised upon his contemporary and subsequent expositors of the Bible, may be judged of from the fact that the eminent Ibn Ezra quotes his works so largely. We have therefore deemed it a duty, owing alike to Biblical exegesis and to this remarkable interpreter, carefully to read through the commentaries of Ibn Ezra, and collate the fragments of Gikatilla therein preserved. And it will be seen that the passages given in this article are more numerous than those collected by the learned and painstaking Leopold Dukes in the Beiträge zur Ältesten Auslegung, Stuttgart 1844, vol. ii. p. 180, ff. We would only add that Ibn Ezra also quotes Gikatilla in his Commentary on Ecclesiastes, v. 12; ix. 15; x. 17, 18, and it is therefore probable that he also commented upon this book. He is generally quoted by Ibn Ezra as רמשה הכהן הספרדי, R. Moses Ha-Cohen Ha-Sefardi, i. e. the Spaniard, or רמשה הכהן, R. Mose Ha-Cohen, רמשה הספרדי, R. Mose Ha-Sefardi, or simply רמשה, R. Mose. These different appellations must be borne in mind by the student of Hebrew exegesis to identify this celebrated commentator.—C. D. G.

GILBOA, usually Mount Gilboa (הַר חִנְבֹּלָה);

Sept. τὰ ὄρη Γελβούε), a ridge of hills rising at Jezreel in the eastern end of the plain of Esdraelon, and extending to the brow of the Jordan valley. Upon Gilboa Saul collected the Israelites to oppose the forces of the Philistines assembled at Shunem. The result of the battle is well known. Saul and his three sons were slain upon the mountain. The news was carried to David, and he gave expression to his grief in one of the most beautiful and pathetic odes in the Bible. In it he thus apostrophizes Gilboa—'Ye mountains of Gilboa, let there be no dew, neither rain upon you, nor fields of offerings; for there the shield of the mighty is vilely cast away, the shield of Saul, as though he had not been anointed with oil' (2 Sam. i. 21). It is somewhat singular that Gilboa is never once mentioned in Scripture except in connection with this event; and it is not afterwards alluded to in history. The incidental references in the Bible narrative, and in the fuller account furnished by Josephus (Antiq. vii. 14) leave no doubt as to its position. Jerome informs us that Gilboa lay six miles south of Scythopolis; and that upon it was a large village called Gelbus (Onomast., s. v. Gelbue), which has been identified with the modern village of Jelbôn (Robinson, B. R., ii. 316). Gilboa was known to the Crusaders, and William of Tyre mentions a noted fountain at the foot of the range (Histor. xxii. 6; Reland, p. 863; Robinson, B. R., ii. 325).

A knowledge of the topography of this region gives great vividness to several of the Scripture narratives; but especially to that of the fatal battle in which Saul fell. About six miles north of Gilboa is a parallel range of nearly equal elevation and length, anciently called the 'hill of Moreh' (Judg. vii. 1), but now Jebel-ed-Duh (and by travellers 'Little Hermon'). Between the two ranges lies the beautiful valley of Jezreel, having at its eastern end, overlooking the Jordan, the mound and ruins of Bethshean. At the western extremity of Gilboa stood the city of Jezreel; and about half a mile east of it, close to the foot of the hill, is the large fountain of Jezreel or Harod (Judg. vii. 1), now called Ain Jâlûd. The spring may perhaps have given the range its name Gilboa ('Bubbling Fountain; ' from גל and בוע; Gesenius, Thesaurus, s. v.) Opposite these on the other side of the valley, and near the base of Moreh, stands Shunem; and away behind the latter hill, hidden from view, is the village of Endor.

The Philistines encamped on the north side of the valley at Shunem; and Saul took up a position by the fountain of Jezreel, at the base of Gilboa (1 Sam. xxviii. 4; xxix. 1). From the brow of the hill above the camp Saul had a full view of the enemy, and he was struck with terror at their numbers (xxviii. 5). The position he had chosen was a bad one. There is a gradual descent in the valley from Shunem to the base of Gilboa at the fountain, while immediately behind it the hill rises steep and rocky. The Philistines had all the advantage of the gentle descent for their attack, and both front and flanks of the Israelites were exposed, and retreat almost impossible up the steep hill side. On the night before the battle Saul went to Endor. The battle seems to have begun early in the morning, when the king was wearied and dispirited (xxviii. 19). The Israelites were broken at once by the fierce onset of the enemy, and the slaughter was terrible as they attempted to flee up the sides of Gilboa. While the terror-stricken masses were clambering up the rugged slopes, they were completely exposed to the arrows of the Philistine archers. 'They fell down slain in Mount Gilboa' (xxxi. 1); 'The Philistines followed hard upon Saul and upon his sons,' probably when they tried to rally their troops. The three sons fell beside their father; 'and the battle went sore against Saul, and the archers hit him; and he was sore wounded of the archers' (ver. 3). David has caught the peculiarity of the position in his ode: 'The beauty of Israel is slain upon the high places;' and, 'Jonathan, thou wast slain upon thine high places' (2 Sam. i. 19, 25). The stripping and mutilating of the slain is characteristic of the Arab tribes to this day, and the writer witnessed some fearful instances of it in 1858 near this same spot (Handbook for S. and P., 355). The Philistines took the body of Saul and fastened it to the wall of the neighbouring fortress of Bethshean, from whence it was snatched by a few brave men from Jabesh Gilead (Stanley, S. and P., 330-37).

The ridge of Gilboa is bleak and bare. The soil is scanty, and the gray limestone rocks crop out in jagged cliffs and naked crowns, giving the whole a look of painful barrenness. One would almost think, on looking at it, that David's words were prophetic (Van de Velde, ii. 369). The highest point of Gilboa is said to have an elevation of about 2200 feet above the sea, and 1200 above the valley of Jezreel (Van de Velde, Memoir, 178).—J. L. P.

GILEAD (גִּלְעָד; Sept. Γαλαδ), a mountain range on the east of the Jordan, extending from the parallel of Rabboth-Ammon on the south, to the river Hieromax on the north. The same name was given to the province lying between these parallels. With the exception of the narrow strip of plain along the bank of the Jordan, the mountains cover the whole region; hence it is sometimes called 'Mount Gilead' (Deut. iii. 12; Jer. l. 19); sometimes 'the Land of Gilead' (Deut. xxxiv. 1; Num. xxxii. 1, 29; Zech. x. 10); and sometimes simply 'Gilead' (Num. xxxii. 40; Josh.

xvii. 1; Amos i. 3). The inhabitants were called 'Gileadites' (Judg. x. 3; 2 Kings xv. 25).

The origin of the name is doubtless to be sought for in the physical aspect of the country. The Hebrew גִּלְעָד, like the Arabic جَلَد, signifies 'hard' or 'rugged' (Gesenius, Thesaurus; Freytag, Lex. Arab., s. v.); and the whole province may be justly termed גִּלְעָד, 'the rugged.' Some have opposed this view on the ground that a different etymology is given in Gen. xxxi. 47. But every Oriental scholar will see how easily the two can be reconciled. The original name of the mountain was גִּלְעָד; 'Jacob set his face toward the mount Gilead' (Gen. xxxi. 21). Laban overtook him there. They made a covenant. Jacob thereupon raised a heap of stones and called it Galeed; that is, 'the heap,' הָא, 'of witness,' וְעָ; thus making the name of the mountain apply, by a slight change of pronunciation, to the heap he had erected. Such a play upon words is of common occurrence in the East even yet; and the Arabs delight in it. The exact site of this Galeed is not known. It could not have been far from Mahanaim. It was doubtless on one of those rounded eminences to the northward, which overlook the broad plateau of Bashan (Gen. xxxi. 25; xxxii. 1, 2).

We next hear of Gilead on the approach of the Israelites to Palestine. Its rich pastures attracted the attention of the tribes of Reuben and Gad, who had 'a very great multitude of cattle.' They asked Moses to give them their inheritance there, and he consented (Num. xxxii. 1, 29, sq.) The Amorites under the rule of Sihon, who reigned in Heshbon, then possessed Gilead as far north as the Jabbok (xxxii. 33, 39; Josh. xii. 3). The northern section, 'half-Gilead,' as it is called in the Bible, was included with Bashan in the kingdom of Og (xii. 6), and was divided between Gad and Manasseh (GAD). The northern boundary of Gilead is not defined by any ancient writer. All we learn from the Bible is that one half of it was south, and the other half north of the Jabbok. The features of the country assist us. The mountain range terminates at the river Hieromax. North of it is the plateau of Bashan, the side of which rises about 2500 feet above the deep Jordan valley, and thus appears from the west like a continuation of the Gilead range. Hence the error of Eusebius in stating that the mountains of Gilead joined Lebanon (Onomast., s. v.) Josephus states that the city of Gadara was in Gilead, and Gamala in Gaulanitis, a part of Bashan. The former city is only some two miles south of the Hieromax, and the latter about four north (Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 13. 5; Vita, 37; Bell. Jud. iii. 3, 5). We may therefore conclude that the Hieromax separated the ancient provinces of Gilead and Bashan. Reland is consequently mistaken when he says, 'Initium Basanis ducitur a Machanaim' (Pal. zoo); and Bochart is still more mistaken in his statement—'Basan . . . regio est trans Jordanem inter torrentes Jabok et Arnon' (Opera, ii. p. 305; see this point discussed at length in Kitto's Journal of Sacred Literature for July 1854).

There are two passages of Scripture in which the name Gilead seems to be taken in a wider sense.

Thus, in Deut. xxxiv. 1, it is said that when Moses went to the top of Pisgah, 'the Lord shewed him all the land of Gilead unto Dan'; yet Gilead, as has been seen, did not reach to within thirty miles of Dan. It is evident that a popular mode of expression is here adopted, the name of the principal part being put for the whole. So also in Josh. xx. 8; Judg. v. 17, etc.

The physical character of the country and the peculiarity of its position had a marked effect on the inhabitants of Gilead, and still have to this day. The Gadites retained their old pastoral and semi-nomad habits, while their brethren west of the Jordan settled down in cities and farms. Gilead was border land; and exposed along the eastern frontier to the unceasing raids of the desert tribes, and on the north to the armies of Syria. The people thus situated became inured to fatigue, danger, and war. Jephthah, the Gileadite, played a distinguished part in the time of the Judges, leading on his followers after the manner of an Arab Sheikh (Judg. xi.); and some of David's noted warriors were trained amid these mountains (1 Chron. xii. 8, 15). Ramoth-Gilead became the gathering-place and stronghold of the tribes beyond the river, and the scene of many a fierce conflict (1 Kings xxii. 4; 2 Kings viii. 28). The Gileadites sustained the first onslaught of the great Assyrian conqueror, and became the first captives (xv. 29). Gilead was a favourite asylum for refugees. When Abner rallied the Israelites around Ishbosheth, he brought him over the Jordan to Mahanaim (2 Sam. ii. 8); and thither David fled from Absalom (see Stanley, S. and P., 322). The reason was twofold—Gilead was a great natural stronghold where invasion and apprehension were equally difficult; and the Gileadites, with that genuine hospitality which characterises the Arab tribes, were ever ready to give a home and a welcome to the stranger.

After the close of the O. T. history the name Gilead is seldom mentioned. It seems to have soon passed out of use; for though referred to a few times by the apocryphal writers (1 Maccab. v. 9, 20, 36), by Josephus (Antiq. i. 19. 11; Bell. Jud. ii. 3. 3), and by Eusebius (Onomast. l. c.); yet it seems only to be borrowed from the Bible. The allusions are all vague, and those who make them had evidently no definite knowledge of the country. In Josephus and in the N. T. the names Peraa and πέρα τοῦ Ἰορδάνου, are used instead of Gilead (Bell. Jud. iii. 3. 3; Matt. iv. 15; John i. 28); and the country is sometimes spoken of by Josephus as divided into small provinces, called after their capitals, Gadara, Pella, etc., in which Greek colonists had established themselves during the reign of the Seleucidae (Joseph. Bell. Jud. iii. 3. 1).

Gilead is now divided into two provinces, separated by the Jabboc. The northern is called Jebel Ajlûn, and the southern Jebel Yilâd, in which we can recognize the ancient name. The inhabitants, like the old Gadites, are semi-nomads, whose wealth consists in flocks and herds. Like them, too, they are harassed by the desert tribes, they are inured to arms, and they are noted for their hospitality. The capital of the whole country is es-Salt, which occupies the site of Ramoth-Gilead (Burckhardt, Trav. in Syr.; Buckingham, Arab Tribes; Lord Lindsay's Travels; Irbid and Mangles).

The great body of the range of Gilead is Jura limestone, but there are also occasional veins of sandstone. The oak and terebinth flourish on the former, and the pine on the latter. The average elevation of the mountains is about 2500 feet; but as seen from the west they appear much higher, owing to the depression of the Jordan valley. The summit of the range is singularly uniform, resembling a great wall; yet the sides are deeply seamed with ravines. The pastures are everywhere luxuriant; and the wooded heights and winding glens clothed with tangled shrubbery, and having here and there open glades and flat meadows of green turf, present a marked contrast to the general bareness of western Palestine. 'In passing through the country one can scarcely get over the impression that he is roaming through an English park. The graceful hills, the rich vales, the luxuriant herbage, the bright wild-flowers, the plantations of ever-green oak, pine, and arbutus; now a tangled thicket, and now sparsely scattered over the gentle slope, as if intended to reveal its beauty; the little rivulets fringed with oleander, at one place running lazily between alluvial banks, at another dashing madly down rocky ravines. Such are the features of the mountains of Gilead. And then, too, we have the cooing of the wood-pigeon, the hoarse call of the partridge, the incessant hum of myriads of insects, and the cheerful chirp of grasshoppers to give life to the scene. Add to all the crumbling ruins of town, village, and fortress, clinging to the mountain-side or crowning its summit, and you have a picture of the country between es-Salt and Gerasa' (Handbook for S. and P., p. 310). Such a picture, too, illustrates at once the fertility ascribed to it by Jeremiah (xxii. 6; i. 19), and the judgments pronounced against it by Amos (i. 3, 13).—J. L. P.

GILGAL (גִּלְגָּל; Sept. Γολγθλ, Γαλγθλ, and Γάλαλα), a place in the plain of the Jordan, on the right bank of the river, and on 'the east border of Jericho' (Josh. iv. 19). It was the first encampment of the Israelites in Palestine, where they pitched their tents immediately after the miraculous passage of the river, and where they set up the twelve stones brought out of the river's bed. It would appear that Gilgal was the name of the place before the Exodus, for Moses describes the Canaanites as dwelling 'over against Gilgal' (Deut. xi. 30). The difficulties connected with this passage have been already explained under EBAL. Keil supposes this Gilgal to have been near Shechem. (See Comm. on Josh., pp. 219, 232). In Josh. v. 7 we read that after the Israelites had been circumcised 'the Lord said unto Joshua, 'This day have I rolled away' (רָחַק) the reproach of Egypt from off you.' Wherefore the name of the place is called Gilgal unto this day.' The meaning does not seem to be that a new name was given; but rather that a new meaning and significance were attached to the old name. The word Gilgal means a 'circle,' and also a 'rolling away.' A similar play upon a word was noticed in the case of GILEAD; and Bethel is an example of an old name having attached to it a new significance (Gen. xxviii. 19; xxxv. 15). This explanation, simple, natural, and in full accordance with the genius of the Oriental languages and the literary tastes of the people, removes at once the hosts of infidel objections that have been brought against the passage (Keil, in loc.)

The camp of Gilgal became permanent; and probably in grateful memorial of the Lord's mercy in bringing them into the land, and of his appearance there to Joshua as 'captain of the host' (Josh. v. 14), the people made it for centuries the great gathering place of the tribes (ix. 6; x. 6, 43). The Tabernacle remained there during the long wars in the interior, and until it was removed to Shiloh (xviii. 1). Gilgal was one of the three assize towns in which Samuel judged (1 Sam. vii. 16); and in its sacred groves were celebrated the solemn assemblies of Samuel and Saul, and of David on his return from exile (Stanley, S. and P., p. 302; 1 Sam. x. 8; xi. 14; xiii. 4, sq.; xv. 12, sq.; 2 Sam. xix. 15). After the erection of the temple Gilgal appears to have been neglected. Probably when Jericho was rebuilt the traditional sanctity of Gilgal was transferred to it, and there a school of the prophets was established and remained until a late period (2 Kings ii. 5—JERICHO). Gilgal was denounced by the prophets because of the sins committed there at the high place (Hos. iv. 15; Amos iv. 4; v. 5). These idolatrous practices are specially mentioned by Epiphanius and others (Reland, p. 782, sq.) The utter desolation of its site, and the whole surrounding region, shews how fearfully the prophecies have been fulfilled.

The site of Gilgal is fixed by Josephus fifty furlongs from the Jordan and ten from Jericho (Antiq. v. i. 4). Jerome's description agrees with this; and he farther states that in his day it was desert (Onomast., s. v. Galgala). These specifications shew that Gilgal must have been at, or very near, the site of the modern village of Riha (Handbook for S. and P., p. 196). Arculf locates it five miles from Jericho, and says a church stood upon the spot (Early Travels in Pal., p. 7). It is probable, however, that the ecclesiastical architects had not been very particular about topography (Robinson, B. R., i. 557).

2. Gilgal, a royal city of the Canaanites, appears to have been situated on the western plain, as it is connected with the 'region of Dor' (Josh. xii. 23). Jerome places it six miles north of Antipatris (now Kefr Saba). The modern village of Jiljûleh, about four miles south of Antipatris, may mark its site, as it bears its name (Onomast., s. v. Gelgel, Robinson, B. R., ii. 243).

3. Gilgal in the mountains. A Gilgal is mentioned in 2 Kings ii. 1; and it is said of Elijah and Elisha that they went down from it to Bethel. It must, consequently, have been different from the Gilgal in the plain of Jericho, which is more than 3000 feet below Bethel (ver. 2). Also in Neh. xii. 29 we read of Gilgal in connection with Geba. These may perhaps be identical with the Galgala supposed by Jerome and Eusebius to be near to Bethel (Onomast. s. v.); Keil (Commentary on Joshua, p. 219), Van de Velde (Memoir, 316), and others, would identify it with the village of Jiljûlia, six miles north of Bethel. Keil argues that this was the site of the permanent camp, and the place where the tabernacle was set up; but his proofs are not conclusive (See, however, Keil on Joshua, pp. 219, 232).—J. L. P.

GILL, JOHN, DR., was born at Kettering in Northamptonshire, Nov. 23, O. S. 1697. He was educated at the grammar school in his native town, and though only eleven years old when he left it, was distinguished for his proficiency in classical learning. He acquired a knowledge of Hebrew by the help of Buxtorf's grammar and lexicon. In 1716 he joined the Baptist Church at Kettering, and shortly after became assistant preacher. In 1719 he was chosen pastor of the church at Horsley Down, Southwark, and retained that office till his death, Oct. 14, 1771. During the whole of his life he was an indefatigable student. His literary reputation is founded chiefly on his Rabbinical learning, in which he had few equals. His Exposition of the New Testament, in 3 vols. folio, appeared in 1746-1748; his Exposition of the Prophets, with a Dissertation on the Apocryphal Writings, in 1757-1758; and the Exposition from Genesis to Solomon's Song, 4 vols. folio, 1763-1766. He had previously published an exposition of Solomon's Song in 1728, with a translation of the Chaldee Paraphrase; a second edition appeared in 1751, and a third in 1767, with many additions, but without the Targum. His other works connected with Biblical literature are: The Prophecies of the Old Testament respecting the Messiah, 1728, in answer to Collins; A Dissertation concerning the antiquity of the Hebrew Language, Letters, Vowel-points, and Accents, 1767; A dissertation on the Baptism of Jewish Proselytes, appended to his Body of Divinity, 3 vols. 4to, 1770. His miscellaneous works, including sermons and several tracts relating to infant baptism, were republished after his death in 3 vols. 4to. He furnished Dr. Kennicott with a collection of the passages from the O. T. quoted in the Talmuds and the Rabboth.—J. E. R.

GILOH (גִּלּוֹה; Sept. Γηλῶν; Alex. Γηλῶν and Γωλά), a town of Judah, one of a group which lay on the declivities of the mountain-range south of Hebron (Josh. xv. 51). It was the native place of Ahithophel. Absalom, when meditating rebellion, asked permission to go and sacrifice in Hebron. Whilst there he sent for Ahithophel the Gilonite, David's counsellor, who had perhaps been banished for some cause from the court, and was now in disgrace at his own city (2 Sam. xv. 7, sq.) This would account for the otherwise inexplicable fact of a man so famed for his sagacity joining the wild adventure of the rebel son, and recommending such an abominable line of conduct (xvi. 21). Giloh was the scene of Ahithophel's miserable death. Its site is unknown.—J. L. P.

GIMZO (גִּמְצוֹ; Sept. Γαμζῶ), a town of the Shephelah, or 'low country' of Judah, captured by the Philistines, with Ajalon and other places, in the reign of Ahaz (2 Chron. xxviii. 18). It has been identified with the large village of Jimzu, situated on an eminence four miles east of Ramleh, on the road to Beth-horon and Jerusalem. It is about nine miles from Ajalon. The only traces of antiquity in it are large caves, hewn in the limestone rock, along the sides of the little hill, and now used as granaries (Robinson, B. R., ii. 249; Handbook for S. and P., 279).—J. L. P.

GIN. [FOWLING.]

GIR (גִּיר or גִּר). This word is used Is. xxvii. 9, and is there rendered in the A. V. by chalk (חֲבֵטִים, 'chalk stones'). The Syr. supports this, giving ܕܠܝܬܐ (Kelsa, calx), as the equivalent; so also the Arab. The word seems to be derived from גיר, to effervesce, and properly to designate the limestone or rock; 'the broken gir-stones' of the passage above cited are the fragments of limestone prepared for being burnt into lime. Limestone abounds in Palestine; indeed, the entire geological formation of the country is, with few exceptions, calcareous. This gives occasion to many of the peculiar features of the country, and has not been without historical results (See Stanley, Sin. and Pal., p. 146, ff.)—W. L. A.

GIRDLE. [ABNET; ARMOUR; DRESS.]

GIRGASHITES (גִּרְגָּשִׁים; Sept. Γεργασαῖοι), one of the families of Canaan, who are supposed to have been settled in that part of the country which lay to the east of the Lake of Gennesareth. This conclusion is founded on the identity between the word Γεργασαῖοι, which the Septuagint gives for Girgashites, and that by which Matthew (viii. 28) indicates the land of the Gergesenes. But as this last reading rests on a conjecture of Origen, on which little reliance is now placed [GADARA], the conclusion drawn from it has no weight, although the fact is possible on other grounds. Indeed, the older reading, 'Gerasenes,' has sufficient resemblance to direct the attention to the country beyond the Jordan.

The Girgashites are conjectured to have been a part of the large family of the Hivites, as they are omitted in nine out of ten places in which the nations or families of Canaan are mentioned, while in the tenth they are mentioned, and the Hivites omitted. Josephus states that nothing but the name of the Girgashites remained in his time (Antiq. i. 6. 2). In the Jewish Commentaries of R. Nachman, and elsewhere, the Girgashites are described as having retired into Africa, fearing the power of God; and Procopius, in his History of the Vandals, mentions an ancient inscription in Mauritania Tingitana, stating that the inhabitants had fled thither from the face of Joshua the son of Nun. The fact of such a migration is not unlikely; but we have very serious doubts respecting the inscription, mentioned only by Procopius, which has afforded the groundwork of many wonderful conclusions; such, for instance, as that the American Indians were descended from these expelled Canaanites. The notion that the Girgashites did migrate seems to have been founded on the circumstance that, although they are included in the list of the seven devoted nations either to be driven out or destroyed by the Israelites (Gen. xv. 20, 21; Deut. vii. 1; Josh. iii. 10; xxiv. 11), yet they are omitted in the list of those to be utterly destroyed (Deut. xx. 17), and are probably among those with whom, contrary to the Divine decree, the Israelites lived and intermarried (Judg. iii. 1-6).—J. K.

GITTAIM (גִּתַּיִם; Sept. Γεταῖμ), a town of Benjamin. It would seem from 2 Sam. iv. 3 that the ancient Gibeonites were expelled from Beeroth, and either built or colonized Gittaim. In the lists of Nehemiah this town is connected with Rameh (Neh. xi. 33); but its site has not been identified.—J. L. P.

GITTITES (גִּתִּיִּם; Sept. Γεθαῖοι), inhabitants or natives of Gath (Josh. xiii. 3). Obed-edom, although a Levite, is called a Gittite (2 Sam. vi. 10), possibly because he had been with David when at Gath, but much more probably from his being a native of Gath-rimmon, which was a city of the Levites. There seems no reason for extending this interpretation to Ittai (2 Sam. xv. 19), seeing that David expressly calls him 'a stranger' (foreigner), and, what is more, 'an exile.' He was at the head of 600 men, who were also Gittites, for they are called (ver. 22) his 'brethren.' They appear to have formed a foreign troop of experienced warriors, chiefly from Gath, in the pay and service of David; which they had perhaps entered in the first instance for the sake of sharing in the booty obtainable in his wars. We can conceive that the presence of such a troop must have been useful to the king in giving to the Hebrew army that organization and discipline which it did not possess before his time. As natives of Gath they were of course Philistines, and the Philistines were beyond comparison the best soldiers in Palestine; and although they were nationally enemies of Israel, it is easy to conceive various partial influences which might have drawn a troop of them into the service of the most renowned general and successful warrior of their time.—J. K.

GITTITH, a word which occurs in the title of Ps. viii., lxxxi., lxxxiv. [PSALMS.]

GLASS, according to Pliny (Hist. Nat. xxxvi. 26), was discovered by what is termed accident. Some merchants kindled a fire on that part of the coast of Phœnicia which lies near Ptolemais, between the foot of Carmel and Tyre, at a spot where the river Belus casts the fine sand which it brings down; but, as they were without the usual means of suspending their cooking vessels, they employed for that purpose logs of nitre, their vessel being laden with that substance; the fire fusing the nitre and the sand produced glass. The Sidonians, in whose vicinity the discovery was made, took it up, and having in process of time carried the art to a high degree of excellence, gained thereby both wealth and fame. Other nations became their pupils; the Romans especially attained to very high skill in the art of fusing, blowing, and colouring glass. Even glass mirrors were invented by the Sidonians—etiam specula excogitaverant. This account of Pliny is in substance corroborated by Strabo (xvi. 15), and by Josephus (De Bell. Jud. ii. 10. 2). Yet, notwithstanding this explicit statement, it was long denied that the ancients were acquainted with glass properly so called; nor did the denial entirely disappear even when Pompeii offered evidences of its want of foundation. Our knowledge of Egypt has, however, set the matter at rest—shewing at the same time how careful men should be in setting up mere abstract reasonings in opposition to the direct testimony of history. Wilkinson, in his Ancient Egyptians (iii. 88, sq.), has adduced the fullest evidence that glass was known to and made by that ingenious people at a very early period of their national existence. Upward of 3500 years ago, in the reign of the first Osirtasen, they appear to have practised the art of blowing glass. The process is represented in the paintings of Beni Hassan, executed in the reign of that monarch. In the same age images of glazed pottery were common. Ornaments of glass were made by them about 1500 years B.C.; for a bead of that date has been found, being of the same specific gravity as that of our crown glass. Many glass bottles, etc., have been met with in the tombs, some of very remote antiquity. Glass vases were used for holding wine as early as the Exodus. Such was the skill of the Egyptians in this manufacture, that they successfully counterfeited the amethyst, and other precious stones. Winckelmann is of opinion that glass was employed more frequently in ancient than in modern times. It was sometimes used by the Egyptians even for coffins. They also employed it, not only for drinking utensils and ornaments of the person, but for Mosaic work, the figures of deities, and sacred emblems, attaining to exquisite workmanship, and a surprising brilliancy of colour. The art too of cutting glass was known to them at the most remote periods; for which purpose, as we learn from Pliny (Hist. Nat. xxxvii. 4), the diamond was used. That the ancients had mirrors of glass is clear from the above cited words of Pliny; but the mirrors found in Egypt are made of mixed metal, chiefly copper. So admirably did the skill of the Egyptians succeed in the composition of metals, that their mirrors were susceptible of a polish which has been but partially revived at the present day. The mirror was nearly round, having a handle of wood, stone, or metal. The form varied with the taste of the owner. The same kind of metal mirror was used by the Israelites, who, doubtless, brought it from Egypt. In Exod. xxxviii. 8, it is expressly said that Moses 'made the laver of brass of the looking-glasses (brazen mirrors) of the women.'

It would be justifiable to suppose that the Hebrews brought glass, and a knowledge how to manufacture it, with them out of Egypt, were not the evidence of history so explicit that it was actually discovered and wrought at their own doors. Whether it was used by them for mirrors is another question. That glass, however, was known to the Hebrews appears beyond a doubt. In Job xxviii. 17, גַּבְשִׁית is believed to mean glass, though it is rendered 'crystal' in the English version; a substance, in Winer's opinion (Handwörterbuch), signified by גַּבְשִׁית, which occurs in the ensuing verse, while the former is the specific name for glass [CRYSTAL; GABISH]. In the N. T. the word employed is βάρος (compare Aristoph. Nubes, 768). In Rev. xxi. 18, we read, 'The city was pure gold, like unto clear glass;' ver. 21, 'as it were transparent glass' (compare iv. 6). 'Molten glass' also occurs in Job xxxvii. 18, but the original נָחַל, and its corresponding word in Exod. xxxviii. 8, authorise the translation 'mirror'—that is, of some metal. Indeed Winer, referring to Beckman (Beiträge zur Gesch. der Erfindung, iii. 319), expressly denies that glass mirrors were known till the thirteenth century—adding that they are still seldom seen in the East. Mirrors of polished metal are those that are mostly used, formed sometimes into such shapes as may serve for ornaments to the person. In the East mirrors had a connection with the observances of religion; females held them before the images of the goddesses, thereby manifesting their own humility as servants of the divinities, and betokening the prevalence in private life of a similar custom (Callimach. Hymn. in Pallad. 21; Senec. Ep. 95; Cyril, De Adorat. in Spir. ii. 64). That in the N. T. a mirror is intended in James i. 23, 'beholding his natural face in a glass,' appears certain; but the signification in 1 Cor. xiii. 12, in which the word ἐσόπτρον occurs, is by no means so clear. If by ἐσόπτρον a metal mirror is to be understood, the language employed is not without difficulties. The preposition διὰ, 'through,' is in such a case improper; 'face to face' presents an equally improper contrast, for in a mirror 'face answers to face' (Prov. xxvii. 19). So the general import of the passage seems to require a medium, and an imperfectly transparent medium, through which objects are beheld. This is confirmed by the words ἐν αἰνίγματι, in enigma, that is, with the meaning hidden or involved in outward coverings: in this state objects are seen mediately, not immediately (see the passages quoted by Weiststein); in the next the veil will be removed, and we shall see them as they are, as when two persons behold each other with no substance intervening. Hence the rendering in the common version appears not unsuitable, and the statement of the Apostle corresponds with fact and experience; for it is obscurely, as through a dim medium, that we see spiritual objects. What the precise substance was which the Apostle thought of when he used the words it may not be easy to determine. It could not well be ordinary glass, for that was transparent. It may have been the lapis specularis, or a kind of talc, of which the ancients made their windows. This opinion is confirmed by Schleusner, who says that the Jews used a similar mode of expression to describe a dim and imperfect view of mental objects (Schöttgen. Hor. Heb. in loc.) See Michaelis, Hist. Vitri ap. Heb. in Comment. Soc. Goetting. iv. 57; also Dr. Falconer 'on the knowledge of the Ancients respecting Glass,' in the Memoirs of the Lit. and Phil. Soc. of Manchester, ii. 95.—J. R. B.

GLASSIUS, SALOMON, a distinguished theologian of the 17th century, was born at Sondershausen in 1593, and educated at the Gymnasium of Gotha. In 1612 he went to the University of Jena, where he spent three years in the philosophical school; and in 1615 to Wittenberg, where he enjoyed the instructions of Hutter and others. After spending a year at Wittenberg, he returned to Jena, at the desire of his parents, and studied five years, chiefly under Gerhard. Hebrew and the cognate dialects were his favourite subjects. In 1619 he was appointed adjunct of the philosophical faculty. He subsequently became professor of Hebrew, then superintendent at Sondershausen, professor of theology at Jena, and finally general superintendent and consistorial assessor in Gotha, where he died July 27, 1656, sixty-three years of age. Glassius laboured much to promote the welfare of the church with which he was officially connected, entering into its affairs with a sincere desire to rectify abuses and further the interests of true religion. The situation he occupied was an influential one; and he justified the choice of his patron Duke Ernest, by working and living for the highest good of the people. As a Biblical theologian he was inferior to none of his contemporaries. But he was also a practical man of deep piety and tolerant spirit, unlike Calovius. His fame rests principally on the Philologia Sacra, 1625, 4to, a book evincing an extensive knowledge of the Hebrew language and its cognate dialects, if judged by the day in which it appeared. Of course it reflects the stiff orthodoxy of the time, which had penetrated even into the region of the vowel points; and it would be unjust to look in it for a philosophical insight into the genius of the Hebrew language. The first two books were published in 1623; the third and fourth in 1634. The best of the old editions was that superintended by Olearius, 1705. The first and second books contained de Sacra: Scripturæ stylo et sensu; the third and fourth, Grammatica Sacra; the fifth, Rhetorica Sacra. Olearius added from the author's MSS. a Logica Sacra. In 1776 Dathe published the Grammatica et Rhetorica, his temporibus accommodata, which work was completed by L. Bauer, who added a Critica Sacra, 1795, and Hermeneutica Sacra, 1797. The parts re-edited by Bauer have been severely criticised from an orthodox stand-point. The book is still useful in its improved form; though almost superseded by later works, which shew an acquaintance with Hebrew and its peculiarities that no man of Glassius's period could pretend to. Other publications are Grammatica Ebraea, 1623, 4to; Exegesis Evangeliorum et Epistolarum, 1664, fol. 2 vols.; Onomatologia Messiae Prophetica, and Christologia Davidica et Mosaica, published in the best form by Crenius, 1700, 4to, Ludg. Bat.—S. D.

GLEANNING. Two Hebrew words are thus rendered in the A. V., גִּלְעָם, applied to the general produce of the fields (Lev. xix. 9; xxiii. 22), and גִּלְעָוֹת, used properly of grape-gleanings (Judg. viii. 2; Is. xvii. 6; xxiv. 13, etc.), and figuratively of a small remnant (Jer. xlix. 9; Obad. i. 5; Mic. vii. 1). This latter term is connected by some of the Rabbins with גִּלְעָל, a child, 'quia respectu aliorum botrorum se habet ut parvulus respectu viri' (Bartenora, ap. Surenhusii Mishnam i. 67). What fell to the ground, or was left of the produce of the vine, belonged to the poor. Any one placing a vessel under the tree to catch the falling grapes was held to defraud the poor. The Biblical word for these fallen grapes is פְּרִיָּה (Lev. xix. 10). [ALMS].—W. L. A.

GLEDE. [DAH.]

GLORY, SYMBOL OF DIVINE, [SHEKINAH.]

GLOSS, GLOSSARY. A gloss is a note appended to any word or phrase for the purpose of interpretation or illustration. Sacred glosses are such notes appended to words or phrases occurring in the Scriptures. A glossary is a collection of such explanatory notes properly arranged.

The word gloss is borrowed from the Greek γλῶσσα. But in the sense above explained, it has no support from classical usage. The process, however, by which the word passed from its original meaning to that in which it was used by mediæval writers, and in which it is now used, may be traced. The Greek word γλῶσσα, meaning tongue or speech, came to be used by the Greek grammarians in the sense of a word requiring to be explained. In process of time, words often become obsolete, or come to be used in senses different from those in which they were originally used; new words are introduced; and words have frequently special meanings attached to them of a professional or technical character, familiar only to a portion of the community. To the multitude, such words need to be explained; and such words the Greek grammarians called γλῶσσαί. Thus Plutarch speaks of certain expressions in the poets which were not commonly understood, and which belonged to the idiotisms of particular regions or tribes, as τὰς λεγόμενας γλῶσσας (De audiend. poet. c. 6). Galen applies the same name to the antiquated words of Hippocrates, and explains the term thus:—ὅσα τῶν τῶν νοσούντων ἐν μὲν τοῖς παλαιῶν χρόνοις συνήθη ἦν νῦν δὲ οὐκ ἔτι ἐστὶ, τὰ μὲν ταῦτα γλῶσσας καλοῦσι (Exeget. Gloss. Hippocrat. Proem.) Aristotle applies the same term to provincialisms (De arte poet. c. xxi., sec. 4-6; xxii. 3, 4, etc.) And, not to multiply quotations, a scholiast on Dion. Halicarn., quoted by Wetstein on 1 Cor. xii. 10, expressly says γλῶσσας φωνὰς ἀρχαίας καὶ ἀποχρησμένους ἢ ἀποχρηστούσας (?). Quintilian also says of the synonymous word glossemata, 'id est voces minus usitatas' (Instil. Orat. i. 8, 15; comp. also i. 1, 35).

The next step was from calling a word needing explanation a gloss, to apply this term to the explanation itself. These explanations at first consisted merely in adhibiting the word in common use (ὄνομα κύριον, Aristot.) to the obsolete and peculiar word; and thus the two viewed as one whole came to be called a gloss; and ultimately this name came to be given to that part which was of most interest to the reader, viz., the explanation.

These explanations constituted the beginnings of Greek Lexicography. They did not continue, however, to be merely lexical; they often embraced historical, geographical, biographical, and such like notices. Nor were they arranged at first in an alphabetical order; nor did they embrace the whole range of the language, but only such parts of it as the glossographer was interested in (hence such works as the Ἀττικαὶ Ἰλῦσσαι of Theodorus, etc.), nor were the words presented in their uninflected forms, but in the form in which they occurred in the course of the glossographer's reading. More methodical collections of these explanations began to be made in the middle ages, and such as have been preserved to us in the works of Hesychius, Suidas, Phavorinus, Zonaras, Photius, etc.

The extant Scriptural glosses comprise two distinct classes. 1. The first of these consists of explanations drawn from the Greek glossarists, a large number of the notes collected by whom are on words occurring in Scripture. Their works thus become valuable as exegetical aids, especially as they convey not the individual opinion of the collector so much as opinions which he had gathered from older writers. A Glossarium Graecum in N. T., collected from these works, was published by Alberti in 1735. Valcknaer collected from Hesychius the explanations of scriptural words (Opp. i. 173, ff.); but this has been best done by J. Ch. Gottl. Ernesti, in his Glossa Sacra Hesychii Græcæ, etc., Lips. 1785; which was followed by a similar collection from Suidas and Phavorinus, with specimens from the Etymologicum Magnum, Lips. 1786. These are extremely convenient books of reference. Comp. Fabricius, Bibl. Græca, iv. 540, ff.; Rosenmüller, Histor. Interpr. iv. 356, ff.

II. The second class of glosses is due to the habit, as old perhaps as the art of writing itself, of readers inscribing on the margin of MSS., or books, observations of their own, explanatory or otherwise of the text. This was especially the case with the sacred books, partly because after the establishment of Christianity they were more read than other books, partly because their contents gave abundant occasion for theological, historical, or philological annotation. Hence, from an early period, marginal notes intended to illustrate in some way the text came to have a place in the codices containing the sacred books. At first very brief, often confined to a single word, these glosses grew into more extended remarks, written in a smaller hand on the margin, and sometimes between the lines of the codex. In the ancient Hebrew codices, these marginal notes were the source of not a few of the K'ri readings; and the glosses on the margins of the codices of the LXX. and the N. T. have given rise to many of the various readings which exist in both of these. It is believed also, as marginal notes are apt to be transferred by ignorant or careless copyists, into the text,* that some such interpolations are to be found in the received text of the N. T., and it is considered to be one of the problems which criticism has to solve to detect these, and eliminate them. The exercise of a sound and cautious judgment, however, is required to preside over this, lest rash and unauthorised alterations be made (Valcknaer, Dissert. de Glossis Sacris, Franq. 1737; J. A. Ernesti, De vero usu et indole Glossarium Gr., Lug. Bat. 1742; Tittmann, De Glossis N. T. æstimandis et judicandis, Witt. 1782; Wassenbergh, De Glossis N. T., prefixed to Valcknaer's Scholia in Libros quosdam N. T., Amst. 1795; Bornemann De Glossematis N. T. caute dijudicandis, in his Scholia ad Luc. Evang., 1830). It has been proposed to restrict the term gloss to the marginal annotations as such, and to use glosseme to designate those which are supposed to have been introduced into the text; but the usage of writers is not uniform in this respect.

The longer marginal annotations (Glosæ Marginales), were made principally on the text of the Vulgate. These were of various kinds; some grammatical, some historical, some theological, some allegorical and mystical. The most famous collection of these is that made in the 9th century by Walafrid Strabo, from the writings of Augustine, Ambrose, Jerome, Gregory, Isidorus, Bede, Alcuin, and Khabanus Maurus, with additions by himself. This became the great exegetical thesaurus of the middle ages, and was known as the Glosa Ordinaria. Of notes written between the lines (Glosa Interlineares), a collection was made by Anselm of Laon in the beginning of the 12th century. Both these works were printed together about the end of the 15th century, 4 vols. fol.; they have often been reprinted since, with the commentary of Lyra. Other glossaries are those of Peter the Lombard on the Psalms, Par. 1535; of Hugo a S. Caro, Postille in universa Biblia, Ven. 1487, fol. [CARO].—W. L. A.

* 'Miror quomodo e latere annotationem nostram nescio quis temerarius scribendam in corpore putaverit, quam nos pro eruditione legentis scripsimus.' Hieron. ad Suniam et Fretellam, tom. iii. p. 58, ed. Francof.

GNAT (κῶρυψ; Vulg. culex; Order, diptera, Linn., culicidae, Latr.; occurs Matt. xxiii. 24). The word κῶρυψ seems to be the generic term for the gnat among the ancient Greek writers, under which they included several species, as we use the word 'fly,' and 'the fly,' though they give distinct names to some species, as the word σέπφος, etc. Rosenmüller observes that the κῶρυπες of the Greeks seem to be the ephemera of Linnæus (apud Bochart, vol. iii. p. 444, 4to, Leips. 1793-99). Aristotle gives the name to a species whose larvæ are bred in the lees of wine, which is then called the culex vinarius (Hist. An. 5, 19). Pliny also refers to various species of gnats: 'varia sunt culicum genera' (Hist. Nat. xi. 35). 'Alii ex ficis, ficarii dicti' (ibid.). 'Alii ex aceto nascuntur' (ibid.). 'Sunt etiam qui vocantur muliones. Alii centrine' (xvii. 27). We ourselves recognise several kinds under the common name, as gall gnats, horse, wheat, winter (see also Linn. Syst. Nat., Diptera, Culex). Our Saviour's allusion to the gnat is a kind of proverb, either in use in his time, or invented by himself, 'Blind guides, who strain out a gnat, and swallow down [bolt, as we say] a camel.' He adopts the antithesis of the smallest insect to the largest animal, and applies it to those who are superstitiously anxious in avoiding small faults, yet do not scruple to commit the greatest sins. The typographical error, 'strain at a gnat,' first found its way into King James's translation, 1611. It is 'strain out' in the previous translations. The custom of filtering wine, among the Jews, for this purpose, was founded on the prohibition of 'all flying, creeping things' being used for food, excepting the saltatorii (Lev. xi. 23). The custom seems alluded to by the Sept., which, in Amos vi. 6, reads διωλισμενον ονον, 'filtered wine,' a passage having a similar scope. According to the Talmud, eating a gnat incurred scourging or excommunication.—J. F. D.

GNOSTIC, GNOTICISM. The religion of Jesus Christ appearing as a Divine message, in which is announced God's plan of reconciling sinners unto Himself, necessarily assumes a position of exclusiveness. It is not one religion among the many, the religion of a nation or a class; it is the only religion which God will acknowledge, or by which men can be benefited, and as such it claims the submission of all men alike. Such pretensions unavoidably brought it, when it first appeared, into direct antagonism with all existing religious systems—with Judaism as well as with the various forms of heathen belief and worship. Between it and them there could be no peace—no righteous or stable compromise.

As often happens, however, though the fundamental and formative principles of the opposing systems were utterly incapable of reconciliation, the boundary-line between them came ere long to be somewhat obscurely defined, and a considerable extent of border territory, so to speak, arose, on which it was attempted to effect the compromise which the inherent antagonism of the systems rendered it hopeless to attempt in the interior. Thus, between Judaism and Christianity there lay a border land which was occupied by the Judaizing teachers, against whom the Apostle Paul so frequently and energetically writes in his epistles, and at a later period by the Nazarenes and Ebionites. The border land between Christianity and Heathenism was chiefly occupied by the Gnostic sects.

The aim of Gnosticism was to complete Christianity so as to render it a perfect solution of the great world-problem—the relation of the finite to the Infinite, of the relative and dependent to the absolute and self-existent. For this purpose its teachers, borrowed partly from the speculations of the Western schools of philosophy, especially that of the later Platonists, and partly from the reveries of the Eastern theosophists; and these elements they sought to incorporate with Christianity, so as to work up a complete and congruous scheme of religio-philosophic speculation. The different sources from which these speculatists drew their materials determined their division into two great classes,—the Alexandrian and the Syrian Gnostics; in the former of which the doctrines of the Grecian philosophy predominated; in the latter, those of the Parsee or Dualistic theosophy prevailed. Differences of a less general kind divided them into many subordinate sects (Mosheim, De rebus Christianorum ante Constantin. Mag., p. 333, ff.; Matter, Histoire du Gnosticisme; Neander, Church Hist., ii. 42, ff.; Gieseler, Church Hist. i. 134, ff.; Hase, Hist. of the Church, sec. 76; Lewald, Comment. de Doctr. Gnostica, Heidelb. 1818; Art. Gnosis by Jacobi in Herzog Encycl. v. 204; Dörner, Development of the Doctrine concerning the person of Christ, i. 184, ff.)

It does not form any part of the design of this work to furnish detailed accounts of systems of speculative opinion; and the Gnostics are noticed here simply because the question has been mooted whether, and to what extent, their doctrines are referred to in the N. T. As preparatory to this inquiry, therefore, it may suffice to state briefly the fundamental principles common to all the Gnostic sects, and by which they were distinguished from the Christians generally.

Gnosticism rested on three fundamental data:—

1. The existence of a Supreme Being entirely unconnected with matter and incapable of being affected by it; 2. The existence of a primal matter, δλν, entirely independent of God, and at the same time, as the principle of evil, antithetic to him; 3. The existence of some being intermediate between these two. Given these data the problem which it set itself to solve was to account for the phenomena of the universe, and especially for the place which evil holds in it. This problem it solved after the following fashion:—The intermediate being reveals God, and so stands related to him; he also has contact with matter, and so becomes the δημιουργός, or world-creator. As the world thus created is the product of a good being, but is made out of the evil principle, δλν, it is necessarily a mixture of good with evil, and that under the condition of the good being imprisoned, cribbed, confined, by the evil from which struggles to get free. This struggle suggests the idea of a deliverance by a higher power, and that of a redemption. Here, again, the agency of the intermediate being comes into request; but the difficulty occurs, If the Demiurge could not at first make a world free from evil, how can he extricate the good from the evil in the world which he has made? To meet this difficulty the intermediate being, ceasing to be viewed as a monad, is conceived as an aggregate of beings, of which the Demiurge is the lowest, the least perfect, the feeblest; whilst a series of ascending beings, δυνάμεις or αἰῶνες, rise up to the λόγος and the νοῦς, in whom are found the revelation of God and the redemption of the good from the evil, and especially of human spirits from the tyranny of the ὄλη. These general conceptions pervade all the Gnostic system, though they are very differently construed and compounded by different sects, according as emanistic or dualistic notions predominated, according to the temperament and genius of the founder of them, and according as he stood nearer to the heathen, the Jewish, or the Christian point of view. With the Christian revelation this system of speculation connected itself thus:—It accepted the view given in the Bible of God as One, invisible, unsearchable, infinite, eternal; it regarded Satan as the source of evil embodied in the ὄλη; it represented the God of Judaism as the Demiurge by whom the world had been created; and it recognised in Jesus Christ the highest of the Aëons, by whom, along with another Aeon, the πνεῦμα, the soul of man is redeemed and restored to unity with God, perfect light with perfect light. It is in the school of Valentinus that we find the most complete development of these notions. Those who accepted them boasted that they had found the true γνώσις which the Christ had left to his genuine followers, and by which they were enabled to penetrate into divine truth far beyond the reach of those who abode by the mere πίστις, or belief of the written word; and hence the name they assumed, Gnostics.

Christianity has its γνώσις as well as its πίστις, but it is not of the sort in which these speculators and dreamers prided themselves. By the careful and well directed exploration of the meaning of Scripture, by the orderly classification of its doctrines, by the due development of the system of truth it unfolds, and by the reconciliation of this with the great moral truths which are anterior to all written revelation; a real and legitimate Christian Gnosis may be evolved. But to attempt this by means of an incorporation of Scriptural truth with mere human theories or fancies, is to pursue a sure course towards a real ἀγνοσία, a state of intellectual and religious confusion in which there can be nothing Christian but the name. Against such an attempt, presuming it to have been made in their day, we may be sure the apostles would direct their strenuous efforts. But was such an attempt made in their day? were such speculative perversions of Christian truth among the heresies of the apostolic age? This is the question which, in the interests of Biblical Science, we propose now to consider.

That Gnostic sects, such as we find existing in the 2d century, existed in the days of the apostles, or that Gnosticism had under any form reached that point of systematic development which it exhibits in the system of Valentinus or even in that of Basilides or Saturninus; are positions which are now universally abandoned as untenable. Nor is the opinion that any of the N. T. books was written especially to refute Gnostic doctrines, and prevent their growth in the church, maintained by any who hold these to be the genuine productions of those whose names they bear. The question, however, still remains open, whether there may not be in the sacred writings allusions to doctrines of the same kind as those which at a later period assumed a prominent place in the Gnostic systems.

In the outset it may be remarked that the occurrence of such allusions is not an improbable thing. We are unable to trace Gnosticism to its source; but the tendency which it represents is one which may be observed both in heathenism and in Judaism; and in all probability speculations of this sort were rife in many quarters where Christianity was established in the days of the apostles. If so, it is not improbable that they might come with their pernicious influence across the sphere of the apostles' working, and by thereby attracting their attention call forth from them words of censure or warning.

When, however, we pass from preliminary probabilities to inquire into the actual facts of the case, it must be confessed that considerable doubt hangs over the position that the N. T. writings contain any allusions to Gnostic speculations. On the testimony of Irenæus (Cont. Her. iii. 11) and Theodoret (Heret. Fab. ii. 3), we may believe that Cerinthus was a contemporary of St. John, and propagated his erroneous doctrines in Asia Minor; and though there is some doubt as to the story of their encounter in the public bath at Ephesus (Iren. iii. 3; comp. Lardner, Credibility, pt. 2, ch. vi., Works, ii. 86, ed. 1788), it is not improbable that the apostle may have known Cerinthus, and may have encountered some that were affected by his doctrines. All this, however, will not prove that either in his Gospel or in his Epistles the apostle has directly referred to these doctrines. Nor can this be proved from the use by him of such terms as λόγος, φῶς, μονογένης, etc., terms of great importance in the systems of the Gnostics; for these terms have their own proper significance in the apostle's writings; they are repeatedly used by him in a way not only different from, but opposed to that in which the Gnostics used them—as, ex. gr., in the case of λόγος and μονογένης, both of which terms St. John applies to Jesus (i. 18), whilst Cerinthus taught that God begot the Monogenes and the latter the Logos; and the use of some of them by the later Gnostics in a Johannine sense is much more probably to be traced to their having borrowed them from St. John than to his having taken them from them. The only legitimate proof of the existence of direct references to Gnostic views in the writings of the apostles is furnished by the adduction of passages which cannot be explained without supposing such a reference, or which are better explained on that hypothesis than on any other. The former gives the conclusion a very high, the latter a very considerable degree of probability.

Applying this test to the so-called prologue to St. John's Gospel, the only part of that book where such allusions can be supposed to exist, and to his Epistles, we arrive at the conclusion that no allusion to sentiments properly Gnostic, as distinguished from such as are simply Doketic, can be substantiated as occurring in the writings of that apostle. In the Epistles some utterances are of such a kind as to constrain us to believe that the apostle had in his eye some who were seeking to spread doketic views among the Christians; comp. 1 Ep. i. 1; ii. 22; iv. 2, 3; v. 6; 2 Ep. ver. 7. It cannot be proved, however, that the prologue to the Gospel has any polemical reference. It is true that its statements stand opposed to many of the Gnostic doctrines; but they stand opposed no less to many doctrines which are not Gnostic, such as Arian and Humanitarian representations of our Saviour's person; and it might, therefore, be as reasonably argued, that St. John had the followers of Arius and our modern Unitarians in view when he wrote his prologue, as that he had the Gnostics. The obvious truth is, that all parts of Scripture which set forth divine verities must stand opposed to the doctrines of those by whom these are denied. In Holy Scripture, consequently, lies the confutation of all heresy; but it was not for this that it was for the most part written. Its primary design is to set forth the truth for the salvation of men and the edification of the church; and if, in aiming at this end, its writers utter what is found to condemn opinions held by men, that may be the result merely of the essential oppugnancy of truth to error, and cannot of itself be held to prove that the writer had these opinions specially in his view when he wrote. In the case of St. John's Gospel, the number of errors its statements confute is such that there is hardly a heretical sect known to the ancients against which it has not been supposed to be directed.

Much stress has been laid, by those who attribute to St. John an anti-gnostic polemic, on his use of the term λόγος as applied to our Lord. The argument here is that John took this word from the Gnostic teachers and applied it to Jesus Christ, whom he sets forth as the true Logos. But is it certain that the word could come to John from no other source than the Gnostics? We know that it occurs constantly, though not in a personal sense, in the writings of Philo; and what is of still more importance, we know that the Jews did, in a personal sense, speak of the לוגה (Memra de Yey), or Word of Jehovah (Bertholdt, Christologia Judeorum, p. 94-96). Is it not more probable that the term found its way among the Christians, amidst whom John wrote, from this source, than from heathen speculation? Besides, is it credible that had St. John borrowed this term from the Gnostics for the purpose of applying it in a very different sense (for the concept of the Logos by the apostle is entirely different from the Gnostic concept of the Logos), he would have omitted distinctly to intimate the existence of such difference? Was not this more likely to mislead than to instruct?—just as we find in our own day the converse course followed by many who employ N. T. phraseology to convey opinions which the N. T. does not teach (Luthardt, Das Johann. Evang., etc., i. 221, ff.; Schott, Isagoge, p. 141).

Turning to the writings of St. Paul we are met by several passages in those epistles which he wrote towards the end of his life, especially those to the Ephesians and the Colossians, and the Pastoral Epistles, which are supposed to contain direct allusions to Gnostic speculation. That the writer of these epistles had in view certain errorists by whom the Christians were in danger of being led astray, and that many of his statements were directed against these, cannot be called in question. But it is by no means clearly made out that their errors belonged to parties holding what may be called Gnostic views in the sense of that term as commonly used. Still less is there any ground for the assumption on which some have sought to wield an argument against the genuineness of these epistles, that they contain sentiments borrowed from the Gnostic schools of the 2d century. The utter futility of this, it needs only a glance at the passages adduced in support of it to show. In Eph. i. 21 and Col. i. 16, we have a series of existences intermediate between God and the world that bears some resemblance to the Gnostic representation of δυνάμεις or αἰῶνες. When more closely looked at, however, this enumeration will be found to have more of a Judæistic than of a Gnostic character; if, indeed, it be not a mere rhetorical amplification for the sake of emphasis (comp. Rom. viii. 38, 39). That there is an angelic hierarchy is a Biblical doctrine older than the N. T., and one, therefore, which may be referred to by the N. T. writers without supposing them to allude to extra-Christian sects or speculations. In Eph. ii. 7, iii. 21, the apostle uses the expression αἰῶνες, but in a sense which has no connection whatever with the Gnostic doctrine of intermediate beings. In Eph. ii. 2 the αἰὼν is personified, and this is said to be a Gnostic representation; but is it more so there than in Rom. xii. 2, where we have exactly the same expression? or than in Luke xvi. 8, where αἰὼν is also spoken of as a person? or than in 1 Cor. ii. 6 and other passages? The use of πλήρωμα (Eph. i. 23; Col. i. 19; ii. 9) has also been adduced as indicating allusion to Gnostic ideas; but πλήρωμα is a genuine Greek word which was as free to the apostle as to the Gnostics, and which he uses in these passages to express a purely Christian idea, viz., the possession by Jesus of the fulness or complement of the divine perfections; just as he uses it elsewhere in the former of these epistles (Eph. i. 23; iii. 19; iv. 13) to denote the relation of the church to Christ or the completeness of the blessing which believers may expect through Christ. Another Gnostic allusion has been found in the relations of the sexes as set forth in Eph. v. 22, ff.; but there is nothing in this passage which may not be gathered from the whole teaching of Scripture on this head, and which is not substantially asserted in 1 Cor. xi. 3. In the union of Christ and his church (Eph. v. 24-33), Baur discovers a Gnostic Syzygy; as if this representation did not pervade Scripture! as if, beyond the mere figure of marriage, there was the remotest resemblance between the union which the apostle sets forth and the Syzygiæ of the Gnostics! As respects the use of such terms as σοφία, μυστήριον, γνώσις, φῶς, σκοτία, etc., it may suffice to say they are no more Gnostic as they occur in these epistles than as they occur elsewhere in Scripture, and that, if there was any borrowing in the case, it is far more probable that the Gnostics borrowed from the writer of the epistles, than that the writer of the epistles borrowed from them.

The chief of the alleged Gnostic references in the pastoral epistles are to be found in the μύησις and γενεαλογία of 1 Tim. i. 4; iv. 7; Tit. iii. 9; in the ascetic notions referred to 1 Tim. iv. 3; and in the declaration that the resurrection was past already (2 Tim. ii. 18). That these refer to some speculative and theosophic notions by which the simplicity of the faith was endangered, seems clear from the tone of the apostles' remarks; but it is not in any degree made certain by this, that these were such as afterwards distinguished the Gnostic schools. It is not probable that had the writer had in view such speculations as those of Basilides, Valentinus, or Marcion, he would have applied to them such a term as γραῶδεις, which conveys the idea not so much of error as of imbecility. When, moreover, we advert to the epithet νόμικαι, as applied to the μάχαι which the writer denounces (Tit. iii. 9), we shall probably see cause to attribute a Jewish source to the errors by which the Christians were assailed; especially as the writer expressly describes those whom he opposes as 'they of the circumcision,' and cautions his readers against Jewish myths (Tit. i. 10, 14).

Drawing our information from the epistles themselves as to the views and tendencies by which the false teachers (ἐρεοδιδασκάλοι) alluded to in them were characterised, it appears that they boasted of a φιλοσοφία, which the apostle stigmatises as a κερὴ ἀπάτη, an empty cheat (Col. ii. 8), and a γνῶσις, which he denounces with equal decisiveness as ψευδῶνυμος, falsely called (1 Tim. vi. 20). This they pretended to have derived from tradition (Col. ii. 8), and presented in the form sometimes of myth, sometimes of speculative discussion (1 Tim. vi. 3-5; Tit. iii. 9). They held by Jewish rites and ordinances (Col. ii. 11, 16; 1 Tim. i. 7); followed and enjoined ascetic courses (20-23; 1 Tim. iv. 1-7), and propagated their errors under a specious guise of sanctity (Col. ii. 23; 1 Tim. iv. 2; 2 Tim. iii. 6). They pretended to a superior knowledge of God (Tit. i. 16); they held worship to be due to angels, and probably assigned to Christ, as the Logos, the place of ἀρχαγγέλος; they taught that the resurrection was already past (2 Tim. ii. 18); and they may also have held doctrines opposed to the absoluteness of the divine essence, the universality of the divine scheme of redemption, the reality of the person of Christ, and the exclusiveness of his mediatorial office, and may have stigmatised child-bearing as deriving a taint from standing connected with matter, the essentially evil; so as to lead the apostle to make such pointed statements as we have in 1 Tim. i. 17; ii. 4, 6, 15; iii. 16; iv. 10; vi. 15, 16, etc. Whether we conclude that they held an emanation-doctrine similar to the Gnostic doctrine of Æons, will depend very much on the meaning we attach to the γενεαλογία to which they were addicted. By some these are held to be the Jewish family registers, by others gradations of existences like the Æons. There are difficulties attaching to both views. On the one hand there is the entire absence of any authority for understanding γενεαλογία in the sense of a series of beings of different grades;* and, on the other hand, there is the want of any traceable connection between the genealogical rolls of the Jews and doctrinal errors on the part of those who attached importance to them. In this uncertainty no help can be obtained from the application by the apostle of the epithet ἀπειράτοι to the γενεαλογία of which he speaks, for whether we take this in the sense of limitless, endless, or in the sense of useless, profitless (ἡτοι πέρας μηδὲν ἔχουσαι ἢ οὐδὲν χρησίμων, Chrysostom, in loc.), it will apply equally well to the Jewish rolls or to the Gnostic æonology. On the whole, the preference seems due to the latter of the opinions above noted (comp. Neander, Apost. Zeit., p. 422, Eng. Tr. i. 340).

It is impossible to overlook the predominant Jewish element in these doctrines. It is not, however, of the same type as the Judaism which the apostle opposes in other of his writings, the Epistle to the Galatians for instance. There it was the Jewish ceremonial tradition which occupied the foreground; here it is philosophy and speculation. In the one case what the apostle resisted was the attempt to force upon Christianity the 'beggarly elements' (πτωχὰ στοιχεῖα) of a defunct economy; in the other, what he resisted was the attempt to mix up with the pure truth of the gospel the 'worldly elements' (στοιχεῖα τοῦ κόσμου) of a purely human theosophy. In the latter there was undoubtedly a mingling of the ethnic with the Jewish speculation (γνῶσις); and probably Neander has exactly determined the position of these heretics when he describes them as 'a Judaizing sect, in which we see the germ of the Judaizing Gnosticism' (Apostol. Zeitalt., p. 404; Eng. Tr. i. 325).

The conclusion to which this inquiry has brought us, is, that whilst there is no evidence that Gnosticism as it appeared in the 2d century was known to the apostles, and whilst the teachers of error against whom they had to contend came from the side of Judaism, there were in their doctrines the germs both of Doketic and Gnostic speculation; so that when these systems came into vogue, the Christians found in the writings of the apostles the most suitable weapons with which to oppose them (Michaelis, Einleit. ins. N. T., sec. 160; Tittmann, De Vestigijs Gnosticorum in N. T. frustra questis, Lips. 1773; Scherer, De Gnosticis qui in N. T. impugnari dicuntur, Arg. 1841; Hildebrand, *Phil. GOAD. Two Hebrew words are translated by this term in the A. V.

(1.) שֶׁטֶל, derived from שָׁלַח, to teach, an instrument to guide oxen and keep them in the right track; the word occurs only in Judg. iii. 31; the Septuagint renders it ἀπορρόποι, and the Vulgate vomere, a ploughshare. Though this is not a correct interpretation, yet doubtless the pointed iron which armed the plough might, without difficulty, be converted into a formidable weapon; and this

* The language of Tertullian (adv. Valentinos, sec. 3) and of Irenæus (Hæc. i. 1, sub init.), can hardly be regarded as such. It is doubtful if the latter intends any reference to the Gnostic æons at all; and the former simply states his opinion, that one looking at the multitudinous names and combinations in the Gnostic systems would be constrained to believe easy adaptation of agricultural implements to war-like purposes will account for the despotic interdict laid upon the Israelites by the Philistines, 1 Sam. xiii. 19, 20 (Kitto, Daily Bible Illustrations, ii. 341). Maundrell noticed that in Palestine and Syria the goads were eight feet long, and at the larger end six inches in circumference. At the lesser end they were armed with a sharp point of iron for driving the oxen, and at the other with a small spade or paddle of iron, strong and massy, for cleansing the plough from the clay. 'I am confident,' he says, 'that whoever should see one of these instruments would judge it to be not less fit, perhaps fitter, than a sword for such an execution' as that related in Judg. iii. 31 (Journey from Aleppo, etc., Lond. 1810, p. 149). Buckingham gives a similar description (Travels in Palestine, Lond. 1822, vol. i. 91).

(2.) עֵז occurs only in 1 Sam. xiii. 21 (ἐπέσπρον, LXX.; stimulum, Vulg.) and Eccl. xii. 11 (βοῦκεντρα, LXX.; stimuli, Vulg.). Kimchi and other Jewish writers consider this word simply to mean the point or head of the מלכוד (Gesenius, Thesaurus, p. 349).—J. E. R.

GOAT. [AKKO; ATTUDIM; EZ; GEDI; YAEI; SA'IR; TSAPHIR.]

GOAT, SCAPE. A reference to this head is made under the article AZAZEL. The article is retained as presenting the view of Hengstenberg.

It appears to Hengstenberg that an Egyptian reference must necessarily be acknowledged in the ceremony of the Great Atonement day; and in order to establish this reference, he first endeavours to substantiate his view of the meaning of the word עֵז, Azazel; which is, that it designates Satan. But this notion can only be placed in a right point of view by taking a general survey of the whole rite, in order to point out definitely the position which Azazel holds in it.

The account of this remarkable ceremony is contained in Lev. xvi.

First, in verses 1-10, the general outlines are given; and then follows, in verses 11, sq., the explanation of separate points. It is of no small importance for the interpretation that this arrangement, which has been recognised by few interpreters, should be clearly understood. Aaron first offers a bullock as a sin-offering for himself and his house. He then takes a firepan full of coals from the altar, with fragrant incense, and goes within the veil. There he puts the incense on the fire before the Lord, and 'the cloud of the incense' (the embodied prayer) covers the mercy-seat which is upon the ark of the covenant, that he die not. Aaron then takes the blood of the bullock and sprinkles it seven times before the mercy-seat. After he has thus completed the expiation for himself, he proceeds to the expiation for the people. He takes two he-goats for a sin-offering for the children of Israel (xvi. 5). These he places before the Lord at the door of the tabernacle (xvi. 7). He casts lots upon them; one lot 'for the Lord' and one lot 'for Azazel' (xvi. 8). The goat upon which the lot for the Lord fell (xvi. 9) he offers for a sin-offering, brings the blood within the veil, and does with it as with the blood of the bullock. In this way is the sanctuary purified from the defilements of the children of Israel, their transgressions, and all their sins, so that the Lord, the holy one and pure, can continue to dwell there with them. After the expiation is completed, the second goat, on which fell the lot for Azazel, is brought forward (xvi. 10). He is first placed before the Lord to absolve him (לכפר עליו). Then Aaron lays his hands upon his head, and confesses over him the (forgiven) iniquities, transgressions, and sins of the children of Israel, puts them upon his head, and gives him to a man to take away, in order that he may bear the sins of the people into a solitary land (xvi. 22), into the desert, for Azazel (xvi. 10). Then Aaron offers a burnt-offering for himself, and one for the people.

Now, in respect to language, there can be no objection to interpreting Azazel as meaning Satan. That the Hebrew עֵז, Azal, corresponds to the Arabic عزل, was long ago asserted by Bochart and others, and is now generally admitted; and עֵז, Azazel, belongs to the form which repeats the second and third radicals. In reference to this form, Ewald remarks (Gramm. sec. 333), that it expresses general intension, and that the idea of continual, regular repetition, without interruption, is also specially expressed by the repetition of nearly the whole word. The Arabic word Azala signifies in that language 'semovit, dimovit, removit, descivit'; in the passive it signifies 'remotus, depositus fuit'; and the participle, azul, means 'a cæteris se jungens.' In like manner azul, mazul, denote 'semotus, remotus, abdicatus.' From this two explanations of Azazel, as relating to Satan, may be deduced; either 'the apostate' (from God), or, 'the one entirely separate.' It is in favour of the latter that the signification 'descivit' is only a derived one, and that it is appropriate to the abode in the desert. The goat is sent to Azazel in the desert, in the divided land ('terra abscissa'). How then could he be designated by a more appropriate name than 'the separate one'?

And this explanation, as far as the facts of the case are concerned, is, in Hengstenberg's opinion, equally free from any well grounded objection. The doctrinal signification of the symbolical action, as far as it has reference to Azazel, is this, that Satan, the enemy of the people of God, cannot harm those forgiven by God, but that they, with sins forgiven of God, can go before him with a light heart, deride him, and triumph over him.

The positive reasons which favour this explanation are the following:—

1. The manner in which the phrase עֵז, 'for Azazel,' is contrasted with ליהוה, 'for Jehovah,' necessarily requires that Azazel should denote a personal existence, and, if so, only Satan can be intended. 2. If by Azazel, Satan is not meant, there is no ground for the lots that were cast. We can then see no reason why the decision was referred to God; why the high-priest did not simply assign one goat for a sin-offering, and the other for sending away into the desert. The circumstance that lots are cast implies that Jehovah is made the antagonist of a personal existence, with respect to which it is designed to exalt the unlimited power of Jehovah, and to exclude all equality of this being with Jehovah. 3. Azazel, as a word of comparatively unfrequent formation, and only used here, is best fitted for the designation of Satan. In every other explanation the question remains, 'Why, then (as it has every appearance of being), is the word formed for this occasion, and why is it never found except here?'

By this explanation the third chapter of Zechariah comes into a relation with our passage, entirely like that in which chap. iv. of the same prophecy stands to Exod. xxv. 31. Here, as there, the Lord, Satan, and the high-priest appear. Satan wishes by his accusations to destroy the favourable relations between the Lord and his people. The high-priest presents himself before the Lord, not with a claim of purity, according to law, but laden with his own sins and the sins of his people. Here Satan thinks to find the safest occasion for his attacks; but he is mistaken. Forgiveness baffles his designs, and he is compelled to retire in confusion. It is evident that the doctrinal part of both passages is substantially the same, and that the one in Zechariah may be considered the oldest commentary extant upon the words of Moses. In substance we have the same doctrine also in Rev. xii. 10, 11; 'the accuser of our brethren is cast down, who accuses them before our God day and night, and they overcame him by the blood of the Lamb.'

The relation in which, according to this explanation, Satan is here placed to the desert, finds analogy in other passages of the Bible, where the deserted and waste places appear as peculiarly the abode of the Evil Spirit. See Matt. xii. 43, where the unclean spirit cast out of the man is represented as going through 'dry places;' also Luke viii. 27; and Rev. xviii. 2, according to which the fallen Babylon is to be the dwelling of all unclean spirits.

To the reasons already given, the Egyptian reference, which the rite bears according to this explanation, may be added—'a reference so remarkable, that no room is left for the thought that it has arisen through false explanation.'

Dr. Hengstenberg then proceeds to meet the objections which have been brought to bear against the view adopted by him—'adopted,' for this explanation is by no means a new one, though he has brought it forward in greater force than before, and with new illustrations.

The most important of the objections, and the one which has exerted the greatest influence, is this, that it gives a sense which stands in direct opposition to the spirit of the religion of Jehovah. It is asked, 'Could an offering properly be made to the Evil Spirit in the desert, which the common precepts of religion in the Mosaic law, as well as the significance of the ceremony, entirely oppose?' To this Hengstenberg answers—'Were it really necessary to connect with the explanation of Azazel as meaning Satan, the assumption that sacrifice was offered to him, we should feel obliged to abandon it, notwithstanding all the reasons in its favour. But nothing is easier than to show that this manner of understanding the explanation is entirely arbitrary. The following reasons prove that an offering made to Azazel cannot be supposed:—'

1. Both the goats are, in verse 5, taken together as forming unitedly one single offering, which wholly excludes the thought that one of them was brought as an offering to Jehovah, and the other to Azazel. And further, an offering which is made to a bad being can never be a sin-offering. The idea of a sin-offering implies holiness, hatred of sin in the being to whom the offering is made.

2. Both the goats were first placed at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation before the Lord. To him, therefore, they both belong; and when afterwards one of them is sent to Azazel, this is done in accordance with the wish of Jehovah, and also without destroying the original relation, since the one sent to Azazel does not cease to belong to the Lord.

3. The casting of lots also shows that both these goats were considered as belonging to the Lord. The lot is never used in the O. T. except as a means of obtaining the decision of Jehovah. So then, here also, Jehovah decides which of the goats is to be offered as a sin-offering, and which to be offered to Azazel.

4. The goat assigned to Azazel, before he is sent away, is absolved (xvi. 21). The act by which the second goat is, as it were, identified with the first, in order to transfer to the living the nature which the dead possessed, shews to what the phrase 'for a sin-offering,' in verse 5, has reference. The two goats (as Spencer had before observed) became, as it were, one goat, and their duality rests only on the physical impossibility of making one goat represent the different points to be exhibited. Had it been possible, in the circumstances, to restore life to the goat that was sacrificed, this would have been done. The two goats, in this connection, stand in a relation entirely similar to that of the two birds in the purification of the leprous persons in Lev. xiv. 4, of which the one let go was dipped in the blood of the one slain. As soon as the second goat is considered an offering to Azazel, the connection between it and the first ceases, and it cannot be conceived why it was absolved before it went away.

5. According to verse 21, the already forgiven sins of Israel are laid upon the head of the goat. These he bears to Azazel in the desert. But where there is already forgiveness of sin, there is no more offering.

The other objections which have on different principles been made to this view are of less weight.

One of them, which alleges the apparent equality given under this explanation to the claims of Jehovah and of Satan, is answered by showing that it is rather calculated to act against the tendency of an ancient people to entertain that belief. The lot is under the direction of Jehovah, and is a means of ascertaining his will; and not a mediation between the two by an independent third agency, which decides to which the one and to which the other shall fall.

Another objection, founded on the belief that Satan nowhere appears in the Pentateuch, will not in this country be deemed to require much answer. It is entertained chiefly by those who believe that the presence of Satan in Scripture is owing to the influence of a foreign (Babylonian and Persian) theology upon Hebrew opinions; and it is answered by a reference to the book of Job, in which Satan appears distinctly, while even the objectors admit that this book was written long before the assigned influence existed. And if it were indeed necessary to refer the knowledge of Satan to a foreign influence, it might be perceived that quite as much is accomplished by referring to the Egyptian Typhon as to the Persian Ahreman. Hengs tenberg also points to the intimations of the doctrine of Satan, which appear in Gen. iii., and remarks—'From a theological point of view, as well as from the nature of the case, it will be found almost impossible that a dogma which, in the later period of the revelation, holds so important a place, should not at least be referred to in the statement of the first principles of that revelation.'

After exhibiting the positive reasons for this explanation, and disposing of the objections to it, Hengstenberg subjects to examination those among the various explanations that have been given, which are now current; and makes out that they are either philologically untenable with reference to the word Azazel, do not agree with the context, or are unsatisfactory in the result to which they conduct us.

If it has been thus established that Satan is to be understood by the term Azazel, then, argues Hengstenberg, an allusion to Egypt in the whole rite cannot be mistaken. In that country every bad influence or power of nature, and generally the bad itself, in a physical or ethical respect, was personified under the name of Typhon. The doctrine of a Typhon among the Egyptians is as old as it is firmly established. Representations of him are found on numerous monuments as old as the time of the Pharaohs. Herodotus speaks of Typhon (ii. 144, 156, and iii. 5). But Plutarch gives the most accurate and particular account, with, indeed, many incorrect additions.

The barren regions around Egypt generally belonged to Typhon. The desert was especially assigned to him as his residence, whence he made his wasting inroads into the consecrated land. 'He is,' says Creuzer, 'the lover of the degenerate Nephthys, the hostile Libyan desert, and of the sea-shore. There is the kingdom of Typhon. On the contrary, Egypt the blessed, the Nile-valley glittering with fresh crops, is the land of Isis.' Herodotus ascribes a similar dwelling to Typhon.

By a strange but very natural alteration, the Egyptian sought sometimes to propitiate the god whom they hated, but feared, by offerings, and indeed by those which consisted of sacred animals. Sometimes, again, when they supposed that the power of the gods was prevalent and sustained them against him, they allowed themselves in every species of mockery and abuse. 'The obscured and broken power of Typhon,' says Plutarch, 'even now, in the convulsions of death, they seek sometimes to propitiate by offerings, and endeavour to persuade him to favour them; but at other times, on certain festival occasions, they scoff at and insult him. Then they cast mud at those who are of a red complexion, and throw down an ass from a precipice, as the Coptites do, because they suppose that Typhon was of the colour of the fox and the ass.'

The most important passage on the worship of Typhon is found in De Is. et Osir. p. 380: 'But when a great and troublesome heat prevails, which in excess either brings along with it destructive sickness or other strange or extraordinary misfortunes, the priests take some of the sacred animals, in profound silence, to a dark place. There they threaten them first and terrify them; and when the calamity continues, they offer these animals in sacrifice there.'

Now, the supposition of a reference to these Typhonia sacra Hilsius considers as a profanation. But it is seen at once that the reference contended for by him is materially different from that adopted by our author. The latter is a controversial one. In opposition to the Egyptian view, which implied the necessity of yielding respect even to bad beings generally, if men would insure themselves against them, it was intended by this rite to bring Israel to the deepest consciousness that all trouble is the punishment of a just and holy God, whom they, through their sins, have offended; that they must reconcile themselves only with him; that when that is done, and the forgiveness of sins is obtained, the bad being can harm no farther.

How very natural and how entirely in accordance with circumstances such a reference was, is evident from the facts contained in other passages of the Pentateuch, which shew how severe a contest the religious principles of the Israelites had to undergo with the religious notions imbibed in Egypt. This is especially exhibited in the regulations in Leviticus xvii., following directly upon the law concerning the atonement-day, which prove that the Egyptian idol-worship yet continued to be practised among the Israelites. The same thing is also evident from the occurrences connected with the worship of the golden calf.

The assumption of a reference so specially controversial might indeed be supposed unnecessary, since in a religion, which teaches generally the existence of a powerful bad being, the error here combated, the belief that this being possesses other than derived power, will naturally arise in those who have not found the right solution of the riddle of human life in the deeper knowledge of human sinfulness.

But yet the whole rite has too direct a reference to a prescribed practice of propitiating the bad being, and implies that former offerings were made to him—a thing which could never be the natural product of Israelitish soil, and could scarcely spring up there, since such an embodying of error contradicts fundamental principles among the Israelites respecting the being of Jehovah, which, indeed, allows the existence of no other power with itself.

And, finally, there exists here a peculiar trait, which in Hengstenberg's opinion makes it certain that there is an Egyptian reference, namely, the circumstance that the goat was sent to Azazel into the desert. The special residence of Typhon was in the desert, according to the Egyptian doctrine, which is most intimately connected with the natural condition of the country. There, accordingly, is Azazel placed in our passage, not in the belief that this was literally true, but merely symbolically (Hengstenberg, Egypt and the Books of Moses).

GOATH (גֹּאֵת, or with suff. גֹּאֲתָה; Vulg.

Goatha), mentioned only Jer. xxxi. 39, where it apparently denotes some prominent object which served to mark in one direction the boundary of Jerusalem; but whether it were a hill, or a valley, or a pool, is altogether uncertain. In the Targ. of Jonathan it is rendered גִּבְרִית עֵינָה, the heifer's pool; and this derives some slight support from the probable connection of the word with גִּיט mugit (Ges.

s. v.) In the Sept. the clause reads περικυλῶσθαι κύκλῳ ἐξ ἐκλεκτῶν λίθων. Equally uncertain is the position of the place. The context seems to favour the conjecture that it was on the southern side of the city.—S. N.

GOB. גֹּב, Is. xxxiii. 4; Sept. ἀκρίδας; Vulg. is deficient; Eng. locusts; Amos vii. 1, ἐπιγονὴ ἀκρίδων; Aquila, βοράδων (voratrices), locustæ, grasshoppers; Nah. iii. 17, ἀττέλαβος, or ἀττέλεβος, locustæ, grasshoppers. Here the lexicographers, finding no Hebrew root, resort to the Arabic. Bochart derives it from the Arabic نَبَا, 'to creep out' (of the ground), as the locusts do in spring. But this applies to the young of all species of locusts, and his quotations from Aristotle and Pliny occur unfortunately in general descriptions of the locust.

Castell gives another Arabic root (ج ب) نَاب, seculi, 'to cut' or 'tear,' but this is open to a similar objection. Parkhurst proposes גב, anything gibbous, curved, or arched, and gravely adds, 'the locust in the caterpillar state, so called from its shape in general, or from its continually hunching out its back in moving.' The Sept. word in Nahum, ἀττέλεβος, may be shewn to mean a perfect insect and species. Accordingly, Aristotle speaks of its partitioning and eggs (Hist. Anim. v. 29; so also Plutarch, De Isid. et Osir.) It seems, however, not unlikely that it means a wingless species of locust, genus Podisma of Latreille. Grasshoppers, which are of this kind, he includes under the genus Tettix. Hesychius defines the ἀττέλεβος as ἀκρίς μικρά, 'a small locust;' and Pliny describes them as 'locustarum minimæ, sine pennis, quas attelabos vocant' (Hist. Nat. xxix. 5). Accordingly the Sept. ascribes only leaping to it, ἐξήλατο ὡς ἀττέλεβος. In Nahum we have the construction גֹּב נֹבִי, locusta locustarum, which the lexicons compare with קָרַשׁ קִרְשִׁים, and explain as a vast multitude of locusts. Archbishop Newcome suggests that 'the phrase is either a double reading where the scribes had a doubt which was the true reading, or a mistaken repetition not expunged.' He adds, that we may suppose גֹּבִי the contracted plural for גֹּבוֹבִים (Improved Version of the Minor Prophets, Pontefr. 1809, p. 188).

GOB (גֹּב), a place mentioned in 2 Sam. xxi. 18 and 19, where battles were fought between the Philistines and Israelites. The Septuagint reads in one verse Γεζ, and in the other Πόμ, AL Γεζ; but the parallel passage in 1 Chron. xx. 4 reads Gezer [GEZER]. The two places were probably close together, but the site is unknown.—J. L. P.

GOBLET (גֹּבֶלֶת; LXX. κράτηρ, ἀγανῶθ). This word is only once used in the A. V., Song vii. 2, 'Thy navel is like a round goblet.' The Hebrew word גֹּבֶלֶת also occurs in two other places (Exod. xxiv. 6, A. V. 'basons,' and Is. xxii. 24, A. V. 'cups.') From Exod. xxiv. 6 it is clear that the vessel was large and round, or it would not have been adapted to hold the blood of the sacrifices. In Song vii. 2 the adjective סָרֹר (round) is incorrectly rendered σπευτός, although these goblets may of course have been occasionally embossed. From the third passage (Is. xxii. 24), it appears that vessels and instruments of all kinds were suspended from pegs on the temple walls. The Peshito is here obviously mistaken in rendering גֹּבֶלֶת, by 'psaltery;' a rendering which is the more strange because the cognate Syriac word is used to render ὑδρία in John ii. 6, 7. [See BASONS.]—F. W. F.

GOD. This word stands in the A. V. as the invariable representative of the Hebrew אֱלֹהִים, אֱלֹהִים, and אֱלֹהִים.* This seems, therefore, the proper place for introducing an enquiry into these terms.

I. We shall commence by a summary of the usages of these words.

1. אֱלֹהִים. This term is used in the most general way as a designation of Deity, whether of the true God or of the false gods, even the idols, of the heathen. In the latter reference it occurs Is. xlv.

10, 15; xlv. 20; xlv. 6; and in the pl. אֱלֹהִים, Exod. xv. 11; Dan. xi. 36; though in both these last instances it may be questioned whether the word is not used in the sense of mighty ones. To render the application of the term in this reference more specific, such epithets as אֲחֵר, other, foreign (Exod. xxxiv. 14), נָכַר, strange, hostile (Ps. lxxxi. 10), נֶכֶד, strange (Deut. xxxii. 12). When used of the true God, אֱלֹהִים is usually preceded by the article הָאֱלֹהִים, Gen. xxxi. 13; Deut. vii. 9), or followed by such distinctive epithets as עֶשְׂרִי, Almighty (Exod. vi. 3); עוֹלָם, eternal (Gen. xxi. 33; Is. xl. 28); עֶלְיוֹן, Supreme (Gen. xiv. 18); חַי, living (Josh. iii. 10); גִּבּוֹר, mighty (Is. ix. 5); or such qualifying adjuncts as כְּבוֹד, of glory (Ps. xxix. 3); אֱמֶת, of truth (Ps. xxxi. 6); גְּמוּלוֹת, of retributions (Jer. li. 56); בֵּית־אֵל, of Bethel (Gen. xxxi. 13); יִשְׂרָאֵל, of Israel (Gen. xxxiii. 20); יְהוָה (Deut. xxxiii. 26). In poetry אֱלֹהִים sometimes occurs as a sign of the superlative; as הַרְיֵי־אֵל, hills of God, very high hills (Ps. xxxvi. 7); אֲחֵר־אֵל, cedars of God (Is. lxxx. 11). The phrase בְּנֵי־אֱלֹהִים occurs Ps. xxix. 1; lxxxix. 7; and is supposed by some to refer to angels; but others take אֱלֹהִים here for אֱלִים, and translate Sons of the mighty (see Rosenmüller, in loc.) There is no instance of אֱלֹהִים in the singular being used in the sense of mighty one or hero; for even if we retain that reading in Ezek. xxxi. 11 (though thirty of Kennicott's codices have the reading אֵל, and the probability is that in those which present אֱלֹהִים, the 'is quiescent), the rendering 'God of the nations,' may be accepted as conveying a strong but just description of the power of Nebuchadnezzar, and the submission rendered to him; comp. 2 Cor. iv. 4. In proper names אֱלֹהִים is often found sometimes in the first member of the compound word, ex. gr., אֱלֹהִים Eldad, etc., and sometimes as the last member, ex. gr., שְׁמוּאֵל Samuel, לֵמוּאֵל Lemuel, טַבְעֵל Tabeel, etc.

* In a few places where the combination אֲדֹנָי יְהוָה, Adonaj Jehovah, occurs, our translators have given 'God' as the rendering of יְהוָה. They have done this, however, merely to avoid the awkwardness of such a combination as Lord Lord. These, as merely exceptional cases, may be passed over here. [JEHOVAH].

2. אֱלֹהִים, pl. אֱלֹהִים. The singular form occurs only in poetry, especially in Job, and in the later books such as Daniel, Nehemiah, and Chronicles. It is used as well of idol deities as of the true God (Dan. xi. 37, 38; Habak. i. 11; Deut. xxxii. 15; Ps. l. 22; Habak. iii. 3, etc.); once in the former case with the addition of נִכְר (Dan. xi. 39), and in the latter with that of יַעֲקֹב (Ps. cxiv. 7). The more common usage is that of the plural. This pervades all the books of the O. T., from the earliest to the latest. The word is used principally of the true God, and in this case frequently with the article prefixed (Gen. v. 22; vi. 9, 11; xvii. 18), as well as with such adjuncts as הַשְׁמַיִם (Neh. i. 4), or with the addition of הוֹאֲרִי (Gen. xxiv. 3); אֱמֶן (Is. lxxv. 16); צֶדֶק (Ps. iv. 2); הַצְּבֹאוֹת (Am. iii. 13), etc. When the relation of Israel to God is to be indicated, the phrases אֱלֹהֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל Elohe Yishrael, יְעֻקֵּב אֱלֹהֵי יַעֲקֹב Elohe Yaaqob, אֱבְרָהָם אֱלֹהֵי אַבְרָהָם E. Abraham, are used (Ezek. v. 1; Ps. xx. 2; xlvii. 10, etc.); and in this case, as the term Elohims is equivalent in effect to Jehovah, it is often used interchangeably with that term; thus Moses, who is designated עֶבְרִי Ebed-Jehovah (Deut. xxxiv. 5), is called in the same sense אֱלֹהִים עֶבְרִי Ebed-Elohim (Dan. ix. 11); and the same object is designated indifferently רֹחַ רוּחַ-יְהוָה Ruach-Jehovah, and רֹחַ אֱלֹהִים Ruach-Elohim (comp. Judg. iii. 10, and Exod. xxxi. 3, etc.) Not unfrequently the two terms are combined (Lev. xviii. 2, 4, etc.; xix. 2, etc.; 2 Sam. v. 10; 1 Kings i. 36; xiv. 13; Ps. xviii. 29, etc.) Most commonly, however, they are used distinctively, with respect, probably, to the difference between their primary meanings (see Hengstenberg, Auth. d. Pent. i. 181, ff.) In the Pentateuch this discriminative usage has given ground for certain hypotheses as to the composition of that work [PENTATEUCH]. In the earlier historical books, Jehovah is more frequently used than Elohims; in Job, Jehovah is more frequently used in the poetical, Eloah or Elohims in the prosaic portions; in the Psalms, sometimes the one sometimes the other predominates, and this has been thought to afford some criterion by which to judge of the age of the psalm, the older psalms being those in which Elohims is used; in Proverbs we have chiefly Jehovah; in Ecclesiastes, Daniel, and Jonah, almost exclusively Elohims, and in the other prophets chiefly Jehovah. Elohims is also used of idol deities or false gods, because these were worshipped as if they were God (Exod. xix. 20; xxxii. 31; Josh. xxiv. 20; Jer. ii. 11; Jonah i. 5, etc.), and like El it is used as a superlative (Ps. lxxviii. 16; lxxv. 10, etc.) Kings and Judges, as the viceregerents of Deity, or as possessing a sort of representative majesty, are sometimes called Elohim (Ps. lxxxii. 1, 6; Exod. xxi. 6; xxii. 8). Whether the term is used of angels may be made matter of question.

This is the rendering given to אֱלֹהִים by the LXX., Vulg., Targ., Syr., etc., in Gen. iii. 5; Ps. viii. 6; lxxxii. 1, 6; xcvi. 7; and cxxxviii. 1; but in the majority of these instances there can be little doubt but that the translators were swayed by mere dogmatical considerations in adopting that rendering; they preferred it because they avoided thus the strongly anthropomorphic representation which a literal rendering would have preserved. In all these passages the proper signification of אֱלֹהִים may be retained, and in some of them, such as Gen. iii. 5; Ps. lxxxii. 1, 6, this seems imperatively required. In Ps. viii. 6, also, the rendering 'angels' seems excluded by the consideration that the subject of the writer is the grace of God to man in giving him dominion over the works of his hands, in which respect there can be no comparison between man and the angels, of whom nothing of this sort is affirmed. In Ps. xcvi. 7 the connection of the last clause with what precedes affords sufficient reason for our giving Elohims its proper rendering, as in the A. V. That the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews should have adopted the LXX. rendering in citing these two passages (ii. 7; i. 6), cannot be held as establishing that rendering, for, as his argument is not affected by it, he was under no call to depart from the rendering given in the version from which he quotes. But though there be no clear evidence that Elohims is ever used in the sense of angels, it is sometimes used vaguely to describe unseen powers or superhuman beings that are not properly thought of as divine. Thus the witch of Endor saw 'Elohims ascending out of the earth' (1 Sam. xxviii. 13), meaning thereby some beings of an unearthly, superhuman character. So also in Zech. xii. 8 it is said, 'The house of David shall be as Elohims, as the angel of the Lord,' where, as the transition from Elohims to the angel of the Lord is a minori ad majus, we must regard the former as a vague designation of supernatural powers. Hengstenberg would explain Ps. viii. 6 in accordance with this; but the legitimacy of this may be doubted.

In three instances the phrase אֱלֹהִים בְּנֵי, B'ney Elohims, occurs (Job i. 6; ii. 1; xxxviii. 7), and in two instances (Gen. vi. 2, 4) בְּנֵי הָאֱלֹהִים, B'ney Ha-Elohims, occurs. We have also the equivalent phrase בְּנֵי אֵל in Hos. ii. 1 (A. V. i. 10). In the book of Job the phrase unquestionably describes the angels, who are called sons of God partly as immediately created by him (in which sense Adam is called 'the son of God,' Luke iii. 38), partly as belonging to the spiritual world, and so appearing to be of the same essence as God, who is emphatically spirit as opposed to flesh (Is. xxxi. 3), and partly as characterised by that holiness which is the distinctive glory of God, and the communication of which to any of his creatures conveys to such an ethical affinity to Him. Of these elements the last is the most important, and hence, where it is possessed, divine sonship may be predicated of the possessor, though both the other elements are wanting. It is on this ground that the phrase may be used of men, as it is in the passage cited from Hosea, and frequently in the N. T. As used in the passages cited from Genesis, the phrase is confessedly difficult, and has called forth numerous explanations. Of these the greater part are purely conjectural, and need not occupy our attention. Our choice must lie between that which takes the phrase as denoting angels, and that which takes it as denoting men standing in some special relation to God.

The former of these is the older, and it is that which the usage of the phrase most readily suggests. It is favoured by the LXX., the text of which fluctuates between υἱοὶ τοῦ Θεοῦ and ἄγγελοι τοῦ Θεοῦ (Aug. De Civ. Dei, xv. 23), Josephus (Antiq. i. 4. 1), Philo (De Gigant. sub init.), the apocryphal book of Enoch, the Testament of the XII. Patriarchs, the later Jewish Hagada, and the majority of the Christian Fathers from Justin to Lactantius. The incongruity however of the supposition, that angels could have carnal intercourse with women, is so strong, that many have on this ground alone rejected the interpretation, some with strong expressions of contempt and indignation. Thus Theodoret speaks of it as ἐμβρόντητον καὶ ἄγαν ἡλίθιον (Quæst. in Genesin. sec. 47); Philastrius denounces it as a heresy; and Rabbi Simeon b. Jochai pronounces an anathema on all who adopt it (Delitzsch, Genes. in loc.) The Reformers generally repudiated it as a mere fable, which is refuted by its own absurdity (Calvin, in loc.); and the majority of more recent writers have followed in the same strain. Unfortunately, however, they have not succeeded in giving us any tenable explanation in its place. If we turn to the hypothesis that the phrase sons of God here is used of men standing in some special relation to God, we are met at the threshold by a difference of opinion as to the relation supposed. Some would class the phrase with those in which Elohim has the force of a superlative [see above], and would render 'men of power,' or 'eminence,' the high-born, as contrasted with the common people, or 'men of great height' as contrasted with men of ordinary stature. But the confusion of thought here is sufficient to condemn such an interpretation. When Elohim is used to express a superlative, it intimates that the quality expressed by the word to which it is appended exists in that particular instance in the highest degree. The phrase, for instance, 'Cedars of God,' means that the quality common to all cedars exists in these in the highest degree; these are cedars of surpassing excellence. But plainly this is inapplicable in the case of words, the quality denoted by which does not admit of degrees; and such is the case with the word son. There are no degrees in sonship; the male progeny of a rich man are no more his sons than the male progeny of a poor man are his; a dwarf is as much the son of his father as a giant is of his. Besides, on this hypothesis, who were the daughters of men with whom these sons of God had intercourse? The two designations are plainly in antithesis to each other. If therefore 'sons of God' mean powerful, great, or tall men; 'daughters of men' must mean low-born, poor, dwarfish women. Why it should be morally wrong for such to intermarry, or why a race differing from other men should spring from the intercourse of such does not appear, and seems to us inexplicable. Others resort to the ethical import of the phrase, 'sons of God,' and suppose that the parties so designated by Moses belonged to the pious race the descendants of Seth. This explanation is as old as the Clementines: 'Homines justi qui angelorum vixerant vitam' (Recognitions, i. 29), is found in many of the later Fathers, from Ephraem to Chrysostom, is followed by Luther, Calvin, and their associates and followers, and may be viewed as the favourite explanation of evangelical commentators. There is much in its favour. There can be no doubt that the phrase 'sons of God' may be used of men in an ethical sense; there can be no doubt that the Cainites and the Sethites had before this time formed two separate communities, between which the primary distinction was a moral and religious one; and the course of the narrative is not opposed to the supposition that the general degeneracy of the race which brought on the flood was the result of an intermingling of the two communities by marriage. But though the phrase may have an ethical meaning, and may in this sense be used of men, there wants evidence of its ever being so used in the O. T. (excepting of Israel as a nation, a case not in point here); and besides, on this hypothesis, what are we to make of the phrase 'daughters of men,' as applied to the women with whom these pious Sethites intermarried? We cannot without the greatest violence take הָאָדָם, Ha-Adam, here as designating a special portion of the human race, when the very same word is used in the preceding verse to designate the race as such; nor can we, on any just grounds, take the word Adam without any qualifying adjunct as meaning wicked men. Besides, what reason is there for supposing that the union of men who worshipped God with women who did not, would specially tend to the procreation of a progeny marked by unwonted strength or size (נַפְלִיִּים)? This has led many* to adopt the oldest interpretation as the only one exegetically tenable. Now, strange as it may appear to us, that such a thing as the historian is thus understood to affirm should have happened, we should be slow to assert that it is impossible, and therefore incredible. That created spirits are not pure spirits, but to some degree partake of a material substance, is one of the common-places of theology; that such spirits can act on our bodies must also be believed from the testimony of Scripture; and that beings of angelic nature are liable to be ensnared by sinful passion is involved in the belief that the fallen angels were once among the hosts of the heavenly world. We are not, therefore, in circumstances to affirm that it is in the nature of things impossible that in some of these lustful passions may have been engendered by the beauty of women, and that they may have been able to assume forms in which these passions could be gratified. Still, in the face of the general statements of Scripture concerning angels, and especially of such a statement as that of our Lord recorded Matt. xxii. 30, it must be felt that a strong degree of improbability attaches to this hypothesis; and that we are entitled to demand some decisive authority from Scripture before we can receive it. Such authority, it has been supposed, is supplied by what St. Jude says in the 7th verse of his epistle,† where, after referring to the angels who kept not their first estate, he proceeds to say, ὡς Σόδομα καὶ Γόμορρα καὶ αἱ περὶ αὐτὰς πόλεις τὸν ὅμιον τρόπον τοῦτους ἐκπορεύσασαι, κ. τ. λ. Here the apostle is understood to mean that the crime by which the angels referred to fell was that of fornication, like that of which the inhabitants of these cities were guilty. This, however, is a most uncertain exegesis; for, in the first place, whatever was the offence of the B'ney Ha-Elohim, of whom Moses writes, it was not, certainly, after the same manner with that of the inhabitants of the cities of the plain; there is no reason to believe it was πορνεῖα of any sort, most assuredly it was not of that unnatural sort which drew down on these cities the special wrath and vengeance of heaven.* Then, secondly, the train of the apostle's thought here is unfavourable to this acceptance of his words. He has in view the reproving of two evils, the one that of proud insubordination, the other that of lascivious indulgence; and he illustrates by examples the evil of both. In illustration of that of the former, he adduces first the case of the rebellious Israelites who fell in the wilderness, and secondly, the case of the rebel angels who fell from heaven; and here his illustration of the first of the two sins terminates. With verse 7th begins his illustration of the evil of the second of these sins, and the case he adduces is the memorable one of Sodom and Gomorrha and the cities around them. Following out the train of thought in this way we are naturally led to connect verse 7th, not with what precedes, but with what follows, the ὡς introducing the protasis and the ὁμοίως of verse 8th the apodosis of one complete statement. In this case the τούτους of verse 7th does not refer to ἄγγελοι as its antecedent, but to Σόδομα καὶ Γόμορρα, or rather, by enallage, to the inhabitants of these cities; and the proper rendering is: 'As Sodom and Gomorrha, and the cities around them, which after the like manner with them gave themselves to fornication . . . are set forth as an example . . . likewise, also, these filthy dreamers,' etc. As to the difficulty arising from the use of the masculine τούτους, in reference to Sodom and Gomorrha, which, as πόλεις, must be held to be feminine, that need not deter us. Beza, long ago, dissipated that by the remark, 'neque nos offendere debet generis mutatio, urbium enim nomine incolas comprehendit.'

With this explanation of the passage in Jude vanishes the only shadow of Scriptural support which has ever been adduced for the hypothesis that the B'ney Ha-Elohim of Moses were angels—an hypothesis in itself to the last degree improbable, and which Hävernicks does not stigmatise too strongly when he places it among 'the silliest whims of the Alexandrian Gnostics and Cabalistic Rabbins' (Intro. to the Pent., p. 111). 'It is,' says Bunsen, 'in itself disagreeable, and being mythologico-physical, is thoroughly unbiblical' (Bibelwerk, v. 51).

In the absence of anything more satisfactory, we would submit a modification of one of the views above noticed, that, viz., which identifies the parties here referred to with the Cainites and the Sethites. Instead of understanding the phrases B'ney Ha-Elohim, and B'noth Ha-Adam, in an ethical sense, we would view them rather as party designations; and instead of regarding the former as belonging to the Sethites, and the latter to the Cainites, we would reverse the application and regard the former as belonging to the Cainites, and the latter to the Sethites. In support of this view we would offer the following suggestion. In Gen. v. 3, we are told that Adam 'begat a son in his own likeness after his image.' Now, without building any dogmatical position on this, it is hardly possible to avoid the conclusion that the writer intended to place this statement in contrast with that in ver. 1, where he says that 'Adam was made in the likeness of God,' and along with that, to convey the idea that man was no longer produced in the likeness of God, but merely in the image and likeness of his parent. Further, in stating this in connection specially with the birth of Seth, may not he mean to intimate that in the family of Seth, this fact was specially recognised and acknowledged? By Cain, on the other hand, we know that this fact was not acknowledged. His great sin lay in his claiming to come before God as an unfallen being, who had no guilt to be expiated, but who had merely an acknowledgment of inferiority and dependance to make. This we take to be the only tenable hypothesis on which to explain the transaction recorded in Gen. iv. 3-7 (see Magee on the Atonement, notes, Nos. 58, 61, 62, 63; Faber on Expiatory Sacrifice, p. 85, ff.; Alexander, Connection and Harmony of the O. and N. T., p. 339, 2d ed.) Now, is it not conceivable that the pious sons of Seth, in humble acknowledgment of the fact of men's fallen condition, may have contented themselves with the name of B'ney (B'noth) Ha-Adam, while the Cainites, claiming to retain the original dignity of man as he came from the hands of God, may have boastfully called themselves B'ney Ha-Elohim? In this case, the term 'Adam,' and the phrase 'sons of Adam,' though actually applicable to the whole race, would designate a portion of it on the same principle on which the descendants of Jacob called themselves 'Israel,' and 'the children of Abraham,' though they were not the only race that could claim descent from that patriarch. If this suggestion be adopted, the narrative we have been considering is a record of what we may very readily suppose to have happened, viz., that the descendants of Cain, and those of Seth, who had hitherto lived apart, came, as the land became filled with people, gradually to approach each other; and that the haughty sons of Cain, who had hitherto probably thought of the Sethites only with contempt, being in this way brought into contact with the daughters of Seth, were struck with their superior beauty, and so after their own high-handed fashion, 'took them wives of all which they chose.'

We now pass on to notice the peculiarity connected with the use of Elohim, a plural, to designate God. This, as a usage in the language of a people of all others the most tenacious of monotheism, is a remarkable phenomenon; and the peculiarity becomes still more noticeable when we find that they made the laws of language bend to this usage, and construed this plural as if it were a singular with singular verbs and adjuncts. Such a phenomenon has naturally drawn to it the attention of interpreters and grammarians, and various solutions of the difficulty, some resting on material, others on purely formal grounds, have been offered.

1. An old opinion is that the peculiarity in question was determined by dogmatical considerations; that as God has revealed himself in His Word as subsisting in Trinity, One yet Three, it is as corresponding to this revealed fact that a plural designation of Him, construed as if it were singular, is employed in Scripture. 2. It has been asserted that as the religion of the Hebrews may be supposed to have grown out of an original polytheism, this peculiarity is a remnant or product of that earlier state of things. 3. It is suggested that as God is conceived to be the sum of all perfections, the plural was used along with singular verbs, etc., to indicate this. 4. It has been maintained that this usage belongs to a class coming under the law, that words expressing majesty or mastership are in Hebrew put in the plural. 5. It is regarded as an instance of the plural used to denote the abstract; in this case the ro Seior, numen venerandum. 6. It is to be viewed as an instance of the plural intensive. Of these views the first has found few supporters among scholars, and has been formally repudiated by several who were strongly attached to Trinitarian views, as ex. gr. Calvin, Drusus, Belarmin, Buxtorf, Hottinger, etc. The second opinion has received the suffrages of some learned men, but has been rejected by the majority as resting on assumptions wholly arbitrary, and as insufficient to account for all the facts of the case. The sixth has been defended with much ability by Hengstenberg (Auth. d. Pent., i. 200), and has received very general assent. Whilst, however, it suffices to account for several of the usages which grammarians have placed under the fiction of a pluralis majestaticus,* it will not account for all, and especially for Elohim. For whilst in such words as בעלים Baalim, אדנים Adonim, etc., the concept of the singular may be intensified, and this intensification may be expressed by the plural, this is not the case with Elohim; in this case the plural expresses no more than the singular, the very idea of intensified deity being absurd. Of the other proposed solutions, the only one which will bear an examination is the third. Ewald (lib. cit.) has adopted this view, and so has Fürst (H. W. B., in verb.) It rests on a principle pervading the language, viz., that words describing objects which combine plurality with unity are used in the plural, and generally with verbs, etc., in the singular (comp. Jer. li. 58; Ps. lxxii. 15; Ps. xviii. 15; Is. lix. 12; Joel i. 20, etc.) If this hypothesis be adopted, it remains open to consider whether the first of the views above stated may not find place under it. If the plural so used be according to Ewald the idiomatic expression of 'multitude and variety existing in unity,' there seems no reason why we may not regard the plurality in unity expressed by Elohim as a plurality of persons, as well as a plurality of attributes (Hengstenberg, book cited; Smith, Scripture Testimony to the Messiah, I. 308; Alexander, Connection and Harmony, etc., p. 69, ff.; 2d ed.)

II. We now come to consider the etymology and derivation of these words.

The opinion which here most naturally presents itself is, that in אלה we have the simple primitive form, which in process of time was elongated into אלהים. This is the opinion of Gesenius (Thes., s. v.), and also of Fürst (H. W. B., s. v.), though both admit that the old opinion that אלה itself is a derivative from אלה, to be strong, may have some foundation. In this case El is an appellation of God as the Mighty One, and Eloah is the same. By others the relative position of these words is reversed; El being regarded as an abbreviation of Eloah. Those who take this view, generally derive אלה, from אלה, Ar. ^{أله} coluit, adonavit, stupuit, attonitus est. In this case Eloah is the numen venerandum, and El the same. By many, however, who regard the noun and the verb as connected, their relation is reversed, the verb being supposed to have come from the noun.

* 'Nichts ist so falsch als dass die jetzige hebraische sprache für einen sog. plur. majest. sinn hätte.' Ewald, Ausf. Lehrbuch d. Heb. Spr., sec. 178, 6.

Hengstenberg has strenuously opposed the regarding of אלה as a primitive. He contends that such a view is without authority, that it is contrary to analogy (the name for God in all languages being a derivative word having an appellative signification), and that such a transition as that of אלה into אלה, is wholly unknown to the language. (Auth. d. Pent., I. 251). He accordingly contends for the derivation of אלה from אלה, coluit, adonavit, pavore correptus fuit, and of אלה from אלה.

III. It may be useful to note the cognate terms in other Shemitic dialects. Samaritan: El, sometimes Chilah or Chiulah, potens (cf. Castelli Animad. Samar. in Pentateuch., p. 3, ap. Bibl. Polyg. t. vi.) Phœnician: El (אל or ܐܠ) as in 'En-d ('Ενλος, ענאל), Gag-el (Gagilus, גגאל), 'Eloesim (ap. Sanchuniathon.) Syriac: ܐܠܝܠܐ Illo, ܐܠܝܠܐ Eloho. Arabic: ايل, ال, الله, ail, al, allah.

GODWYN, THOMAS, D.D., was born in 1587, and entered as a student of Magdalen Hall, Oxford, in 1602. He was for some years head master of the free school at Abingdon, Berks. He was subsequently presented to the Rectory of Brightwell, near Wallingford, where he died, March 20, 1643. His reputation rests upon the valuable aid which he rendered to the study of Hebrew antiquities. Two works upon this subject were published by him, the first entitled Synopsis Antiquitatum Hebraicarum ad explicationem utriusque Testamenti valde necessaria, etc., Lib. iii., Oxford 1616, 4to; the other, which is more generally known, has the title Moses and Aaron, Civil and Ecclesiastical Rites used by the ancient Hebrews, observed, and at large opened, for the clearing of many obscure texts throughout the whole Scripture, Lond. 1625, 4to. This work passed rapidly through several editions, the seventh being published in 1655. It was translated into Dutch in 1629, and into Latin by Reiz in 1679, by Witsius, Bremæ 1694, 8vo; and by Hottinger, Francof. 1710, 8vo. It was very generally used as a text-book by teachers of theology; amongst others, by H. Witsius, and by Jones of Tewkesbury, both of whom wrote annotations upon it. It also formed the basis of Carp-207's apparatus historico-criticus, and of Jennings' Jewish antiquities. The great learning and general accuracy of the work is sufficiently attested by these facts.—S. N.

GOEL [KINSMAN.]

GOG (גֹּג). 1. A people inhabiting the extreme north, and by metonymy the chief of that people (Ezek. xxxviii., xxxix.; Rev. xx. 8 [MAGOG]). 2. One of the sons of Joel, a Reubenite (1 Chron. v. 4). 3. In Num. xxiv. 7 the Samaritan codex and the LXX. read גֹּג, גֹּגִי, for גִּג, Agag. In Gen. xiv. 1 Symmachus would seem to have read גֹּג for גִּי, for he gives Σκυθῶν as the rendering.

The word גֹּג has been connected by some with the Pers. گوه Koh, mountain (comp. Koh-Kaf the Caucasus); by others with the Pehl. Kōka, the moon. A shemitic source, however, may be found for it. From גָּל, to be high, by reduplication גִּלְגִּל, whence גֹּל, a roof, may come גֹּל, a height, a mountain.—W. L. A.

GOLAN (גִּלְגָּל, and גִּלְגָּל; Sept. Γαυλῶν and Γαυλῶν), an ancient city of Bashan, allotted to the Levites, and made one of the three cities of refuge east of the Jordan (Deut. iv. 43; Josh. xx. 8; 1 Chron. vi. 71). The name does not occur in Bible history after the division of the country among the tribes. Josephus calls it Γαυλῶν (Antiq. xiii. 15. 3; Bell. Jud. i. 4. 8); and its province Γαυλανίτις (Antiq. viii. 2. 3). The site of Golan has not yet been identified. Jerome says that in his day it was 'villa prægrandis in Batanea' (Onomast. s. v.).

The province of Gaulanitis took its name from the city, as is stated by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. l. c.). It appears that after the Greek conquest of Syria the kingdom of Bashan was divided into four provinces, Gaulanitis, Trachonitis, Auranitis, and Batanea (Porter's Damascus, ii. 253). The three last were only Greek forms of the names of ancient principalities; while Gaulanitis was the territory attached to the important city of Golan. The boundaries of Gaulanitis are not given by any ancient writer; but they may be ascertained from some incidental references of Josephus. On the south it was separated from Gadaris by the river Hieromax (Joseph. Bell. Jud. iii. 3. 1; Journal of Sacred Literature for July 1854, p. 292). The Jordan and Sea of Galilee formed its western border from the mouth of the Hieromax to Cæsarea Philippi (Joseph. Bell. Jud. iv. 1. 1). On the north it had Ituraea, and on the east Auranitis and Trachonitis (Porter's Damascus, ii. 257-259). Gaulanitis was then the western province of Bashan; and it still retains its ancient name under the Arabic form Faulân (Arab. جولان; Heb. גִּלְגָּל).

Gaulanitis, or Jaulân, is about 40 miles long from north to south, by 20 broad. The greater part is flat table-land, with a deep soil and luxuriant pastures. The western side, as seen from Tiberias, resembles the declivities of a mountain range, furrowed deeply by torrents and ravines. This is occasioned by the elevation of the plateau (about 2500 feet), and the depression of the Sea of Galilee and the Jordan valley. On the north-west a spur from the Hermon range runs across it some 15 miles, and terminates in a conical peak called Tell el-Faras. The scenery of this ridge is picturesque—graceful conical summits clothed with evergreen oaks, long winding glens filled with tangled copse, and little upland plains carpeted with green grass and spangled with wild flowers. The 'oaks of Bashan,' of which prophets wrote and psalmists sung, are still here (Is. ii. 13; Zech. xi. 2), and among those rich pastures roamed in ancient days the herds of cattle, the pride of the country—'Strong bulls of Bashan' (Ps. xxii. 12). Flocks too, wandered along the hill sides, and spread themselves over the green plateau—'rams and lambs, and goats, and bullocks, all of them fatlings of Bashan' (Ezek. xxxix. 18; Deut. xxxii. 14). The province was once densely peopled. The ruins of no less than 127 towns and large villages are known, only eleven of which have now any settled inhabitants. The whole country is overrun periodically by the wild Bedawin of the eastern desert, whose vast droves of camels and flocks of sheep devour the pastures, and too often trample down the few corn-fields of the peasants (Porter, Damascus, ii. 250, seq.; Handbook for S. and P., ii. 461; Burckhardt, Travels in Syria, 277; Wilson, Lands of the Bible, ii. 319, seq.; Thomson, The Land and the Book, 364, seq.)—J. GOLD. [ZAHAB.]

GOLGOTHA (Γολγοθᾶ; Heb. גִּלְגָּל, and Chaldee ܡܬܝܬܐ, 'a skull.') In considering the import of this name, and the situation of the place, it is necessary to distinguish very clearly between what is purely historical and what is legendary and hypothetical. The Hebrew or Aramæan name Golgotha is mentioned by three of the evangelists, and the Greek equivalent given; thus in Matt. xxvii. 33, ἐλθόντες εἰς τόπον λεγόμενον Γολγοθᾶ, ὃ ἐστὶν κρανίου τόπος λεγόμενος, 'Having come to the place called Golgotha, which is called the place of a skull.' John (xix. 17) gives it somewhat differently; 'Jesus, bearing his cross, went forth into a place called of a skull—εἰς τὸν λεγόμενον κρανίου τόπον; which is called in Hebrew Golgotha, ὃ λέγεται Ἑβραϊστὶ Γολγοθᾶ.' Luke gives the Greek name only, 'And when they were come—εἰς τὸν τόπον τὸν καλούμενον Κρανίου (xxiii. 33)—to the place called Kranion, or Calvary, as it is rendered in the A. V. and in the Vulgate. It seems, therefore, that the place was commonly known by both its Hebrew name Golgotha, and its Greek name Kranion. Why this name was given to it none of the sacred writers state. Three etymologies have since been suggested.—1. Jerome mentions a tradition which he had heard, that Adam was buried in Golgotha, and that the name was given to the place because the skull of Adam was there preserved (Comment. in Ephes. v. 14; Epist. xlv.; De Sanc. locis). 2. Jerome says in another place, 'Outside the city and the gates are the places in which those that have been condemned are beheaded, et Calvarie, id est, decollatorum sumpserunt nomen' (Comment. in Matt. xxvii. 33). Against this it has been argued, that if this derivation were correct, Golgotha would have been called κρανίου τόπος, and not κρανίου, or κρανίου, as Luke has it. 3. It has been maintained by Reland, De Wette, and others, that the name arose from the skull-shaped hill on the spot (Reland, Pal. p. 860). It must be remembered, however, that neither Eusebius, nor Cyril, nor Jerome, nor any of the earliest historical writers ever speak of Golgotha as a hill. Yet the expression must have become current at a very early period, for the Bordeaux pilgrim describes it in A.D. 333 as Monticulus Golgotha (Itinerarium Hierosol., ed. Wessel p. 593). Dr. Robinson suggests that the idea of a mount originated in the fact that a rounded rock or monticule existed on the place where, in the beginning of the 4th century, tradition located the scene of the crucifixion (Bib. Res. ii. 376). Golgotha was probably the place of the public execution of criminals.

The situation of Golgotha and the holy sepulchre, which must be connected with it, has formed a subject of keen and even bitter controversy. Some confidently affirm that the spot is now marked by the Church of the Sepulchre; others as confidently deny it. The former was the almost universally accredited tradition down to last century; for though many were struck by the singular position of the church, yet they got over that difficulty by various means (Robinson, Bib. Res. i. 408). The first who openly opposed the tradition was Korte, a German traveller who visited Jerusalem in 1738. He was followed by Dr. Clarke (Travels), Scholz (Reise, and De Golgotha Situi), Robinson, Tobler (Golgotha), and others. The identity of Golgotha has been maintained by Von Raumer (Palästina), Krafft (die Topographie Jerusalems), and especially Williams in his Holy City. This is not the place for considering the subject at length. All the information the Bible gives us regarding the site of Golgotha may be stated in a few words. Christ was crucified 'without the gate' (Heb. xiii. 12), 'nigh to the city' (John xix. 20), at a place called Golgotha (Matt. xxvii. 33), and apparently beside some public thoroughfare (xxvii. 39) leading to the country (Mark xv. 21). The tomb in which he was laid was hewn out of the rock (Mark xv. 46), in a garden or orchard (κῆπος), at the place of crucifixion (John xix. 41, 42). Neither Golgotha nor the tomb is ever afterwards mentioned by any of the sacred writers. No honour seems to have been paid to them, no sanctity attached to them during the apostolic age, or that which immediately succeeded it. It is not till the beginning of the 4th century that we find any attempt made to fix the position of, or attach sanctity to, Golgotha. Eusebius then informs us that the Emperor Constantine, 'not without divine admonition,' resolved to uncover the holy tomb. He states that wicked men had covered it over with earth and rubbish, and had erected on the spot a temple of Venus. These were removed, and the tomb and Golgotha laid bare. A magnificent church was built over them, and consecrated in A.D. 335 (Vit. Constantini, iii. 26-33). There can be little doubt that the present church of the sepulchre occupies the site of that built by Constantine (See, however, Fergusson, Ancient Topography of Jerusalem). The only point to be settled is, whether the church of Constantine stood on the real Golgotha. Eusebius is our first witness, and he lived 300 years after the crucifixion. His story is repeated with some changes, and numerous embellishments, by subsequent writers (Socrates, H. E. i. 17; Sozom., H. E., ii. 1; Theodoret, H. E., i. 18). It must be confessed that a critical examination of the narratives does not impress us with any very deep sense of their historic accuracy.

The topography of Jerusalem is decidedly against Eusebius, and far outweighs his questionable testimony. The Church of the Sepulchre is in the centre of the modern city, though we know that Golgotha was 'without the gate' at a period when Jerusalem was at least five times its present size. This is not the place for a minute examination of the topography of the Holy City. It is enough to state that in the time of our Lord it had two walls. One encompassed Zion only. The second commenced at the gate Gennath in the first wall, enclosed Acra, and terminated at the Castle of Antonia. Beyond this second wall, on the north and north-west, were large suburbs, and these the elder Agrippa surrounded by a third wall a few years after the crucifixion. The advocates of the identity of Golgotha and the Sepulchre attempt to prove that these lay without the second wall. Their arguments, though put forward with great learning and great skill, are far from being conclusive.

A third theory regarding the site of Golgotha and the sepulchre was advanced by Mr. Fergusson in his Essay on the Ancient Topography of Jerusalem (London, 1847), and more recently in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible (s. v. Jerusalem). He asserts that Golgotha was on Mount Moriah, and that the building now called the Mosque of Omar, or Dome of the Rock, is the church erected by Constantine over the Holy Sepulchre. Beneath its dome is a projecting rock with a cave in it; this, he says, is the real tomb. The arguments on which his theory rests are mainly architectural, and are unquestionably very forcible; were they supported by history and topography they would be conclusive. His historical argument is a complete failure. He says the site was transferred at the time of the Crusaders; but for this there is not a shadow of evidence. Any one who has examined, on the spot, the topography of Mount Moriah, and who has closely inspected the masonry of the massive wall which surrounds the whole of the Haram area, must see that this theory is untenable.

The writer of this article has had repeated opportunities of examining the topography of Jerusalem. The opinion which he was led to form regarding the site of Golgotha and the tomb of our Lord, is as follows:—The palace of Pilate and the judgment hall stood at the north-west angle of the Haram area, where the house of the pasha still stands. There Jesus was condemned, scourged, and mocked. Thence the soldiers 'led him out' (Mark xv. 20) to crucify Him. They met a man called Simon 'coming out of the country,' and compelled him to bear the cross. They brought Him unto Golgotha, and there they crucified Him. The passers by reviled Him. His mother and some others stood by the cross (John xix. 25). 'All his acquaintance stood afar off beholding these things' (Luke xxiii. 49). Such is the substance of the narratives. It would seem that the soldiers had not far to go from the palace to Golgotha. The gate of St. Stephen is about 200 yards from the palace, and leads directly into the country. Without the gate one road runs eastward across the Kidron, another northwards along the narrow brow of the hill. Between these is an open space, rugged and rocky; just below it, in the shelving bank of the Kidron, are several rock tombs. This spot would seem to answer all the requirements of the narrative. The passers by on both roads would be within a few yards of Him; and his acquaintance could stand 'afar off' on the side of Olivet and see with the utmost distinctness the whole scene.

The traditional Golgotha is now a little chapel in the side of the church of the sepulchre, gorgeously decorated with marble, and gold, and silver. The monks profess to shew the hole in which the cross was planted, and a rent in the rock made by the earthquake! (See Handbook for Syria and Pal., p. 166; Williams' Holy City, ii. 226, sq.)—J. GOLIATH. [DAVID; GIANT.]

GOMAR, FRANCIS, celebrated in church history as the leading opponent of Arminius, was born at Bruges, Jan. 30, 1563, and died at Groningen, Jan. 11, 1641. His theological education was carried on partly in England, where he attended the lectures of Dr. John Rainolds at Oxford, and of Dr. William Whittaker of Cambridge, and partly at Heidelberg. In 1594 he accepted one of the chairs of theology at Leyden, in which university James Arminius was also, in 1603, appointed a professor. Almost immediately a warm controversy arose between the two professors. On the death of Arminius in 1609, the friends of Gomar being unsuccessful in their opposition to the appointment of Vorstius to the vacant chair, Gomar resigned his office and retired to Middleburgh. In 1614 he became professor of theology at Saumur, and four years afterwards accepted a similar appointment in the university of Groningen. Gomar was one of the members of the synod of Dort (1618), and took an active part in its proceedings. He enjoyed a high reputation for his Hebrew scholarship, and in 1633 assisted at Leyden in the revision of the translation of the O. T. His collected works were published at Amsterdam in 1644, fol. Those which relate to Biblical topics are the following—1. Ex Evangelio Matthæi locorum explicatio. 2. Selectorum Ev. Lucæ locorum illustratio. 3. Selectorum Ev. Johannis locorum illustratio. 4. Analysis et explicatio epistolarum Pauli ad Rom., Gal., Philip., Coloss., Philem., Hebræos. 5. Explicatio epistolarum Petri, Johannis, et Judæ. 6. Explicatio capitum priorum quinque Apocalypsis. 7. Dissertatio de Evangelio Matthæi quanam lingua sit Scriptum. 8. Davidis Lyra, seu nova Ebræa ars poetica canonibus suis descripta et exemplis Sacris Pindari et Sophoclis parallelis descripta. The commentaries of Gomar are highly commended by R. Simon (Hist. Crit. du N. T., p. 761).—S. N.

GOME (גֹּמֶה), translated 'rush' and 'bulrush,' is mentioned in four places of Scripture, from which there is no doubt that it was a plant growing in moist situations in Egypt, and employed in the construction of vessels of different kinds, intended to float upon the water, such as the ark in which Moses was hid, and vessels for transit (Job viii. 11; Is. xxxv. 7; Exod. ii. 3; Is. xviii. 2). The name gome, according to Celsius (Hierobot. vol. ii. p. 138), is derived from גִּמְמָה gimme, 'absorbere, bibere, quia in aqua nascitur, et aquam semper imbibit.' Though other plants are adduced by translators and commentators as the gome of Scripture, yet it is evident that only the papyrus can be meant, and that it is well suited to all the passages. Being in some respects so obvious, it could not escape the notice of all translators. Hence, in the Arabic Version, and in the Annals of Eutychius, the word بردي, burdee, is given as the synonym of gome in Exod. ii. 3. The Sept. in Job (viii. 11) gives πάπυρος, in Isaiah (xviii. 2) βιβλίνας, and the Vulgate, in this last passage, papyrus. In Arabic authors on Materia Medica, we find the papyrus mentioned under the three heads of Fascer, Burdee, and Chartas. Fascer is said to be the Egyptian name of a kind of burdee (bur-reed) of which paper (charta) is made; and of burdee, the word fasfururs (evidently a corruption of papyrus) is given as the Greek synonym.

The papyrus is now well known: it belongs to the tribe of sedges or cyperaceæ, and is not a rush or bulrush, as in the A. V. It may be seen growing to the height of six or eight feet, even in tubs, in the hothouses of this country, and is described by the ancients as growing in the shallow parts of the Nile. The root is fleshy, thick, and spreading; the stems triangular, eight or ten feet in height, of which two or so are usually under water, thick below but tapering towards the apex, and destitute of leaves; those of the base broad, straight, and sword-shaped, but much shorter than the stem. This last is terminated by an involucre of about eight leaves, sword-shaped and acute, much shorter than the many-rayed umbel which they support. The secondary umbels are composed only of three or four short rays, with an involucre of three awl-shaped leaflets. The flowers are in a short spike at the extremity of each ray. Cassiodorus, as quoted by Carpenter, graphically described it as it appears on the banks of the Nile, 'There rises to the view this forest without branches, this thicket without leaves, this harvest of the waters, this ornament of the marshes.'

The papyrus was well known to the ancients as a plant of the waters of Egypt. 'Papyrus nascitur in palustribus Ægypti, aut quiescentibus Nili aquis, ubi evagatæ stagnant' (Pliny, xiii. 11). Theophrastus, at a much earlier period, described it as growing, not in the deep parts, but where the water was of the depth of two cubits, or even less. It was found in almost every part of Egypt inundated by the Nile, in the Delta, especially in the Sebennytic nome, and in the neighbourhood of Memphis, etc. By some it was thought peculiar to Egypt; hence the Nile is called by Ovid 'amnis papyrifer.' So a modern author, Prosper Alpinus (De Plant. Ægypti, c. 36):—'Papyrus, quam berd Ægyptii nominant, est planta fluminis Nili.' By others it was thought to be a native also of India, of the Euphrates near Babylon, of Syria, and of Sicily. The genus cyperus, indeed, to which it is usually referred, abounds in a great variety of large aquatic species, which it is difficult for the generality of observers to distinguish from one another; but there is no reason why it should not grow in the waters of hot countries, as, for instance, near Babylon or in India. In fact, modern botanists having divided the genus cyperus into several genera, one of them is called papyrus, and the original species P. nilotica. Of this genus papyrus there are several species in the waters of India (Wight, Contributions to the Botany of India, Cyperæ, p. 88).

A brief description of the uses of this plant, as given in the works of the ancients, is thus summed up by Parkinson in his Herbal, p. 1207: 'The plant, say the ancients, is sweete, and used by the Egyptians, before that bread of corne was known unto them, for their food, and in their time was chewed, and the sweetnesse sucked forth, the rest being spit out; the roote serveth them not only for fewell to burne, but to make many sorts of vessels to use, for it yielded much matter for the purpose. Papyrus ipse (say they), that is the stalke, is profitable to many uses, as to make ships, and of the barke to weave, and make sailes, mats, carpets, some kinds of garments, and ropes also.' The construction of papyrus boats is mentioned by Theophrastus; so Pliny (Hist. Nat. vi. 24), 'Papyraceis navibus armamentisque Nili;' and again (vii. 56), 'Naves primum repertas in Ægypto in Nilo ex papyra.' Plutarch, as quoted by Rosenmüller, says, 'Isis circumnavigated the marshes in a papyrus wherry for the purpose of collecting the pieces of Osiris's body. From Heliodorus's account it appears that the Ethiopians made use of similar boats; for he relates that the Ethiopians passed in reed wherries over the Astaboras; and he adds that these reed wherries were swift sailing, being made of a light material, and not capable of carrying more than two or three men.' Bruce relates that a similar kind of boat was made in Abyssinia even in his time, having a keel of acacia wood, to which the papyrus plants, first sewed together, are fastened, being gathered up before and behind, and the ends of the plants thus tied together. Representations of some Egyptian boats are given in the Pictorial Bible (ii. p. 135); where the editor remarks that when a boat is described as being of reeds, or rushes, or papyrus (as in Egypt), a covering of skin or bitumen is to be understood. That the papyrus was employed for making paper is also well known, and Wilkinson mentions that from ancient paper being found at Thebes and elsewhere, it is evident that this application of it was much anterior to the time of Alexander the Great.—J. F. R.

GOMER (גֹּמֶר; Sept. Γαμέρ). 1. A son of Japhet, from whom descended Ashkenaz, Riphath, and Togarmah (Gen. x. 2, 3).

2. A people descended from him, the troops of which appear along with those of Togarmah in the army of Gog (Ezek. xxxviii. 6). Bochart, following the Targ. Hierosol., and the Midrash Gen., which give גֹּמֶרִיקָא, or גֹּמֶרִיקָי (i.e., Phrygia), as its equivalent, concludes that Gomer was the stem-name of the Phrygians; and this he endeavours to confirm by an etymological parallel between the Aram. גֹּמֶר, to consume, and φρυγία, from φρύγην, to roast (Phrygia being, according to ancient testimony a χώρα εὐεκπύρωτος, and part of it bearing the name of κατακαυμένη, or burnt; Strab. xiii. p. 628; Diod. iii. p. 138). But to this it seems a fatal objection that the Phrygians formed only a branch of the Togarmians (Joseph. Antiq. i. 6. 1; Hieron. Quæst. in Gen. x. 3), and therefore cannot be regarded as the stem whence the Togarmians themselves sprang. The same objection applies to the suggestion that Gomer is the German race (Talm. Joma, 10a); for this comes under Ashkenaz, a branch of Gomer. Much more probable is the suggestion that Gomer is to be connected with the Γαμέριοι of Homer (Od. xi. 14) and Herodotus (i. 6, 15, 103; iv. 12), or the Cimbri, of the north of Europe, described by the classical writers sometimes as a German, sometimes as a Celtic race. The preponderance of authority is in favour of the latter (Sall. Jug. 114; Flor. iii. 3; Appian, De Reb. Ill. 4; Bell. Civ. i. 29; iv. 2; Diod. v. 32; xiv. 114; Plut. Cam. 15, Mar. 25, 27; Dion. Cass. xlv. 42; Justin. xxiv. 8; xxxviii. 3, 4); and the probability is that the Cimbri were Celtic, and of the same tribe as the Cymry of Britain (Prichard, Eastern Origin of the Celtic Nations, by Latham, p. 142; Latham, Germania of Tacitus, Epilegom. p. clxv., ff.) By the ancients the Cimmerii and the Cimbri were held to be one people; an opinion which, though repudiated by many, is still regarded with favour by such men as Bunsen and Knobel. On the presumption that they were different, we are inclined to connect Gomer rather with the Cimmerii than with the Cimbri. From the place Gomer occupies in the roll of nations in Genesis, it may be presumed that the people descended from him was one of the oldest, and this would fall in with the half-mythic character of the Cimmerii as they appear in Homer. It is plain also from Ezek. xxxviii. 6, that the race of Gomer was regarded by the Hebrews as living to the far north of Palestine, and this accords exactly with the site assigned to the Cimmerii by Herodotus, who places them on the Caucasus, and represents them as skirting the Euxine and coming down on Asia Minor by way of Colchis, and across the river Halys. If the Cimmerii and the Cimbri are identified, and the latter be regarded as a Celtic-speaking people, the statement of Jerome that the Galatæ spoke a language not greatly differing from that of the Treveri (Proleg. Lib. ii., ad Ep. ad Galatas), may have an important bearing on the subject of the migrations of the original Gomerian stock. Cf. Joseph. Antiq. i. 6. 1.

GOMORRAH, in the N. T. GOMORRAH (ΓΟΜΟΡΡΑ; Sept. N. T. Γομορρά). One of the most ancient towns of Palestine, situated in that part of the once fertile plain of the Jordan which is now covered by the Dead Sea. Sodom appears to have been the chief city of this region; hence, ancient geographers call the whole plain 'the province of Sodom' (Σοδομικὴν Χώρα); and Eusebius describes Gomorrah as 'one of the five cities of Sodom' (μία τῆς πενταπόλεως Σοδόμων; Onomast. s.v.; see also Reland, Pal., p. 815). The few allusions made in Scripture to the 'cities of the plain' appear to indicate that they stood close together (Gen. xiii. 10; xiv. 8-11), and that they lay near the southern extremity of the present lake, for Abraham, on going out to the brow of the mountain near Hebron, 'looked toward Sodom and Gomorrah, and all the land of the plain;' and this he could not have done had they been situated farther north (Gen. xix. 28). Gomorrah, with the other cities, was completely destroyed by fire from heaven. It has been questioned whether the cities of the plain were engulfed after their destruction, or whether they stood upon the shore of the present sea. The words of Gen. xiv. 3 appear to favour the former opinion. The battle between the eastern kings and the people of Sodom took place in the 'vale of Siddim, which is the Salt Sea.' The phrase, however, is not quite decisive; for, as Reland says, it is not affirmed that 'the five cities stood in the vale of Siddim' (Pal. 254). The name Gomorrah would seem to indicate that the popular opinion of the submersion of the cities is correct. The Hebrew גֹּמֶרֶר is most probably derived from the Arabic root غمر, 'to cover with water.' For a full account of this matter see SODOM and SALT SEA; Robinson, B. R., ii. 187-192; Handbook for S. and P., i. 246, sq.; Stanley, S. and P., 281, sq.)

M. de Saulcy astonished the world a few years ago by the announcement that he had discovered the sites of the whole Pentapolis, and he gives a minute description of what he calls their ruins (Journey round the Dead Sea). Gomorrah, he locates at Ain el-Feshkah, on the north-west shore of the lake, where are the ruins of a small tower and some rude walls, apparently field fences. Oriental travellers and geographers place little faith in M. de Saulcy's discoveries; indeed, they have been shewn by Van de Velde and others to be a series of delusions (Van de Velde, ii. 115, sq.) There is not a shadow of evidence tending to fix the site of Gomorrah at the place indicated.—J. L. P.

GONACH. [IBN GONACH.]

GOOD, JOHN MASON, M.D., was born in 1764 at Epping, where his father was pastor of a Congregational Church, and died in 1827. He commenced practice as a surgeon at Sudbury in 1784, but removed to London in 1793, where he continued for the rest of his life. Besides contributing largely to the literature of his profession, he devoted much time to Biblical studies, and produced several works of some value in this department. In 1800 appeared his Translation of the Song of Solomon, with notes critical and explanatory; and in 1812 his Translation of the Book of Job, with notes critical and illustrative, and an Introductory Dissertation.

Since his death there have appeared from his pen, Historical outline of the Book of Psalms, edited by the Rev. J. M. Neale, Lond. 1852; and The Book of Psalms: a new translation, with notes critical and explanatory, edited by the Rev. Dr. Henderson, Lond. 1854. Dr. Good was a man of extensive knowledge and unusual attainments as a linguist, and he has in his notes collected much that may be of use to the Biblical scholar; but he cannot be assigned any above a secondary place as an expositor of Scripture.—W. L. A.

GOODWIN, THOMAS, D.D., styled by Anthony Wood 'one of the Atlases and Patriarchs of Independency,' was born at Rollesby, Norfolk, Oct. 5, 1600. He was sent to Cambridge a little before the completion of his 13th year, and when only in his 20th year was chosen Fellow and Lecturer of Catherine Hall. In 1634, through dissatisfaction with the terms of conformity, he resigned his preferment and left the university. In 1639 he withdrew to Holland, and was for some time pastor of a church at Arnhem. He returned to England at the beginning of the long Parliament, and in January 1650 was appointed President of Magdalen College, Oxford, by order of the House of Commons. On the Restoration he retired to London, and there exercised his ministry as pastor of an Independent Church, until his death, Feb. 23, 1679. His collected works were published in London, 5 vols. fol., 1681-1704. They include an Exposition on the First and part of the Second Chapters of the Epistle to the Ephesians, and also an Exposition on the Book of Revelations. The criticism of Calamy is fairly characteristic:—'He was a considerable scholar and an eminent divine, and had a very happy faculty in descanting upon Scripture, so as to bring forth surprising remarks, which yet generally tended to illustration.'—S. N.

GOPHER WOOD. [ETZ-GOPHER.]

GOPHRITH (גֹּפְרִית), a mineral easily inflammable. The LXX. translate the word by ῥέτωρ, the Vulg. by sulphur, and the A. V. by brimstone. The Lexicons connect it with גפר, the name of a tree, probably a species of pine that exudes resin [ETZ-GOPHER]; but this may admit of doubt, as it has nothing in its favour except the identity of the letters composing this word with those composing the first part of Gophrith. The native brimstone or sulphur is found in crystals of different forms, and in almost all parts of the world. The sacred writers make frequent references to brimstone in connection with the inflictions of the Divine vengeance on the guilty. Comp. Deut. xix. 23; Job xviii. 15; Is. xxx. 33; xxxiv. 9; Ez. xxxviii. 22; Rev. xiv. 10; xix. 20; xx. 10; xxi. 8. These references undoubtedly find their basis in the fact recorded, Gen. xix. 24, 25.—W. GORDON, JAMES, a Scottish Jesuit, born at or near Aberdeen in 1553. He spent his life chiefly on the Continent; he was professor in the colleges of Toulouse and Bourdeaux, and was the author of several works on history and chronology. He published also Biblia Sacra cum Commentariis, etc., Paris, 3 vols. fol. 1632. These volumes, according to Walch, contain many things which may be read with profit; they are also commended by Dupin. The author died in 1641.—W. L. A.

GORGIAS (Γοργίας), one of the generals of Antiochus Epiphanes, who is called in 1 Maccab. and in Josephus 'a mighty man of the king's friends' (ἀνὴρ δυνατὸς τῶν φίλων τοῦ βασιλέως; 1 Maccab. iii. 38; Joseph. Antiq. xii. 7. 3.) He was chosen by Lysias, the general and minister of Antiochus Epiphanes, and at this time in sole command of the provinces from the Euphrates to the sea, to undertake an expedition in company with Ptolemy, the son of Dorymenes, and with Nicanor, against Judæa, B.C. 166 (1 Maccab. iii. 38; Joseph. Antiq. xii. 7. 2, 3). These generals were, however, totally defeated near Emmaus by Judas Maccabæus (1 Maccab. iv. 1, seq.; Joseph. Antiq., l. c.) In B.C. 165, Joseph, the son of Zacharias, and Azarias, two captains in the service of Judas Maccabæus, anxious to get themselves a name, and acting without the orders of Judas, attacked the garrison of Jamnia. Gorgias, the governor of the forces at Jamnia, defeated them with great loss (1 Maccab. v. 56, seq.; Joseph. Antiq. xii. 7. 6.)

The account of Gorgias in 2 Maccab. is very confused. In one passage he is described simply as 'a captain, who in matters of war had great experience,' and therefore sent with Nicanor, the son of Patroclus, one of the special friends of Ptolemæus, the governor of Coele-Syria and Phœnicæ (cf. 1 Maccab. iii. 38; Joseph. Antiq. xii. 7. 3), to root out the whole nation of the Jews (2 Maccab. viii. 9). In another passage he is represented as 'governor of the holds' (στρατηγὸς τῶν τόπων [τρόπων Alex.], 2 Maccab. x. 14), and apparently of the holds of the Idumæans (?) (Acrabattene? cf. 1 Maccab. v. 3; Joseph. Antiq. xii. 8. 1; see Ewald, Geschichte, iv. 91, 358, and Smith, Dict. of Bible, vol. i., p. 42, note). He is afterwards, according to the present text, described as 'governor of Idumæa' (2 Maccab. xii. 32).

Grotius (see Wernsdorff, De fid. Libr. Macc., sec. 73) suggests that the reading 'governor of Idumæa' is an error for 'governor of Jamnia' (as at 1 Maccab. v. 58). Josephus warrants this correction (ὁ τῆς Ἰαμνείας στρατηγός, Antiq. xii. 8. 6). From the epithet applied to Gorgias, he seems to have been held in the highest detestation by the Jews (A. V., that cursed man; τὸν κατὰρατον, 2 Maccab. xii. 35). The description of his flight to Marisa and his defeat by Dositheus, one of Judas' generals, is given at some length, though in an obscure and confused manner (2 Maccab. xii. 34-38; cf. Joseph. Antiq. xii. 8. 6).—F. W. M.

GORTYNA (Γόρτυνα Alex., Vat.; * in classical writers, Γόρτυρ, Γόρτυνα; on a coin, Κόρτυνα [Κορτυνίων]), a city of Crete, and next to Cnos-sus, the most important in the island for power and magnificence. At one time Gortyna and Cnossus in union held the whole of Crete in their power excepting Lyttus (Polyb. iv. 53, 54). In later times they were in a continual state of warfare (Strabo x., Didot. ed., p. 410). Gortyna was founded by a colony from Gortys of Arcadia (Plato, Leges iv., Didot. ed., p. 320). It was of very considerable size, its walls being fifty stadia in circuit, whilst those of its rival, Cnossus, were not more than thirty (Strabo x., Didot. ed., pp. 409-411). Homer bestows upon it the epithet 'walled' (τειχιόσσα, Il. ii. 646). It was situate on the south side of the island on the river Lethæus (Μεσσαρά), and at a distance of ninety stadia from the Libyan Sea (Strabo, l. c.) In the Peloponnesian war Gortyna seems to have had some relations with Athens (Thuc. ii. 85). Its connection with Philopœmen in B.C. 201, is shewn by the Gortynians having invited him to take the command of their army (Plut. Philop. 13). When the Achæan League was in alliance with the Romans, B.C. 197, against Philip V. of Macedon, 500 Gortynians joined Quinticius Flaminius when on his march to Thessaly, previous to the battle of Cynoscephalæ (Liv. xxxiii. 3). It is only recently that a coin bearing the well-known types of the League has been found, struck at Gortyna. The late Col. Leake has shewn that the coin with the legend ΚΟΡΤΥΝΙΩΝ ΑΧΑΙΩΝ, which had previously been assigned to Gortys in Arcadia by the late Mr. Burgon (Num. Chron., vol. xix. p. 235-36), certainly belongs to the Cretan Gortyna (Supp. Num. Hell. p. 110), thus proving that cities beyond the continent were admitted into the League (R. S. Poole, Num. Chron., N. S., vol. i. p. 173). About the same period there are evidences of an alliance, political or commercial, between Athens and several of the Cretan towns. Some of the coins of six of these—Cnossus, Cydonia, Gortyna, Hierapytna, Polyrrhenium, and Priansus—are tetradrachms with exactly the types of those of Athens of the same age, but distinguished by having the distinctive badges of the Cretan towns. They were probably struck by the Cretan cities of the great alliance against Philip V. of Macedon about B.C. 188 (Paus. i. 36, 5, 6; cf. Eckhel, Doct. Num. Vet., vol. ii. p. 221; Leake, Num. Hell. Insular Græce, p. 19; R. S. Poole, Num. Chron., N. S., l. c.) As Cnossus declined, Gortyna rose to eminence, and became the metropolis of Crete. About A.D. 200 a brother of Septimius Severus held at Gortyna the office of proconsul and quæstor of the united provinces of Crete and Cyrene (Boeckh, No. 2591). In the arrangement of the provinces by Constantine, Gortyna was still the metropolis of Crete (Hierocl. Synecd., p. 649; cf. Leake, Supp. Num. Hell., p. 157).

The remains of Gortyna near Aghius Dheka (the ten Saints), and the cavern in the mountain, have been described by Tournefort (Relation d'un Voyage du Levant) and Pococke (Description of the East), and the cavern, more recently, by Mr. Cockerell (Walpole, ii. p. 402). The modern Gortynians hold this cavern to be the Labyrinth, thus claiming for themselves the honours of the myth of the Minotaur, but it does not appear from the Gortynian coins, which date from the time of the Persian war to that of Hadrian (and there are none later), that their ancestors ever entertained such an idea (Leake, Num. Hell. Insular Græce,

* We can find no authority for Γόρτυνα, as Winer (Realwörterbuch, s. v. Gortyna) and Howson (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, s. v. Gortyna) both state. We have carefully examined the Alexandrian MS., and looked at the text of that of the Vatican (ed. Mai.) In the former the reading is καὶ εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν καὶ Γόρτυναν, in the latter καὶ Ἀραδὸν καὶ Γόρτυναν. We have also consulted the Vetus Testamentum Græcum (1798-1827), commenced by Holmes, and continued by Parsons, which professes to give a great variety of readings. The only variation regarding the word in question is in a MS. as late as the 13th century, where the passage reads εἰς Γόρτυνα.

p. 18). The famous Labyrinth is represented on the coins of Cnossus, and Col. Leake says that 'it is difficult to reconcile this fact with the existence of the Labyrinth near Gortyna, for that the excavation near Aghius Dheka, at the foot of Mount Ida, is the renowned Cretan labyrinth, cannot be doubted after the description of Tournefort, Pococke, and Cockerell' (Supp. Num. Hell., p. 156). This opinion is given notwithstanding the assertion of Pausanias (δ ἐν Κνωσσῷ λαβύρινθος, i. 27, 9). One of the coins of Cnossus, bears, besides the Labyrinth on its reverse, the Minotaur on the obverse. It cannot be much later than the expedition of Xerxes, and thus affords evidence of the antiquity of the tradition of the Labyrinth, if not of its real existence; whereas Hoeck (Kreta, vol. i., p. 56, seq.), relying on the silence of Hesiod and Herodotus, and the assumed silence of Homer—though the Iliad contains what looks very like an allusion to the Cretan wonder (Il. xviii. 590, seq.) has supposed it to have been an invention of the later poets borrowed from Egypt (R. S. Poole, Num. Chron., N. S., vol. i. pp. 171-72). A full account of the remains of the old site and the modern place is given in the Museum of Classical Antiquities (vol. ii. pp. 277-286). Mr. Falkener here describes the cavern near Gortyna from Sieber, who spent three days in examining it, and says, that certainly it had been nothing more than a quarry, which probably supplied the stone for building the city (Reise nach der Insel Kreta, vol. i. pp. 511-520). Hoeck seems to hold similar views (Kreta, vol. i. pp. 447-454).

The only Biblical interest attached to Gortyna is that it is mentioned in the Apocrypha in the list of cities to which the Romans sent letters on behalf of the Jews, when Simon the Maccabee renewed the treaty which his brothers Judas and Jonathan had made with Rome (1 Maccab. xv. 23; cf. 1 Maccab. viii. 1, seq.; xii. 1, seq.). There is no doubt that the Jews were settled in great numbers in Crete (Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 12. 1; Bell. Jud., ii. 7; Philo, Leg. ad Caium, sec. 36), and Gortyna may have been their chief residence. Ptolemy Philometor, who treated the Jews kindly, and who had received a numerous body in Egypt when they were driven out of Judæa by the opposite party (Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 3; Bell. Jud. i. 1. 1), rebuilt part of Gortyna (Strabo x., Didot. ed., p. 411). When St. Paul, as a prisoner, was on his voyage from Cæsarea to Rome, the ship, on account of a storm, was obliged to run under the lee of Crete, in the direction of Cape Salmone, and soon after came to a place called FAIR HAVENS, which was near a city called LASÆA (Acts xxvii. 8) [CRETE]. Lasæa is probably the Lasia of the Peutingerian Tables, and is there stated to be sixteen miles east of Gortyna. It is very uncertain how long the vessel was detained at Fair Havens, though 'much time had been spent' (Acts xxvii. 9), not since they had sailed from Cæsarea, but at the anchorage (Alford, in loc.) Doubtless, the sailors, soldiers, and prisoners, had frequent intercourse with Lasæa, and perhaps Gortyna. St. Paul may then have preached the Gospel at one or both of these places, but of this there is not the slightest proof (cf. Conybeare and Howson, Life of St. Paul, vol. ii. pp. 394-396).—F. W. M.

GOSHEN (גֹּשֶׁן; Sept. Γεσέν, Γεσέμ), a province or district of Egypt in which Jacob and his family settled through the instrumentality of his son Joseph, and in which they and their descendants remained for a period of 430 years (Gen. xlv. 10; xlvii. 28; xlviii. 27; 1. 8; Exod. viii. 22; ix. 26). The Bible does not present any definite information as to the precise locality of Goshen, and of course later authorities possess only an inferior value. There are, however, incidental expressions, allusions, and implications in the Scriptures, which afford aid in determining the spot. That Goshen lay on the eastern side of the Nile may be justifiably inferred from the fact that Jacob is not reported to have crossed that river; nor does it appear that the Israelites did so in their flight out of Egypt. With this inference all the language employed (see the passages as given above), to say the least, agrees, if it does not afford an indirect evidence in its favour. By comparing Exod. xiii. 17 and 1 Chron. vii. 21, it appears that Goshen bordered on Arabia (see Gen. xlv. 10, Sept. Γεσέμ 'Αραβίας) as well as Palestine, and the passage of the Israelites out of Egypt shews that the land was not far removed from the Red Sea. It appears probable that we may fix the locality of Goshen in Lower Egypt, on the east side of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile, in the district around Heroopolis. The Septuagint renders the words אֶרֶץ גֹּשֶׁן, 'land of Goshen' (Gen. xlvii. 28), καθ' Ἡρώων πόλιν, εἰς γῆν 'Ραμεσσή, thus identifying Goshen with Rameses, or the district of Pithom or Heroopolis. (See map, No. 3, in Knight's Illuminated Atlas.) This would make Goshen correspond with one of the divisions of what was anciently termed the Prefectura Arabica, Ti-Arabia, the eastern district, lying, that is, on the eastern or Arabian side of the Nile. This division was that of Heliopolis or On, Matariyeh, or Ain-Shems. An attempt has been made to define it accurately, so as to identify Goshen (Rosenm. Alterthum., iii. 246) with the Nomos Arabie (Ptol. iv. 5), or the country of Esch-schar Kijah (the eastern land), which stretches south from Pelusium as far as Belbeis (north-east from Cairo), and to the north-east borders of the desert El Dschefar. Traces are found here, it is thought, of the residence of the Israelites, in large heaps of ruins, a few hours' journey to the north-east of Cairo, which the Arabs call Tell el Jhud (Jews' hills), or Turbeh el Jhud (Jews' graves) (Niebuhr, i. 100). According to Bois Aymé (Descrip. de l'Égypte, viii. 111) Goshen was the valley of Sabal-yar, which begins in the vicinity of Belbeis, and embraces the district of Heroopolis. Robinson (Palestine, i. 37) makes light of the evidence supposed to be supplied by 'the mounds of the Jews,' just mentioned. He says, 'If there is any historical foundation for this name, which is doubtful, these mounds can only be referred back to the period of the Ptolemies, in the centuries immediately before the Christian era, when great numbers of Jews resorted to Egypt and erected a temple at Leontopolis.' This opinion, however, appears to us somewhat arbitrary. And whatever the actual origin of these mounds, the ordinary account of them may be the transmission or echo of a very ancient tradition. Robinson, however, does not deny that Goshen is to be found about where the best authorities ordinarily place it, as will appear from the following quotation; we regret that the wish here spoken of was not fulfilled: 'It had been our wish to take a more circuitous route from Suez to Cairo, descending the eastern branch or canal of the Nile beyond Belbeis, as far as to the province of Shur-kiyeh, and thence along the valley of the ancient canal to the head of the gulf of Suez. Our object in taking this route would have been to make inquiries and observations personally in relation to the land of Goshen and the Exodus of the Israelites' (i. 54). The following passage, however, will serve to prove that even the desert is not unsuited to pastoral purposes:—'The desert which we were now crossing is not sandy, but its surface, for the most part, is a hard gravel, often strewed with pebbles. Numerous wadys, or shallow water-courses, intersect its surface. In all these wadys there are usually to be found scattered tufts of herbs or shrubs, on which the camels browse as they pass along, and which serve likewise as their pasturage when turned loose at night. During the rainy season and afterwards, the inhabitants of Belbeis and the Shur-kiyeh, as probably did the Israelites of old, still drive their mingled flocks of sheep and goats for pasturage to this quarter of the desert.'

Laborde (Arabia Petrea, p. 58) fixes Goshen in the country around Belbeis, on the eastern side of the Nile. Speaking of his journey from Cairo by Belbeis to Suez, he says, 'This plain is the province of Goshen, where the children of Egypt settled and multiplied: it was here that the meeting occurred between Jacob, the patriarch, and Joseph, the minister and master of Egypt.' Laborde passed the banks of the canal which formerly united the Nile with the Red Sea, and which, he says, Bonaparte was the first in modern times to observe. M. Quatremère has endeavoured to define the locality, and by comparing several passages collected from different writers, he infers that the Wady Tumilat (Wady Tomlate in Laborde), in which the canal of Cairo terminates, is the land of Goshen: such at least seems to have been the opinion of Saadias and Abu Said, the authors of the earliest Arabic Versions of the O. T.—the one for the use of the Jews, and the other for that of the Samaritans (Mém. Géogr. sur l'Égypte). J. D. Michaelis was of opinion (Spicil. p. 371) that Goshen extended from Palestine along the Mediterranean as far as the Tanitic mouth of the Nile, and thence inland up to Heliopolis, embracing a sweep of country so as to take in a part of Arabia, bordering on Egypt. The various opinions that have been held on the subject may be found classified and considered by Bellermand in his Handb. d. Bibl. Lit. iv. 191-220 (see also Jablonsky, Dissert. viii. de Terra Gosen).

This district was suitable for a nomadic people, who would have been misplaced in the narrow limits of the valley of the Nile. Children of the desert, or at least used as they were to wander freely from one fertile plain to another with their flocks and herds, the sons of Jacob required a spot where the advantages of an advanced civilization could be united with unrestricted freedom, and abundance be secured without the forfeiture of early and cherished habits. The several opinions which we have given substantially agree in referring Goshen to the country intervening between the desert of Arabia and Palestine on the one side, and the Pelusiatic arm of the Nile on the other, with the Mediterranean at the base. The district assigned to Jacob and his family was chosen for its superiority (Gen. xlvii. 6), 'In the best of the land make thy father and brethren to dwell, in the land of Goshen let them dwell;' and the subsequent increase of the Israelites themselves, as well as the multiplication of their cattle, shews that the territory was one of extraordinary fertility. Time and circumstances have doubtless had their effect on the fertility of a country in which the desert is ever ready to make encroachments so soon as the repelling hand of man is relaxed or withdrawn. But Laborde (p. 53) represents the vicinity of Heliopolis as still covered with palm-trees, and as having an enclosure, comprehending a considerable space of ground, which is covered every year by the inundation of the Nile to the height of five feet. We are not, however, to expect evidences of luxuriant fertility. The country was chosen for its pre-eminent fitness for shepherds. If a nomadic tribe had wide space and good pasture-grounds, they would have 'the best (for themselves) of the land,' and these advantages the district in which we have placed Goshen abundantly supplied in ancient times, when the waters of the Nile were more liberally dispensed than at present to the eastern side of the country. Nothing is needed but water to make the desert fertile. 'The water of the Nile soaks through the earth for some distance under the sandy tract (the neighbourhood of Heliopolis), and is everywhere found on digging wells eighteen or twenty feet deep. Such wells are very frequent in parts which the inundation does not reach. The water is raised from them by wheels turned by oxen, and applied to the irrigation of the fields. Whenever this takes place the desert is turned into a fruitful field. In passing to Heliopolis we saw several such fields in the different stages of being reclaimed from the desert; some just laid out, others already fertile. In returning by another way more eastward, we passed a succession of beautiful plantations wholly dependent on this mode of irrigation' (Robinson's Palestine, vol. i. p. 36).—J. R. B.

GOSPELS, THE. The first four books of the N. T. early received the name 'Gospels,' not as historical or biographical writings, but because they announce the glad tidings (εὐαγγέλιον) concerning Jesus as the Messiah, in the form of a historical demonstration of His Messiahship (Meyer). They are ascribed to Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, respectively; but instead of the genitive of authorship, the preposition κατά, 'according to,' is used in the inscription. The Gospel is properly 'the Gospel of God' or 'of Christ;' and 'the Gospel according to Matthew' is the Gospel-message, as Matthew delivered it. The inscription in the Peshito (Syriac) version is, 'The holy Gospel, the preaching of the Apostle Matthew.'

The integrity and genuineness of the Gospels admit of no reasonable doubt. The substantial sameness of the text from the beginning is proved by the agreement among the numerous manuscripts extant in various countries. This agreement, evidenced by a careful collation, is satisfactorily accounted for only when we admit that the existing copies have been derived from the same common exemplar faithfully copied. The various readings, however numerous, are comparatively unimportant, and do not affect the essential sameness of the books.

That the Gospels have been rightly ascribed to the writers whose names they bear, appears from the undisputed fact that they were regarded with the highest reverence as genuine and sacred books by the great body of Christians during the last quarter of the 2d century (Norton). In support of this statement, Irenæus of Lyons, Theophilus of Antioch, Tertullian of Carthage, Clement and Origen of Alexandria, might be cited as witnesses. They all bear testimony to our present Gospels, although living in countries distant from each other, some in Asia, others in Africa and Europe. It should be remarked, further, that they were not only men of learning and ability, but that they represent the great body of Christians for whom they spoke, a circumstance which greatly enhances the importance of their testimony in favour of the Gospels. By way of example we shall quote Irenæus: Contra Hæres. iii. 1—'Matthew among the Hebrews published a Gospel in their own language, while Peter and Paul were preaching the Gospel at Rome, and founding the church there. After their departure (death), Mark, the disciple and interpreter of Peter, himself delivered to us in writing what had been preached by Peter. And Luke, the companion of Paul, committed to writing the Gospel preached by him. Afterwards, John the disciple of our Lord, who leaned upon His breast, likewise published a Gospel, while he dwelt at Ephesus in Asia.' Irenæus elsewhere (iii. 2, 5) assigns reasons why there can be neither more nor fewer Gospels than four. And (iii. 2, 7) he says, that these Gospels are so sure that even the heretics bear testimony to them, and attempt to confirm their own doctrine from them.

The personal relations of Irenæus strengthen his testimony. He was born in the first half of the 2d century, and died at the beginning of the 3d. He had listened to the discourses of Polycarp, who had been a disciple of John, and conversant with others who had seen the Lord.

About A.D. 175 or 180, then, or within a hundred years of the period when the Gospels were written, they were generally received among Christians. They were even admitted as genuine by Celsus, the opponent of Christianity, and the heretics who flourished about A.D. 140-150. Now, it seems impossible to account for the early and general reception of the four Gospels, and the reverence with which they were regarded in all parts of the world, except upon the supposition of their being known as the genuine productions of the writers whose names they bear.

Before passing from our brief survey of the direct historical evidence, we shall refer to two witnesses still earlier than those already mentioned. Justin Martyr was born in the latter part of the 1st or the beginning of the 2d century, and flourished about A.D. 150. His quotations are taken from 'Memoirs by the Apostles, which are called Gospels,' and which he further describes as 'composed by Apostles of Christ and their companions,' a description exactly applicable to our Gospels. Though Justin does not mention the names of the writers of our Gospels, his numerous quotations correspond to such a degree, both in matter and words, with the present Gospels, as to leave scarcely any room to doubt that it is from them he quotes. It is admitted that he did not always quote with verbal accuracy, but it was customary with most of the early fathers to quote loosely, as if from memory, and too much stress has been laid upon this circumstance in the case of Justin.

The other witness is Papias, who lived during the first quarter of the 2d century, and was acquainted, as he tells us, with many of the disciples of the Apostles. It appears from his testimony, as given in Euseb. H. E. iii. 39, that the Gospels of Matthew and Mark were well known before the time of Papias.

On the whole, it may be concluded that the historical testimonies in favour of our present Gospels are not merely equal, but far superior to those which can be adduced for any other writings of the same antiquity.

In proceeding to consider 'the mutual relations and peculiarities of the Canonical Gospels,' we are struck with the many points of resemblance or correspondence among the first three Gospels. In consequence of the combined view and harmony which seems to characterise them, as contra-distinguished from the fourth Gospel, they are called 'the Synoptic Gospels.'

Before inquiring how the correspondences among the first three Gospels are to be explained, it will be necessary for us to have a just idea of the phenomenon itself. 'Many portions of the history of Jesus (remarks Mr. Norton, who has minutely investigated the subject), are found in common in the first three Gospels, others are common to two of their number, but not found in the third. In the passages referred to, there is generally a similarity, sometimes a very great similarity, in the selection of particular circumstances, in the aspect under which the event is viewed, and the style in which it is related. Sometimes the language found in different Gospels, though not identical, is equivalent or nearly equivalent; and not unfrequently, the same series of words, with or without slight variations, occurs throughout the whole or a great part of a sentence, and even in larger portions' (Genuineness of the Gospels, i. p. 240).

Mr. Westcott exhibits the proportion of correspondences and peculiarities in several numerical tables:

'If (he says), the extent of all the coincidences be represented by 100, their proportionate distribution will be, Matthew, Mark, and Luke 53, Matthew and Luke 21, Matthew and Mark 20, Mark and Luke 6. . . . Looking only at the general result, it may be said that of the contents of the Synoptic Gospels, about two-fifths are common to the three, and that the parts peculiar to one or other of them, are little more than one-third of the whole.' He adds, 'in the distribution of the verbal coincidences a very simple law is observable; they occur most commonly in the recital of the words of our Lord or of others, and are comparatively rare in the simple narrative. Thus, of the verbal coincidences in St. Matthew, about seven-eighths; of those in St. Mark, about four-fifths; and of those in St. Luke, about nineteen-twentieths, occur in the record of the words of others' (Introduction to the study of the Gospels, p. 179).

The following instances may be referred to for illustration, Matthew viii. 2, 3 = Mark i. 40, 42 = Luke v. 12, 13; Matthew ix. 5, 6 = Mark ii. 9, 11 = Luke v. 23, 24; Matthew xix. 23, 24 = Mark x. 23-25 = Luke xviii. 24, 25. The amount of agreement, however remarkable, ought not to be over-rated; it occurs chiefly in reporting the words of Christ. Norton gives, as the most striking instance of verbal coincidence, in the case of narrative, Luke ix. 16 (comp. Matt. xiv. 19; Mark vi. 41).

Along with the instances of correspondence, there are also many instances of difference. This renders the problem difficult of solution. No explanation can be satisfactory, which does not account for both the correspondences and differences.

Such is the phenomenon which has provoked so many attempts at explanation. The literature of the subject is of vast extent, and the question is regarded as still unsettled. Our aim in the present article is to inquire how near the principal hypotheses which have been proposed approach to a solution of the difficulty.

1. In order to account for this singular relationship between the Synoptic Gospels, the first supposition is, that the evangelists copied from one another, or that one evangelist used the Gospels of his predecessors, making such extracts as he thought necessary, with alterations and additions of his own. It is a curious circumstance, however, that the supposition of any one of the evangelists copying from the others is attended with insuperable difficulty. Whichever of them we suppose to be the original evangelist, and whichever we suppose to be the last, having one or both the others before him, we are unable in this way to explain the phenomenon. There are six possible ways of putting the case, every one of which has had learned advocates, and this variety of opinion itself is a strong argument against the hypothesis. Griesbach thought that Mark copied from Matthew and Luke, and this opinion is still held by some; but an opinion in favour of the originality of Mark has of late been gaining ground (Thiersch, Meyer, Weiss). It must, we think, be evident to any one who attentively compares the Gospels of Matthew and Mark, that the latter cannot with any propriety be called a copy or abridgment of the former. There is an air of originality and freshness in Mark's narrative which proves the work to be anything but a compilation; and besides, in several important particulars, Mark differs from Matthew. No explanation can be satisfactory which does not account for the want of agreement as well as the agreement between the Gospels. Indeed, it is not easy to see what object Mark or any other of the evangelists could have in compiling a new Gospel out of one or more which were acknowledged to be the works of apostles or their companions, 'In its simple form,' says Westcott, 'the 'supplemental' or 'dependent' theory is at once inadequate for the solution of the difficulties of the relation of the Synoptic Gospels, and inconsistent with many of its details; and, as a natural consequence of a deeper study of the Gospels, it is now generally abandoned, except in combination with the other principle of solution' (Westcott on the Gospels, p. 184).

2. We are thus brought to consider Eichhorn's famous hypothesis of a so-called original Gospel, now lost. A brief written narrative of the life of Christ is supposed to have been in existence, and to have had additions made to it at different periods. Various copies of this original Gospel, with these additions, being extant in the time of the evangelists, each of the evangelists is supposed to have used a different copy as the basis of his Gospel. In the hands of Bishop Marsh, who adopted and modified the hypothesis of Eichhorn, this original Gospel becomes a very complex thing. He supposed that there was a Greek translation of the Aramæan original Gospel, and various transcripts with alterations and additions. But when it is considered that all these suppositions are entirely gratuitous, that they are made only to meet the emergencies of the case as they arise, one cannot help feeling that the licence of hypothesis is carried beyond just bounds. The grand objection to this original Gospel is the entire want of historical evidence for its existence. If such an original Gospel ever had existed, it must have been of the very highest authority, and, instead of being tampered with, would have been carefully preserved in its original form, or at least in its Greek translation. The alterations and additions supposed to have been made in it are not only inconsistent with its sacred and authoritative character as the original Gospel, but also with the habits of the Jews. Even if this hypothesis did adequately explain the phenomena presented in the first three Gospels, it is far too artificially contrived to be true; but it fails of its aim. The original work, supposed to consist of the sections common to the three Gospels, cannot be made out; and the individuality of character belonging to each of the evangelists is irreconcilable with the supposition that several different writers contributed materials. Notwithstanding the identity of subject among the three Gospels, each writer is distinguished by his own characteristic style.

It is remarkable that Dr. Weiss of Königsberg has quite recently (Stud. u. Kritik, Hefte, i. iv., 1861) propounded a theory of explanation very much akin to that of Marsh. He supposes that the first evangelist, the writer of Matthew's Gospel, as well as Luke, used a copy of Mark's Gospel, and, along with this, a second more ancient, perhaps immediately apostolic written source, which Mark also had already made use of in the composition of his Gospel. In this way he thinks all the phenomena are simply and easily explained. He endeavours to establish his view by a detailed examination and comparison of the three Synoptic Gospels, and holds that these results of criticism are confirmed by the ancient tradition that Matthew wrote his Gospel in Hebrew, whilst there is no trace of the Hebrew Gospel itself. The conclusion is, that the Hebrew Gospel of Matthew must have been displaced at an early period by another containing its essential contents, but richer and more generally accessible in its Greek form. Hence the later Greek Gospel was held to be the work of Matthew the apostle, the more ancient Hebrew one having been really the apostle's work. This revival in the present day of what is substantially the hypothesis of Eichhorn and Marsh is significant of the still unsettled state of the question.

3. That our present Gospels are to be traced mainly to the oral teaching of the apostles as their source, was the opinion of Herder and Gieseler, and more recently of De Wette, Guericke, Norton, Westcott, and others. 'They have correctly apprehended (says De Wette) the spirit of Christian antiquity who regard the oral tradition of the Gospel (the oral original Gospel) as the basis and source of all the Christian Gospels, and who endeavour to apprehend the history of the origin of the latter in a definite relation to the former' (Introd. to N. T., sec. 87).

The Gospel was published orally before it was committed to writing, and the preaching of the apostles must, from the nature of the case, have consisted chiefly of a narration of the facts recorded in our present Gospels. It is naturally supposed that very soon a certain agreement or uniformity of narrative would be the result, and that we have a transcript, as it were, of this type or form of narrative in the first three Gospels. The verbal coincidences in the Gospels are found especially in those cases in which it might have been expected that the first preachers of the Gospel would be exact, namely, the recital of the words of Christ, and quotations from the O. T.

This account of the probable origin of the Gospels is not only in accordance with the character of the period as an age of oral tradition rather than of writing, but is also substantially the same as that which Luke gives in the preface to his Gospel (Luke i. 1-4). While Luke refers to written accounts of the ministry of Christ in the possession of some Christians at that time, he mentions that these accounts were founded directly or indirectly upon the oral accounts of the apostles (καθὼς παρέδοσαν ἡμῖν οἱ ἀπ' ἀρχῆς αὐτόπται καὶ ὑπηρέται γερῶν τοῦ λόγου). The statement of Papias respecting the origin of Mark's Gospel is, that it was derived from the preaching of Peter, and we have already quoted the important testimony of Irenæus to the same effect.

To prevent misapprehension, however, it ought to be observed that our written Gospels date from the latter half of the first century, and that, 'so long as the first witnesses survived, so long the tradition was confined within the bounds of their testimony; when they passed away it was already fixed in writing' (Westcott, p. 192).

The theory of the oral origin of the Gospels, while it has much evidence in its favour, cannot be accepted as a complete solution of the problem. It does not explain the striking instances of verbal coincidence in the narrative portions common to the three synoptists, or to two of them; nor the instances in which either two or all the three evangelists agree with each other in their quotations from the Septuagint, and at the same time differ from the Septuagint itself (Matt. iii. 3; Mark i. 3; Luke iii. 4; compared with Is. xl. 3, LXX., and Matt. iv. 10; Luke iv. 8, compared with Deut. vi. 13, LXX.) De Wette would combine 'the two hypotheses of a common oral source, and of the influence through writing of one evangelist on another.'

There is a striking difference between the fourth

* Mr. Roberts (Discussions on the Gospels, p. 437) 'ventures to offer another hypothesis on this much-ventured subject.' 'My hypothesis,' he says, 'is simply this:—The Lord Jesus Christ spoke in Greek, and the evangelists independently narrated His actions and reported His discourses in the same language which He had Himself employed. This theory I propose as adequate to account for all the phenomena presented by the first three Gospels.'

It may be allowed that the difficulty of the question regarding the origin of the Gospels is aggravated by supposing that our Saviour generally spoke Aramaic, and that Matthew wrote his Gospel in that language; but, even if we should concede to Mr. Roberts the truth of his hypothesis, we could by no means accept it as an adequate solution of the problem.

Gospel and the Synoptic Gospels, in respect both to contents and form; but with all this difference, there is a general and essential agreement. John relates in part the same things as the Synoptists, and in a similar manner, but not with like verbal agreement. The following are parallel:—The purification of the temple, ii. 13-22 = Matt. xxi. 11, ff.; the feeding of the multitude, vi. 1-15 = Matt. xiv. 13-21; the walking upon the sea, vi. 16-21 = Matt. xiv. 22-36; the anointing, xii. 1-8 = Matt. xxvi. 6-13; the entry into Jerusalem, xii. 9-19 = Matt. xxi. 1-11; the prediction of the denial of Peter, xiii. 36-38 = Matt. xxvi. 33-35. In some of these instances the expressions are verbally parallel; also in the following—xii. 25 = Matt. x. 39; xiii. 20 = Matt. x. 40; xiv. 31 = Matt. xxvi. 46. There is a similarity between iv. 44 and Matt. xiii. 57; between xiii. 16 and Matt. x. 24, and Luke vi. 40 (De Wette, Exeg. Handb. zum N. Test.) On the other hand, however, much important matter has been omitted and much also added by John, whilst his manner of narration also differs from that of the Synoptists. In the first three Gospels, the scene of our Lord's ministry is laid chiefly in Galilee, but in the fourth Gospel it is chiefly in Judæa and Jerusalem. This may partly account for the different style of our Lord's discourses in the Synoptic Gospels, as compared with the Gospel of John (Hug, p. 433). In the former, Christ often makes use of parables and proverbial sayings; in the latter, John records long and mystical discourses. Yet we find proverbial maxims and parables also in John xii. 24-26; xiii. 16, 20; x. 1, ff.; xv. 1, ff.

Many points of difference between the fourth Gospel and the others may be satisfactorily accounted for from the fragmentary character of the narratives. None of them professes to be a complete biography, and, therefore, one may contain what others omit. Besides, the fourth Gospel was composed after the others, and designed to be in some respects supplemental. This was the opinion of Eusebius, and of the still more ancient writers whose testimony he cites, Clement of Alexandria and Origen; and the opinion appears to be well founded. Whether John was acquainted with the works of his predecessors or not is uncertain, but he was no doubt acquainted with the evangelical tradition out of which they originated. We have, then, in this circumstance a very natural explanation of the omission of many important facts, such as the institution of the supper, the baptism of Jesus by John, the history of his temptation and transfiguration, and the internal conflict at Gethsemane. These his narrative assumes as already known. In several passages he presupposes in his readers an acquaintance with the evangelical tradition (i. 32, 45; ii. 1; iii. 24; xi. 2).

It is not easy to reconcile the apparent discrepancy between John and the Synoptists with respect to the day on which Christ observed the last passover with his disciples. Lücke decides in favour of John, but thereby admits the discrepancy to be real. Again, in the Synoptic Gospels the duration of our Lord's ministry appears to be only one year, whereas John mentions three passovers which our Saviour attended, but neither the Synoptists nor John determine the duration of the Saviour's ministry, and, therefore, there is no contradiction between them on this point.

able difference between the Synoptic and the Johannean representation of Christ, so that, assuming the historical reality of the former, the latter must be regarded as ideal and subjective; particularly, that the long discourses attributed to Christ in the fourth Gospel could hardly have been retained in John's remembrance, and that they are so unlike the sayings of Christ in the other gospels, and so like John's own style in his Epistles, that they appear to have been composed by John himself.

If the allegation could be made good that the Christ of John is essentially different from the Christ of the Synoptists, the objection would be fatal. On the contrary, however, we are persuaded that, on this all-important point, there is an essential agreement among all the Evangelists. We must remember that the full and many-sided character of Christ himself might be represented under aspects which, although different, were not inconsistent with each other. It is by no means correct to say that the fourth Gospel represents Christ as God, while the others describe him as a mere man. Yet we may find in the fact of his wondrous person as the God-man, an explanation of the apparent difference in their respective representations. That the Synoptists do not differ essentially from John in their view of Christ is shewn by Dörner in an admirable comparison (Dörner, Entwicklungsgeschichte, i. 81, ff.; E. Tr. i. 50, ff.).

We are sorry that Lücke and Frommann, as well as De Wette, give in so much to the view that John has mingled his own subjectivity with the discourses of Christ, which he professes to relate. That the Evangelist does not transfer his own subjective views to Christ appears from the fact that while he speaks of Christ as the Logos, he never represents Christ as applying this term to himself. We may also refer to those passages in which, after quoting obscure sayings of the Redeemer or remarkable occurrences, he either adds an explanation or openly confesses his ignorance of their meaning at the time (ii. 19-22; vi. 70; vii. 37-39; xi. 11; xii. 16, 32; xiii. 27; xx. 9).

The susceptible disposition of John himself, and the intimate relation in which he stood to Christ, make the supposition reasonable that he drank so deeply into the spirit of his master, and retained so vivid a recollection of his very words, as to reproduce them with accuracy. Instead of transferring his own thoughts and expressions to Christ, John received and reproduced those of Christ himself. In this way the similarity between John's language and that of Christ is accounted for. It is acknowledged, even by Strauss and De Wette, that the most characteristic expressions in John were originally used by Christ himself. When it is objected that John could not retain in remembrance, or hand down with accuracy, such long discourses of Christ as he records in his Gospel, far too little regard is paid to the assistance of the Holy Spirit, to be expected especially in such a case as this, according to the Saviour's promise, 'He shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you,' John xiv. 26.

GOSPELS, SPURIOUS (PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA).

The canon of the N. T. having been finally settled before the close of the 4th century [CANON], the rejected writings which bore the names of the Apostles and Evangelists soon sunk into oblivion, and few, if any, have descended to our times in their original shape. From the decree of Gelasius and a few other sources we have the names and a few detached notices of a good many of these productions. We shall first speak of those which are still extant.*

THE HISTORY OF JOSEPH THE CARPENTER, which has been preserved in the East in an Arabic translation, was first made known in Europe in the commencement of the 16th century by Isidore de Isolani in his Summa de donis Sti. Josephi. He observes that the 'Catholics of the East' commemorate St. Joseph on the 19th March, and read the legend of the saint, omitting certain parts which are not approved in the Roman church. This work was first published by Wallin, at Leipzig, in 1722, from an Arabic MS. of the 13th century, in the Bibliothèque du Roi, accompanied with a Latin translation. It was divided by Wallin into chapters and verses. It is also found in Coptic, Sahidic, and Memphic. It is highly esteemed by the Copts. The former part, to chap. ix., appears to have been derived from an ancient Gospel of the Infancy. The Latin was republished by Fabricius.

THE GOSPEL OF THE INFANCY was first published by Henry Sike, at Utrecht, in 1697, from an Arabic MS. Sike's Latin version was republished by Fabricius, who divided it into chapters. The Arabic was divided into corresponding chapters by Thilo, in 1832. There are several MSS. of this gospel extant, the oldest of which known is that in the Medicean Library, written in 1299. The narratives which it contains were current in the 2d century, and the account contained in this gospel respecting Christ's learning the alphabet is mentioned by Irenæus (Adv. Hæres. i. 20) as a fabrication of the Marcians. The Gospel of the Infancy is found in the catalogue of Gelasius, and it is especially remarkable from the fact that it was most probably this Gospel which was known to Mohammed, who seems to have been unacquainted * [Of these pseudepigraphic gospels collections have been made by Neander (Narrationes de Christo et rebus Christ., appended to Catechesis Lutheri, Gr. et Lat., Bas. 1567); Fabricius (Codex Apocr., N. T., Hamb. 1703-43); Birch (Auctarium Cod. Apoc. Fabriciani, Hafn. 1804); Schmid (Corpus Apocryph. extra Biblia, Had. 1804); Thilo (*Cod. Apocr. N. T. with any of the canonical Scriptures, and who has inserted some of its narrations in the Koran. The Sepher Toldoth Jesu, a well-known publication of the Jews, contains similar fables with those in this gospel (Wagenseil's Sota). This work was received as genuine by many of the Eastern Christians, especially the Nestorians and Monophysites. It was found to have been universally read by the Syrians of St. Thomas, in Travancore, and was condemned at the Synod of Diamper, in 1599, by Archbishop Menezes, who describes it as 'the book called the Gospel of the Infancy, already condemned by the ancients for its many blasphemous heresies and fabulous histories.' Wherever the name Jesus occurs in this gospel, he is universally entitled الرب, while Christ is called السيد. This was a distinction introduced by the Nestorians. The Blessed Virgin is also entitled the Lady Mary. The Persians and Copts also received this Gospel (De la Brosse's Lexic. Pers. voc. Trinitaria ars). The original language was probably Syriac. It is sometimes called the Gospel of Peter, or of Thomas.

THE GOSPEL OF THOMAS THE ISRAELITE (Greek), a work which has flowed from the same source with the former, was first published by Cotelerius (Notes on the Constitutions of the Apostles, l. vi. c. 17, tom. i. p. 348), from an imperfect MS. of the 15th century. It was republished and divided into chapters by Fabricius. The most perfect edition was that of Mingarelli, in the Nuova Raccolta d' Opuscoli scientifiche e filosofice, Venet. 1764, from a Bologna MS. of the 15th century. Mingarelli (who believed it to have been a forgery of the Manichees) accompanied his text with a Latin translation. Thilo has given a complete edition from a collation of Mingarelli's work with two MSS. preserved at Bonn and Dresden [and Tischendorf has given it in three different recensions]. It has been questioned whether this is the same work which is called the Gospel of Thomas, by Origen, Ambrose, Bede, and others. This gospel probably had its origin among the Gnostics, and found its way from them, through the Manichees, into the church; but having been more generally received among the heretics it was seldom copied by the monks, which accounts for the paucity of MSS. Nicephorus says that the Gospel of Thomas contained thirteen hundred στίχοι. This pseud-epigraphical work is probably the foundation of all the histories of Christ's infancy, but it is supposed to have been recast and interpolated.

THE PROTEVANGELION OF JAMES has descended to us in the original Greek, and was first published by Bibliander, at Basel, in 1552, in a Latin version by William Postell, who asserted that it was publicly read in the Greek churches, and maintained that it was a genuine work of the Apostle James, and intended to be placed at the head of St. Mark's Gospel. These commendations provoked the wrath of the learned Henry Stephen, who insinuated that it was fabricated by Postell himself, whom he calls 'a detestable monster' (Introduction au Traité de la Conformité des Merveilles Anciennes avec les Modernes, 1566). It was reprinted in the Orthodoxographia of J. Herold, Basil 1555; and again in the Orthodoxographia, vol. i. (1569), of Jacob Grynaeus, who entertained a very favourable opinion of it. Subsequent discoveries have proved that, notwithstanding the absurdity of Postell's high pretensions in favour of the authenticity of this gospel, Stephen's accusations against him were all ill-founded. There had, even at the time when Stephen wrote, been already a Greek translation published by Neander, of which Stephen was not aware; it appeared among the Apocrypha annexed by Oporin to his edition of Luther's Catechism, Basel 1564. It was republished by Fabricius (who divided it into chapters), and subsequently by Birch, Thilo [and Tischendorf; a separate edition by C. A. Suckow appeared at Breslau in 1840]. Thilo collated for his edition six Paris MSS., the oldest of which is of the 10th century. From the circumstance of these MSS. containing a Greek calendar or martyrology, and from other internal evidences, there seems little doubt that this gospel was formerly read in the Greek Church (Montfaucon, Palæogr. Græc. p. 304). There are also extant versions of the Gospel of the Infancy in the Arabic and other languages of the Eastern churches, among which they appear to have possessed a high degree of authority.

Although this work is ascribed by Postell the Protevangelium, there is no MS. authority for this title, nor for the fact of its being ascribed to St. James the Apostle. It only appears that the author's name is James. The narrations of this gospel were known to Tertullian (Adv. Gnost. c. viii.), Origen (Com. in Matt. p. 223), Gregory Nyssen (Orat. in diem Nat. Christ. ; Opp. vol. iii. p. 346), Epiphanius (Har. 79, sec. 5), the author of the Imperfect Work on Matt.; Chrysost. (Opp. tom. vi. p. 24), and many others among the ancients [Suckow, De arg. et ind. Protev. Jacobi, Bresl. 1830.]

THE GOSPEL OF THE NATIVITY OF MARY. (Latin). Although the Latins never evinced the same degree of credulity which was shown by the Greeks and Orientals in regard to these fabulous productions, and although they were generally rejected by the fathers, they were again revived about the 6th century. Notwithstanding the contemptuous rejection of them by Augustine and Jerome, and their condemnation by Popes Innocent and Gelasius, they still found readers in abundance. Gelasius expressly condemns the book concerning the Nativity of St. Mary and the Midwife.

The Gospel of the Nativity of Mary, which most probably, in its present form, dates its origin from the 6th century, has been even recommended by the pretended authority of St. Jerome. There is a letter extant, said to be written by the Bishops Chromatius and Heliodorus to Jerome, requesting him to translate out of Hebrew into Latin the history of the Birth of Mary, and of the Birth and Infancy of Christ, in order to oppose the fabulous and heretical accounts of the same, contained in the apocryphal books. To this Jerome accedes, observing at the same time that the real author of the book was not, as they supposed, the Evangelist Matthew, but Seleucus the Manichee. Jerome observes that there is some truth in the accounts, of which he furnishes a translation from the original Hebrew. These pretended letters of Jerome are now universally acknowledged to be fabrications; but the apocryphal gospel itself, which is the same in substance with the Protevangelion of James, is still extant in Jerome's pretended Latin version. It is from these Gospels of the Infancy that we have learned the names of the parents of the Blessed Virgin, Joachim (although Bede reads Eli) and Anna. The narratives contained in these gospels were incorporated in the Golden Legends, a work of the 13th century, which was translated into all the languages of Europe, and frequently printed. There are extant some metrical accounts of the same in German, which were popular in the era of romance. These legends were, however, severely censured by some eminent divines of the Latin church, of whom it will be sufficient to name Alcuin, in his Homilies, in the 9th, and Fulbert and Petrus Damianus (bishop of Ostia) in the 11th century. Eadmer, the monk, in his book on the Excellence of the Virgin, speaks of them also in the language of censure (cap. ii. Anselm. Opp. p. 435, Paris, 1721). Luther also inveighs against the readers of these books (Homil. ed. Walch. tom. xi.; and Table-Talk, ch. vii. tom. xxii. p. 396).

There were several editions of Jerome's pretended translation published in the 15th century, one of them by Caxton. It is printed by Thilo from a Paris MS. of the 14th century, and divided by him into twenty-four chapters, after a MS. of the 15th century in the same library. One of the chief objects of the writer of these gospels seems to be to assert the Davidical origin of the Virgin, in opposition to the Manichees. An edition was also published by Mr. Jones, who conceives that the first author of these legends was a Hellenistic Jew, who lived in the 2d century, but that they were added to and interpolated by Seleucus at the end of the 3d, who became their reputed author; and that still further additions were made by the Nestorians, or some late Christians in India. Lardner (Credibility, vol. viii.) so far differs from Mr. Jones as to believe the author not to have been a Jew.

The Gospel of the Nativity of Mary was received by many of the ancient heretics. The Gnostics and Manichees endeavoured to found on its authority some of their peculiar opinions (such as that Christ was not the Son of God before his baptism, and that he was not of the tribe of Judah, but of that of Levi); as did also the Collyridians, who maintained that too much honour could not be paid to the Blessed Virgin, and that she was herself born of a virgin, and ought to be worshipped with sacrifices.

Although the GOSPEL OF MARCION, or rather that of St. Luke as corrupted by that heretic in the 2d century, is no longer extant, Professor Hahn has endeavoured to restore it from the extracts found in ancient writers, especially Tertullian and Epiphanius. This work has been published by Thilo.

Thilo has also published a collation of a corrupted Greek GOSPEL OF ST. JOHN, found in the archives of the Knights Templars in Paris. This work was first noticed (in 1828) by the Danish Bishop Muentzer, as well as by Abbé Grégoire, ex-bishop of Blois. It is a vellum MS. in large 4to, said by persons skilled in palæography to have been executed in the 13th or 14th century, and to have been copied from a Mount Athos MS. of the 12th. The writing is in gold letters. It is divided into nineteen sections, which are called gospels, and is on this account supposed to have been designed for liturgical use. These sections, corresponding in most instances with our chapters (of which, however, the twentieth and twenty-first are omitted), are subdivided into verses, the same as those now in use, and said to have been first invented by Robert Stephen [VERSE]. The omissions and interpolations (which latter are in barbarous Greek) represent the heresies and mysteries of the Knights Templars. Notwithstanding all this, Thilo considers it to be modern, and fabricated since the commencement of the 18th century.

One of the most curious of the apocryphal gospels is the GOSPEL OF NICODEMUS, or ACTS OF PILATE. It is a kind of theological romance partly founded on the canonical gospels. The first part, to the end of ch. xv., is little more than a paraphrastic account of the trial and death of Christ, embellished with fabulous additions. From that to the end (ch. xxviii.) is a detailed account of Christ's descent into hell to liberate the spirits in prison, the history of which is said to have been obtained from Lenthius and Charinus, sons of Simeon, who were two of those 'saints who slept,' but were raised from the dead, and came into the holy city after the resurrection. This part of the history is so far valuable, that it throws some light upon the ancient ideas current among Christians on this subject. It is therefore considered by Birch (Auctarium, Proleg. p. vi.) to be as valuable in this respect as the writings of the Fathers.

The subscription to this book states that it was found by the emperor Theodosius among the public records in Jerusalem, in the hall of Pontius Pilate (A.D. 380). We read in chap. xxvii. that Pilate himself wrote all the transactions from the relation of Nicodemus, who had taken them down in Hebrew; and we are informed by Epiphanius that the Quartadecimans appealed to the Acts of Pilate in favour of their opinions as to the proper time of keeping Easter. It was written in these Acts that our Saviour suffered on the eighth Kal. of April, a circumstance which is stated in the subscription to the present Acts. It is uncertain, however, when this work was first called by the name of Nicodemus.

The two ancient apologists, Justin Martyr and Tertullian, both appeal in confirmation of our Saviour's miracles and crucifixion to the Acts of Pilate (Justin Martyr, Apology, pp. 76, 84; Tertullian, Apol. c. 21, or English transl. by Chevalier, 1833). From this circumstance it has been generally held that such documents must have existed, although this fact has been called in question by Tanquil Faber and Le Clerc (Jones, On the Canon, vol. ii. p. 282, pt. iii. ch. 29). These appeals, however, in all probability first furnished the idea of the present pious fraud. Mr. Jones supposes that this may have been done in order to silence those pagans who denied the existence of such Acts. The citations of those Fathers are all found in the present work. [Henke, De Pontii Pilati actis in causa J. C. ad Tiber. missis, 1784.]

We have already seen that a book entitled the Acts of Pilate existed among the Quartadecimans, a sect which originated at the close of the 3d century. We are informed by Eusebius that the heathens forged certain Acts of Pilate full of all sorts of blasphemy against Christ, which they procured (A.D. 303) to be dispersed through the empire; and that it was enjoined on schoolmasters to put them into the hands of children, who were to learn them by heart instead of their lessons.

But the character of the Gospel of Nicodemus, which contains no blasphemy of the kind, forbids us to identify it with those Acts. This gospel probably had its origin in a later age. From the circumstance of its containing the names of Lenthinus and Charinus, Mr. Jones conceives it to have been the work of the celebrated fabricator of gospels, Lucius Charinus, who flourished in the beginning of the 4th century. It is certainly not later than the 5th or 6th. 'During the persecution under Maximin,' says Gieseler (Eccles. Hist., vol. i. sec. 24, note), 'the heathens first brought forward certain calumnious Acts of Pilate (Euseb. ix. 5), to which the Christians opposed others (Epiph. Har. 79, sec. 1), which were afterwards in various ways amended. One of these improved versions was called afterwards the Gospel of Nicodemus.'

Bausobre suspected that the latter part of the book (the descent into hell) was taken from the Gospel of Peter, a work of Lucius Charinus now lost. Thilo (Codex Apocryphus) thinks that it is the work of a Jewish Christian, but it is uncertain whether it was originally written in Hebrew, Greek, or Latin. The only Greek writer who cites it is the author of the Synaxarion, and the first of the Latins who uses it is the celebrated Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. i. 20, 23).

The Gospel of Nicodemus (in Latin) was one of the earliest books printed, and there are subsequent editions in 1490, 1516, 1522, and 1538, and in 1569 in the Orthodoxographia of Grynaeus. It was afterwards published by Fabricius (Cod. Apoc.), who divided it into chapters. Fabricius gives us no information respecting the age or character of his MS., which is extremely defective and inaccurate. Mr. Jones republished this with an English version.

The Greek Gospel of Nicodemus was first published from an incorrect Paris MS. by Birch (Auctarium), and subsequently from a collation of several valuable manuscripts, the most ancient of which are of the 13th century, by Thilo, with the Latin text of the very ancient MS. at Einsiedl, described by Gerbert in his Iter Alemannicum. It has been shewn by Smidt (Bibl. für Kritik und Exegese) that the present MSS. exhibit in their citations from the canonical books a text of the 6th century, and consequently that this gospel is extremely useful in a critical point of view.

The esteem in which this work was held in the middle ages may be seen from the number of early versions which were in popular use, of which innumerable MSS. have descended to our times. The earliest of these is the Anglo-Saxon translation, printed at Oxford in 1698, from a Cambridge MS. (Thwaites's Heptateuchus). This is a translation from the Latin, as none of the Greek MSS. contain Pilate's letter to Claudius. There are also MSS. of the same in the Bodleian and Canterbury libraries. That in the Bodleian is divided into thirty-four chapters. There are several MSS. of the English version in the Bodleian, one in Sion College, and one in English verse in Pepys's collection. It was also translated by Wickliffe; and there were versions printed in London, in 1507 and 1509, by Julian Notary and Wynkyn de Worde, which ran through several editions (Panzi's Annals). The latest published before Mr. Jones's work was by Joseph Wilson, in 1767. The regard, indeed, in which this book was held in England will be understood from the fact that, in 1524, Erasmus acquaints us that he saw the Gospel of Nicodemus affixed to one of the columns of the cathedral of Canterbury. Translations were also common in French, Italian, German, and Swedish. In the French MSS. and editions it is united with the old romance of Perceforest, King of Great Britain. There was also a Welsh translation (Lhuys's Archæologia, p. 256), and the work was known to the Eastern Christians, and has been even supposed to be cited in the Coptic liturgy; but this has been shewn by Ludolf to be a mistake, as the lesson is from the history of Nicodemus, in John iii. [Brunn, De indole adate et usu Evang. Nicod., Ber. 1794; Tischendorf, Pilati circa Chr. judicio quid lucis afferatur ex Actis Pilati, Lips. 1855].

Of the Gospels no longer extant, we know little more than that they once existed. We read in Irenæus, Epiphanius, Origen, Eusebius, and other ecclesiastical writers, of the Gospels of Eve or of Perfection, of Barnabas (ancient and modern), of Bartholomew, of Basilides, of Hesychius, of Judas Iscariot, of the Valentinians, of Apollon, of Cerinthus, of the Twelve Apostles, and several others. Some of these were derived from the Gnostics and other heretics; others, as the Gospel of Matthias, are supposed by Mill, Grabe, and most learned men, to have been genuine gospels now lost. Those of which we have the fullest details are the Gospel of the Egyptians and that of the NAZARENES. This latter is most probably the same with that of the Hebrews, which was used by the Ebionites. It was supposed by St. Jerome to have been a genuine Gospel of St. Matthew, who, he says, wrote it in the Hebrew language and letters. He copied it himself from the original in the library of Cæsarea, translated it into Greek and Latin, and has given many extracts from it. Grabe conceived this gospel to have been composed by Jewish converts soon after our Lord's ascension, before the composition of the canonical Gospel of St. Matthew. Baronius, Grotius, Father Simon, and Du Pin, look upon it as the Gospel of St. Matthew—interpolated, however, by the Nazarenes. Baronius and Grabe think that it was cited by Ignatius, or the author of the Epistles ascribed to him. Others look upon it as a translation altered from the Greek of St. Matthew. Mr. Jones thinks that this Gospel was referred to by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Galatians. It is referred to by Hegesippus (Euseb. Ecc. Hist. iv. 22), Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. ii. p. 280), Origen (Comm. on John; Hom. viii. in Matt.), and Eusebius (Hist. Ecc. iii. 25, 27, 39). Epiphanius (Har. secs. 29, 30) acquaints us that it was held in great repute by the ancient Judaizing Christians, and that it began thus: 'It came to pass in the days of Herod king of Judæa that John came baptizing with the baptism of repentance in the river Jordan,' etc. It consequently wanted the genealogy and the first two chapters.

The GOSPEL OF THE EGYPTIANS is cited by Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. iii. pp. 445, 452, 453, 465), Origen (Hom. in Luc. p. 1), Ambrose, Jerome (Pref. to his Comm. on Matt.), and Epiphanius (Har. lxix. sec. 2). Grabe, Mill, Du Pin, and Father Simon, who thought highly of this Gospel, looked upon it as one of the works referred to by St. Luke in the commencement of his Gospel. Mill ascribes its origin to the Essenes, and supposes this and the former Gospel to have been composed in or a little before A.D. 58. It is cited by the Pseudo-Clement (Ep. Sec. ad Cor. ch. 12; Cf. Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 9), who is generally supposed to have written not before the 3d century. [See Cave, Hist. Liter., and Oudin, Scriptt. Eccl. passim; Mill, Prolegg. in N. T., saepe; Ant. v. GOTHIC VERSION.—The Mæso-Goths were a German tribe which settled on the borders of the Greek empire, and their language is essentially a German dialect. Their version of the Bible was made by Ulphilas, in the fourth century, after Greek MSS. in the N. T., and after the Seventy in the Old. The author is generally regarded as an Arian; but his peculiar doctrinal sentiments do not seem to have influenced his translation. Of the O. T. portion, nothing but a fragment of Nehemiah has been printed, although parts of other books have been discovered. A great part of the New has been published at different times in fragments. The four Gospels exist in the very celebrated MS. called the Codex Argenteus, now preserved in the library of the university at Upsal, and minutely described by Dr. E. D. Clarke and Zahn. This MS., however, has considerable chasms. The Gospels have been several times printed from it, but not very correctly. That of Uppström is the most exact and beautiful (1854). Knittel discovered fragments of Paul's Epistle to the Romans in a codex rescriptus belonging to the Wolfenbüttel library, which he published in 1762, 4to, and which were republished by Zahn in the complete edition of the Gospels issued in 1808, 4to. In 1817, Angelo Mai discovered important parts of the Gothic version among five codices rescripti in the Ambrosian library at Milan. They contain for the most part the Pauline Epistles, with the exception of that to the Hebrews; and two fragments of Matthew. Various portions were printed by Mai in conjunction with Castillionæus, in 1819. In 1829 the latter published the fragments of Paul's Second Epistle to the Corinthians. In 1834 fragments of the epistle to the Romans, the First to the Corinthians, and that to the Ephesians; and in 1835, the fragments to the Pauline Epistles to the Galatians, Philippians, Colossians, and the First to the Thessalonians. In 1839 the same scholar published the fragments of the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians, to Timothy, Titus, and Philemon. These were all combined in the edition by Gabelentz and Loebe, 2 vols. 1836, 1847.—S. D.

GOURD. [KIKAYON; PAKKUOTH.]

GOVERNOR, a term used by the A. V. to denote various degrees of authority and power: absolute and limited, acquired by birth or by election, military and civil. The numerous and mostly vague original terms are found in other passages translated by 'ruler, chief, prince, captain, one who reigneth, holds dominion,' etc.: LXX., ἀρχων, ἡγεμὼν, δεσπότης, στρατηγός, ἀρχή, etc.; Luther: Regent, Oberst, Fürst, Befehlshaber, etc. Yet there is, in some cases at least, a distinctive meaning inherent as well in the roots as in the peculiar formation of the respective words of the text. So that, however much their primary significance may have been widened in the course of time,—in accordance with the ever-shifting circumstances of the Jewish commonwealth,—we are occasionally still able to trace it to a certain degree; aided chiefly by comparisons with cognate idioms. Instances of the different applications, principally of the Hebrew terms, in the Bible, no less than in the Rabbinical writings, will further illustrate their meaning and history.

We shall commence our list with those words of the O. T., the Katûl- or Katil-form of which points them out at once as participles passive: or, in other words, that the power which they express is a more or less delegated one—undoubtedly the first form of dominion and rulership. Next we shall enumerate those formed from the participle active, and finally speak of the one foreign, probably Persian, equivalent introduced, together with the corresponding dignity and office, at a very early period, into the Hebrew language and community.

נָגִיד, Nagîd; Phœn. נָגִיד, Nagîd; Ar. نَجِيد; Syr. ܢܓܝܕ, from נָגַד, a verb only used in Hiph.

and Hoph. in the signification of نَجَد, to tell.

The original meaning of this verb is 'to rise, to become conspicuous, visible, to be in front (cf. נָגַד, praesto, vorstehen, to lead, to be first; [Germ., Fürst=Prince]. The substantive נָגִיד is used of a chief or prefect, 'governor' of the royal palace (Azrikam); נִגְבִּית, 2 Chron. xxviii. 7 (= על הבית, 1 Kings iv. 6; אשר על הבית, Is. xxii. 15; οὐκὸνομος, chamberlain, secretary of state), whose power (מַשְׁלָט) seems to have been very considerable, cf. Is. xxii. 21, ff. ('Shebna . . . a nail to the throne'), and who, it would appear, was distinguished from the other court officers by a particularly brilliant uniform (girdle and robe), and to whose insignia belonged a key worn over the shoulder. In a wider sense the word is applied to the chief of the temple: Azariah, the high-priest, 'ruler of the House of God,' 1 Chron. ix. 11 (2 Chron. xxxi. 13); Pashur, 'chief governor of the House of God' (Jer. xx. 1); further, to the 'leader of the Aaronites,' Jehojadah (1 Chron. xii. 27). Again, it is used of the keeper of the sacred treasury, 'Shebuel, ruler of the treasures,' 1 Chron. xxvi. 24; of the chieftains of a tribe, 'Zebadiah, the ruler of the house of Judah' (2 Chron. xix. 11); of the 'captains' of the army (1 Chron. xiii. 1; 2 Chron. xxxii. 21); of the eldest son of the king, the heir-apparent 'Abijah, the son of Maachah [the chief] to be ruler among his brethren' (2 Chron. xi. 22). It is finally applied to the king himself:—to Saul (A. V. 'anoint him to be captain, 1 Sam. ix. 16, etc.), to Cyrus, מִשִּׁיחַ נָגִיד, 'Messiah [the Anointed], the Prince' (Dan. ix. 25, etc.) In Plur. the word occurs in the more general sense of Aristocracy, 'Nobles,' (Prov. vii. 16). The Targum renders שׁוֹפְטֵיהֶם, 'their judges,' by מַנְיִדֵיהֶם; and in the Talmud נָגִיד is used paraholically for 'leader of a flock' (cf. בְּרֹשֶׁת אֶלְיָהוּ); כִּדְרֵי רִנָּה עֲבִיד עֲנִיָּה נְנִידָא סְמִיתָא, 'When the shepherd is angry with his flock he gives it a blind leader' (Baba K. 52)—a corrupt generation to which God appoints a bad king. How far the Talmudical use of נָנַר, in the sense of 'flagellate' (Pes. 52) and of 'extend' (Baba Mez. 74), may be connected with the notion of supremacy, reign, we cannot decide here.

נָשִׂיא, Nasif; from נָשָׂא, to carry, lift up; lit.

Raised, Exalted, Elected; LXX., ἡγεμὸς, ἡγεμῶν, a word applied to the chiefs of the families of which a tribe was composed, נָשִׂיא בֵּית הָאֲבוֹת, Num. iii. 24, 30, 32, 35; xvi. 2, etc. (as many as 250 on one occasion, Num. xvi. 2); and who, as Deputies (Commoners) at the National Assembly are also called נָשִׂיא הָעֵדָה, Nasis of the congregation, or נָשִׂיא יִשְׂרָאֵל, Nasis of Israel (elected, called to the assembly, (קָרָא) נָשִׂיא מֵעַד). But it was also used of the twelve supreme chiefs of the tribes themselves נָשִׂיא נְשִׂאִים (ראשי־הַמְּטוֹת) Num. ii. 3, ff.; vii. 2, ff.; iii. 32, etc. Both these dignities, the chieftom of a family as well as that of a tribe, would appear to have been elective—corresponding to the word נָשִׂיא—not hereditary, as Michaelis and Winer hold. The Nasi of Judah f. i., Nahshon b. Aminadab, does not descend from the first line of the tribe (Num. ii., cf. 1 Chron. ii. 9, 10). The Nasi of Issachar, again, is called Nathaniel b. Shuar, a name not found among the eldest sons of this tribe (1 Chron. vii. 1-3). Finally, in the table of the Nasis—no doubt the chiefs of the tribes—to whom the division of the Promised Land was entrusted by Moses at his death, no son of the Nasis of the desert occurs (Munk P., p. 194).—נָשִׂיא is further employed for generals, under a head (ראש) 1 Chron. vii. 40;

of Abraham, נָשִׂיא אֱלֹהִים, a Nasi of God, a mighty Sheikh; for Nonisraelitish 'Princes' of the Midianites (Josh. xiii. 21), and of the Hivites (Shechem) (Gen. xxxiv. 2). On the Maccabæan coins Shimeon is called נָשִׂיא יִשְׂרָאֵל, 'Nasi of Israel.' Nasi was also the official name of the president of the Synedrium (under whom stood the אֲבִיבֵית דִּין, 'father of the tribunal, or vice-president'), whose seat was in the middle of the 71 members (Maim. Jad. Chaz. xiv., Syn. i.)

פָּקִיד, Pakid; from פָּקַד, to appoint; an officer, official, magistrate, applied to the ecclesiastical delegate of the High Priest (פִּי כֹהֵן הָרָאשׁ) who, together with the king's scribe, had to empty the chest containing the contribution to the Temple (2 Chron. xxiv. 11); to the Levites (Neh. xi. 22); to the 'chief' of the Temple פָּקִיד נְנִידָא (Jer. xx. 1, 2); to 'officers in the House of the Lord' (Jer. xxix. 26); to a military commander (2 Kings xxv. 19), פִּי עַל אֲנָשִׁי, פִּי מַלְחָמָה (Jer. lii. 25), and to his adjutant or principal manager (Judg. ix. 28). Further, to the officers whom Joseph suggested that Pharaoh should put over Egypt during the years of the famine (Gen. xli. 34); to those who were to gather all the virgins unto Shushan for Ahasuerus (Esth. ii. 3); to prefects, 'overseers,' etc. (Neh. xi. 9; xii. 42), and finally to the nobles or 'princes' of the king (Jer. xx. 1; 2 Chron. xxxv. 8).

שָׁלַט, Shallit, Hebr. and Aram. (from שָׁלַט, to rule, have power, Arab. سلط cf. سلطان Sultân). 'One who hath power' (Eccles. viii. 8); 'Arioch, the king's captain' (Dan. ii. 15); 'Joseph, the governor over the land' (Gen. xlii. 6); a 'mighty man,' or hero (Eccles. vii. 19); a 'king' or satrap (Ezra iv. 20); Daniel, the third 'ruler' (Dan. v. 29), etc. The verb שָׁלַט is also used in later Hebrew in the sense: 'to have power,' of evil hours, evil spirits (הָרַע יָצַר), etc.

אַלְפָּה, Allāph (from אַלַּף; Arab. الف, to join, etc.); Pesh. זָכַן; originally, one who is put over a 'thousand' or אַלְפָּה, viz. the round number of families, מִשְׁפָּחוֹת, בְּנֵי אֲבוֹת, which constitute a clan or subdivision of a tribe (cf. old Saxon 'Hundred'); parallel with נָוִי, Is. ix. 22; and בֵּית אָב itself, Judg. vi. 15. First used of the chiefs, 'dukes' of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 1; 1 Chron. i. 51), we find it at a later period also applied to Jewish chiefs (Zech. ix. 7; xii. 5, 6). This word is not to be confounded either with the רֹאשׁ אֲלָפִים, the captain of a body of thousand men (χιλιάρχος, LXX.) or with the שָׂרֵי אֲלָפִים, 'rulers of thousands,' a kind of magistrates, selected by Moses, on the advice of Jethro, for the purpose of judging the smaller matters during the sojourn of the Israelites in the desert; and who were, at a later period, superseded by the regular institution of the שׁוֹפְטִים, Judges. The further use of the word in the sense of 'friend' (parallel with יָרֵךְ, companion, Mich. vii. 5, Prov. xvi. 28, or יָרֵךְ acquaintance, Ps. lv. 14); [cf. Arab.

صاحب and of husband (נְעוּרִיָּה), 'friend, companion of her youth' must be traced directly to the root (see above), since our אַלְפָּה, governor, can only be derived from the derivative אַלְפָּה, a thousand.

It may further be noticed here, that Matt. ii. 6 seems to have read the passage in Micah v. 2, בְּאֲלָפֵי יְהוּדָה, 'among the thousands [clans] of Judah,' as בְּאֲלָפֵי יְהוּדָה, 'among the princes of Judah.'

Derived from the Partic. Act. (Kal and Piel) are the following four:—

חָקַק, Chokék, Mechokék (from חָקַק, lit. an engraver, a writer (cf. γράφειν),—scil. of laws (חָק, חָקֵק, חָקֵק, law, decree; ar. حقوق, a lawgiver, Gen. xlix. 10, Deut. xxxiii. 21; one who decides by the law: a judge, Is. x. 1, parallel with מְכַתְּבִים, 'they that write,' with מְכַתְּבִים, 'they that handle the pen of the writer,' Judg. v. 14; 'the Lord is our Judge, the Lord is our Law-giver, the Lord is our King' (Is. xxxiii. 22); 'Princes decree justice' (Prov. viii. 15), etc. The Talmud has retained the original meaning of engraving, painting, writing, c. g. יִנְתֵּן חֻקֹּה, Gem. Pes. i. a, is explained by סוֹפֵר, 'of the engravers, scribes,' (Aruch, s. v.), and the imitation implied in the notion of 'drawing' has become fixed in the word חָקַק, Talm. Chul. 41 b, שָׁלַח יָחֵק אֶת הַצְּדִיקִים, 'that he shall not imitate the Sadducees.'

מָשַׁל, Moshel; (מָשַׁל, to be strong = ar. بَسَلَ) one who reigns, holds dominion, 'rules.' used for nearly all degrees of power: of the taskmaster of the ant (Prov. vi. 7), the husband who rules his wife (Gen. iii. 16), Eliezer, who has the management of Abraham's house (Gen. xxiv. 2), Joseph, the second in command over a country, Gen.

xlv. 8, an absolute king (מֶלֶךְ, Melek), Ps. cv. 20, Is. xvi. 1; also in the bad sense of despot (Is. xiv. 5); of the Messiah (Mic. v. 1); of God (1 Chron. xxix. 12, Ps. ciii. 19), etc. No less is the word applied to the sway which sun and moon hold over day and night, Gen. i. 18 [omnium moderator et dux sol, Cic. Tusc. i. 68; sol cœli rector, Plin. ii. 4]. In Treat. Jad. 76, מֶלֶךְ is used for Pharaoh עַם הַשָּׁם בְּרַף.

כותב־מַלְאכָה מֶלֶךְ עִם הַשָּׁם בְּרַף, Melek, to rule, reign), [cf. Phoen. שָׂר, Sar, king, e.g., 'Nabukudurrusur Sar Babilu,' Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, Inscr. Borsippa, etc.], a word used of nearly all degrees of chiefdom or wardenship. It is applied to the chief baker of Pharaoh (Gen. xl. 16), to the chief butler (ib. xl. 2), to the 'ruler over the cattle' (ib. xlvii. 6), to the keeper of the prison (ib. xxxix. 21), to the taskmaster of the Israelites (Ex. i. 11), to the 'prince of the eunuchs' (Dan. i. 7), to the 'master of the song' (Chenanjah, (שׁ) הַמִּשְׁכָּן (1 Chron. xv. 27). Further, to prefects, civil or military, of very limited or very extensive authority: Zebul, the 'ruler of Shechem' (Judg. x. 30); 'Amon, the governor of the city' (1 Kings xxii. 26); 'שׁ, the prefects of the provinces' (1 Kings xx. 15); 'שׁ, 'Decurion' (Ex. xviii. 21); 'שׁ, 'a captain of fifty', καταστάρχος (2 Kings i. 19); 'שׁ, captains (judges) over hundreds (Deut. i. 15); over a thousand (1 Sam. xviii. 3), over many thousands (1 Chron. xv. 25); 'שׁ, 'captain over half of the chariots of war' (1 Kings xvi. 9; 'שׁ, 'captain of the host' (2 Sam. xix. 2); general-in-chief, (LXX. ἀρχιστρατήγος (Gen. xxi. 22, 1 Sam. xii. 9): hence used—after אֱלֹהֵי צְבָאוֹת, God of Hosts—of God Himself (Dan. viii. 11). It occurs by itself in the stat. absol. as a parallel to 'judge': 'who has made thee a prince [שׁ] and a judge over us?' (Ex. ii. 14), to 'elder' (Ezra x. 8), to 'counsellor' (Ezra viii. 25), to 'king' (Hos. iii. 4). The merchants of Tyre are called שָׂרִים [merchant-princes], Is. xxiii. 9; the same term is applied to noblemen and courtiers, 'the princes of Pharaoh,' Gen. xii. 15; 'princes of Zoan,' Is. xix. 11, 13. The priests are called שָׂרִים chiefs or princes of the sanctuary (Is. xliii. 28, 1 Chron. xxv. 5), and the chief priests again are called שָׂרִים. Gradually the word came to be used of angels, as patrons and representatives of special nations (guardian-angels): of Persia, Dan. x. 13, 20; of Greece, Dan. x. 20; of Israel, x. 21: Michael, 'the great prince,' xii. 1; the chief princes, x. 13; שָׂרִים, 'the Prince of Princes':—God, ib. viii. 25 (cf. LXX. in Deut. xxxii. 8). The use of שָׂר as guardian-angel (עֶשֶׂר, etc.) is retained in the Midrash, but the word is also applied in the Talmud to 'a hero at the table, a mighty drinker' (Nidd. 16, etc.).—On the proper noun formed from this word, viz. שָׂרָה, שָׂרִי, Sarah, Sarai, we need not enlarge.

פֶּשֶׁל, Pesh. מַלְאכָה, Shultan; Luther: Landpfleger, Landvogt; Joseph. ἑταρχος (of Tatnai, Antiq. xi. 4. 4). This word has been variously derived from the Persian בֵּכִית, 'Magnates' (Bohlen); Pers. پختن, 'to cook' (Ewald); Pers.

بيک, 'Satelles,' 'Pedisequus' (Gesenius); from the Turk. بيک, 'General' (Frähn); from the Assyrian Pakha (Sanskrit. Pakhsha); whence پاشا, Pasha—friend [of the king], adjutant, governor of a province (Benfey, Stern); from بي, Pê, 'the lower'; and گاہ, gâh, 'royal office,'

= Pêgâh, Sub-king (Jul. Fürst); from 'the Arab. verb ساقط, saqat, (Jahn);* and finally from the Hebr. פָּחַק = פָּחַק, parqat. It is applied to a sub-prefect of a province, who is subject to the authority of the prefect or real governor, in contradistinction to אחשדרפן, a satrap (Esth. viii. 9); to שָׂר, ib. [see above]; to סָגָן, 'sagan' (municipal officer), Jer. li. 28; to מֶלֶךְ, 'king' (or sub-king), 2 Chron. ix. 14. It is used of the 'chiefs' of provinces in the Assyrian (2 Kings xviii. 24; Is. xxxvi. 9); Babylonian (Chaldee), (Jer. li. 57; Ezek. xxiii. 6, 23; Dan. iii. 2); Median and Persian Empires (Jer. li. 28; Esth. iii. 12; viii. 9). Palestine stood, while under Persian dominion, under such officers, called עַבְרֵי נָהַר, 'P. over the river' (Euphrates), whose official residence [כְּסֵא] was in Jerusalem, Neh. iii. 7; Ezra v. 3; vi. 6; Neh. ii. 7, 9. They were also called הַיּוֹדֵה, 'P. of Judah' (Hagg. i. 1); e.g., Zerubabel (Ezra ii. 63; Hagg. ii. 21, etc.); Nehemiah, who succeeded Sheshbazzar לַיהוּדָה, 'the prince of Judah' (Neh. v. 5, 14; xviii. 12). The word seems to have been adopted into the Hebrew idiom at an early period, since we find it used in 1 Kings x. 15 (2 Chron. ix. 14), of the tributary chieftains 'of the country'—together with the 'kings of Arabia'; further, of Syrian captains, to be put in the room of the (vice-) kings at the time of Benhadad, 1 Kings xx. 24, and finally it passed current for any person in high authority who was to be propitiated by gifts, Mal. i. 8. With respect to the שׂ of Judæa, introduced by Persian rule, it would appear that their remuneration ('Bread of the governor,' Ezra iv. 14), consisted partly in kind, partly in money ('bread, wine, and forty shekels of silver,' Neh. v. 15), chargeable upon the people (Neh. v. 18: 'One ox, and six choice sheep, also fowls, and once in ten days store of all sorts of wine'). Their office seems chiefly to have consisted in collecting the taxes of the province (Ezra vi. 8); an office at a later period in the hands of the high-priest, and later still let out on lease [JUDÆA; ROME].

It will not be necessary to dwell here with any length upon the Greek terms for governor met with in the N. T. and the Apocrypha, since those will be found for the most part treated fully in other articles (ROME; JUDÆA; FEAST; HOUSE, etc.) We shall, therefore, confine ourselves to name them, and to indicate their meaning briefly, as far as necessary for our present purpose:—

* תְּרִשְׁתָּא being probably the Persian denomination for this office, Ez. ii. 36; Neh. vii. 65, 70. The name Nehemiah seems inserted by clumsy copyists, Neh. viii. 9; x. 2' (Jahn, Bibl. Arch.)

Of a military and public capacity are:—

Ἐθράρχης (ἔθρος, ἀρχή):—Luther: Landpfleger, Fürst; a prefect over a province or a people, without either possessing the authority or the name of king. Aretas, a prefect of the Arabian king, stationed at Damascus, 2 Cor. xi. 32. Simon, the high-priest (1 Maccab. xiv. 47; xv. 12). Archelaus, Herod's son, a Roman vassal 'Ethnarch' of Idumæa, Judæa, and Samaria, Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 11. 4; Bell. Jud. ii. 6. 3. The seven chiefs between whom Egypt was divided during the Roman dominion are called Ethnarchs (Strabo xvii. 798.) In the widest sense it is applied also to Jewish chiefs of Jewish communities in larger cities, Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 7. 2; xiv. 8. 5; Bell. Jud. vii. 6. 3, the duties of whose office may be learned from Strabo in Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 7. 2. ἡγεμὼν (ἡγέομαι), 'Leader' [Talmud הגמון Sabb. 145, Aboda Sar. 11 = רוכסא, dux; or שלטנות, rulership], chief, prince, Matt. ii. 6 [see אֶלְיָהוּ]; more especially the ambassador (Legatus) sent into a province with the emperor's authority. Prefect, Matt. x. 18; 1 Pet. ii. 14. Procurator, Matt. xxvii. 2, 11, etc.; Luke xx. 20; Acts xxiii. 24, etc. In classical Greek the word is also used for king, as chief of the land, cf. Soph. O. R. 103, etc.—

Governors in a domestic capacity are:—

Ἀρχιτρίκλινος, John ii. 9, 'the ruler of the feast,' 'the governor of the feast' ('Obertruchsess'), the man who has the chief superintendence of the table. His functions (in the N. T. passage quoted), are not clearly defined. He has been identified with the Roman 'arbiter bibendi,' with the Greek συντροπάρχης, and with the παραξοιστός; but neither of these formal offices would seem in accordance with the somewhat humble marriage-feast described there. He is much more likely to have been a friend of the bridegroom's who undertook the superintendence of the feast for the time being [See FEAST; TABLE].

Οἰκονόμος (οἶκος, νέμω), the chief butler and steward of the house (Xen. Mem. ii. 10, etc.); in the N. T. more especially one entrusted with the management of the property (Luke xvi. 1, etc.) of the heirloom of a minor (Gal. iv. 2; 1 Cor. iv. 2; cf. Gen. xxiv. 2; 1 Kings iv. 6, etc.) Further, a 'chamberlain of the city' (Erastus), (Rom. xvi. 23), cf. Esth. viii. 9; Joseph. Antiq. xii. 4. 7, etc.; a 'dispenser' of the gospel, 1 Cor. ix. 17 = 'the Lord's steward,' Tit. i. 7.—E. D.

GOZAN (גוזן; Sept. Γωζαν), a province or district of Assyria. Ptolemy, in his description of Media, mentions a town called Gausania (Geogr. vi. 2) situated between the Zagros mountains and the Caspian Sea. Bochart, Rennell, and others, have attempted to identify this town with Gozan (Bochart, Opp. i. 194). Rennell further states, that the river Gozan (1 Chron. v. 26) is the modern A'zûl Ozen, which rises near Sinna in the eastern part of the Zagros chain, and, after a winding course, joins the Sefid-rud, which flows into the Caspian (Geography of Herodotus, i. p. 521, 2d ed.; see also Ritter, Erskunde, viii. 615; Sir Ker Porter, Travels, i. 267). This theory, however, places Gozan too far east for the requirements of the Scripture narrative. Dr. Grant supposes that the word Gozan signifies 'pasture,' and is the same as the modern Gozan, the name given by the Nestorians to all the Highlands of Assyria which afford pasturage to their flocks. He thinks that the ancient province of Gozan embraced the mountainous region east of the Tigris, through which the Khabûr and the Zab flow (Nestorian Christians, p. 125, sq.)

A close examination of the notices in Scripture, and a comparison of them with the Geography of Ptolemy and modern researches, enable us to fix, with a high degree of probability, the true position of Gozan. It appears from 2 Kings xvii. 6 (also xviii. 11), that Gozan was in Assyria, which is there distinguished from Media; and that Habor was a 'river of Gozan.' There can be little doubt that the Habor is identical with the Khabûr of Mesopotamia (HABOR). Gozan must, therefore, have been in Mesopotamia. The words of 2 Kings xix. 12 appear to confirm this view, for there Gozan and Haran are grouped together, and we know that Haran is in Mesopotamia. (See also Is. xxxvii. 12; Rawlinson's Ancient Monarchies, i. 245, sq.) In 1 Chron. v. 26, Gozan is called a river, and is distinguished from Habor. The explanation seems to be, that in this passage Habor is the name of a district, probably that watered by the lower Khabûr; while the upper part of the same river, flowing through the province of Gozan, is called נהר גוזן, 'the river of Gozan.'

Ptolemy states that Gausanitis was one of the provinces of Mesopotamia adjoining Chalcitis (Geogr. v. 18). The same province Strabo calls Mygdonia (xvi. 1), which may probably be, as suggested by Professor Rawlinson, another form of the same name (Ancient Monarchies, i. 245). As we find Halah, Habor, and Haran, grouped together in Mesopotamia; as we find beside them a province called Gausanitis; and as in Scripture Gozan is always mentioned in connection with the above places, we may safely conclude that Gozan and Gausanitis are identical. Gausanitis lay along the southern declivities of Mons Masius, and extended over the region watered by the upper Khabûr and Jerujer rivers to the ranges of Sinjar and Hama. The greater part of it is an undulating plain, having a poor soil and scanty vegetation. (Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, p. 324.)—J. L. P.

GRABE, JOHN EARNEST, an eminent scholar and divine, was born at Königsberg, July 10, 1666, and educated at the university of the same, where his father was professor of divinity and history. Having devoted himself to the study of the Fathers, he was led to question the validity of the orders of the clergy of the Lutheran church, and felt disposed to join the Church of Rome. Advised to visit England to have his doubts resolved, he was well received there by William III., who conferred a pension on him. He became a minister of the Church of England, and was made D.D. of the university of Oxford, 1706. He died 1711, in the forty-fifth year of his age. His theological views were of the Anglo-Catholic type. He was the author of many learned works, of which those relating to Biblical science are subjoined:—1. Epistola ad clarissimum virum, Jo. Millium; quâ ostenditur Libri Judicium Genuinum LXX. Interpretum Versionem eam esse, quam MS. Cod. Alex

The whole of this great work Dr. G. prepared for the press, but only lived to publish the first and fourth vols.; the second vol. was edited by Francis Lee, M.D.; and the third by W. Wigan, L.L.D. GRAMBERG, KARL P. W., a Biblical critic, was born at Seefeldt, in the duchy of Oldenburg, November 27th, 1797. Having lost his father when he was but ten years of age, he was placed at Stooden, and afterwards at Oldenburg, where he studied the classical and modern languages. Subsequently, with a view to preaching, he devoted himself to Hebrew and the Oriental tongues. The O. T. became the chief subject of his examination. After being master of the school at Oldenburg, he became a professor of the first class at the royal institution of Züllichau, 1822. His death took place on the 29th March 1830. His Biblical works are—Libri Genesios secundum fontes rite dignoscendos Adumbratio, 8vo, 1828; Das Buch d. Sprüche Salomo's neu ubersetzt, u. s. w., 8vo, 1828; Kritische Geschichte d. Religionsideen d. alten Testaments, 2 Theile 8vo, 1829, 1830. Gramberg was one of the free theologians of Germany. His critical abilities were not great; but he had a good knowledge of Hebrew, and occupied a respectable place among the critics of his day. Men like Gesenius and De Wette attached some importance to his opinions on the books of the Bible.—S. D.

GRAVES, RICHARD, D.D., Dean of Ardagh, was born in 1763, and died in 1829. He was the author of Lectures on the four last books of the Pentateuch, designed to shew the Divine origin of the Jewish Religion chiefly from internal evidence; in three parts, Lond. 1815, 2 vols. 8vo; and An Essay on the Character of the Apostles and Evangelists, designed to prove that they were not Enthusiasts, Dublin 1798, 8vo. The former of these may still be consulted with advantage, although on many points it is necessarily behind the requirements of the present day.—S. N.

GRAY, ROBERT, D.D., bishop of Bristol, was born in 1762, and died Sept. 28th, 1834. He was the author of the following two Biblical works—1.

A key to the O. T. and Apocrypha, or an account of their several books, their contents, and authors, and of the time in which they were respectively written, Lond. 1790, 8vo, 10th ed., 1841, 8vo. 2. The connection between the Sacred Writings and the Literature of Jewish and heathen authors, particularly that of the classical ages, illustrated principally with a view to evidence in confirmation of the truth of revealed religion, Lond. 1816, 8vo; 2d ed., 2 vols, 1819, 8vo. The former of these works had for many years a considerable reputation, but is now superseded.—S. N.

GREAVES (ἡμῖς, κρημίδες, οὐρα). All the ancient versions and Josephus (Antiq. vi. 9. 1) agree in regarding the Hebrew term so translated in the A. V., 1 Sam. xvii. 6, as a defensive armour for the leg. It is to be distinguished from ἄνδρ, which was a sort of military shoe like the Roman caliga; and was probably similar to the κρημὶς of the Greeks, or the greaves of the Assyrians, as represented in their sculptures, which not only protected the leg, but covered the upper part of the foot like our gaiters (Layard, Nineveh ii. 337).—J. E. R.

GREECE. The relations of the Hebrews with the Greeks were always of a distant kind, until the Macedonian conquest of the East: hence in the O. T. the mention of the Greeks is naturally rare. It appears by Cruden's Concordance that 'Tubal and Javan,' in connection, are named four times, Dan and Javan once (Ezek. xxvii. 19), and Javan, translated by us Greece and Greeks, five times, of which three are in the book of Daniel. Of these passages, that which couples Dan and Javan is generally referred to a different tribe [see JAVAN]; in the rest Javan is understood of Greece or its people. The Greek nation had a broad division into two races, Dorians and Ionians: of whom the former seem to have long lain hid in continental parts, or on the western side of the country, and had a temperament and institutions more approaching to the Italic. The Ionians, on the contrary, retained many Asiatic usages and tendencies, witnessing that they had never been so thoroughly cut off as the Dorians from Oriental connection. When afterwards the Ionic colonies in Asia Minor rose to eminence, the Ionian race, in spite of the competition of the half Doric Æolians, continued to attract most attention in Asia; and it is not wonderful that the Ionian name (for Javan is the same word as 'Idaw) should have maintained its extensive application in Oriental usage. Just so in the 'Persæ' of the tragic poet Æschylus (178, 564), the Persians are made to style all the Greeks Idæes, i.e., Javan.

The few dealings of the Greeks with the Hebrews seem to have been rather unfriendly, to judge by the notice in Zech. ix. 13. In Joel. iii. 6, the Tyrians are reproached for selling the children of Judah and Jerusalem to the Grecians: but at what time, and in what circumstances, must depend on the date assigned to the book of Joel [see JOEL]. With the Greeks of Cyprus or Chittim, the Hebrews were naturally better acquainted; and this name, it would seem, might easily have extended itself in their tongue to denote the whole Greek nation. Such at least is the most plausible explanation of its use in 1 Maccab. i. 1, and viii. 9.

The Greeks were eminent for their appreciation of beauty in all its varieties : indeed their religious creed owed its shape mainly to this peculiarity of their mind ; for their logical acuteness was not exercised on such subjects until quite a later period. The puerile or indecent fables of the old mythology may seem to a modern reader to have been the very soul of their religion ; but to the Greek himself these were a mere accident, or a vehicle for some embodiment of beauty. He thought little whether a legend concerning Artemis or Apollo was true, but much whether the dance and music celebrating the divinity were solemn, beautiful, and touching. The worship of Apollo, the god of youth and beauty, has been regarded as characterising the Hellenic in contrast with the older Pelasgian times ; nor is the fact without significance, that the ancient temple and oracle of Jupiter at Dodona fell afterwards into the shade in comparison with that of Apollo at Delphi. Indeed the Dorian Spartans and the Ionian Athenians alike regarded Apollo as their tutelary god, who was Ἀπόλλων πατρώος at Athens, and Ἀπόλλων Καρπείος at Amyclæ. Whatever the other varieties of Greek religious ceremonies, no violent or frenzied exhibitions arose out of the national mind ; but all such orgies (as they were called) were imported from the East, and had much difficulty in establishing themselves on Greek soil. Quite at a late period the managers of orgies were evidently regarded as mere jugglers of not a very reputable kind (see Demosth. De Corona, sec. 79, p. 313) ; nor do the Greek States, as such, appear to have patronized them. On the contrary, the solemn religious processions, the sacred games and dances, formed a serious item in the public expenditure ; and to be permanently exiled from such spectacles would have been a moral death to the Greeks. Wherever they settled they introduced their native institutions, and reared temples, gymnasias, baths, porticoes, sepulchres, of characteristic simple elegance. The morality and the religion of such a people naturally were alike superficial ; nor did the two stand in any close union. Bloody and cruel rites could find no place in their creed, because faith was not earnest enough to endure much self-abandonment. Religion was with them a sentiment and a taste rather than a deep-seated conviction. On the loss of beloved relatives they felt a tender and natural sorrow, but unclouded with a shade of anxiety concerning a future life. Through the whole of their later history, during Christian times, it is evident that they had little power of remorse, and little natural firmness of conscientious principle : and, in fact, at an earlier and critical time, when the intellect of the nation was ripening, an atrocious civil war, that lasted for twenty-seven years, inflicted a political and social demoralization, from the effects of which they could never recover. Besides this, their very admiration of beauty, coupled with the degraded state of the female intellect, proved a frightful source of corruption, such as no philosophy could have adequately checked. From such a nation then, whatever its intellectual pretensions, no healthful influence over its neighbours could flow, until other and higher inspiration was infused into its sentiment.

Among the Greeks the arts of war and peace were carried to greater perfection than among any earlier people. In navigation they were little behind the Tyrians and Carthaginians ; in political foresight they equalled them ; in military science, both by sea and land, they were decidedly their superiors ; while in the power of reconciling subject-foreigners to the conquerors and to their institutions, they perhaps surpassed all nations of the world. Their copious, cultivated, and flexible tongue carried with it no small mental education to all who learned it thoroughly ; and so sagacious were the arrangements of the great Alexander throughout his rapidly acquired Asiatic empire, that in the twenty years of dreadful war among his generals which followed his death, no rising of the natives against Greek influence appears to have been thought of. Without any change of population adequate under other circumstances to effect it, the Greek tongue and Greek feeling spread far and sank deep through the Macedonian dominions. Half of Asia Minor became a new Greece ; and the cities of Syria, North Palestine, and Egypt, were deeply imbued with the same influence.

When a beginning had been made of preaching Christianity to the Gentiles, Greece immediately became a principal sphere for missionary exertion. The vernacular tongue of the Hellenistic Christians was understood over so large an extent of country, as almost of itself to point out in what direction they should exert themselves. The Grecian cities, whether in Europe or Asia, were the peculiar field for the Apostle Paul ; for whose labours a superintending Providence had long before been providing, in the large number of devout Greeks who attended the Jewish synagogues. Greece proper was divided by the Romans into two provinces, of which the northern was called Macedonia, and the southern Achaia (as in 2 Cor. ix. 2, etc.) ; and we learn incidentally from Acts xviii. that the proconsul of the latter resided at Corinth. To determine the exact division between the provinces is difficult ; nor is the question of any importance to a Biblical student. Achaia, however, had probably very nearly the same frontier as the kingdom of modern Greece, which is limited by a line reaching from the gulf of Volo to that of Arta, in great part along the chain of Mount Othrys. Of the cities celebrated in Greek history, none are prominent in the early Christian times except Corinth. Laconia, and its chief town Sparta, had ceased to be of any importance : Athens was never eminent as a Christian church. In Macedonia were the two great cities of Philippi and Thessalonica (formerly called Thēme) ; yet of these the former was rather recent, being founded by Philip the Great ; the latter was not greatly distinguished above the other Grecian cities on the same coast. Nicopolis, on the gulf of Ambracia (or Arta), had been built by Augustus, in memory of his victory at Actium, and was, perhaps, the limit of Achaia on the western coast (Tacitus, Annal. ii. 53). It had risen into some importance in St. Paul's days, and, as many suppose, it is to this Nicopolis that he alludes in his epistle to Titus. (See further under ACHÆA and NICOPOLIS.)—F. W. N.

GREEK LANGUAGE (BIBLICAL). There has been much discussion as to the peculiar nature of the language used by the Septuagint translators and by the writers of the N. T. It would be useless to attempt to give a history of these discussions in this article. We shall simply indicate the main facts which have come out in the course of investigation, stating at the same time the theory which seems to us to account most satisfactorily for the peculiarities of Greek which these writings present.

In the earliest stages of a language the dialects are exceedingly numerous, every small district having peculiar variations of its own. Such we find to have been the case with Greek, for though its dialects have been generally reckoned as four, we know that each of these was variously modified in various places. In course of time, however, one of these dialects, the Attic, drove the rest from the field of literary composition, and almost all Greeks who wrote books wrote in that dialect wherever they might have been born. The Attic which they used underwent some changes, and then received the name of the 'common dialect.' This dialect has been used by Greeks for literary purposes from the time of Alexander the Great down to the present age.

While Attic thus became the literary language, the various communities spoke Greek as they had learned it from their parents and teachers. This spoken Greek would necessarily differ in different places, and it would gradually become very different from the stationary language which was used in writings. Now it seems to us that the language used by the Septuagint and N. T. writers was the language used in common conversation, learned by them, not through books, but most likely in childhood from household talk, or if not, through subsequent oral instruction. If this be the case, then the Septuagint is the first translation which was made for the great masses of the people in their own language, and the N. T. writers are the first to appeal to men through the common vulgar language intelligible to all who spoke Greek. The common Greek thus used is indeed considerably modified by the circumstances of the writers, but these modifications no more turn the Greek into a peculiar dialect than do Americanisms or Scotisms turn the English of Americans and Scotsmen into peculiar dialects of English.

In considering a language we have to look at its inflections, its syntax, and its vocabulary.

Inflections.—It is in the inflections that the main proof of our theory in regard to the N. T. Greek lies. Max Müller justly affirms that the grammar of a language is 'the most essential element, and therefore the ground of classification in all languages which have produced a definite grammatical articulation' (Lectures on the Science of Language, p. 74). Now the grammar of the Septuagint and N. T., in very many of its departures from the 'common dialect,' approximates to the modern Greek of Ptochoprodromus in the 12th century, and to the modern Greek of the present day, both of which are simply the language of the common people. The modern Greek grammar of our own time is only a full development of the tendencies which shew themselves in the Septuagint and N. T. Thus the N. T. and modern Greek have no dual. In their declension of nouns we find a mixture of dialects, such as, for instance, α in the genitive singular of proper names in $\alpha\varsigma$; and $\eta\varsigma$ in the genitive, and η in the dative, of nouns in $\rho\alpha$ (σπελρῆς, Acts xxvii. 1; μαχαλρῆ, Rev. xiii. 10, etc.). There is in both a change from the second to the third declension in the words νοῦς, σκότος, ἔλεος, and πλοῦτος. The N. T., however, declines some of them occasionally as of the second declension. Both display great peculiarities in the forms for the comparative and superlative of adjectives, such, for instance, as μειζότεραν, 3 John 4. In modern Greek the optative mood is rare, and occurs only in wishes. It is rare also in the N. T., and in some of the books it does not occur at all. The modern Greek declines the second Aorist as the first. This is the case frequently in the N. T. also, as ἔπεσα for ἔπεσον. The N. T. sometimes forms the imperative by means of ἀφίημι, as ἄφεσ ἐκβάλω, ἄφεσ ἰδομεν. This is now the common form in modern Greek, ἄφεσ being contracted into ἄς. The second person singular in the present passive or middle ends in modern Greek in the regular σαι; so in the N. T. καυχᾶσαι and δύνασαι. The third person plural of the imperfect active of contracted verbs in modern Greek ends in σαν; so in Septuagint and N. T. ἐδολοῖσαν. There is a striking similarity in the conjugation of verbs in both. Both have a tendency to form all the parts regularly. Both also deal arbitrarily with augments. Both avoid the use of verbs in μ , and both generally strengthen pure verbs by the insertion of a ν . Sometimes they change the vowel ϵ into α , as ἐλεᾶτε, in Jude 23. These are some of the points in which the grammar of the N. T. Greek, and that of modern Greek, agree. Many more might have been added. Instances of several of these peculiarities may be found in our texts of the classical writers, and a still larger number in our manuscripts of them; but it is to be noted that in them they appear as rarities; in the N. T. their occurrence is more frequent, and in modern Greek they have passed into customary forms. Some of these forms have been set down as Alexandrian or Macedonian, but Sturz (De Dialecto Macedonica et Alexandrina Liber, Lipsiæ, 1808) has entirely failed to prove that there was either a Macedonian or an Alexandrian dialect. The Macedonian words which he has adduced indicate that the Macedonians were non-Hellenic. And there are no forms adduced as Alexandrian which are not to be found in some earlier dialect. In fact there is nothing in any of the statements to which he appeals, to contradict the opinion that Alexandrians, like other Greek-speaking people, mixed up various dialects in their spoken language. The written language of the Alexandrians, as we know from the works of Philo and other residents in Alexandria, was the so-called 'common dialect.' Moreover, the Greek of the N. T. is to be found not in writings of any special locality, but in writings which made no pretensions to literary excellence, such as the fragments of Hegesippus, some of the Apocryphal gospels, the Apostolical constitutions, the liturgies, the Chronicon Paschale and Malelas.

Syntax. In the syntax the peculiar elements that mixed themselves with the common spoken language in the N. T. writings, make their appearance. The Hebrew element especially is noteworthy. The translators of the Septuagint went on the principle of translating as literally as possible, and consequently the form of the sentences is essentially Hebrew. Some of the writers of the N. T. were themselves Jews, or derived part of their information from Jews, and accordingly the form of portions of their writings, particularly in narrative, is influenced by Hebrew modes. At the same time too much stress is not to be laid on this Hebrew influence; for the writers appear sometimes to differ from the classical types, not because they were Jews, but because they were simple plain-speaking (τῆν γλῶτταν διωρεῖσιν, Eus. Hist. Eccl. iii. 24) men, who cared little about rounded sentences. The Hebrew element shews itself in particular phrases and constructions, as in ποιεῖν ελεος μετὰ τινος; but the amount of this Hebrew element is not so great as it has often been supposed to be, and in some of the N. T. writers it is scarcely noticeable at all. Generally speaking, the syntax, like the grammar, is a tendency towards modern Greek. It has, like it, frequent recourse to the use of prepositions, and we find such expressions even as δόξα εἰς ὑμᾶς, 1 Thes. iv. 8. After the comparative παρά is used frequently instead of ἢ in the N. T.; in modern Greek it is always employed. On account of the rareness of the optative, and an avoidance of the infinitive by some of the writers, both the N. T. and modern Greek abound in the use of ἵνα with the subjunctive, and sometimes even with the indicative, as in Revelations. The neuter plural is more regularly joined with a plural verb in N. T. Greek; it is always joined with it in modern Greek. Many other peculiarities in which the syntax of the N. T. and that of modern Greek agree might be noted.

Vocabulary.—The words used by the N. T. writers shew a still greater variety of elements. Here we notice distinctly, also, the tendency towards the modern language, as, for instance, in the use of χορεύω, to feed men, in the frequent employment of diminutives, in attaching a weakened sense to words like βάλλω, which had originally the idea of vigour in them, and in a variety of adverbs and conjunctions rarely used by the classical writers. Some of these peculiar uses have been assigned to the supposed Alexandrian dialect; but in the discussions no attempt has been made to distinguish between what may have been pure Alexandrianisms, and what may have been common in Greek conversation though not in Greek writings.

In the words we find a Latin element, as might be expected. The Latin words used in the N. T. are not very numerous, but they show plainly that the writers had no other desire than to call things by their common names. They do not translate them into Greek, as a scholar of those days or an imitator of Attic writings would have done. We find a few Greek phrases in the N. T. which have evidently been translated from Latin, such as συμβούλιον λαβεῖν—consilium capere.

There are also several Aramaic words used in the N. T., especially by Christ. Most of these words and expressions are of a peculiar nature. They are almost all of them utterances employed on some solemn occasion. They were at one time appealed to as proof that Jesus regularly used the Aramaic in his addresses to the people; but they have been recently adduced, and with considerable force, to prove exactly the contrary, that Jesus frequently used the Greek language in his public conversations as being more intelligible to all, but that when powerfully moved or deeply touched, he employed Aramaic words as being more expressive from their associations (Roberts, Discussions on the Gospels, pt. I. ch. iv.) Besides this, the Hebrew or Aramaic has exercised an influence on the meanings of some Greek words, as, for instance, in the use of ὀφειλῆμα, for a sin. In several instances, however, where this Hebrew influence has been set down as existing, a more satisfactory explanation is given in another way. Thus δικαιοσύνη is taken by some to mean liberality in 2 Cor. ix. 9, 10, because they suppose that דִּקְיֻנָּה has this meaning in Ps. cxii. 9, where the Sept. translates δικαιοσύνη. In both cases it may be doubted whether δικαιοσύνη ought to receive this meaning, and unquestionably in the second Epistle to the Corinthians it is much simpler to suppose that Paul looks on liberality as an essential part of righteousness, and righteousness therefore as including liberality.

There is also another element in the vocabulary of a peculiar nature. This arises from the novelty of the teachings combined with their exalted morality. The new thoughts demanded new modes of expression, and hence the writers did not hesitate to use words in senses rare if not entirely unknown to the classical writers. This fact could not be fully illustrated without exhibiting the results of investigation into various characteristic words, such as μυστήριον, δίκαιος, δικαιοσύνη, δικαιοῦν, πίστις, ζωή, θάνατος, δόξα, δοξάζω, ὁρᾶν, etc. These results seem to us to form no inconsiderable addition to the proof of the divinity of Christianity, for the grand moral ideas that were expressed by some of them are unique in the age in which they were uttered. Thus the word ζωή is frequently used to denote an entire and absolute consecration of soul, body, and spirit, to God, for it is this entire consecration which they look upon as the life-principle of man. Living with them, if it be not living to God in Christ, is not living at all, but death,—and a death which works not merely in the soul, but necessarily also in the body. Plato and the Stoics have something like this notion of ζωή, but with them it is a speculation. They are continually reasoning about it. The writers of the N. T. treat it as an unquestionable realized fact. So again δόξα means glory; but the writers of the N. T. separate from it every notion of material splendour or earthly renown, and use it to denote that spiritual irradiation of the whole man which takes place when God reigns in him, when the image of God is realized in him. Thus we come short of God's glory when we fail to present the purity and holiness of his character and image in our characters. And so the δόξα of the N. T. is purely spiritual and moral. Then, again, it is remarkable how in the case of words like ὕδωρ, λουτρὸν, and βαπτίζω, the material meaning often vanishes entirely out of sight, and the writers express by them the spiritually purifying power of Christ, which really and entirely cleanses both soul and body (Alexander, Anglo-Catholicism not Apostolical, p. 293). The moral fervour of the writers is seen also in their omission of certain words. Thus the sensuous ἐρᾶν is never used to express the idea which they had of love. The words εὐδαίμων and εὐτυχής are also unknown to the N. T., and indeed the writers do not use any word to express mere happiness. μακάριος is used several times to denote something more than mere earthly felicity. They avoid all words connected with mythology, such as the compounds of δαίμων, which, with its diminutive, is used in a peculiarly Jewish and Christian sense. The writers of the N. T. are also remarkable for confining a word to one meaning. Thus, μετάνοια is a turning of the whole soul from evil to good, and no other compound with μετὰ is used in the same sense, while Justin Martyr uses μετάνοια as a change from good to evil as well as from evil to good, and he employs μεταγινώσκω and μετανοέω, as well as μετανοώ for the same idea.

The works on the subject of this article are very numerous. They are enumerated and criticised in Winer's Grammatik des Neutestamentlichen Sprachidioms, Fünfte Auflage, Leipzig 1844, 8vo; and Schirlitz's Grundzüge der Neutestamentlichen Gräcität, Giessen 1861, 8vo. Much information will be found in works that discuss later Greek, such as Lobeck's Phrynichus, and Jacobs's Achilles Tattius, and especially in a Glossary of Later and Byzantine Greek, by E. A. Sophocles, published as vol. vii. new series of the Memoirs of the American Academy, Cambridge and Boston, 1860, 4to. Much interesting and instructive matter is also to be found in the glossaries and articles given in the Pandora, a fortnightly periodical published in Athens.—J. D.

GREEK VERSIONS.—I. SEPTUAGINT. The oldest version of the O. T. in any language is the Greek translation commonly called the Septuagint, either because it was approved and sanctioned by the Jewish Sanhedrim consisting of seventy-two persons, or rather from the Jewish account which states that so many individuals were employed in making it. The history of this version is obscure. Few notices of its origin are extant; and even such as exist are contradictory.

The space allotted to the present article will only allow the writer to touch upon the chief points relating to the Septuagint. A radical and minute investigation cannot be expected. Results alone must be briefly stated.

The oldest writer who makes mention of the Septuagint is Aristobulus, an author referred to by Eusebius (Præpar. Evang. xiii. 12, vol. iii. p. 310, ed. Gaisford), and Clement of Alexandria (Stromata, i. v. vi.) According to Eusebius, he was a Jew, who united the Aristotelian with the Jewish philosophy, and composed a commentary on the law of Moses, dedicated to Ptolemy Philometor. He is also mentioned in 2 Maccab. i. 10. Both Clement and Eusebius make him contemporary with Philometor; for the passages in their writings, in which they speak of him under Philadelphus, must either have been corrupted by ignorant transcribers, or have been so written by mistake (Valckenaer, De Aristobulo Judeo, Philosopho Peripatetico, Alexandrino, etc., secs. 10, 11; Daehne, Geschichtliche Darstellung der Jüdisch-Alexandrinischen Religions-Philosophie, zweyte Abtheilung, p. 73, et seq.) His words relative to the Septuagint are ἡ δ' ὅλη ἐρμηνεία τῶν διὰ τοῦ νόμου πάντων ἐπὶ τοῦ προσαγορευθέντος Φιλαδέλφου βασιλέως—Δημητρίου τοῦ Φαληρέως πραγματευσαμένου τὰ περὶ τούτων. The entire passage, of which the preceding words form a brief portion, has occasioned much conjecture and discussion. It is given by Valckenaer, Thiersch, and Frankel. It appears to us, that the words of Aristobulus do not speak of any prior Greek translation, as Hody supposes, or indeed of any translation whatever. They rather refer to some brief extracts relative to Jewish history, which had been made from the Pentateuch into a language commonly understood by the Jews in Egypt, before the time of Demetrius. The entire law, ἡ δ' ὅλη ἐρμηνεία τῶν διὰ τοῦ νόμου πάντων, was first rendered into Greek under Ptolemy I. Hody, and after him Eichhorn, conjectured that the fragments of Aristobulus preserved by Eusebius and Clement were written in the 2d century by another Aristobulus, a Christian; and that Aristobulus, the professed Peripatetic, was a heathen. But the quotation of Cyril of Alexandria (contra Julianum, lib. vi.), to which they appeal, was erroneously made by that father, as may be seen by comparing it with Clement. Richard Simon also denied the authenticity of Aristobulus's remains (Histoire Critique du V. T., p. 189). But Valckenaer has sufficiently established their authenticity. The testimony of Aristobulus is corroborated by a Latin scholion recently found in a MS. of Plautus at Rome, which has been described and illustrated by Ritschl in a little book entitled 'Die Alexandrinischen Bibliotheken und die Sammlung der Homerischen Gedichte nach Anleitung eines Plautinischen Scholium's,' Berlin, 1838. From the passage of Aristobulus already quoted, it appears that in the time of Aristobulus, i.e., the beginning of the 2d century B. C., this version was considered to have been made when Demetrius Phalereus lived, or in the reign of Ptolemy Lagi. Hody has endeavoured to shew that this account contradicts the voice of certain history, because it places Demetrius in the reign of Philadelphus. The son is manifestly confounded with the father; Ptolemy Philadelphus with Ptolemy Lagi, both by Aristobulus and in the scholion. The object of Demetrius in advising Lagi to have in his library a copy of the Jewish laws in Greek, is not stated by Aristobulus; but Aristes relates that the librarian represented it to the king as a desirable thing that such a book should be deposited in the Alexandrian library. Some think that a literary, rather than a religious motive, led to the version. So Havernick. This, however, is improbable. Hody, Sturz, Frankel, and others conjecture that the object was religious or ecclesiastical. Eichhorn refers it to private impulse; while Hug takes the object to have been political. It is not probable, however, that the version was intended for the king's use, or that he wished to obtain from it information respecting the best mode of governing a nation and enacting laws for its economic well-being. The character and language of the version unite to shew that an Egyptian king, probably ignorant of Greek, could not have understood the work. Perhaps an ecclesiastical motive was in the minds of the Jews who were originally interested in it; while Demetrius Phalereus and the king were actuated by a political design.

It is difficult to ascertain whether Aristobulus's words imply that all the books of the O. T. were translated into Greek under Ptolemy Lagi, or simply the Pentateuch. Hody contends that νόμος, the term used by Aristobulus, meant at that time the Mosaic books alone; although it was afterwards taken in a wider sense to embrace all the O. T. Vaickenaer thinks that all the books were comprehended under it. It is certainly more natural to restrict it to the Pentateuch. The Pentateuch, therefore, was completed under Lagi.

The next historical testimony regarding the Septuagint, is the prologue of Jesus the son of Sirach, a document containing the judgment of a Palestinian Jew concerning the version before us. His words are these: οὐ μόνον δὲ ταῦτα ἀλλὰ καὶ αὐτοὶ ὁ νόμος καὶ αἱ προφητεῖαι καὶ τὰ λοιπὰ τῶν βιβλίων οὐ μικρὰν ἔχει τὴν διαφορὰν ἐκ τῶν τοῖς λεγόμενα—'and not only these things, but the law itself, and the prophets, and the rest of the books, have no small difference when they are spoken in their own language.' Supposing that these words refer to the Septuagint, it is not easy to settle the time when the writer lived. The most probable opinion seems to be that which places him about 130 B.C., in the reign of Euergetes II.

The account given by Aristæas comes next before us. This writer pretends to be a Gentile, and a favourite at the court of Ptolemy Philadelphus King of Egypt. In a letter addressed to his brother Philocrates, he relates that Philadelphus, when forming a library at great expense, was advised by Demetrius Phalereus to apply to the Jewish high-priest Eleazar for a copy of the book containing the Jewish laws. Having previously purchased the freedom of more than a hundred thousand captive Jews in Egypt, the king sent Aristæas and Andreas to Jerusalem, with a letter requesting of Eleazar seventy-two persons as interpreters, six out of each tribe. They were despatched accordingly, with a magnificent copy of the law; and were received and entertained by the king for several days, with great respect and liberality. Demetrius led them to an island, probably Pharos, where they lodged together. The translation was finished in seventy-two days, having been written down by Demetrius, piece by piece, as agreed upon after mutual consultation. It was then publicly read by Demetrius to a number of Jews whom he had summoned together. They approved of it; and imprecations were uttered against any one who should presume to alter it. The Jews requested permission to take copies of it for their use; and it was carefully preserved by command of the king. The interpreters were sent home, loaded with presents. Josephus agrees in the main with Aristæas; but Philo's account differs in a number of circumstances. Justin Martyr endeavoured to harmonise the various traditions current in his day, but without success. Exaggerations and glaring falsehoods had been added to the story of Aristæas, in the days of Justin and Epiphanius; which these credulous men received without hesitation, and to which it is probable they themselves contributed. The interpreters are said to have been shut up in separate cells, where they made separate versions, which were found on comparison to agree in every minute particular. Hence they were looked upon as inspired, and their version as infallibly correct. Most of the Fathers received this tradition; and the early Jewish Rabbins equally believed it. Even Philo regarded the translators as inspired; but it is evident that he was ignorant of Hebrew. Jerome seems to have been the first who distinctly rejected the story of their inspiration; although he did not doubt the veracity of Aristæas, whose simpler narrative makes no mention of inspiration. Until the latter half of the 17th century, the origin of the Septuagint as given by Aristæas, was firmly believed; while the numerous additions that had been made to the original story, in the progress of centuries, were unhesitatingly received as equally genuine. The story was first reckoned improbable by L. Vives (in a note to Augustine's De Civitate Dei); then Scaliger asserted that Aristæas's letter was written by a Jew; and Richard Simon was too acute a critic not to perceive the truth of Scaliger's assertion. Hody was the first who demonstrated, with great learning, skill, and discrimination, that the narrative could not be authentic. It is now universally pronounced fabulous.

The work of Aristæas, which was first published in the original Greek by Simon Schard, at Basel, 1561, 8vo, and several times reprinted, was also given by Hody, in Greek and Latin, in his book entitled De Bibliorum textibus originalibus, versionibus Græcis, et Latina Vulgata, Oxonii, 1705, fol. The most accurate edition, however, is that by Galland, in the Bibliotheca Vet. Patrum, vol. ii. It was translated into English by Whiston, and published at London in his Collection of Authentic Records, part 2 (London, 1728).

It is a difficult point to determine the extent to which truth is mixed up with fable in this ancient story. However absurd the traditions may appear in the view of modern criticism, some truth must lie at the basis of them. In separating the true from the fabulous, it appears to us that Hody has not been successful. From the extreme credulity manifested in the reception of the fable, he has gone to the extreme of scepticism. Yet he has been generally followed. He thinks that the Pentateuch was translated a considerable time before the prophets; and that the Jews first resorted to the reading of the prophets in their synagogues when Antiochus Epiphanes forbade the use of the law; consequently the prophetic portion was not translated till after the commencement of Philometor's reign. It is wholly improbable, however, that Antiochus interdicted the Jews merely from reading the Pentateuch (comp. 1 Maccab. i. 41, etc.; and Joseph. Antiq. xii. 5; Frankel, pp. 48, 49). The interval between the translating of the law and the prophets, of which many speak, was probably short. In order to reconcile conflicting statements, Hody assigned the version of the Pentateuch to the two years during which Philadelphus reigned conjointly with his father, about 286-285 B.C. We prefer assuming that it was begun under Ptolemy Lagi, the son and father having been confounded by Aristobulus and the scholion on Plutarch; by Aristæas too, probably on purpose. Hody's proof that the book of Joshua was not translated till upwards of twenty years after the death of Ptolemy Lagi, founded upon the word γὰρ, is perfectly nugatory; although the time assigned cannot be far from the truth. The epilogue to the book of Esther does not state that this part of the O. T. was translated under Ptolemy Philometor, or that it was dedicated to him. On the contrary, it refers to the apocryphal additions of the canonical book (Valckenauer, pp. 33, 63). It is a fruitless task to attempt to ascertain the precise times at which separate portions of the version were made. All that can be known with any degree of probability is, that it was begun under Lagi. Hody supposes that the book of Judges was not translated till after Christ, but his proof is invalid. The same may be said of the assumption made by Michaelis and Bertholdt, that Daniel was not rendered into Greek till after Christ.

It is obvious, from internal evidence, that there were several translators; but certainly not seventy-two. Hody has endeavoured to parcel out their version into small portions, assigning each part to a separate person, and affirming that they were put together in one cento without revision; but his notions of rigid uniformity in the translators are such as exclude perspicuity, freedom, variety, and elegance. Internal evidence is in favour of the Pentateuch having been made by more than one. Exodus, Leviticus, and Deuteronomy are better rendered than the other two books; Leviticus best of all. But Thiersch and Herschfeld endeavour to shew that one translator only appears in the Pentateuch. The whole version was the work of five or six translators at least, and must therefore be of unequal merit.

In opposition to the Pseudo-Aristeas, we cannot but maintain that the translators were Alexandrian, not Palestinian Jews. The internal character of the entire version, particularly of the Pentateuch, sufficiently attests the fact. We find, accordingly, that proper names, and terms peculiar to Egypt, are rendered in such a manner as must have been unintelligible to a Greek-speaking population other than the Egyptian Jews. That the translators were Egyptians has been proved to the satisfaction of all by Hody; although some of his examples, such as the words γέρας and λαρόδρους, are not appropriate or conclusive. Frankel supposes that the version was made not only at different times, but at different places. This is quite arbitrary. There is no reason for believing, with him, that different books originated after this fashion, the impulse having gone forth from Alexandria, and spreading to localities where the Jews had settled, especially Cyrene, Leontopolis, and even Asia Minor.

Next to the Pentateuch, in point of goodness, is the version of Proverbs. The translator of Job, though familiar with the Greek poets, and master of an elegant diction, was very imperfectly acquainted with Hebrew. The Psalms and Prophets have been indifferently executed. Jeremiah is best translated among the prophetic books. Amos and Ezekiel stand in the next rank. Isaiah met with a very incompetent translator. The version of Daniel is the worst. That of Theodotion was very early substituted for it. Jerome did not know the reason of the substitution. Most of the historical books are ill interpreted.

With regard to the external form of the MSS. from which this version was made, we may remark that the letters were substantially the same as the old Samaritan characters—that there were no vowel-points—that there was no separation into words; no final letters; that the letter W wanted the diacritic point; and that words were frequently abbreviated. The division into verses and chapters is much later than the age of the translators. Our present editions have been printed in conformity with the division into chapters made in the 12th century; though they are not uniform in this particular. Still, however, many MSS. have separations in the text. The Alexandrine codex is said by Grabe to have one hundred and forty divisions, or as they may be called, chapters, in the book of Numbers alone (Prolegomena, c. i. sec. 7).

The titles given to the books, such as Γένεσις, etc., could hardly have been affixed by the translators, since they do not often harmonise with the version of the book itself to which they belong.

It has been inquired, whether the translator of the Pentateuch followed a Hebrew or Samaritan codex. The Septuagint and Samaritan harmonise in more than a thousand places, where they differ from the Hebrew. Hence it has been supposed that the Samaritan edition was the basis of the version. Various considerations have been adduced in favour of this opinion; and the names of De Dieu, Selden, Whiston, Hottinger, Hassenkamp, and Eichhorn, are enlisted on its behalf. But the irreconcilable enmity subsisting between the Jews and the Samaritans, both in Egypt and Palestine, effectually militates against it. Besides, in the prophets and hagiographa the number of variations from the Masoretic text is even greater and more remarkable than those in the Pentateuch; whereas the Samaritan extends no farther than the Mosaic books. No solution, therefore, can be satisfactory, which will not serve to explain at once the cause or causes both of the differences between the Seventy and Hebrew in the Pentateuch, and those found in the remaining books. The problem can be fully solved only by such an hypothesis as will throw light on the remarkable form of the Septuagint in Jeremiah and Esther, where it deviates most from the Masoretic MSS., presenting such transpositions and interpolations as excite the surprise of the most superficial reader. How, then, is the agreement between the Samaritan and Septuagint to be explained?

Some suppose that the one was interpolated from the other—a conjecture not at all probable. Jahn and Bauer imagine that the Hebrew MS. used by the Egyptian Jews agreed much more closely with the Samaritan in the text and forms of its letters, than the present Masoretic copies. This hypothesis, however, even if it were otherwise correct, would not account for the great harmony existing between the Samaritan and Septuagint.

Another hypothesis has been put forth by Gesenius (Commentatio de Pent. Samar. orig. indole, et auctor.), viz., that both the Samaritan and Septuagint flowed from a common recension (ἐκδόσις) of the Hebrew Scriptures, one older than either, and different in many places from the recension of the Masoretes now in common use. 'This supposition,' says Prof. Stuart, by whom it is adopted, 'will account for the differences and for the agreements of the Septuagint and Samaritan.'

This hypothesis, more ingenious and refined than the others, is less liable to objection. Much may be said in its favour. With some minor improvements and modifications we should not oppose it. Taking recension as not necessarily equivalent to revision, but rather in connection with the Samaritan and Septuagint a want of revision, as far as the text at their basis is concerned, the hypothesis bears a very plausible character. In the absence of a better it might be adopted. But it is not probable that the Samaritan copy was subsequently corrected and interpolated, as Gesenius supposes; at least it could not have been much transcribed, and therefore its liability to interpolation was less. Some considerations might be urged as adverse to the hypothesis; but they are of a subtle character, not patent to ordinary apprehension. We waive all mention of them in the present place, especially as they are of comparatively little weight or importance. We do not feel at liberty to adopt the hypothesis, however plausible it appears, believing it insufficient to account for all the phenomena. We admire the ingenuity of the contriver, but cannot fully coincide with him.

Dr. Lee (Prolegomena to Bagsters' Polyglott) accounts for the agreement between the Septuagint and Samaritan in another way. He conjectures that the early Christians interspersed their copies with Samaritan glosses, which ignorant transcribers afterwards inserted in the text. But he has not shewn that Christians in general were acquainted with the Samaritan Pentateuch and its additions to the Hebrew copy; neither has he taken into account the reverence entertained by the early Christians for the sacred books. We cannot, therefore, attribute the least probability to this hypothesis.

Another hypothesis has been mentioned by Frankel, viz., that the Septuagint flowed from a Chaldee version which was used before and after the time of Ezra—a version inexact and paraphrastic, which had undergone many alterations and corruptions. This was first proposed by R. Asaria di Rossi, in the midst of other conjectures.

Frankel admits that the assumption of such a version is superfluous, except in relation to the Samaritan Pentateuch, where much is gained by it. This Chaldee version circulated in various transcripts here and there; and as the same care was not applied in preserving its integrity as that of the original Hebrew, the copies of it presented considerable differences among themselves. Both the Greek version and the Samaritan Pentateuch were taken from it. Frankel concedes that this hypothesis is not satisfactory with regard to the Septuagint, because the mistakes found in that version must have frequently originated in misunderstanding the Hebrew text. There is no evidence, however, that any Targum or Chaldee version had been made before Ezra's time, or soon after. Explanations of the lessons publicly read by the Jews were given in Chaldee, not regularly perhaps, or uniformly; but it can scarcely be assumed that a Chaldee version had been made out in writing, and circulated in different copies. Glosses, or short expositions of words and sentences, were furnished by the public readers for the benefit of the people; and it is by no means improbable that several of these traditional comments were incorporated with the version by the Jewish translators, to whom they were familiar.

In the present state of the question, nothing better can be proposed than that the countries where the Samaritan Pentateuch originated and the Jewish MSS. at the basis of the Seventy had been in circulation, were much less favourable to the preservation of a pure text than Palestine, or rather its metropolis, Jerusalem. The people, too, who possessed the Pentateuch and the Jewish MSS. in question, were less careful of them. They lived amid less conservative influences than the Palestinian brethren. The Samaritan Pentateuch suffered in its text from the hands it passed through—not from any bad motive, but a mistaken desire of making it more intelligible, regular, and full. The Alexandrian Jews, living under the influence of the philosophy that prevailed in Egypt, had little superstitious veneration for the mere text of the sacred volume. The translators, too, were more intent on giving the sense than adhering to the literal text. They were inexperienced; and often failed in the difficult task they had undertaken. But why the agreement of the one document with the other should be so extensive; why both texts should harmonise so often where they differ from the Masoretic, we are unable to explain.

Tychsen (Tentamen de variis codd. Heb. V. T. MSS. gener.) thought that the Septuagint was made from the Hebrew transcribed into Hebrew-Greek characters. It is almost unnecessary to refer to such a notion. It never obtained general currency; having been examined and refuted by Dathe, Michaelis, and Hassencamp.

The Septuagint does not appear to have obtained general authority as long as Hebrew was understood at Alexandria. It is remarkable that Aristobulus quotes the original, even where it departs from the text of the Seventy. The version was indeed spread abroad in Egypt, northern Africa, and Asia Minor; and it acquired a high reputation among the Hellenistic Jews. It is spoken of in the Babylonian and Jerusalem Talmuds. It was read in some synagogues at least out of Egypt, as may be inferred from statements in Justin Martyr and Tertullian. Philo and Josephus adopted it; and it was universally received by the early Christians.

When controversies arose between Christians and Jews; and the former appealed with irresistible force of argument to this version, the latter denied that it agreed with the Hebrew original. Thus by degrees it became odious to the Jews—as much execrated as it had before been commended. Hence arose the Talmudic statement of a fast on the eighth day of the month Thebet, the day on which the law was turned into Greek, to perpetuate the remembrance of an event so inauspicious. The Jews had then recourse to the translation of Aquila, who is imagined to have undertaken a new work from the Hebrew with the express object of supplanting the Septuagint and favouring the sentiments of his brethren.

After the general reception of the Septuagint version, numerous mistakes were made in the transcription and multiplication of copies. In the time of the early fathers its text had already been altered; and the Jews, in argument with the Christians, commonly said, that such and such things were not in the Hebrew original. This affirmation was generally sufficient to silence the professors of the Christian religion, who were unable to follow their critical antagonists into the Hebrew text.

In order to rectify the text of the Septuagint, and to place Christians on even ground with their Jewish opponents, Origen undertook to revise it. After travelling about for twenty-eight years in quest of materials, and getting six Greek translations—three belonging to Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion respectively, and three anonymous—he began his great work, probably at Cæsarea. He had first published his Tetrapla, containing in four columns the versions of Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, and the Seventy. Thus the Tetrapla was only preparatory to his projected emendation of the Seventy. In an enlarged edition, undertaken after he had found the three anonymous versions, he added the Hebrew text in Hebrew and in Greek letters; and as the work then consisted of six columns, it was termed Hexapla. Such is the opinion of Hody, Montfaucou, and Bauer. But Eichhorn, Eichstaedt, and Frankel, think that the Tetrapla was not a distinct work preparatory to the Hexapla, but only an abridgment of the latter. In some parts he used two other Greek versions made by unknown authors, and occasionally a third anonymous translation. Hence the name Octapla. Thus the different appellations by which the work is distinguished refer merely to the number of columns. The following is their order:—1. The Hebrew text in its proper characters; 2. The same in Greek letters; 3. Aquila; 4. Symmachus; 5. Septuagint; 6. Theodotion; 7, 8, and 9. The three anonymous Greek versions were called the fifth, sixth, and seventh, in relation to the other four (see a specimen in Davidson's Bib. Criticism, vol. 1, p. 204).

Origen's object in this laborious work was not so much to correct the Septuagint, as to shew where and how it differed from the original Hebrew. When he discovered a word in Hebrew, or in the Greek versions, which was not in the Seventy, he inserted it out of Theodotion. If Theodotion wanted it also, he made up the deficiency from Aquila, and occasionally from Symmachus. In every case, he put the name of the translation from which a supplement was made, with an asterisk at the commencement, and two dots at the end, to show the extent of the supplied matter. And where the Septuagint, as compared with other Greek versions and the original, seemed to be redundant, he did not expunge the superfluity, but appended marks to point out this particular. His recension is called the Hexaplarian text, to distinguish it from the text as it existed before, which has been styled the common (κοινή) or ante-hexaplarian.

This great work, consisting of nearly fifty volumes, is thought to have perished at Cæsarea, when the town was sacked by the Saracens, A.D. 653. It was never transcribed.

In the beginning of the 4th century, Pamphilus and Eusebius copied the column containing the text of the Seventy, with the passages and scholia out of the other translators, and the critical marks used by Origen. It is to be regretted that this copy was soon extensively corrupted. The Hexaplarian text, coming through such a transcript, with fragments of the other versions, was published by Montfaucon, at Paris, 1714, 2 vols. fol.; and afterwards reprinted by Bahrdt, Leipzig, 1769-70, 2 vols. 8vo. Subsequent contributions to the same text were made by Doederlein, Spohn, Scharfenberg, Matthæi, Bruns and Adler, Schleusner, Vincentius de Regibus. The last-named scholar published Ezekiel in this text, from a Chigian MS. Pomæ, 1840, 8vo.

At the beginning of the same century, Lucian, a presbyter of Antioch, undertook to amend the text of the Seventy after the Hebrew original. This recension was called the editio vulgata (κοινή and also Λουκιανός), and became current in various churches. Another revision was undertaken about the same time by Hesychius, an Egyptian bishop, which, according to Jerome, was generally used in the churches of Egypt. Hesychius and Lucian probably used the versions of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, not the Hebrew Text; although Hody thinks otherwise. From these three recensions all our printed editions have been derived. In the two great MSS. of the Seventy, the Vatican and Alexandrine, the basis of the former is the common or earlier text, according to John Morin; an opinion adopted by Holmes only so far as the Pentateuch is concerned. The Alexandrine exhibits more of the readings and interpolations of the Hexaplarian text. Both have not been always kept distinct. The Vatican text is far purer than the Alexandrine. It is free from the asterisks, obeli, and other marks used by Origen, as well as from the transpositions he made. Besides, the Alexandrine has been very frequently conformed to the Masoretic text, which must be considered as a corruption.

All printed editions of the Septuagint may be reduced to four; viz., the Aldine, the Complutensian, the Roman, and the Grabian.

The Aldine or Venetian appeared at Venice in 1518, fol. The editor has not specified the MSS. from which the text was taken. He merely affirms that he collated many very ancient copies, and was favoured with the advice of some learned men. According to Walton, the text of this edition is purer than the Complutensian, and resembles most the Roman text. It has been interpolated, however, in various instances, out of Theodotion, Aquila, and the N. T.

The Complutensian was printed 1514-1517, but not published till 1522, as a column of the Complutensian Polyglott. It has been suspected that the text was altered by the editors to bring it into agreement with the Hebrew. So Ussher, Walton, Hody, and Frankel suppose. But the conjecture is unfounded. The text was taken from Greek MSS. containing Origen's improved Hexaplaric text, as Simon believed.

The Roman edition appeared under the auspices of Sixtus the Fifth, in 1587, fol., superintended by Cardinal Carafa and others. The text follows the celebrated codex Vaticanus. Yet the editors made alterations in the orthography, and in particulars which they looked upon as the mistakes of copyists. Other MSS. were necessarily used; since almost the entire book of Genesis is wanting in cod. B., besides from Psalm cv. 27 to cxxvii. 6, and other parts.

The Grabian edition appeared at Oxford, in 1707 and following years, 4 vols. fol., and 8 vols. 8vo, being prepared for the press by Dr. Grabe, a learned Prussian, and published in part by himself. This edition exhibits the text of the Codex Alexandrinus, but not perfectly; since Grabe altered and improved many places.

The latest and most splendid critical edition is that begun in 1798 by Dr. Holmes, and finished by Parsons, Oxford, 1798-1827, five vols. folio, with a large critical apparatus. The continuator appears to have become weary of his task; for he has only selected the readings most important in his own judgment. The text is that of the Roman edition, not a critically revised one. The work is merely a storehouse of materials for such an edition. The Roman edition is still the best; though no one edition should be followed absolutely (see Credner's Beiträge, vol. ii. pp. 74-98).

In 1857 Cardinal Mai published the O. and N. T. from the Vatican MS. The Old is in 4 vols. 4to. Unfortunately this edition offers no security for its being an exact and faithful representation of the MS. The gaps are supplied from other MSS., and so careless was the Cardinal, that many leaves had to be reprinted before publication. Doubtless many errors still remain. A very convenient manual edition is that of Tischendorf, 2 vols. 8vo, 3d edition, 1860, with a good selection of various readings taken in part from MSS. which he published for the first time. The text is that of the Vatican MS.

The proper Alexandrine version of Daniel was first published from a MS. in the library of Cardinal Chigi, at Rome, 1772, fol. After being reprinted at Göttingen (by Michaelis), and at Leyden

[by Segaar], it was critically edited by Hahn (1845); and by Tischendorf in his edition of the Seventy. In 1859 Tischendorf found a MS. in the convent of St. Catherine at Mount Sinai, which he rightly supposes to belong to the 4th century, and to be more valuable internally than any other existing one. Besides the New Testament entire, it has the Old imperfectly. If the Codex Fridericus-Augustanus, previously discovered by the same scholar, be part of the Sinaitic one, as seems to be the case, a good portion of the O. T. is thus preserved. The text of the MS., after having been described (see Notitia editionis codicis Bibliorum Sinaitici, etc., by Prof. Tischendorf, Lipsiæ, 1860, fol.), has since been published in fac-simile at St. Petersburg, at the expense of the Emperor of Russia (4 vols. folio, 1862).

The best Lexicon to the Septuagint is that of Schleusner, published at Leipzig, in 1820, 1821, in five parts, and reprinted at Glasgow, 3 vols. 8vo., 1822. The best Concordance is that of Trommius, published at Amsterdam, 2 vols. fol., 1718.

A number of versions have been founded on the Seventy. 1. The old Latin or Vetus Italica; 2. The Coptic and Sahidic; 3. The Ethiopic; 4. The Armenian; 5. The Georgian; 6. Various Syriac versions; 7. Some Arabic versions; 8. The Slavonic; 9. The Gothic.

Great value unquestionably belongs to this version. In the criticism and interpretation of the O. T., it holds a conspicuous place. Yet most of the translators were incompetent. They often mistook the sense of the original; and indulged in many liberties with regard to the text. They inserted glosses, and paraphrased with unmeaning latitude. Their errors are neither few nor small. It must be recollected, however, that the text is in a state of irremediable disorder. The labours of Origen, however laudable the motive that prompted them, introduced great confusion. On the whole, the translation is free rather than literal. Figures, metaphors, and anthropomorphic expressions are frequently resolved. Still the document is important, both in the criticism and exposition of the O. T. It is difficult to say whether Palestinian exegesis had an influence upon Alexandrian hermeneutics; or that the position is proved by the character of the Septuagint. Frankel has endeavoured to establish it, with great learning and ingenuity. But Herzfeld objects; and he is a man who usually can give a good reason for his statements (Geschichte des Volkes Israel, vol. iii. p. 548, et seq.).

(For a more copious account of the Septuagint, the reader is referred to Davidson's Treatise on Biblical Criticism; and Text of the O. T. Considered, etc., 2d edition (1859). On the Pentateuch part, the best work is that of Thiersch, De Pentateuchi Versione Alexandrina, libri tres, Erlangæ, 1841, 8vo, in which the character of the diction employed by the translator is minutely and admirably investigated. See also Toepfer, De Pentateuchi interpretationis Alexandrinæ indole critica et hermeneutica, Hal. Sax. 1830, 8vo; Plüschke, Lectiones Alexandrinæ et Hebraicae, etc., Bonn, 1837, 8vo. This writer would correct the present Hebrew text by the Seventy in many cases; which is preposterous. Vorstudien zu der Septuaginta, von Dr. Z. Frankel; Leipzig, 1841, 8vo, is the most important work on the Septuagint that has appeared for many years. It was followed by Über den Einfluss der Palæstinischen Exegese

II. AQUILA. Aquila was a Jew of Pontus, who lived in the reign of Adrian, and undertook a Greek version of the O. T. about A.D. 160. It appears from Jerome (in Ezek. iii.) that there were two editions of this version, the second more literal than the first. It was very highly prized by the Jews, and much preferred to the Septuagint, because the latter was employed as an authorized and genuine document by the early Christians in their disputations with the Hebrew opponents of the new religion. The very circumstance of its being adopted and valued by the Jews would tend to create a prejudice against it among the Fathers, independently of all perversion of Messianic passages. Irenæus, the earliest writer who mentions Aquila, pronounces an unfavourable opinion respecting his translation (Advers. Hæres. iii. 24, p. 253, ed. Grabe). So also Eusebius (Ad Psalm xc. 4) and Philastrius. Jerome speaks of him in various parts of his writings, sometimes disparagingly, and again in terms of commendation: the former, in allusion to his doctrinal prepossessions; the latter, in reference to his knowledge of the Hebrew language and exceeding carefulness in rendering one word by another. He was early accused of distorting several passages relating to the Messiah; and Kennicott, in modern times, has re-echoed the censure. There is some ground for the charge, but certainly not so much as Kennicott imagines. A polemic tendency may be detected in the work, yet not to a greater degree than in most translations. [AQUILA.]

The version before us is extremely, and even unintelligibly, literal. It adheres most rigidly to the original. So highly did the Jews esteem it that they called it the Hebrew verity. Its use in criticism is considerable, but in interpretation it is comparatively worthless.

III. SYMMACHUS. Symmachus appears to have been an Ebionite (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. vi. 17; Demonstr. Evang. vii. 1, Jerome, Pref. in Ezram: Assemani, Bibl. Orient. ii. 278; iii. 1, 17). His Greek version of the O. T. was made after that of Theodotion, as may be inferred from the silence of Irenæus, and the language of Jerome in his commentary on the 38th chapter of Isaiah. The style of the work is good, and the diction perspicuous, pure, and elegant (Thieme, De puritate Symmachi; Hody, De Bibl. text. Originali). It is of less benefit in criticism than that of Aquila, but of greater advantage in interpretation. It would seem from Jerome, that there was a second edition of it (Comment in Jerem. xxxii.; in Nah. iii.)

N

IV. THEODOTON. Theodoton, like Symmachus, was an Ebionite. Irenæus states (Advers. Hæres. iii. 24) that he belonged to Ephesus, and was a Jewish proselyte. His Greek version of the O. T. appeared during the former half of the 2d century, and is first mentioned by Irenæus. He follows the Septuagint very closely, so that he appears to have intended to make a revision of its text rather than a new version. He is not so scrupulously literal as Aquila, nor so free as Symmachus. He was certainly not well acquainted with Hebrew, as the numerous errors into which he has fallen demonstrate. It is probable, if credit can be given to Jerome, that there were two editions of the translation (in Jerem. xxix. 17). His translation of Daniel was very early adopted by the Christians in place of that belonging to the Septuagint. The Jews do not seem to have had much regard for this castigated edition of the Seventy; although Von Lengerke inclines to the opposite opinion.

V., VI., VII. When Origen travelled into Eastern countries collecting materials for his Polyglott, he discovered three other Greek versions not extending to the entire O. T., but only to several books. These are usually designated the fifth, sixth, seventh. The authors were unknown to Origen himself. As far as we can judge, they appear to have translated the original somewhat freely and paraphrastically. The fifth comprehended the Pentateuch, Psalms, Song of Solomon, and the twelve Minor Prophets, besides the books of Kings. Jerome says that the author was a Jew, meaning probably a Jewish Christian. The sixth version contained the same books as the fifth, except those of the Kings. The author appears to have been a Jewish Christian also. This inference has been drawn from his rendering of Habak. iii. 13. The seventh embraced the Psalms and minor prophets. Perhaps the author was a Jew. The three translations in question were made subsequently to those of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodoton. Very few fragments of them remain. (See Epiphanius, De Pond. et Mens., cap. 17; Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. vi. 16; Jerome, Comment in Tit. cap. 3; Apolog. contra Rufin. ii. 34; Hody, p. 590, et seq.)

VIII. GRÆCO-VENETA. In a MS. belonging to St. Mark's Library at Venice, there is a Greek version of several O. T. books. Its internal character proves that the translation was made directly from the Hebrew. It is more literal than any other ancient version, even that of Aquila, adhering with slavish scrupulosity to the original words. In the Chaldee portions of Daniel, the Attic dialect is changed for the Doric. The style, however, is a singular compound. Attic elegancies occur along with barbarous expressions; high-sounding words used by the best Greek writers, by the side of others contrary to the genius of the Greek language. The origin of the version cannot be placed higher than the 9th century; the MS. itself was written in the 14th. It is uncertain whether the author was a Jew or a Christian. Michaelis supposes that he was a Jew. With Bertholdt, we believe that he was a Christian. It is probable that it was made at Byzantium for private use. The text seldom differs from the Masoretic; and the translator consulted the Septuagint and other Greek versions, besides adhering, as he generally does, to the current exegetical tradition of the Jews. Criticism can never derive much use from this version. Extracts from it are given in Holmes's edition of the Septuagint. The Pentateuch was published by Ammon, in three volumes, at Erlangen, in the years 1790-91. Different parts of the Pentateuch had been previously published, along with Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Ruth, Lamentations, Daniel, and Canticles, by Villosion, at Strasburg, 1784. (See Eichhorn's Allgem. Biblioth. iii. p. 371, et seq.; v. p. 743, et seq.; vii. p. 193, et seq.; Dahler, Ani-madversiones in versionem Græcam Proverb., Argentor. 1786; the Introductions of Eichhorn, Bertholdt, De Wette, and Hävernick; and Davidson's *Treatise on Bib. GREEN, WILLIAM, rector of Hardingham, Norfolk, and fellow of Clare Hall, Cambridge. He took the degree of B.A. in 1737, and of M.A. in 1741. He died in 1794. As a writer he devoted himself chiefly to the translation of the poetical books of the O. T., and published successively the following works—1. The Song of Deborah reduced to metre, with a translation and commentary, 1753, 4to. 2. A translation of the Prayer of Habakkuk, the Prayer of Moses, and the 139th Psalm, with a commentary, 1755, 4to. 3. A new Translation of the Psalms from the Hebrew original, with notes, critical and explanatory, to which is added a dissertation on the last prophetic words of Noah, 1762, 8vo. 4. A new translation of Isaiah vii. 13 to the end of liii., from the original Hebrew, with notes critical and explanatory, 1776, 4to. 5. Poetical parts of the O. T., newly translated from the Hebrew, with notes critical and explanatory, 1781, 4to.—S. N.

GREENFIELD, WILLIAM, was born in London 1st April 1799. He received the elements of his education in Scotland, to which his family originally belonged, but in his thirteenth year he became apprentice to a London bookseller. Whilst but a child his talent and desire for learning languages shewed itself, and whilst engaged in his duties as a bookseller's apprentice he found means to gratify this tendency. Beginning with Hebrew, which he thoroughly mastered, he proceeded to the other Semitic dialects, from them to Greek and Latin, and then to French and other modern western tongues. These acquirements were all made whilst he was labouring in his master's service from six in the morning till six, and sometimes eight, in the evening, with the interval of meal hours. In 1822 he submitted to an eminent publisher, Mr. Bagster, the prospectus of a Polyglott grammar, of nearly thirty languages, on the principles of comparative grammar. This led to his being employed to edit the Comprehensive Bible issued by that firm in 1826. In 1828-9 he was engaged in carrying through the press an edition of the Syriac New Testament for their Polyglott series, and in 1830 he prepared his revised translation of the N. T. into Hebrew. He now became regularly engaged in connection with Messrs. Bagster's Biblical publications; and, besides editing several works for them, he prepared a lexicon of the Greek N. T., followed by an abridgment of Schmidt's Greek Concordance. In 1830 he was appointed editor of foreign versions to the British and Foreign Bible Society, an appointment which exposed him to much obloquy on the part of some who sought to find occasion against the Society by attacking the notes in the Comprehensive Bible as heretical and reologist. He defended himself by collecting and publishing in a consecutive form the notes and prefaces of the book, leaving them to speak for themselves; which they did to the full satisfaction of all competent judges. To the Bible Society his services were invaluable; but the excessive labour which these services and his devotion to literature imposed upon him overmastered his strength, and he sank into a premature grave on the 5th Nov. 1831. He was a member of the Royal Asiatic Society, having been elected to this honour in compliment to his extensive Oriental acquirements.—W. L. A.

GREENHILL, WILLIAM, M.A., was born in 1581, and died 27th Sept. 1671. He was educated at Oxford, and during the Commonwealth held the vicarage of Stepney, though at the same time pastor of a Congregational Church which he had collected at Stepney Meeting House. He was a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, where he was one of 'the Dissenting brethren.' After the execution of Charles I. he was appointed chaplain to the royal children, an office for which some earlier relations with the royal family, and his own polished manners, rendered him especially eligible. In 1654 he was appointed one of Cromwell's 'Triers.' At the Restoration he was ejected from his vicarage, and from this time till his death lived in private, officiating as opportunity offered to his special flock at the meeting house. His Exposition on the 28 first chapters of Ezekiel, which is his principal work, was delivered in lectures to his congregation, and appeared in five volumes 4to, published at different times. The first volume was issued in 1645, and is dedicated, in courtly terms, to the Princess Elizabeth, with whom Greenhill seems to have been well acquainted; the fifth appeared in 1662. A new edition, in one vol. imperial 8vo, was issued by Mr. Sherman in 1846. This commentary is much prized by the lovers of Puritan theology and exposition. He published also several sermons and works on practical divinity.—W. L. A.

GREGORY, surnamed 'the Great,' one of the Popes of Rome, and the first of that name, and a saint in the Romish Calendar, was born at Rome about 540, was made Pope in 590, and died in 604. He was descended from one of the highest patrician families of the city. He filled the office of prefect of the city for a time. On his father's death he gave this up and devoted the large property which descended to him to the establishment of several monasteries. Into one of these, at Rome, he retired, and was ordained deacon. He was employed on important services by the Pope Pelagius II.; on whose death he was elected, against his wishes, to succeed him.

Gregory's theological works are not of great importance to the interpretation of Scripture. They consist of (1) A Commentary on Job, in which we find the distinction between the historical or literal, the allegorical, and the moral or spiritual interpretation; (2) Homilies on the Prophecy of Ezekiel, delivered to the people during the war with the Lombards; (3) Homilies on the Evangelists; (4) De curâ Sacerdotali, a work on the duties of bishops; (5) Dialogues. Besides these we have a valuable collection of his letters during fourteen years. He was the author, moreover, of great alterations in the ceremonies of the Roman Catholic Church, and more especially of improvements in the music. The Gregorian chant derives its name from him.

The best edition of his works is that published at Paris, 1705, in 4 vols. fol., by the Benedictines of Saint Maur.—H. W.

GREGORY, JOHN, an English theologian, was born in Buckinghamshire, November 10, 1607. At the age of sixteen he went to Oxford with Sir William Drake, where he studied with great diligence. About 1631 he entered into orders in the Church. In 1638 he was appointed domestic chaplain to the bishop of Chichester, his patron; and was subsequently made a prebend. From his being a loyalist he was deprived of his benefices, and reduced to great straits. He died of gout in an obscure ale-house near Oxford, March 13, 1646. Gregory was an excellent scholar, and was highly esteemed by some of the most learned and distinguished men of the age, belonging to all sects. He is the author of Notes and Observations on some Passages of Scripture, 1646, 4to. These notes were reprinted four times, translated into Latin, and inserted in the Critici Sacri. His posthumous works, edited by Gurgany, appeared in 1 vol. 4to, 1650. Among them is 'a discourse' upon the Septuagint, and 'a disproof' of the second 'Cainan' in Luke iii. 36, 37.—S. D.

GREGORY, JOHN, born at Wotton near Woodstock, and educated at Cambridge, where he became a Fellow of Trinity College, was subsequently master of Gloucester school and Archdeacon of the diocese of Gloucester. At his death he left behind him a collection of scholia on the Greek N. T., gathered from the writings of the Greek fathers. These were published by his son along with the text from Fell's edition in one vol. folio, Oxford 1793. This is a splendid book, with head and tail pieces from the burin of Vandergucht and Gribelin. It is also a very useful book, containing in narrow compass the cream of what the Greek fathers have offered for the elucidation of the N. T. The editor was assisted in preparing it for and carrying it through the press by Dean Aldrich and J. E. Grabe. We regret that we have not been able to recover the dates of Gregory's life. All that we know for certain is that when he was ready to go to the University of Oxford he was prevented by the circumstance of that city being besieged by the Parliamentary forces, and that it was at the Restoration he settled at Gloucester. He was probably born about 1630, and died about 1700.—W. L. A.

GREGORY OF NYSSA was born at Cæsarea of Cappadocia in the year 331 or 332. He was ordained by his brother Basil the Great, and became Bishop of Nyssa about the year 372. He took a leading part in the controversy with the Arian party, to whose views he was very determinately opposed. The date of his death is uncertain, but probably it took place before the close of the century. His works consist of treatises on controversial and practical theology, homilies, orations, and epistles. His principal work of an exegetical kind is his Hexæmeron sive de opera sex dierum, intended as a supplement to the work of his brother Basil on the same subject. He wrote, also, eight homilies on Ecclesiastes, an exposition of the Song of Songs, homilies on the Lord's Prayer, and on some of the Psalms. As an expositor he follows the proper rather than the allegorical method of interpretation; though his desire to find the deeper sense of Scripture not unfrequently betrays him into undue spiritualizing of the text. The best edition of his works is that published at Paris in 1638, 3 vols. folio.—W. L. A.

GREYHOUND. [ZARZIR; KELEB.]

GRIESBACH, JOHANN JAKOB, was born 4th Jan. 1745, at Butzbach, a small town of Hesse Darmstadt, where his father was pastor. Having received his school education at Frankfurt on the Maine, he studied theology at the universities of Tübingen, Halle, and Leipsic. Whilst at Halle he came under the influence of Semler, whose methods, opinions, and pursuits, gave a powerful bias to the mind of the young student. Having finished his academical career at Leipsic, he returned to Halle, but before settling himself there, he, in 1769, commenced a literary tour for the purpose especially of examining the MSS. of the N. T. in the principal libraries of Germany, Holland, England, and France. He returned to Halle in 1770 laden with materials, and set himself to make use of them for the emendation of the text of the N. T. In 1773 he was appointed extraordinary professor of theology at Halle; and two years after he became ordinary professor of theology at Jena. Here the rest of his useful and laborious life was spent; and here he died on the 24th of March 1812.

Griesbach's name and fame stand connected with the textual criticism of the N. T. On this principally he spent his time and his strength. In 1771, soon after his return from his extended tour, he submitted to the University of Halle a dissertation, De codicibus quatuor Evangelistarum Origenianis. In 1774 he issued the first volume of his N. T. containing the historical books, with the first three gospels arranged synoptically; in 1775 appeared the second volume, containing the epistles and the Apocalypse; and along with this a new edition of vol. i., but without the synoptic arrangement of the first gospels. Between 1777 and 1794 he published a series of critical works on the text of the N. T., and having thus prepared the way for his great work, he sent forth, in 1796, the first volume of a completely remodelled and carefully prepared edition of the N. T., with copious apparatus and valuable prolegomena; followed, in 1806, by vol. ii. This edition was published both at Halle and London. A sumptuous edition in 4 vols. 4to, or small folio, with copperplate illustrations, was issued in 1805-1807. Manual editions, containing the principal various readings, but without the authorities, appeared in 1805 and in 1825. A third edition of the larger work was commenced by Dr. D. Schulz, of which only the first volume appeared, Berol. 1827.

Griesbach's labours on the text of the N. T. commenced an era in Biblical criticism. Not only were his collections of various readings more extensive and more carefully sifted than those of any who had preceded him; not only did he carry out more thoroughly than any of his predecessors the principle of determining the value of a reading by its antiquity and its source; but he contributed more than any of them to place textual criticism on a scientific basis, and to furnish rules for the guidance of the critic in his work. His system of recensions may be unsound, and he may have been hampered or misled by it in some of his decisions; but there can be no doubt as to the important bearing both of the facts he has collected and the theories he has offered to account for them, on the subsequent progress of Biblical criticism. Ever where he had little to guide him but his own judgment, more recent investigations have generally shewn that his conclusions were correct. He was the first, also, who ventured to print the text as the principles of his criticism determined, instead of retaining the Textus Receptus and treating the readings of the codices simply as departures from that. Griesbach's Opuscula, which consist chiefly of academic programmes and addresses, and are not of much value, were collected and published by Gabler in 2 vols, Jena 1824.—W. L. A.

His works are:—Der Prophet Jonas übers. und mit anmerk. herausgegeben, 1789; Nahum übers. mit anmerk. 1790; Exeget. Aufsätze zur aufklärung schwierige stellen d. Schrift, 1793; *Chald. GRINDING. [MILL.]

GROTIUS (HUGO DE GROOT). This great man, prominent among the leading writers of the 17th century as a jurist, a scholar, a statesman, and a theologian, was born at Delft, in Holland, April 10, 1583. He was so precocious, that before he arrived at the age of sixteen he had published an edition of Marcianus Capella. In 1598 he accompanied the famous Barneveldt on his embassy to the court of Henri IV., and won the esteem of that monarch. At the age of twenty-four he was made advocate-general, and in 1613 settled at Rotterdam. After the synod of Dort having warmly espoused the views of the Arminians, he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment in the castle of Louvestein (June 6, 1619), where for a year and a half he suffered great hardships, till his wife enabled him to effect his escape in a book-chest. He retired to France, where he was well received, and had a pension assigned to him by Louis XIII. After spending eleven studious years in France, during which he still suffered persecutions from his unrelenting enemies the Calvinists, he returned to Holland, from which he was once more driven by the violence of his theological opponents. In 1634 Christina, Queen of Sweden, appointed him her ambassador to the French court, where he again resided for ten years. Being permitted to resign this appointment, he intended to return from Stockholm to his native country, but was shipwrecked, during his voyage, on the coast of Pomerania. He continued his journey by land, but died of fatigue and exposure at Rostock, Aug. 28, 1645, and was buried at Delft. It is certain that he died in the faith of Christ, although the same furious malice which had embittered his life strove to blacken his deathbed by the assertion that he had died a Socinian. He was frequently accused both of popery and Socinianism, but it is probable, both from his own writings, and from the facts adduced by J. Clericus at the end of his edition of the De Veritate, that the Anglican church, the liturgy of which he specially admired, received a larger share of his approval than any other.

As a theologian Grotius stands very high, and as a commentator on the Bible deserves the first rank among his contemporaries, although sectarian animosity caused his merits to be for a long time depreciated, and almost ignored. He was particularly successful in illustrating the meaning of various passages from the classical parallels supplied by his immense learning. Simple explanation is always his main object, and he makes it chiefly depend on history and philology, in which method he was followed by Ernesti. He was one of the first to reject altogether the irregularities and mysticisms of Patristic and mediæval exegesis; and (in strong contrast to his fellow-countryman Cocceius) he always proceeds on the maxim that the inspired writers wrote with the intention of being understood. His clear judgment and strong good sense led him, on this ground, to acquiesce for the most part in the primary and obvious meaning, which he learnedly elucidates by the ordinary canons of criticism. As long as keen acumen, moderation, liberality, and learning are valued, so long will the commentaries of Grotius be read with a respectful appreciation, as having been among the first to recall the science of Biblical hermeneutics into the domain of erudition and common sense, and rescue it from the hands of superstitious, arbitrary, and fanciful allegorists.

His chief theological works are the De Veritate relig. Christianæ, 1627, which has been reproduced in a vast number of editions and translations; the Defensio fidei catholica de satisfactione Christi, Leyden, 1617; and especially the Annotationes ad Vetus et Novum Testamentum, first published, in various parts, at Paris, between the years 1641 and 1650, and afterwards republished by Vogel and Doederlein. There is an edition of them by Moody, 2 vols. 4to, Lond. 1727. The entire theological works of Grotius were published under the title Opera Theologica, Amsterdam, 1679, and Bâle, 1731 (See Bayle, Dict. vii. 270, seqq.; Herzog, Encycl. s. v.; Hallam, Lit. of Europe, ii. 356, etc.; Horne's Intrad. ii. 228; Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctrines, Engl. Tr., ii. passim; Butler, Life of Grotius, Lond. 1827, etc.)—F. W. F.

GROVES. [HIGH PLACES.]

GUARD. 1. מִשְׁמָרָה [EXECUTIONER]. 2. רִצֵּי [FOOTMAN]. 3. מִשְׁמָרָה, מִשְׁמָר, words which primarily denote the place where a watch or guard is posted (Is. xxi. 8; Hab. ii. 1; 2 Chron. vii. 6), and came afterwards to designate the persons so employed (Neh. iv. 3, 16 [A. V. 22]; vii. 3) [CAPTAIN].—†.

GUEST. [HOSPITALITY.]

GULLOTH (גֻּלּוֹת; LXX. Vat. Γουλαθ; Alex. Γουλαθ; Onom. Γουλαθματ=ים גֻּלּוֹת) occurs only in Josh. xv. 19 and Judg. i. 15, where it refers to the springs granted by Caleb to his daughter Achsah. These springs are described as 'upper' and 'lower.' The same epithets are applied to Bethnuron, Josh. xvi. 3, 5, where they clearly designate the relative positions of the two places. It is therefore most probable that the springs in question were situated some on higher and some on lower ground. Their exact site has not been determined.—S. N. [Stanley (Jewish Church, v.

263) finds Gulloth in a stream flowing through a beautiful green valley about one hour south-west of Hebron. The spots are now called Ain-Nun-kar and Dewir-Ban.]

GUNI (גֻּנִי; Sept. Γωνι, Alex. Γωνι, Gen. xlv. 24; 1 Chron. vii. 13; Γωνι, Num. xxvi. 48). 1. A son of Naphthali, and head of the house of the Gunites (גֻּנִי; Sept. δῆμος ὁ Γωνι). 2. A descendant of Gad and father of Abdiel (1 Chron. v. 15). The words that follow, 'chief of the house of their fathers,' refer to Ahi and not to Abdiel.—†

GUR (גֻּר; Sept. Γατ). The name of an ascent (מַעְלֵה) where Ahaziah king of Judah was slain (2 Kings ix. 27). This ascent was at or near Ibleam, a town of Western Manasseh. Neither place has been identified, but the steep pass of Gur must have been near Megiddo, and formed, probably, one of the ascents from the plain of Esdraelon to the higher grounds. Eusebius and Jerome mention a Γατ, which they simply describe as φάραγξ, vallis sine præruptum.—†

GUR-BAAL (גֻּר-בַּעַל; Sept. τῆς πέτρας), the site of certain Arabians against whom God helped Uzziah (2 Chron. xxvi. 7). The rendering of the LXX. probably arose from their thinking of the chief city of the Edomites, Sela or Petra; but, though Uzziah's conquests may have lain in this direction, we have no means of proving this. The Targum makes it the well-known Gerar. This is probably correct, as the inhabitants of Gur-Baal are mentioned along with the גֻּר-בַּעַל, who dwelt by Gerar (1 Chron. iv. 41; comp. Ewald, Gesch. V. Israel, vol. i. p. 322) [MAONITES]

GUTBIR, GILES, born at Wirstensee in Thuringia, 1617, studied at Rostock, Königsberg, and Leyden, and after visiting Oxford and Lübeck, became, in 1652, professor of Oriental languages at Hamburg. In 1660 the University of Giessen made him doctor in theology, after which he taught logic and philosophy as well as Eastern tongues. He is chiefly noted for his Syriac works. He printed himself, in a press of his own, the Peshito N. T., with the vowels, Ham. 1664, also a Syriac Lexicon, containing all the words and particles of N. T. Nota Critica in N. T. Syriacum; Novum Musa Orientale; De Angelis; De Controversia rebaptisationis; De Sibyllis et earum oraculis. Died 1667.—S. L.

GUYSE, JOHN, D.D., was born at Hertford in 1680. For many years he was pastor of the Independent Church in his native town. In 1727 he removed to London, and was the first pastor of the church in New Broad Street. Here he continued until his death, Nov. 22, 1761. His chief work was a paraphrastic exposition of the N. T., the first volume of which was entitled A practical exposition of the four Evangelists, in the form of a paraphrase, with occasional notes in their proper places for further explication, and serious recollections at the close of every chapter, Lond. 1739, 4to. The second volume was published with a similar title in 1747, and included the Acts, and the Epistles to the Romans and Corinthians. The third volume, issued in 1752, included the remaining books of the N. T. The work is inferior to Doddridge's both for expository and for devotional purposes. A complete list of Guyse's other works may be found in Wilson's Dissenting Churches, ii. 240.—S. N.

GYMNASIUM (γυμνάσιον, Syr. ܓܝܡܢܝܐܝܐ), a large unroofed building for the purpose of exercise, consisting usually of different compartments, or a set of separate buildings conjoined, each of which was set apart to some special sport, as the Sphæristērion for playing at ball, the Palestra for wrestling and the exercises of the pancratium, etc. (Smith, Dict. of Antiquities, s. v.) This was almost exclusively a Greek institution, and there was hardly a Greek town of any size that had not its gymnasium. To the Jews it was unknown until the Hellenising party introduced it in the age of the Maccabees (1 Maccab. i. 14). Jason, the Hellenising high-priest, caused one to be erected at Jerusalem (2 Maccab. iv. 12, ff.) This innovation was viewed with much displeasure by the strict party among the Jews. Whether Herod the Great, when he introduced the theatre and the amphitheatre, restored the gymnasium does not appear, but the probability is that he did (Joseph. Antiq. 15. 8. 1; comp. Bell. Jud. i. 21. 11). [GAMES].—W. L. A.

HABAKKUK (חֲבַקּוּךְ; Ἀμβακούμ), a distinguished Jewish prophet who flourished about 610 B.C., the name descending, in the form of חֲבַקּוּךְ, from חֲבַק, amplēcti, and denoting, as observed by Jerome, as well a 'favourite' as a 'struggler.' Abarbanel thinks that in the latter sense it has allusion to the patriotic zeal of the prophet fervently contending for the welfare of his country: but other prophets did the same; and in the former and less distant signification, the name would be one like Theophilus, 'a friend of God,' which his parents may have given him for a good omen. The Greeks, not only the Septuagint translators but the fathers of the Church, probably to make it more sonorous, corrupt it into Ἀραβακούμ, Ἀραβακούρω, or as Jerome writes, Ἀβακούρω, and only one Greek copy, found in the library of Alcalá in Spain, has Ἀββακούμ, which seems to be a recent correction made to suit the Hebrew text. Of this prophet's birth-place, parentage, and life, we have only apocryphal and conflicting accounts. The Pseudo-Epiphanius (De Vitis Prophet., Opp. tom. ii. 18, p. 247) states that he was of the tribe of Simeon, and born in a place called Βηδόκηρ (al. Βηδέγδαρ); that he fled to Ostrarine when Nebuchadnezzar attacked Jerusalem, but afterwards returned home, and died two years before the return of his countrymen. But rabbinical writers assert that he was of the tribe of Levi, and name different birth-places (Huetius, Dem. Evang., Prop. iv. p. 508). In the apocryphal appendix to Daniel, in the story of Bel and the Dragon, we are told that an angel seized Habakkuk by the hair, when he was in Judæa carrying food to his reapers in the field, and transported him through the air to the lions' den in Babylon, where Daniel then lay; and that, after having provided the latter with victuals, he was the same day carried back to his own country in like manner. Eusebius notices that in his time the tomb of Habakkuk was shewn in the town of Ceila, in Palestine; and this is repeated also by Nicephorus (Hist. Eccles. xii. 48), and Sozomen (vii. 29); still there are other writers who name different places where, according to common opinion, he had been buried (Carpzov, Introd. ad libros canonicos V. T., p. 402).

A full and trustworthy account of the life of Habakkuk would explain his imagery, and many of the events to which he alludes; but since we have no information on which we can depend, nothing remains but to determine from the book itself its historical basis and its age. Now, we find that in chap. i. the prophet sets forth a vision, in which he discerned the injustice, violence, and oppression committed in his country by the rapacious and terrible Chaldeans, whose oppressions he announces as a divine retribution for sins committed; consequently he wrote in the Chaldean period, shortly before the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar which rendered Jehoiakim tributary to the king of Babylon (2 Kings xxiv. 1). When he wrote the first chapter of his prophecies, the Chaldeans could not yet have invaded Palestine, otherwise he would not have introduced Jehovah saying (i. 5), 'I will work a work in your days, which ye will not believe, though it be told you;' (ver. 6) 'for I raise up the Chaldeans, that bitter and hasty nation, which shall march through the breadth of the land to possess the dwelling-places that are not theirs.' From ver. 12 it is also evident that the ruin of the Jews had not then been effected; it says, 'the Lord ordained them for judgment, established them for correction.' Agreeably to the general style of the prophets, who to lamentations and announcements of divine punishment add consolations and cheering hopes for the future, Habakkuk then proceeds in the second chapter to foretell the future humiliation of the conquerors, who plundered so many nations. He also there promulgates a vision of events shortly to be expected; (ver. 3) 'the vision is yet for an appointed time, but at the end it shall speak, and not lie; though it tarry, wait for it, because it will surely come; it will not tarry.' This is succeeded in the third chapter by an ode, in which the prophet celebrates the deliverances wrought by the Almighty for his people in times past, and prays for a similar interference now to mitigate the coming distresses of the nation; which he goes on to describe, representing the land as already waste and desolate, and yet giving encouragement to hope for a return of better times. Some interpreters are of opinion that ch. ii. was written in the reign of Jehoiachin, the son of Jehoiakim (2 Kings xxiv. 6), after Jerusalem had been besieged and conquered by Nebuchadnezzar, the king made a prisoner, and, with many thousands of his subjects, carried away to Babylon; none remaining in Jerusalem save the poorest class of the people (2 Kings xxiv. 14). But of all this nothing is said in the book of Habakkuk, nor even so much as hinted at; and what is stated of the violence and injustice of the Chaldeans does not imply that the Jews had already experienced it. The prophet distinctly mentions that he sets forth what he had discerned in a vision, and he, therefore, speaks of events to be expected and coming. It is also a supposition equally gratuitous, according to which some interpreters refer ch. iii. to the period of the last siege of Jerusalem, when Zedekiah was taken, his sons slain, his eyes put out, the walls of the city broken down, and the temple burnt (2 Kings xxv. 1-10). There is not the slightest allusion to any of these incidents in the third chapter of Habakkuk; and from the 16th verse it appears that the destroyer is only coming, and that the prophet expresses fears, not of the entire destruction of the city, much less of the downfall of the state, but only of the desolation of the country. It thus appears beyond dispute, that Habakkuk prophesied in the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim, about the year stated above. Carpzov (Introductio ad libr. canon. V. T., pp. 79, 410) and Jahn (Introd. in libros sacros V. T., ii. sec. 120) refer our prophet to the reign of Manasseh, thus placing him thirty odd years earlier; but at that time the Chaldeans had not as yet given just ground for apprehension, and it would have been injudicious in Habakkuk prematurely to fill the minds of the people with fear of them. Some additional support to our statement of the age of this book is derived from the tradition, reported in the apocryphal appendix to Daniel and by the Pseudo-Epiphanius, that Habakkuk lived to see the Babylonian exile; for if he prophesied under Manasseh he could not have reached the exile at an age under 90 years; but if he prophesied early in the reign of Jehoiakim he would have been only 50 odd years old at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem and of the exile. He was, then, a contemporary of Jeremiah, but much younger, as the latter made his first appearance in public as early as B.C. 629, in the thirteenth year of Josiah. Ranitz (Introductio in Hab. Vatic., pp. 24, 59), Stirkel (Prolog. ad interpr. tertii cap. Hab., pp. 22, 27), and De Wette (Einleit. Berlin, 1840, p. 338) justly place the age of Habakkuk before the invasion of Judæa by the Chaldeans.

The style of this prophet has been always much admired. Lowth (De Poesi Hebræor. p. 287) says: 'Poeticus est Habaccuci stylus; sed maxime in oda, quæ inter absolutissimas in eo genere merito numerari potest.' Eichhorn, De Wette, and Rosenmüller are loud in their praise of Habakkuk's style; the first giving a detailed and animated analysis of the construction of his prophecies (Einleitung in das A. T., iii. p. 333). He equals the most eminent prophets of the O. T.—Joel, Amos, Nahum, Isaiah; and the ode in ch. iii. may be placed in competition with Ps. xviii. and lxviii. for originality and sublimity. His figures are all great, happily chosen, and properly drawn out. His denunciations are terrible, his derision bitter, his consolation cheering. Instances occur of borrowed ideas (ch. iii. 19, comp. Ps. xviii. 33; ch. ii. 6, comp. Is. xiv. 4; ch. ii. 14, comp. Is. xi. 9); but he makes them his own in drawing them out in his peculiar manner. With all the boldness and fervour of his imagination, his language is pure and his verse melodious. Eichhorn, indeed, gives a considerable number of words which he considers to be peculiar to this prophet, and supposes him to have formed new words, or altered existing ones, to sound more energetic or soft, as the sentiments to be expressed might require; but his list needs sifting, as De Wette observes (Einleitung, p. 339); indeed בִּקְלָל, ch. ii. 16, is the only unexceptionable instance. The ancient catalogues of canonical books of the O. T. do not mention Habakkuk by name; but they must have counted him in the twelve minor prophets, whose number would otherwise not be full. In the N. T. some expressions of his are introduced, but his name is not added (Rom. i. 17; Gal. xiii. 11; Heb. x. 38, comp. Hab. ii. 4; Acts xiii. 40, 41, comp. Hab. i. 5).

HABAZZELETH. [CHABAZZELETH.]

HABERGEON (חֶבְרֹן, חֶבְרֹן) [ARMS; ARMOUR.]

HABOR (חָבֹר; Sept. Ἀβὺρ, and Χαβὺρ). A river, and apparently also a district, of Assyria, to which considerable interest is attached in connection with the first captivity. We read in 1 Chron. v. 26, that Tilgath-pilneser carried away 'the Reubenites, and the Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, and brought them unto Halah, and Habor, and Hara, and to the river Gozan.' About seventeen years later Shalmaneser, the successor of the former monarch, 'took Samaria, and carried Israel away into Assyria, and placed them in Halah, and in Habor, the river of Gozan' (A. V., 'by the river Gozan,' 2 Kings xvii. 6; xviii. 11). There are two rivers still bearing this name, and geographers are not agreed as to which is here referred to.

A river called Khabûr (Arab. خابور = Heb. חָבֹר) rises in the central highlands of Kurdistan, flows in a south-westerly direction, and falls into the Tigris about seventy miles above Mosul (Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, p. 56; Schultens, Index Geogr. in vitam Saladini, s. v.) Many suppose this to be the Habor of Scripture, for the following reasons: 1. It is within Assyria proper, which Ptolemy says was bounded on the west by the Tigris (vi. 1). 2. It is affirmed that the Assyrian monarch would place his captives in a central part of his kingdom, such as this is, and not in the outskirts (Keil on 2 Kings xvii. 4-6). 3. Habor is termed 'a river of Gozan' (חָבֹר נְהַר גֹּזָן), and Gozan is supposed to signify 'pasture,' and to be identical with the word Zozan, now applied by the Nestorians to the pasture-lands in the highlands of Assyria, where the Khabûr takes its rise (Grant, The Nestorian Christians, p. 124). 4. Ptolemy mentions a mountain called Chabor (χαβώρας) which divides Assyria from Media (vi. 1); and Bochart says the river Chabor has its source in that mountain (Opera, i. p. 194, 242, 362). Some have supposed that the modern Nestorians are the descendants of the captive Jews (Grant, l. c.)

The other and much more celebrated river, Khabâr, is called Aborrhâs by Strabo (Γεωγρ., xvi. p. 514), Chaboras by Ptolemy (v. 18) and Pliny (H. N. xxx. 3). 'It rises about lat. 36° 40', long. 40°, flows only a little south of east to its junction near Koukab with the Jeruger or river of Nisibis, which comes down from Mons Masius. Both of these branches are formed by the union of a number of streams. Neither of them is fordable for some distance above their junction; and below it they constitute a river of such magnitude as to be navigable for a considerable distance by steamers. The course of the Khabour below Kaukab is tortuous, but its general direction is south-south-west. The entire length of the stream is not less than 200 miles' (Rawlinson, Ancient Monarchies, i. 236; Ainsworth, Travels in the Track of the Ten Thousand, p. 79; Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, p. 304). Winer (Realwörterbuch, s. v.), Ritter (Erdkunde, x. p. 248), Gesenius (Thesaurus), Layard, Rawlinson, and others, maintain that this is the ancient Habor. There can be no doubt that Assyria proper was confined to the country lying along the banks of the Upper Tigris, and stretching eastward to Media. But its territory gradually expanded, so as to include Babylonia (Herodotus, iii. 92), Mesopotamia (Pliny, H. N., vi. 26), and even the country westward to the confines of Cilicia and Phœnicia (Strabo, xvi.) At the time of the captivity the power of Assyria was at its height. The Jewish captives were as secure on the banks of the western as of the eastern Habor. The ruins of Assyrian towns are scattered over the whole of northern Mesopotamia. 'On the banks of the lower Khabour are the remains of a royal palace, besides many other traces of the tract through which it runs having been permanently occupied by the Assyrian people. Even near Seruj, in the country between Haran and the Euphrates, some evidence has been found not only of conquest but of occupation' (Rawlinson, Ancient Monarchies, i. p. 247; Chesney, Euphrates Expedition, i. p. 114; Layard, Nin. and Bab., pp. 275, 279-300, 312). There can be no doubt that the Khabûr was in Assyria, and near the centre of the kingdom, at the time of the captivity. Further, Ptolemy mentions a province in Mesopotamia called Gauzanitis (v. 18). It lay around the Khabûr, and was doubtless identical with Gozan, hence the phrase, 'Habor the river of Gozan' (2 Kings xvii. 6). Chalcitis, which appears to be identical with Halak, mentioned in the same passage, adjoined Gauzanitis. It is a remarkable fact that down as late as the 12th century there were large Jewish communities on the banks of the Khabûr (Benjamin of Tudela, in Early Trav. in Pal., 92, 99.) This appears to be the Habor of the Bible. The district along the banks probably took its name from the river, as would seem from a comparison with 1 Chron. v. 26. Ptolemy mentions a town called Chabor (v. 18). It seems doubtful whether Habor was identical with the river Chebar (כבר), on which Ezekiel saw his visions. The latter was perhaps farther south in Babylonia (Ezek. i. 3, etc.).—J. L. F.

HACHILAH, THE HILL OF (נֶבֶת הַחִילָה), is mentioned three times in the history of David's flight from Saul, 1 Sam. xxiii. 19; xxvi. 1 and 3. The Hebrew is the same in all the passages; but the versions vary: the LXX. reads 'Ο Βουρὸς τοῦ Ἐχελᾶ in (1), and 'Ο Βουρὸς ὁ [or τὸ] Ἐχελᾶ,* as apposition nouns, in (2) and (3); the Vulgate has Collis Hachila in (1) and (2), and Gabaa Hachila in (3); the Syriac drops Hachila in (1), and reads ܒܝܬ ܓܒܐ only [i.e., in Gebaath], while in

(2) and (3) it adds to this word a second proper name, ܒܝܬ ܚܝܠܐ, Chevila, thus producing the compound designation 'Gebaath Hevila.' Fürst (Hebr. W. B. s. v.) supposes the name to mean 'hill of barrenness'; Simon (in Onomast., p. 75), and, with less precision, Gesenius (in Thes. and Lex., s. v.), connect 'Hachilah' with the obsolete root חָכַל, to be dark, and call it the darksome hill. ['Collis obscuritatis,' says Simon, 'i.e., umbrosus, adeoque absconsioni commodus.'] This is probably the correct idea, as indicating (like the Mount Zalmon of Judg. ix. 48) the woodland character of the hill of Hachilah in the days of David. One of the most remarkable points of contrast between ancient and modern Palestine arises from the entire destruction of woods which once covered its mountains (see Stanley, Sin. and Palest., p. 120), so that no conclusion can be drawn of its ancient condition from the present sterility of any place.† Our 'hill of Hachilah' is, no doubt, the 'mountain of the wilderness of Ziph' mentioned in 1 Sam. xxiii. 14; and 'the wood' of the 15th verse, which aided David's concealment, very probably covered its slopes and crest, and so gave great propriety to its name of Hachilah, or 'hill of shade.' So much indeed seems expressed in verse 19, where David's 'woody fastness' is described as 'on the hill of Hachilah. [נֶבֶת הַחִילָה]

* But Cod. Alex. reads ὁ βουρὸς τοῦ Ἀχλᾶ in 1 Sam. xxvi. 1, and ὁ βουρὸς τοῦ Ἐχελᾶ in xxvi. 3.

† Such was the beauty and productiveness of these elevated plains ['the hill country' of Judah], that the estate of Caleb, as well as the Israelitish Goshen, and (at no great distance northwards) the rich meadows on which the numerous flocks of Nabal browsed, as well as the vineyards of Engedi, all lay in different parts of the hill country. In short, lofty mountains, on which the light sandy soil was supported by terraces almost to the top, spacious plains enriched with an infinite variety of springs, small lakes and rivers, and adorned with luxuriant crops of grain and extensive woods—pastures in which grass of the loveliest verdure afforded an almost inexhaustible store of food to the grazer, and gardens, redolent with fruit and flowers of every name, composed the beautifully variegated landscapes of Judah; a few bleak spots, such as at Maon, Ziph, Zin, valleys which, in the language of the Hebrews, were called 'deserts,' but which, though inferior to the rest of the tribe, contained too good pasture to be considered barren wastes, were all that detracted from the general and extraordinary fertility of the country.—Paxton's Illustrations, Sacred Geography, p. 469.

‡ The Sept. rendering of this passage is ἐν Μορ

הַחִילָה are three locatives of co-ordinate descriptive force, indicating that 'the strongholds' were in 'a thicket-wood' and that that wood was on 'the hill of Hachilah.' The name of this hill does not survive, so far as research has yet shewn, in any modern place; it is not, however, difficult to discover its situation by help of the names mentioned in chapters xxiii. and xxv.—Ziph, Carmel, and Maon. These names have been identified in the modern Tell Zif, Kurmul [Kirmel in Seetzen], and Tell Main (See Van de Velde, Map and Memoir; Robinson, Bibl. Res. [ed. 1], vol. ii. p. 200, etc.; Ritter, Erdk. [Pal. u. Syr., ii. 636-640]; Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 600; Von Raumer, Palästina, 183, 211). We will, in order approximately to fix the site of our hill, quote the topographical notes of R. Jos. Schwarz (Descriptive Geog. of Palest., p. 106), because of their succinctness; 'Maon, the village Maun, five English miles south of Hebron; Carmel is the village Al Kirmil, situated two English miles north-north-west of Maun, on a small mount; it has an excellent water-course called Birkat al Kirmil, in the vicinity of which is a small fort whence the Dead Sea can be seen; Ziph, the village Ziff, two English miles south-east of Hebron, and two English miles north-east of Al Kirmil.' These distances are substantially correct, within a mile or two, according to Van de Velde's excellent map, with which that of Robinson and Smith (Bibl. Res., vol. ii., ed. 1) agrees. Dr. Thomson, L.c., in reference to the sacred history which mentions the subject of this article, observes:—'The people of Ziph obtained an odious reputation in the time of David by betraying his hiding-place in the hill of Hachilah to king Saul. One of these rough hills below Ziph must doubtless be the scene of that venturesome visit of David into the camp of his enemy while he and all his troop were asleep (1 Sam. xxvi. 1-12). That entire region is now almost deserted, except by Bedawin robbers, who render it at least as dangerous to honest shepherds as it seems to have been before David and his company frequented it. The men of Carmel mention it as something remarkable that they were not hurt, neither missed anything as long as they were conversant with them in the fields. 'They were a wall unto us night and day all the while we were with them keeping the sheep' (1 Sam. xxv. 15, 16). It is refreshing to read such a testimony to David's admirable government over the band that followed him; and if there were now such an emir in that same region, we might have safely extended our rambles down to the Dead Sea, etc.' Dr. Robinson (Bibl. Res., ii. 201) refers to the character of David's outlaws and his control over them, and adds: 'In all these particulars we were deeply struck with the truth and strength of the Biblical descriptions of manners and customs, almost identically the same as they exist at the present day.' The additional information about the site of our 'hill of Hachilah,' as 'south of Jeshimon' (xxiii. 19, מִיְמֵי הַיְשִׁמֹן, 'on the right hand,' i.e., of one facing the east; or (as it is in xxvi. 1 and 3) עַל פְּנֵי הַי, 'in front of,' or 'before' Jeshimon), gives us no assistance. If 'Jeshimon' be a proper name, as the LXX., the Vulgate, the Syriac, and St. Jerome (Onomast. s.v. Isimoth) make it, we have no clue of its ancient situation.* But it is much better to regard it as an appellative, after Aquila and Symmachus and Eusebius (if his reference to these two translators in his Onomasticon may be deemed an indication of his own opinion in opposition to St. Jerome, who simply assumes Isimoth to be a proper name, without deference to Aquila and Symmachus), together with the margin of our own A. V., which, in 1 Sam. xxiii. 19, instead of Jeshimon, reads 'the wilderness.' This version, which is corroborated by those of Aquila and Symmachus, is rendered extremely probable by the article in the Hebrew הַיְשִׁמֹן (in Num. xxi. 20 the same marginal note occurs), and by the frequent use of the word in the Psalms (e.g., lxxviii. 40) and Isaiah (e.g., xlii. 19) as an appellative, parallel to מִדְבָּר.

If so, the local note about the site of the hill of Hachilah must be only regarded as placing it on the south edge of the wilderness and facing it, as if the heights of Hachilah commanded the view of the entire wilderness towards the north. The wilderness itself seems to be called indifferently by the names of the towns which lay on its northern and southern borders—'Ziph' on the north, and 'Maon' on the south (comp. xxiii. 14 and 25). Hachilah, with its slopes of thicket-wood, seems to have been the chief rising-ground on all the plain; another hill is mentioned in the history 'afar off' (xvi. 13); this agrees with the modern accounts and larger maps of the district (See that of Van de Velde). Ἐχελά, the form of Hachilah, σὰδ, ἐν τοῖς στενοῖς, ἐν τῇ Κανῇ, ἐν τῷ βουνῷ τοῦ Ἐχελά. Here ἐν τοῖς στενοῖς, from being a gloss explanatory of Μεσὰδ, has crept into the text. Μεσὰδ is a corruption of the Hebrew מַסְעָדָה, the double sigma representing the tsadi, and the daleth being mistaken, as often happens, for the resh (Stanley, S. and P., appendix, 94). Another instance of mistaking ט for ר curiously happens in this very passage—for the LXX. ἐν τῇ Κανῇ is clearly the rendering of קָנֶה, 'New,' instead of קֶנֶה, 'a wood.'

Josephus has the same version as the LXX. (Antiq. vi. 13. 2). It will be observed that the Masada, so famous in the wars of Josephus (vii. 8), as 'the very last scene in the tragedy of Israel's destruction' (Thomson, Land and Book, p. 602), more correctly retained the Hebrew מַסְעָדָה, fortress or stronghold. Eusebius and St. Jerome (Onomast.) give the form of the LXX. nearly, Μασερεθ and Masereth; but they express their doubt whether it be a proper noun at all by quoting Aquila's rendering 'stronghold,' Symmachus' 'retreat' or 'refuge,' and Theodotion's 'cave' (Origen, Hexapla, in loc.)

* The Bethsimuth and Βηθσαιμὺθ of St. Jerome and Eusebius (Onomast.), ten miles south of Jericho, which some have identified with our Jeshimon, was no doubt another place. There can, therefore, be no ground for Dr. Kitto's conjecture that our hill of Hachilah was the same locality as the subsequently famous stronghold Masada (Pictor. Bible on 1 Sam. xxiii. 19; and comp. Bonfrerius on Onomast., for the true situation of Jerome's 'Bethsimuth,' which led to Kitto's conjecture; see also Kruse and Fleischer's note on Seetzen, Reisen, iv. 405).

seems to have misled Eusebius and St. Jerome in their Onomast., for, as Reland (Palastina, 745) has shewn, they have described both 'Ἐχέλα and Κέελα (Keilah) as seven miles from Eleutheropolis in the same direction; this distance holds good indeed of Keilah, which is north-west of Hebron, but is of course untrue of our hill, which is south and slightly east of Hebron. [The existence of two ancient Ziphis in Judah (Josh. xv. 24, 55), and the mention of 'the wilderness' of Paran (xxv. 1), have suggested a more southern situation for the events of this portion of David's life; but the arguments in support of that view do not invalidate our conclusion that the site of the hill of Hachilah was in the neighbourhood of the northern Ziph. (ZIPH)].—P. H.

HACHMONITE. This is the rendering in 1 Chron. xi. 11 of חֲכֹמֹנִי, more properly rendered in the margin, and in xxvii. 32, 'son of Hachmoni.' In the former of these passages this appellation is used of Jashobeam, one of David's mighty men; in the latter of Jehiel, who 'was with the king's sons,' probably as their tutor. As Jashobeam was the son of Zabdiel (xxvii. 2), we must regard Hachmoni either as the name of an ancestor who founded a family, or as a title of Zabdiel = the Hachmonite, i.e. the wise man, from חָכֵן (Jerome renders it by sapientissimus, and applies it to David, Quaest. Hebr. ad. loc.) In 2 Sam. xxiii. 8 he is called 'the Tachmonite,' probably by a clerical error [EZNITE].—W. L. A.

HACKSPAN, DIETRICH, or, in the Latinized form of his name, THEODORICUS HACKSPANNUS, was born at Weimar in 1607. He early devoted himself to the study of sacred philology, and on this account became an earnest student of the Oriental languages. He studied for seven years in the theological and philosophical schools of Jena, then at Altorf under the Orientalist Schwenter, and subsequently at Helmstadt under G. Calixtus. In 1636 he returned to Altorf, and became professor of Oriental languages in that university, where he also held a chair of theology. He was reputed to be the first scholar of his age in Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldee, and Arabic. He died Jan. 19, 1659. His most important Biblical works are—1. Lucubrations Frankenthalenses, sive specimen aliquod interpretationum et expositionum, quas plurimas in difficultillima quaque utriusque Testamenti loca meditatus est B. C. Bertramus, Altorf 1645, 8vo. 2. Sylloge disputationum theologicarum et philologicarum, Alt. 1663, 4to. 3. Miscellaneorum sacrarum, libri duo, Alt. 1660. 4. Notae philologico-theologicae in varia et difficultiora Veteris et Novi Testamenti loca, Alt. 1664, 3 vols. 8vo. 5. Observationes, Arabico-Syriacae in quadam loca Veteris et Novi Testamenti, Alt. 1662, 4to. Zeltner, quoted by Buddeus (Isagoge, p. 1476), speaks in the highest terms of Hackspan's skill in the exegesis of the O. T. R. Simon's only complaint is the absence of originality [Hist. Crit. du N. T., p. 721].—S. N.

HADAD, properly CHADAD (חֲדָד; Sept. Χοδδάρ, Χοδδάρ, Alex. Χοδδάρ). A son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15; 1 Chron. i. 30). The textual reading in the former of these passages is חֲדָר, but the Sam., LXX., Josephus, Gr. Venet., Arab., etc., read חֲדָד, and this is held to be the correct reading. On the border of the Persian Gulf there is a district called by Polybius (xiii. T. iii. 205, ed. Lips. 1764) Χαρρηνία, inhabited by the Gerrhaeans; Ptolemy (vi. 7, 15) mentions the Ἀτταίοι to the south of the Gerrhaeans; Pliny speaks of the Chateni along with the Gerrhaeans, and has Attene as the name of a district there (H. N. vi. 32); and the Arabians celebrate a place which they call حَثْثَة Chathth, between Oman and Bahrein. It is here, therefore, we are probably to look for the settlement of the descendants of Chadad.—W. L. A.

HADAD (חֲדָד; Sept. Ἀδδδ) is equivalent to Adad, the name of the chief deity of the Syrians [ADAD], and borne, with or without additions, as a proper name, or more probably as a title, like 'Pharaoh' in Egypt, by several of the kings of Southern Syria.

1. A king of Edom, who defeated the Midianites in the intervening territory of Moab (Gen. xxxvi. 35; 1 Chron. i. 46). This is the only one of the ancient kings of Edom whose exploits are recorded by Moses. Another king of Edom of the same name is mentioned in 1 Chron. i. 50, 51.

2. A king of Syria, who reigned in Damascus at the time that David attacked and defeated Hadad-ezer, king of Zobah, whom he marched to assist, and shared in his defeat. This fact is recorded in 2 Sam. viii. 5, but the name of the king is not given. It is supplied, however, by Josephus (Antiq. vii. 5. 2), who reports, after Nicolas of Damascus, that he carried succours to Hadad-ezer as far as the Euphrates, where David defeated them both.

3. A young prince of the royal race of Edom, who, when his country was conquered by David, contrived, in the heat of the massacre committed by Joab, to escape with some of his father's servants, or rather was carried off by them, into the land of Midian. Thence Hadad went into the desert of Paran, and eventually proceeded to Egypt. He was there most favourably received by the king, who assigned him an estate and establishment suited to his rank, and even gave him in marriage the sister of his own consort, by whom he had a son, who was brought up in the palace with the sons of Pharaoh. Hadad remained in Egypt till after the death of David and Joab, when he returned to his own country in the hope of recovering his father's throne (1 Kings xi. 14-22). The Scripture does not record the result of this attempt farther than by mentioning him as one of the troubleshooters of Solomon's reign, which implies some measure of success. After relating these facts the text goes on to mention another enemy of Solomon, named Rezin, and then adds (ver. 25), that this was 'besides the mischief that Hadad did; and he abhorred Israel and reigned over Syria.' On this point the present writer may quote what he has elsewhere stated—'Our version seems to make this apply to Rezin; but the Septuagint refers it to Hadad, reading דִּינָן Edom, instead of דִּינָן Aram or Syria, and the sense would certainly be improved by this reading, inasmuch as it supplies an apparent omission; for without it we only know that Hadad left Egypt for Edom, and not how he succeeded there, or how he was able to trouble Solomon. The history of Hadad is certainly very obscure. Adopting the Septuagint reading, some conclude that Pharaoh used his interest with Solomon to allow Hadad to reign as a tributary prince, and that he ultimately asserted his independence.

Josephus, however, seems to have read the Hebrew as our version does, 'Syria' not 'Edom.' He says that Hadad, on his arrival at Edom, found the territory too strongly garrisoned by Solomon's troops to afford any hope of success. He therefore proceeded with a party of adherents to Syria, where he was well received by Rezin, then at the head of a band of robbers, and with his assistance seized upon part of Syria and reigned there. If this be correct, it must have been a different part of Syria from that in which Rezin himself reigned, for it is certain, from verse 24, that he (Rezin) did reign in Damascus. Carrières supposes that Hadad reigned in Syria after the death of Rezin; and it might reconcile apparent discrepancies, to suppose that two kingdoms were established (there were more previously), both of which, after the death of Rezin, were consolidated under Hadad. That Hadad was really king of Syria seems to be rather corroborated by the fact, that every subsequent king of Syria is, in the Scripture, called Ben-Hadad, 'son of Hadad,' and in Josephus simply Hadad; which seems to denote that the founder of the dynasty was called by this name. We may observe that, whether we here read Aram or Edom, it must be understood as applying to Hadad, not to Rezin' (Pictorial Bible, on 2 Kings xi. 14).—J. K.

HADADEZER (הַדָּדְעֶזֶר, Hadad-helped; Sept.

Ἰδπαδῆζερ), or HADADREZER, king of Zobah, a powerful monarch in the time of David, and the only one who seems to have been in a condition seriously to dispute with him the predominancy in south-western Asia. He was defeated by the Israelites in the first campaign (B.C. 1032) in the neighbourhood of the Euphrates, with a great loss of men, war-chariots, and horses, and was despoiled of many of his towns (2 Sam. viii. 3; 1 Chron. xviii. 3). This check not only impaired, but destroyed his power. A diversion highly serviceable to him was made by a king of Damascene-Syria (whom the Scripture does not name, but who is the same with Hadad, 3), who, coming to his succour, compelled David to turn his arms against him, and abstain from reaping all the fruits of his victory (2 Sam. x. 6, seq.; 1 Chron. xix. 6, seq.) The breathing-time thus afforded Hadadezer was turned by him to such good account that he was able to accept the subsidies of Hanun, king of the Ammonites, and to take a leading part in the confederacy formed by that monarch against David. The first army brought into the field was beaten and put to flight by Abishai and Joab; but Hadadezer, not yet discouraged, went into the countries east of the Euphrates, and got together the forces of all his allies and tributaries, which he placed under the command of Shophach, his general. To confront so formidable an adversary, David took the field in person, and in one great victory so completely broke the power of Hadadezer, that all the small tributary princes seized the opportunity of throwing off his yoke, of abandoning the Ammonites to their fate, and of submitting quietly to David, whose power was thus extended to the Euphrates.—J. K.

HADAD-RIMMON (הַדָּד־רִמּוֹן; Sept. kawerds Ἰδπαδῆρ). This place is only mentioned in one passage of Scripture, and there it is introduced incidentally—'In that day there shall be great lamentation in Jerusalem, as the lamentation of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon' (Zech. xii. 11). Reference is manifestly made to the mourning for the death of king Josiah, who fell in battle against Pharaoh-Necho (2 Kings xxiii. 29; 2 Chron. xxxv. 20-23); though others have understood it differently (see Poole, Synopsis, ad loc.) Jerome says that in his day Hadad-rimmon was called Maximianopolis (Comment. in Zachariam, ch. xii. 11), which he tells us was in the plain near Jezreel (Comment. in Osee, ch. i. 5). The Jerusalem Itinerary locates Megiddo seventeen miles from Cæsarea, and ten from Jezreel (ed. Wesseling, p. 586). This would indicate a site at or near Lejjün, which accordingly von Raumer would identify with Maximianopolis (Palästina, p. 402, 3d ed.) But Dr. Robinson has shewn that Lejjün is the Roman Legio, and the Hebrew Megiddo (Bib. Res. ii. 329, sq.); and the same city could scarcely have had two Roman names given to it. One great road from Egypt to northern Syria passed through the low ridge which separates Sharon from Esdraelon, and enters the latter plain a short distance to the east of Lejjün. Here Josiah rashly attempted to bar the progress of the Egyptian army while defiling into the great plain. Hadad and Rimmon were both names of Syrian deities; the city, therefore, appears to have been an ancient Syrian stronghold, perhaps intended to defend the road. At it the king of Judah fell, and here the first wail of that lamentation was raised, which was afterwards renewed at Jerusalem (Stanley, S. and P., p. 339). About four miles south of Lejjün is a small village called Kummāneh, which Van de Velde identifies with Hadad-rimmon (Memoir of Map, p. 333); but its position among the hills, and a considerable distance from the great road, does not accord with the above specifications.—J. L. P.

HADAR (הָדָר; Sept. Xoddāḥ), a son of Ishmael.

In Chron. i. 30 the name is written Hadad (הָדָד; Xoddād; Xoddāḥ). The former, according to Gesenius, is the correct reading. Hadar was the eighth of the twelve sons promised to Ishmael's parents long before; and though all became 'princes according to their nations' (Gen. xxv. 16), and the progenitors, it is believed, of the great Arabian tribes, only the slightest traces of them now remain (Burckhardt's Notes on the Bedouins; Pict. Bible, Gen. xxv.). The mountain of Hadad, on the borders of the Syrian desert, is supposed to indicate the district of the tribe of Ishmaelites sprung from Hadar—a supposition by no means unlikely; but this is the most that can be said for it.—W. J. C. [HADAD.]

HADAS (הָדָס), always translated 'myrtle,' occurs in several passages of the O. T., as in Isaiah xli. 19; lv. 13; Neh. viii. 15; Zech. i. 8, io, 11. The Hebrew word hadas is identical with the Arabic هَدَس, hadas, which in the dialect of Arabia Felix signifies the myrtle-tree (Richardson's Pers. and Arabic Dict.) The myrtle is, moreover, known throughout Eastern countries, and is described in Arabic works under the name أس, As. The present writer found the berries of the myrtle sold in the bazaars of India under this name (Illustr. Himal. Bot. p. 217). Esther is supposed by Simonis (Bibl. Cabinet, xi. 262) to be a compound of As and tur, and so to mean a fresh myrtle; and hence it would appear to be very closely allied in signification to Hadassah, the original name of Esther. Almost all translators unite in considering the myrtle as intended in the above passages; the Sept. has μυρτην, and the Vulgate myrtus.

The myrtle has from the earliest periods been highly esteemed in all the countries of the south of Europe, and is frequently mentioned by the poets: thus Virgil (Ecl. ii. 54)—

Et vos, O lauri, carpam, et te, proxima myrte :
Sic positæ quoniam suaves miscetis odores.

By the Greeks and Romans it was dedicated to Venus, and employed in making wreaths to crown lovers, but among the Jews it was the emblem of justice. The note of the Chaldee Targum on the name Esther, according to Dr. Harris, is, 'they call her Hadassah because she was just, and those that are just are compared to myrtles.'

The repute which the myrtle enjoyed in ancient times it still retains, notwithstanding the great accession of ornamental shrubs and flowers which has been made to the gardens and greenhouses of Europe. This is justly due to the rich colouring of its dark green and shining leaves, contrasted with the white starlike clusters of its flowers, affording in hot countries a pleasant shade under its branches, and diffusing an agreeable odour from its flowers or bruised leaves. It is, however, most agreeable in appearance when in the state of a shrub, for when it grows into a tree, as it does in hot countries, the traveller looks under instead of over its leaves, and a multitude of small branches are seen deprived of their leaves by the crowding of the upper ones. This shrub is common in the southern provinces of Spain and France, as well as in Italy and Greece: and also on the northern coast of Africa, and in Syria. The poetical celebrity of this plant had, no doubt, some influence upon its employment in medicine, and numerous properties are ascribed to it by Dioscorides (i.

127). It is aromatic and astringent, and hence, like many other such plants, forms a stimulant tonic, and is useful in a variety of complaints connected with debility. Its berries were formerly employed in Italy, and still are so in Tuscany, as a substitute for spices, now imported so plentifully from the far East. A wine was also prepared from them, which was called myrtidandum, and their essential oil is possessed of excitant properties. In many parts of Greece and Italy the leaves are employed in tanning leather. The myrtle, possessing so many remarkable qualities, was not likely to have escaped the notice of the sacred writers, as it is a well-known inhabitant of Judæa. Hasselquist and Burckhardt both notice it as occurring on the hills around Jerusalem. It is also found in the valley of Lebanon. Capt. Light, who visited the country of the Druses in 1814, says, he 'again proceeded up the mountain by the side of a range of hills abounding with myrtles in full bloom, that spread their fragrance round,' and, further on, 'we crossed through thickets of myrtle.' Irby and Mangles (p. 222) describe the rivers from Tripoli towards Galilee as generally pretty, their banks covered with the myrtle, olive, wild vine, etc. Savary, as quoted by Dr. Harris, describing a scene at the end of the forest of Platanea, says, 'Myrtles, intermixed with laurel-roses, grow in the valleys to the height of ten feet. Their snow-white flowers, bordered with a purple edging, appear to peculiar advantage under the verdant foliage. Each myrtle is loaded with them, and they emit perfumes more exquisite than those of the rose itself. They enchant every one, and the soul is filled with the softest sensations.'—J. F. R.

HADASHAH (הַדָּשָׁה; Sept. 'Αδασα; Alex.

'Αδασά), a city of Judah in the low country (Josh. xv. 37). Of this the Talmud says, that it was the smallest city in Judah, and contained only fifty houses (Reland, Pal. p. 701). It is in all probability the place which is called 'Αδασά, i Maccab. vii. 40, 45, and where Nicanor was slain by Judas Maccabæus. Josephus places this thirty stadia from Bethhoron (Antiq. xii. 10. 5); and from the narrative it must have been to the west of this place towards Gezer. Eusebius calls it a village near Gouphnae (Onom. s. v.) By this he cannot mean Gophna, the modern Jifna, which lies to the north-east of Bethhoron; and besides, Jerome corrects Eusebius for placing Adasa in Judah, saying it was in Ephraim. Both Eusebius and Jerome seem to have known the place, but it cannot now be identified.—W. L. A.

HADASSAH. [ESTHER.]

HADATTAH (הַדָּטָה). In the A. V. this appears as a town in the southern border of Judah, between Beersheba and Kadesh (Josh. xv. 25). The pointing of the Hebrew would seem to indicate that it is to be taken as an adjective qualifying הַדָּשָׁה; and that Hazar was here called Hasor-hadattah, perhaps to distinguish it from the other town of the same name in verse 23. The Vulg. renders it Asor nova; and both Eusebius and Jerome give this explanation of the word, but err in locating the town near Ascalon (Onomast. s. v. Asor).—J. L. P. [The LXX. omits the word according to both the Cod. Vat. and the Cod. Alex. Bos in a note gives Αλασὶν τῇ καυρῇ, but without any reference.]

HADES. [HEAVEN; HELL]

HADID (חַדִּיד; Vulg. Hadid) is mentioned in Ezra ii. 33; Neh. vii. 37, and xi. 34. In the first and second of these passages it is combined with two other towns, thus 'Lod, Hadid, and Ono;' the LXX. in both passages makes one word out of 'Lod, Hadid'—Λοδαῖδ: in the third passage, however, where Hadid occurs first, and separate from its companions by two other names, it has an independent designation in the LXX. [Cod. Alex.] under the form of 'Αδῶδ. The three places were near each other; and the version Αὔδδα for 'Lod' [Λῶν], in Neh. xi. 34, offers a clue of their situation. Αὔδδα is unquestionably the Lydda of Acts ix. 32. This Lydda or Disopolis is marked on Van de Velde's map 9½ miles south-east of the maritime town of Yāfa (Joppa). It agrees very well with the close association of the towns Lod and Adid in Ezra and Nehemiah, that, three miles due east of the modern Ludd [Lod, Lydda] occurs the village el-Haditheh, at the end of the Wady Muzairah, where it runs into the Wady Bādrā. This, no doubt, is the site of the ancient 'Hadid.' We will add the succinct notice of the place given in Van de Velde's Memoir; 'Hadid was a city inhabited by the Benjamites [on their return from the captivity] (Neh. xi. 34); near Lod and Ono (Ezra ii. 33; Neh. vii. 37); probably the same which is called Adida (1 Maccab. xii. 38; xiii. 12; Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 15. 2; Bell. Jud. iv. 9. 1); and identical with el-Haditheh, a village at the foot of the hills of Ludd (Van Seden, ii. 40; Rabbi Schwarz, p. 134).' R. Schwarz, however, puts the village 'on the summit of a round hill,' and in this he is corroborated by E. ha-Parchi, an Israelite geographer on the Holy Land, of the age of Abulfeda. (See Zunz, in Asher's Benj. Twadd, vol. ii. p. 439.) If Adida be the same place, we may quote Josephus in support of its high situation, for he says in the first of the cited passages: 'The city Adida is upon a hill, and beneath it lie the plains of Judæa' (comp. Gesenius, s. v. חַדִּיד). The alleged site 'in Sephela' (1 Maccab. xii. 38) induces Mr. Grove (Dict. of Bible, s. v.) to doubt the identity of our Hadid, a Benjamite city, with the Adida of the Maccabean history, on the ground that the plain called 'Sephela' was more to the south. But according to R. Schwarz (with whom agree Winer and Gesenius, s. v. Sephela), this long range of lowland extended as far north as Ludd and even Yāfa,* beyond which it was called 'The plain of Sharon' (see also Van de Velde's map). As to Josephus' statement that 'the plains of Judæa lie beneath Adida,' we must not forget that the 'Judæa' of the N. T. and later times stretched much further north than the ancient tribe of Judah. The boundary-line, in fact, of Samaria and Judæa would include the whole of the level country around Yāfa and Ludd within the southern province of Palestine, and so justify the statement of the Jewish historian. [ADIDA; SEPHELA].—P. H.

* There is nothing in the Onomast. of Eusebius and St Jerome opposed to this view; 'Usque hodie,' says the latter, somewhat vaguely, 'omnis regio juxta Eleutheropolim campestris et plana, quæ vergit ad aquilonem et occidentem, Sephela dicitur.' (πρὸς βορρᾶν καὶ δυσμᾶς, Euseb.)

HADORAM (הָדוֹרָם; LXX. Ἰδωράμ, Κεδουσόμ, Ὀδορᾶμ; Vulg. Aduram, Adoram; Joseph. Ἀδωραμ). The name of one of the Bnei-Joktan mentioned Gen. x. 27 and 1 Chron. i. 21; but whether it be the name of a tribe, or of the chief from whom the tribe was named, is uncertain. According to Gen. x. 30, the descendants of Joktan settled in Arabia, and amongst the Arab tribes mentioned by Ptolemy are the Adramitæ ('Αδραμίται), whom he places on the south coast between the Homeritæ and the Sachalitæ (vi. 7). Pliny also (N. H. vi. 28; xii. 14) refers to the same tribe under the name Atramitæ, and tells us that their principal city was Sabota. There is little doubt that this is the tribe referred to in the Scripture narrative. Some writers refer to the modern Hadramaut as preserving the ancient designation of this tribe; but it is more probable that this name is the representative of Hazarmaveth, Gen. x. 26 (חֲצַרְמַוֶּתֶת), the Χατραπευτίς of Ptolemy, and the Chatramotitæ of Pliny.—S. N.

HADRACH (חֲדָרַח; Sept. Σεδράχ). The meaning of the only passage in which this name occurs (Zech. ix. 1) is obscure. It may be thus rendered, 'The announcement of the Word of the Lord upon the land of Hadrach, and Damascus shall be its (the word's) resting-place,' etc. Adrichomius says, 'Adrach, or Hadrach, alias Adra . . . is a city of Coele Syria, about 25 miles from Bostra, and from it the adjacent region takes the name of Land of Hadrach. This was the land which formed the subject of Zechariah's prophecy' (Theatrum Terra Sancte, p. 75). Michaelis says—'To this I may add what I learned, in the year 1768, from Joseph Abbassi, a noble Arab of the country beyond Jordan. I inquired whether he knew a city called Hadrakh (حدرک) . . . He replied that there was a city of that name, which, though now small, had been capital of a large region called the land of Hadrakh,' etc. (Hengstenberg, Christology, iii. p. 372, Edin. 1858). The two names, however, are entirely different (חֲדָרַח, Hadrach; ادرع, Edhr'a), and there is no historical evidence that Edhr'a ever was capital of a large territory [EDREI]. Mövers suggests that Hadrach may be the name of one of the old deities of Damascus (Die Phönizier, i. 478); and Bleek conjectures that reference is made to a king of that city (Studien und Kritik, 1852, ii. p. 258). Henderson supposes it to be only a corruption of חֲדָר, the common names of the kings of Syria (Comment. ad loc.). Jarchi and Kimchi say, 'Rabbi Juda interpreted it as an allegorical expression relating to the Messiah, Who is harsh (חָר) to the heathen, and gentle (רַךְ) to Israel.' Jerome's interpretation is somewhat similar—'Et est ordo verborum; assumptio verbi Domini, acuti in peccatores, mollis in justos. Adrach quippe hoc resonat ex duobus integris nomen compositum: AD (חָד) acutum, RACH (רַךְ) molle, tenerumque significans' (Comment. in Zach. ad loc.) Hengstenberg adopts the same etymology and meaning, but regards the word as a symbolical appellation of the Persian empire, whose overthrow by Alexander Zechariah here foretells. He says the prophet does not mention the real name, because, as he lived during the supremacy of Persia, such a reference would have exposed him to danger. It will thus be seen that the interpretations of the word are almost as numerous as the commentators upon the passage.

Looking at the passage in what appears to be its plain and natural meaning, no scholar can deny that, according to the usual construction, the proper name following אֶרֶץ is the name of the 'land' itself, or of the nation inhabiting the land, and the analogy presented by all the other names in the section is a sufficient proof that this must be the case here (Hengstenberg, iii. 375). All the other names mentioned are well known—Damascus, Hamath, Tyre, Zidon, Gaza, etc.; it is natural to infer that Hadrach is also the name of a place, known to the prophet. Its position is not accurately defined. The words of the passage do not connect it more closely with Damascus than with Hamath. It is remarkable that no such name is elsewhere found in ancient writers. The translators of the Septuagint were ignorant of it. So was Jerome. No such place is now known. The writer can affirm that there is no town or province near Damascus or Hamath bearing a name at all resembling Hadrach. Yet this does not prove that there never was such a name. Many ancient names have disappeared, as it seems to be the case with this (see Hengstenberg l.c.; Winer, Realwörterbuch s.v.; Alpheus, Diss. de terra Chadrach, etc.)—J. I. P.

HAGADIC or Homiletic Exegesis. [MIDRASH, iii. 167.]

HAGAR (הָגָר, a stranger; Sept. Ἀγαρ), a native of Egypt, and servant of Abraham; but how or when she became an inmate of his family we are not informed. The name Hagar, which is pure Hebrew, signifying stranger, having been probably given her after her arrival, and being the one by which she continued to be designated in the patriarch's household, seems to imply that her connection with it did not take place till long after this family had emigrated to Canaan; and the presumption is that she was one of the female slaves presented to Abraham by Pharaoh during his visit to Egypt (Gen. xii. 16). But some derive the name from הָגַר, to flee; and suppose it to have been applied to her from a remarkable incident in her life, to be afterwards mentioned; just as the Mohammedans call the flight of Mohammed by the collateral term 'Hegira.' Whatever were her origin and previous history, her servile condition in the family of Abraham must have prevented her from being ever known beyond the limits of her humble sphere, had not her name, by a spontaneous act of her mistress, become indissolubly linked with the patriarch's history. The long-continued sterility of Sarah suggested to her the idea (not uncommon in the East) of becoming a mother by proxy through her handmaid, whom, with that view, she gave to Abraham as a secondary wife [ABRAHAM; ADOPTION; CONCUBINE].

The honour of such an alliance and elevation was too great and unexpected for the weak and ill regulated mind of Hagar; and no sooner did she find herself in a situation, which made her, in the prospect of becoming a mother, an object of increasing interest and importance to Abraham, than she openly indulged in triumph over her less favoured mistress, and shewed by her altered behaviour a growing habit of disrespect and insolence. The feelings of Sarah were severely wounded, and she broke out to her husband in loud complaints of the servant's petulance. 'My wrong be upon thee,' she cried—language which is generally considered an impassioned burst of temper, in which she unjustly charged Abraham with causing or encouraging, by his marked attention to the concubine, the ill usage she met with; but it appears susceptible of other constructions much more favourable to Sarah's character. The words וְעָלַי

עָלַי signify either 'My wrong be super te,' as Cocceius and others render it, i.e., lieth upon thee, pointing to his duty as her protector, and soliciting his interference, or else, 'My wrong is propter te'—on your account. 'I have exposed myself to these indignities solely out of my intense anxiety to gratify you with a son and heir.' Whichever of these interpretations we prefer, the exclamation of Sarah expresses bitter indignation at the misconduct of her slave; and Abraham, whose meek and prudent behaviour is strikingly contrasted with the violence of his wife, leaves her with unfettered power, as mistress of his household, to take what steps she pleases to obtain the required redress. In all Oriental states where concubinage is legalized, the principal wife has authority over the rest; the secondary one, if a slave, retains her former condition unchanged, and society thus presents the strange anomaly of a woman being at once the menial of her master and the partner of his bed. In like manner Hagar, though taken into the relation of concubine to Abraham, continued still, being a dotal maid-servant, under the absolute power of her mistress, who, after her husband had left her to take her own way in vindication of her dignity as the principal wife, was neither reluctant nor sparing in making the minion reap the fruits of her insolence. Sarah, indeed, not content with the simple exertion of her authority, seems to have resorted even to corporal chastisement, the word וַתַּעֲנֶה conveying such a meaning, and hence Augustine has drawn an elaborate argument for inflicting civil penalties on heretics (Epist. xlviii.) But whether she actually inflicted blows, or merely threw out menaces to that effect, cannot be determined, as the two renderings, 'Sarah afflicted' and 'would afflict' her, have received equal support from respectable lexicographers and versions. Sensible, at length, of the hopelessness of getting the better of her mistress, Hagar determined on flight; and having seemingly formed the purpose of returning to her relations in Egypt, she took the direction of that country; which led her to what was afterwards called Shur, through a long tract of sandy uninhabited country, lying on the west of Arabia Petraea, to the extent of 150 miles between Palestine and Egypt. In that lonely region she was sitting by a fountain to replenish her skin-bottle or recruit her wearied limbs, when the angel of the Lord, whose language on this occasion bespeaks him to have been more than a created being, appeared, and in the kindest manner remonstrated with her on the course she was pursuing, and encouraged her to return by the promise that she would ere long have a son, whom Providence destined to become a great man, and whose wild and irregular features of character would be indelibly impressed on the mighty nation that should spring from him. Obedient to the heavenly visitor, and having distinguished the place by the name of Beer-lahai-roi, 'the well of the visible God,' Hagar retraced her steps to the tent of Abraham, where in due time she had a son; and having probably narrated this remarkable interview to Abraham, that patriarch, as directed by the angel, called the name of the child Ishmael, 'God hath heard.'

Fourteen years had elapsed after the birth of Ishmael when an event occurred in the family of Abraham, by the appearance of the long-promised heir, which entirely changed the prospects of that young man, though nothing materially affecting him took place till the weaning of Isaac, which, as is generally thought, was at the end of his third year. Ishmael was then a lad of seventeen years of age; and being fully capable of understanding his altered relations to the inheritance, as well as having felt perhaps a sensible diminution of Sarah's affection towards him, it is not wonderful that a disappointed youth should inconsiderately give vent to his feelings on a festive occasion, when the newly-weaned child, clad according to custom with the sacred symbolic robe, which was the badge of the birthright, was formally installed heir of the tribe (see Biblioth. Bibl. vol. i.; Vicas, Annot. 32; Bush on Gen. xxvii. 15). Our feelings of justice naturally lead us to take part with Ishmael, as hardly dealt with in being so unexpectedly superseded after having been so long the acknowledged heir. But the procedure of Abraham in awarding the claim to the inheritance to Isaac in preference to his elder son was guided by the special command of God; and it may be remarked, moreover, that it was in harmony with the immemorial practice of the East, where the son of a slave or secondary wife is always supplanted by that of a free woman, even if born long after. The harmony of the weaning feast was disturbed by Ishmael being discovered mocking. The Hebrew word צחק, though properly signifying 'to laugh,' is frequently used to express strong derision, as in Gen. xix. 14; Neh. ii. 19; i. 1; Ezek. xliii. 32; accompanied, as is probable on some of the occasions referred to in these passages, with violent gestures; and in accordance with this idea the Chaldee and Septuagint versions render it by 'I play,' which is used by the latter in 2 Sam. ii. 14-17, as synonymous with boxing, whence it might very justly be characterised as persecution (Gal. iv. 29). This conduct gave mortal offence to Sarah, who from that moment would be satisfied with nothing short of his irrevocable expulsion from the family; and as his mother also was included in the same condemnation, there is ground to believe that she had been repeating her former insolence, as well as instigating her son to his improprieties of behaviour. So harsh a measure was extremely painful to the affectionate heart of Abraham; but his scruples were removed by the timely appearance of his divine counsellor, who said, 'Let it not be grievous in thy sight, because of the lad, and because of thy bondwoman: in all that Sarah hath said unto thee, hearken unto her voice: 'for,' adds the Targum of Jonathan, 'she is a prophetess.' Accordingly, what she said is called the Scripture (Gal. iv. 30), and the incident affords a very remarkable instance of an overruling Providence in making this family feud in the tent of a pastoral chief 4000 years ago the occasion of separating two mighty peoples, who, according to the prophecy, have ever since occupied an important chapter in the history of man. Hagar and Ishmael departed early on the day fixed for their removal, Abraham furnishing them with the necessary supply of travelling provisions. The Septuagint, which our translators have followed, appears to represent Ishmael as a child, placed along with the travelling-bags on the heavily-loaded shoulders of Hagar. But a little change in the punctuation, the observance of the parenthetical clause, and the construction of the word 'child' with the verb 'took,' remove the whole difficulty, and the passage will then stand thus: 'And Abraham rose up early in the morning, and took bread, and a bottle of water (and gave it unto Hagar, putting it on her shoulder), and the child, and sent her away.'

In spite of their instructions for threading the desert, the two exiles missed their way. Overcome by fatigue and thirst, increasing at every step under the unmitigated rays of a vertical sun, the strength of the young Ishmael, as was natural, first gave way, and his mother laid him down in complete exhaustion under one of the stunted shrubs of this arid region, in the hope of his obtaining some momentary relief from smelling the damp in the shade. The burning fever, however, continued unabated, and the poor woman, forgetting her own sorrow, destitute and alone in the midst of a wilderness, and absorbed in the fate of her son, withdrew to a little distance, unable to witness his lingering sufferings; and there 'she lifted up her voice and wept.' In this distressing situation the angel of the Lord appeared for the purpose of comforting her, and directed her to a fountain, which, concealed by the brushwood, had escaped her notice, and from which she drew a refreshing draught, that had the effect of reviving the almost lifeless Ishmael. This well, according to the tradition of the Arabs, who pay great honour to the memory of Hagar, is Zemzem, near Mecca.—R. J.

[The only additional fact mentioned concerning Hagar is, that she took a wife for her son, with whom she had settled in the wilderness of Paran (Gen. xxi. 21). The Apostle Paul (Gal. iv. 22, ff.) allegorises the story of Hagar, for the purpose of elucidating the relation of the Jewish to the Christian dispensation. Hagar he compares to the former, and Sarah to the latter; and in order to strengthen or give point to his allegory, he lays hold of the fact (ver. 25) that, among the Arabians, Hagar is the name of Mount Sinai (جبل, a stone). Properly the Heb. הַר corresponds to the Arab. جبل, jugil; but where a general resemblance of one word to another existed, the sacred writers seem to have deemed that enough for the purpose of allegorical identification; comp. Matt. ii. 23; John ix. 7 (Borger, Meyer, De Wette, in loc.)

HA-GAON. [SAADIA.]

HAGARITE, THE (הַגָּרִיטָה), is used twice in the singular number—(1) In 1 Chron. xi. 38 of MIBHAR, one of David's mighty men, who is described as בֶּן־הַגָּרִיטָה, vids 'Agarai, filius Agarai, 'the son of Haggeri,' or better (as the margin has it), 'the Haggerite,' whose father's name is not given. This hero differs from some of his colleagues, 'Zelek the Ammonite' (ver. 39), for instance; or 'Uriah the Hittite' (ver. 41), or 'Ithmah the Moabite' (ver. 46), in that, while they were foreigners, he was only the son of a foreigner—a domiciled settler perhaps. (2) In 1 Chron. xxvii. 31 of JAZIZ, another of David's retainers, who was 'over his flocks.' This man was himself an 'Hagarite,' ὁ Ἀγαρίτης, Agareus. A comparison of next article (1) will show how well qualified for his office this man* was likely to be from his extraction from a pastoral race. One of the effects of the great victory over the Hagarites of Gilead and the East was probably that individuals of their nation entered the service of the victorious Israelites, either voluntarily or by coercion, as freemen or as slaves. Jaziz was no doubt among the former, a man of eminence and intelligence amongst his countrymen, on which account he attracted the notice of his royal master, who seems to have liberally employed distinguished and meritorious foreigners in his service.—P. H.

HAGARITES (1 Chron. v. 10, 19, 20; הַהַגָּרִיטִים; Sept. Ἀγαρίται [v. 19], Ἀγαρίται [v. 20, in v. 10 deest]; Vulg. Agarei): HAGARENES (Psalm lxxxiii. 6 [7 Hebr. Bib.] הַגָּרִינִים; Sept. Ἀγαρίνοι [lxxxiii. 6]; Vulg. Agareni): AGARENES (Baruch iii. 23; of vol Ἀγάρ; Vulg. Fili Agar). Such are the three forms in which occurs the designation of probably the same Arab people who appear at different periods of the sacred history—in hostile relation to the Hebrew nation.

(1.) Our first passage treats of a great war, which in the reign of King Saul was waged between the transjordanic tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh on the one side, and their formidable neighbours, the Hagarites, aided by the kindred tribes† of 'Jetur and Nephish and Nodab,' on the other. The result of this war was extremely favourable to the Eastern Israelites; besides the capture of immense booty from the enemy,‡ many of whom

* 'A Hagarite had charge of David's flocks and an Ishmaelite of his camels, because the animals were pastured in districts where these nomadic people were accustomed to feed their cattle' [or rather, because their experience made them skillful in such employments]. Bertheau on Chronicles [Clark's tr.], ii. 320.

† Kindred tribes, we say, on the evidence of Gen. xxv. 15. The Arab tribes derived from Hagar and Ishmael, like the earlier stocks descended from Cush and Joktan, were at the same time generically known by the common patronymic of Ishmaelites or Hagarenes. Some regard the three specific names of Jetur, Nephish, and Nodab, not as distinct from, but in apposition with, Hagarites; as if the Hagarites with whom the two tribes and a half successfully fought were the clans of Jetur, Nephish, and Nodab. See Forster's Geog. of Arabia, vol. i. pp. 186-189.

‡ 'Of camels 50,000, and of sheep 250,000, and of asses 2000' (ver. 21). Rosenmüller, (Bibl. Geog. [tr. by Morren], iii. 140), following LXX. and Luther, unnecessarily reduces the number of camels to 5000. When it is remembered that the wealth of a Bedouin chief, both in those and these times, consisted of cattle, the amount of booty taken in the Hagarite war, though great, was not excessive. Job's stock is described as '7000 sheep, 3000 camels, 500 yoke of oxen, and 500 she-asses' (i. 3). Meshia, king of Moab, paid to the king of Israel a tribute of 100,000 lambs and 100,000 rams (2 Kings iii. 4). In further illustration of this wealth of cattle, we may quote were taken and many slain in the conflict (ver. 21, 22), the victorious two tribes and a half took possession of the country, and retained it until the captivity (ver. 22). By this conquest, which was still more firmly ratified in the subsequent reign of David, the promise, which was given as early as Abraham's time (Gen. xv. 18) and renewed to Moses (Deut. i. 7) and to Joshua (i. 4), began to receive that accomplishment, which was consummated by the glorious Solomon (1 Kings iv. 21). The large tract of country which thus accrued to Israel, stretched from the indefinite frontier of the pastoral tribes, to whom were formerly assigned the kingdoms of Sihon and Og, to the Euphrates. A comparison of 1 Chron. v. 9-20 with Gen. xxv. 12-18, seems to shew that this line of country, which (as the history informs us) extended eastward of Gilead and Bashan in the direction of the Euphrates, was substantially the same as that which Moses describes as peopled by the sons of Ishmael, whom Hagar bore to Abraham. 'They dwelt,' says Moses, 'from Havilah unto Shur, that is before Egypt, as thou goest towards Assyria'—in other words, across the country from the junction of the Euphrates with the Tigris to the isthmus of Suez; and this is the spacious tract which we assign to the Hagarites or Hagarenes. The booty taken from the Hagarites and their allies proves that much of this territory was well adapted to pasturage, and therefore valuable to the nomadic habits of the conquerors (Num. xxxii. 1). The brilliancy of the conquest, moreover, exhibits the military prowess of these shepherds. Living amidst races whose love of plunder is still illustrated in the predatory Bedouins of Eastern Palestine, they were obliged to erect fortresses for the protection of their pastures (Michaelis, Law of Moses, art. xxxiii.), a precaution which seems to have been resorted to from the first. The sons of Ishmael are enumerated, Gen. xxv. 16, 'by their towns and by their castles,' and some such defensive erections were, no doubt, meant by the children of Reuben and Gad in Num. xxxii. 16, 17.

(2.) Though these eastern Israelites became lords paramount of this vast tract of country, it is not necessary to suppose that they exclusively occupied the entire region; nor that the Hagarites and their kindred, though subdued, were driven out; for it was probably in the same neighbourhood that 'the Hagarenes' of our second passage were living, when they joined in the great confederacy against Israel with, among others, Edom and Moab and Ammon and Amalek. When this combination took place is of little importance here; Mr. Thrupp (Psalms, vol. ii. pp. 60, 61) gives excellent reasons for assigning it to the reigns of Jehoash and of his son Jeroboam II. The nations, however, which constituted the confederacy with the Hagarenes, seem to confirm our opinion that these were still residing in the district, where in the reign of Saul they had been subjugated by their Israelite neighbours. Rosenmüller (Bibl. Geog.

a passage from Dr. Stanley's Jewish Church, i. 215, 216: 'Still the countless flocks and herds may be seen [in this very region conquered from the Hagarites], droves of cattle moving on like troops of soldiers, descending at sunset to drink of the springs—literally, in the language of the prophet, 'rams and lambs, and goats and bullocks, all of them fatlings of Bashan.'

[trans.], iii. 141) and Gesenius (Thes., s. v. הַגָּרִי) suggest that the Hagarenes when vanquished migrated to the south-east, because on the coast of the Persian Gulf there was the province of Hagar or Hadjar (هَجَر). This is the district which the Arabian geographers have carefully and prominently described (comp. De Sacy's Chrest. Arab., ii. 123; Abulfeda [by Reinaud], ii. 1. 137, who quotes Jakut's Moschtarek for some of his information; and Rommel's Commentary on Abulfeda, De Prov. Hagar, هَجَر, sive Bahhrain, البحرين, pp. 87, 88, 89; D'Herbelot, s. v. Hagr). We will not deny that this province probably derived its name and early inhabitants from Hagar and her son Ishmael (or, as Rabbi D. Kimchi would prefer, from Hagar, through some son by another father than Abraham); but we are not of opinion that these Hagarenes of the Persian Gulf, whose pursuits were so different,* were identical with the Hagarenes of the Psalm before us, or with the Hagarites of 1 Chron., whom we have identified with them. The fact seems to be that many districts in Arabia were called by the generic appellation of Hagarite or Hagarene, no doubt after Hagar; as Keturah, another of Abraham's concubines, occasioned the rather vaguely-used name of Ketureans for other tribes of the Arabian peninsula (Forster, Geog. of Arabia, ii. 7). In the very section of Abulfeda which we have above quoted, that geographer (after the author of the Moschtarek) reminds us that the name Hadjar (Hagar) is as extensive in meaning in Arabia as Scham (Syria) and Irak, elsewhere; in like manner Rommel, within a page or two, describes an Hagar in the remote province of Yemen; this, although an unquestionably different place (Reinaud, ii. 1-137, note), is yet confounded with the

* Nothing pastoral is related of this maritime tribe; Rommel quotes from two Arabian geographers, Taifaschi and Bakui, who both describe these Hagarenes of the coast as much employed in pearl-fishing and such pursuits. Niebuhr (Travels in Arabia [Engl. tr.], ii. 151, 152) confirms their statement. Gesenius is also inexact in identifying these maritime Hagarenes with the Ἀγάραιοι of Ptolemy, v. 19. 2, and Eratosthenes, in Strabo xvi. 767, and Pliny vi. 28. If the tribes indicated in these classical authors be the same (which is doubtful), they are much more correctly identified by our own writer Dr. T. Jackson (Works [ed. Oxon.], vol. i., p. 220), who says:—'The seat of such as the Scripture calls Hagarens was in the desert Arabia betwixt Gilead and Euphrates, 1 Chron. v. 9, 10. This people were called by the heathen Ἀγάραιοι, Agræi, rightly placed by Ptolemy in the desert Arabia, and by Strabo in that very place which the Scripture makes the eastern bounds of Ishmael's posterity, to wit, next unto the inhabitants of Havilah.' Amidst the difficulty of identification, some modern geographers have distributed the classical Agræi in various localities. Thus, in Forster's maps of Arabia, they occupy both the district between Gilead and the Euphrates in the north, as well as the western shores of the Persian Gulf.

VOL. II.

maritime Hadjar. In proof of the uncertainty of the situation of places in Arabia of like name, we may mention that, while Abulfeda, Edrisi, Giau-hari, and Golius distinguish between the Hagarenes of the north-east coast and those of the remote south-west district which we have just mentioned, Nassir Edin, Olugbeig, and Busching confound them as identical.* Such being the uncertainty connected with the sites of these Arab tribes, we the less hesitate to place the Hagarenes of the Psalm in the neighbourhood of Edom, Moab and Ammon in the situation, which was in Saul's time occupied by the Hagarites, 'near the main road which led' [or, more correctly, in the belt of country which stretched] 'from the head of the Red Sea to the Euphrates' (Smith's Dict. of Geog., s. v. Agræi; see also Bochart, Phaleg, [ed. Villemandy], iv. 11, p. 225). The mention both of Ishmaelites and Hagarenes in this Psalm has led to the opinion that they are separate nations here meant. The verse, however (7th in the Hebrew Bible) is in the midst of a poetic parallelism, in which the clauses are synonymous and not antithetic (comp. vv. 5-11), so that if 'Edom and the Ishmaelites' is not absolutely identical in geographical signification with 'Moab and the Hagarenes,' there is at least a poetical identity between these two groups which forbids our separating them widely from each other in any sense (for the dispersed condition of the Hagarenes, see also Fuller, Misc. Sacr., ii. 12).

Combinations marked the unrelenting hostility of their neighbours towards the Jews to a very late period. One of these is mentioned in 1 Maccab. v., as dispersed by Judas Maccabæus. 'The children of Bean' (viol Balaw) of ver. 4 have been by Hitzig conjectured to be the same as our Hagarenes; there is, however, no other ground for this opinion than their vicinity to Edom and Ammon, and the difficulty of making them fit in with any other tribe as conveniently as with that which is the subject of this article (see J. Olshausen, die Psalmen, p. 345).

(3). In the passage from Baruch iii. 23, we have attributed to 'the Agarenes' qualities of wisdom for which the Arabian nation has been long celebrated, skill in proverbial philosophy (Cf. Freytag, Arab. Prov., tom. iii., præf.); in this accomplishment they have associated with them 'the merchants of Meran and of Theman.' This is not the place to discuss the site of Meran, which some have placed on the Persian Gulf and others on the Red Sea; it is enough to observe that their mercantile habits gave them a shrewdness in practical knowledge which rendered them worthy of comparison with 'the merchants of Theman' or Edom.† The wisdom of these is expressly mentioned in Jer. xlix. 7 and Obad., ver. 8. The Agarenes of this passage we would place among the inhabitants of the shores of the Persian Gulf, where (see 1) Gesenius and others placed 'the Hagarites' after their conquest by the trans-jordanic Israelites. The clause, 'that seek wisdom on earth' [that is, 'which acquire experience and intelligence from intercourse with mankind'], seems to best fall in with the habits of a seafaring and mercantile race (see Fritzsche, das Buch Baruch, p. 192; and Hävernicks, whose words he quotes: 'Hagareni terram quasi perlustantes dicuntur, quippe mercatores longe celeberrimi antiquissimis jamjam temporibus').—P. HAGGAI (חַגַּי; Sept. and Joseph. Ἀγγαῖος; Jerome and Vulg. Aggeus or Aggeus, otherwise Haggæus), one of the twelve minor prophets, and the first of the three who, after the return of the Jews from the Babylonian exile, prophesied in Palestine. Of the place and year of his birth, his descent, and the leading incidents of his life, nothing is known which can be relied on. Some assert that he was born in Babylon, and came to Jerusalem when Cyrus, in the year B.C. 536, allowed the Jews to return to their country (2 Chron. xxxvi. 23; Ezra i. 1),—the new colony consisting chiefly of people belonging to the tribes of Judah, Benjamin, and Levi, with a few from other tribes. [From ch. ii. 2 Ewald conjectures that Haggai may have been of the number of those who had seen the former temple; and Hävernicks, Keil, and Bleek, accept this as not improbable.] The more fabulous traditions of Jewish writers, who pass him for an Assessor of the Synagoga Magna, and enlarge on his literary avocations, have been collected by Carpzov (Introductio in V. T. iii. p. 426). [Jerome (Comment. ad Agg. 1) says that some, resting on the words כִּלְמָן יְהוָה (i. 13), held Haggai to have been really an angel doctically incarnate.] This much appears from his prophecies, that he flourished during the reign of the Persian monarch Darius Hystaspis, who ascended the throne B.C. 521. These prophecies are comprised in a book of two chapters, and consist of discourses so brief and summary as to have led some German theologians to suspect that they have not come down to us in their original complete form, but are only an epitome (Eichhorn, Einleitung in das A. T. iii. sec. 598; Jahn, Introductio in libros sacros Vet. Fed., edit. 2, Viennæ 1814, sec. 156). Their object generally is to urge the rebuilding of the Temple, which had indeed been commenced 303; but in this he is flagrantly inconsistent with his own good canon (i. 291); the name of the son of Eliphaz and of his descendants [the Edomites] is uniformly written Tema in the original Hebrew; and that of the son of Ishmael and his family [the Hagarenes or Ishmaelites] as uniformly Tema [without the n].

* Winer, R. W. B., s. v. Hagariter, mentions yet another هَجَر, Ihadjar, which, though slightly different in form, might be written much like our word in Hebrew, הַגָּרִי, and is actually identical with it in the Syriac ܗܝܓܪܝܐ (Assemani, Biblioth.

Orient., iii. 2. 753). This place was in the province of Hedjaz on the Red Sea, on the main route between Damascus and Mecca.

* The LXX., of ἐκζητοῦντες τὴν σύνεσιν οἱ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, is surely corrupt, because meaningless: by the help of the Vulgate and the Syriac it has been conjectured by some (by Hävernicks and Fritzsche, in loc., for instance) that instead of οἱ ἐπὶ we should read τὴν ἐπὶ, q. d., 'the wisdom [or common sense] which is cognisant of the earth—its men and manners'; an attainment which mercantile persons acquire better than all else.

as early as B.C. 535 (Ezra iii. 10), but was afterwards discontinued, the Samaritans having obtained an edict from the Persian king which forbade further procedure, and influential Jews pretending that the time for rebuilding the Temple had not arrived, since the seventy years predicted by Jeremiah applied to the Temple also, from the time of the destruction of which it was then only the sixty-eighth year. As on the death of Pseudo-Smerdis, and the consequent termination of his interdict, the Jews still continued to wait for the end of the seventy years, and were only engaged in building splendid houses for themselves, Haggai began to prophesy in the second year of Darius, B.C. 520.

[In the LXX. the name of Haggai occurs along with that of Zechariah in the inscriptions of Ps. cxxxvii., cxlv.-cxlviii.; in the Vulg. the same names are prefixed to Ps. cxi. and Ps. cxlv.; and in the Syr. they are prefixed to Ps. cxv., Ps. cxxvi., and Ps. cxlv.-cxlviii. The purport of this is not that these prophets were the authors of the psalms in question, but only that they introduced them into the service of the Temple, or specially adapted them to the circumstances of the people at the time, or themselves conducted the chanting of them in the service. This last view is favoured by the statement of the Pseudo-Epiphanius (De Vit. Proph.), that Haggai 'himself first sung a Hallelujah, which is interpreted Praise ye the Living God, and Amen, which is, Be it, Be it; wherefore, he adds, we say Hallelujah, which is, the hymn of Haggai and Zechariah.' The writer cannot intend by this that Haggai and Zechariah introduced the word Hallelujah into the Psalms; he can only mean that in singing the Hallelujah Psalms these prophets in some way took the lead (Carpzov, Introd. in Libb. V. T. ii. 4, 28; Hamaker, Commentatio in Libellum de Vitis Proph. 207.)

His first discourse (ch. i.), delivered on the first day of the sixth month of the year mentioned, foretells that a brighter era would begin as soon as Jehovah's house was rebuilt; and a notice is subjoined, stating that the address of the prophet had been effective, the people having resolved on resuming the restoration of the Temple. The second discourse (ch. ii. 1-9), delivered on the twenty-first day of the seventh month, predicts that the glory of the new Temple would be greater than that of Solomon's, and shows that no fear need be entertained of the Second Temple not equalling the first in splendour, since, in a remarkable political revolution, the gifts of the Gentiles would be brought thither. The third discourse (ch. ii. 10-19), delivered on the twenty-fourth day of the ninth month, refers to a period when building materials had been collected, and the workmen had begun to put them together; for which a commencement of the Divine blessing is promised. The fourth and last discourse (ch. ii. 20-23), delivered also on the twenty-fourth day of the ninth month, is exclusively addressed to Zerubbabel, the political chief of the new Jewish colony, who, it appears, had asked for an explanation regarding the great political revolutions which Haggai had predicted in his second discourse: it comforts the governor by assuring him they would not take place very soon, and not in his lifetime. The style of the discourses of Haggai is suitable to their contents: it is pathetic when he exhorts; it is vehement when he reproves: it is somewhat elevated when he treats of

HAGIOGRAPHHA, Sacred Writings. The word ἁγιογραφα is first found in Epiphanius (Panarium, p. 58), who used it, as well as γραφεαί, to denote the third division of the Scriptures, called by the Jews כתובים, or the Writings, consisting of five books [MEGILLOTH], viz., the three poems (מִשְׁנָה), Job, Proverbs, and the Psalms, and the two books of Chronicles. [CANON.]

The word Hagiographa is once used by Jerome in a peculiar sense. Speaking of Tobit, he asserts that the Jews, cutting off this book from the catalogue of the divine Scriptures, place it among those books which they call Hagiographa. And again, of Judith he says, 'by the Jews it is read among the Hagiographa, whose authority is not sufficient to confirm debated points;' but, as in the latter instance, the greater number of manuscripts read Apocrypha, which is doubtless the true reading, it is highly probable that the word Hagiographa, used in reference to the book of Tobit, has arisen from the mistake of a transcriber. The two words were in the middle ages frequently

HAI (חַי) or HAJA (חַיָּה), GAON B. SHERIRA. GAON, was the last rector of the renowned college at Pumbedita in Babylon. This celebrated Talmudist, jurist, poet, and commentator, was born at Pumbedita A.D. 969, and displayed at a very early period such extraordinary talents that he was made president of the College of Law (בֵּית דִּין) at Pumbedita, at the age of 18 (in 987), at 20 (in 989) he was co-gaon with his father, and at 30 (in the year 999) was elevated to the dignity of sole gaon, i. e., spiritual head of the Jewish community in Babylon. The liberality of mind and frankness which he manifested in his expositions of Scripture have hardly ever been surpassed. When discussing in his academical lectures a difficult passage in the Psalms, and not being able to arrive at any satisfactory explanation, this spiritual head of the synagogue sent to his friend Mar-Elijah, the spiritual head of the Eastern Church at Bagdad, to ask what he had learned about it; and when Maziach Ibn Al-Bazak, judge of Sicily, one of the audience who had come to amass Talmudic lore at the renowned college at Pumbedita, expressed his amazement at such a proceeding, Hai demonstrated to him that according to the Talmud every man is bound to learn truth from any one (comp. Steinschneider, Jewish Literature, Longman, 1857, pp. 78, 125). His exposition of the celebrated declaration in the Talmud about Job is of great interest to the Biblical student. 'R. Hai writes in his Theological Decisions,' says Joshua Ibn Shœib (דְּרוֹשׁוֹת), Cracow 1570, p. 77), 'that Job has actually existed, and that no one [among Israel] has ever doubted it. When it is said in the Talmud אֵין לוֹ

15 a: Baba Bathra 15 a: the meaning is that he is to be an example to all the children of men, who are to act as he did, and are, like him, to confide in God, who will recompense their losses and turn their chastisements into blessings. Hai, moreover, says that in their copies of the Talmud the reading actually is לֹא הָיָה וְלֹא נִבְרָא אֱלֹהִים לְמַשַּׁל, and not מַשַּׁל הָיָה, for Job did exist, as is evident from Ezek. xiv. 11.

Passing by his extraordinary productions connected with the Talmud and his Theological Decisions, which more or less also explain the legal portion of the Scriptures, we shall specify his labours which directly bear upon the Bible and its language.

Hai wrote commentaries on the Bible, which have not as yet come to light. We have, however, fragments of them given in the exegetical and lexical works of Rashi (on Judg. iv. 19; Hos. iii. 4), Ibn Ezra (Deut. xxxiii. 39; Is. xli. 8; Amos v. 22; Ps. lviii. 10; Job. iv. 15; vi. 10; xiii. 27; xxi. 32), and Kimchi (Is. v. 5; xxxviii. 14; Jer. xii. 6; Ezek. xix. 10); Lexicon under Art. חֲזַק.

* The passage also occurs in the Jerusalem Talmud Sota 15 a, where, however, the reading is אֵינוֹ Job neither did nor will exist.

He also wrote a Hebrew Lexicon in Arabic, called אלחאו, which Ibn Ezra, who had it before him when he wrote his grammatical treatise entitled מאחונים, calls המאסר, and describes as מלא חכמה וכליל יופי, full of wisdom and perfect in beauty. This work, too, has not as yet come to light. From the fragments of his works as given by the above-mentioned commentators, we see that Hai was a liberal and impartial interpreter of the Hebrew Scriptures, and that he resorted to the Koran and the ancient traditions of the Mohammedans for aid to settle the meaning of archaic expressions and peculiar phrases in the Bible. If we bear in mind the extraordinary esteem in which he was held by Jews throughout Babylon and elsewhere, who called him by the distinguished title 'the Father of Israel' (אב ישראל), the salutary influence which this liberal example of Hai must have exercised upon the development of Biblical exegesis will easily be understood. Hai died 28th March 1038, after holding the highest office among the Jews for 39 years. Comp. HAIR is frequently mentioned in Scripture, and in scarcely anything has the caprice of fashion been more strikingly displayed than in the various forms which the taste of different countries and ages has prescribed for disposing of this natural covering of the head. The Greeks let their hair grow to a great length, and their natural fondness for this attribute of beauty has been perpetuated not only by the frequently recurring epithet of Homer, καρχαρόδωρες, as descriptive of the Ἀχαιοί, but by the circumstance of the poets and artists of that ancient people representing even the gods themselves with long hair. The early Egyptians, again, who were proverbial for their habits of cleanliness, removed the hair as an incumbrance, and the almost unavoidable occasion of sordid and offensive negligence. They shaved even the heads of young children, leaving only certain locks, as an emblem of youth, on the front, the back, and the sides. In the case of royal children those on the sides were covered and enclosed in a bag, which hung down conspicuously as a badge of princely rank. All classes amongst that people, not excepting the slaves imported from foreign countries, were required to submit to the tonsure (Gen. xli. 14); and yet, what was remarkable in the inhabitants of a hot climate, while they removed their natural hair, they were accustomed to wear wigs, which were so constructed that 'they far surpassed,' says Wilkinson, 'the comfort and coolness of the modern turban, the reticulated texture of the ground-work on which the hair was fastened allowing the heat of the head to escape, while the hair effectually protected it from the sun Anc. Egyptians, iii. 354). Different from the custom both of the Greeks and the Egyptians, that of the Hebrews was to wear their hair generally short, and to check its growth by the application of scissors only. The priests at their inauguration shaved off all their hair, and when on actual duty at the temple, were in the habit, it is said, of cutting it every fortnight. The only exceptions to this prevailing fashion are found in the Nazarites (Num. vi. 5), whose hair, from religious duty, was not to be cropped during the term of their vow; of young persons who, during their minority, allowed their hair to hang down in luxuriant ringlets on their shoulders; of such effeminate persons as Absalom (2 Sam. xiv. 26); and of Solomon's horse-guards, whose vanity affected a puerile extravagance, and who strewed their heads every day with particles of gold-dust (Joseph. Antiq. viii. 7. 3). Although the Hebrews wore their hair short, they were great admirers of strong and thickest locks; and so high a value did they set on the possession of a good head of hair, that they deprecated nothing so much as baldness; to which, indeed, so great ignominy was attached that, whether a man was destitute of hair or not, bald-head became a general term expressive of deep and malignant contempt (2 Kings ii. 23). [BALDNESS.] To prevent or remedy this defect they seem, at an early period, to have availed themselves of the assistance of art, not only for beautifying the hair, but increasing its thickness, while the heads of the priests were anointed with an unguent of a peculiar kind, the ingredients of which, with their various proportions were prescribed by divine authority, and the composition of which the people were prohibited, under severe penalties, from attempting to imitate (Exod. xxx. 32, ff.). This custom spread till anointing the hair of the head became a general mark of gentility and an essential part of the daily toilet (Ps. xxiii. 5; xlv. 7; Eccles. ix. 8; Mark xiv. 3); the usual cosmetics employed consisting of the best oil of olives mingled with spices, a decoction of parsley-seed in wine, and more rarely of spikenard. The prevailing colour of hair among the Hebrews was dark; 'locks bushy and black as a raven,' being mentioned in the description of the bridegroom as the perfection of beauty in mature manhood (Sol. Song, v. 11). Hence the appearance of an old man with a snow-white head in a company of younger Jews, all whose heads, like those of other Eastern people, were jet black—a most conspicuous object—is beautifully compared to an almond-tree, which in the early part of the year is in full blossom, while all the others are dark and leafless (Eccles. xii. 5). Red hair, however, occasionally appeared, and seems to have been regarded as ornamental rather than otherwise. The word אדמוני, Admoni, rendered in the A.V. 'of a ruddy complexion,' properly means red-haired. It would thus appear that Esau (Gen. xxv. 25) and David (1 Sam. xvi. 12; xvii. 42) were red-haired. Red hair is so uncommon in the East, that it forms a particular distinction, as in the Scriptural instances; but it is by no means unknown, especially in mountainous countries. The writer has observed it in Persia repeatedly, accompanied with the usual fresh complexion. Such hair and complexion together seem to have been regarded as a beauty among the Jews. The personal characters of Esau and David appear to agree well with the temperament which red hair usually indicates. A story is told of Herod, that in order to conceal his advanced age, he used secretly to dye his gray locks with a dark pigment (Joseph. Antiq. xvi. 8. 1); and although the anecdote was probably an unfounded calumny on that prince, yet that it was customary with many of his Roman contemporaries to employ artificial means for changing or disguising the silver hue of age, is sufficiently apparent from the works of Martial and other satirical poets. From Rome the fashion spread into Greece and other provinces, and it appears that the members of the church of Corinth were, to a certain extent, captivated by the prevailing taste, some Christians being evidently in the eye of the Apostle, who had attracted attention by the cherished and womanly decoration of their hair (1 Cor. xi. 14-16). To them the letter of Paul was intended to administer a timely reproof for allowing themselves to fall in with a style of manners which, by confounding the distinctions of the sexes, threatened a baneful influence on good morals; and that not only the Christian converts in that city, but the primitive church generally, were led by this admonition to adopt simpler habits, is evident from the remarkable fact that a criminal, who came to trial under the assumed character of a Christian, was proved to the satisfaction of the judge to be an impostor by the luxuriant and frizzled appearance of his hair (Tertullian, Apol.; Fleury, Les Mœurs des Chrétiens).

With regard to women, the possession of long and luxuriant hair is allowed by Paul to be an essential attribute of the sex—a graceful and modest covering provided by nature; and yet the same Apostle elsewhere (1 Tim. ii. 9) concurs with Peter (1 Pet. iii. 3) in guarding women professing godliness against the pride and passionate fondness often displayed in the elaborate decorations of the head-dress. As the hair was pre-eminently the 'instrument of their pride' (Ezek. xvi. 39, margin), all the resources of ingenuity and art were exhausted to set it off to advantage and load it with the most dazzling finery; and many when they died carried their longest locks to be cut off, and placed separately in an urn, to be deposited in their tomb as the most precious and valued relics. In the daily use of cosmetics they bestowed the most astonishing pains in arranging their long hair; sometimes twisting it round on the crown of the head, where, and at the temples, by the aid of gum, which they knew as well as the modern belles, they wrought it into a variety of elegant and fanciful devices—figures of coronets, harps, wreaths, diadems, emblems of public temples and conquered cities, being formed by the mimic skill of the ancient friseur; or else, plaiting it into an incredible number of tresses which hung down the back, and which, when necessary, were lengthened by ribbons so as to reach to the ground, and were kept at full stretch by the weight of various wreaths of pearls and gold fastened at intervals down to the extremity. From some Syrian coins in his possession Hartmann (Die Hebräerin am Putzische) has given this description of the style of the Hebrew coiffure; and many ancient busts and portraits which have been discovered exhibit so close a resemblance to those of Eastern ladies in the present day, as to shew that the same elaborate and gorgeous disposition of their hair has been the pride of Oriental females in every age.

[As illustrative of the above remarks reference may be made to the seven locks in which Samson's hair was arranged, these being probably plaits into which his hair was divided. This also is probably what Josephus intends in the description he gives of the style in which Herod dressed his hair when called in his youth before the Sanhedrim; he appeared τὴν κεφαλὴν κεκοσμημένον τῇ συνθέσει τῆς κόμης (Antiq. xiv. 9. 4). When Judith was about to go to the camp of Holofernes διέταξε τὰς τρίχας 'she braided her hair' (A. V.) On the Assyrian monuments figures appear with the hair parted into several bands or plaits, and curled at the extremities, but whether the hair in these is natural or artificial remains matter of doubt. Writing of the Turkish ladies, Lady Mary Wortley Montague says, 'The hair hangs at its full length behind, divided into tresses, braided with pearl or ribbon, which is always in great quantity. . . .

In one lady's head,' she adds, 'I have counted a hundred and ten of these tresses, all natural' (Letters, etc., edited by Lord Wharcliffe, i. 372). This style of dressing the hair, and the practice of fixing pearls or ornaments of precious stones or metals in the hair, is referred to by St. Paul and St. Peter as a thing to be avoided by Christian women (1 Tim. ii. 9; 1 Peter iii. 3), partly perhaps because of the undue cost of such modes of dressing the hair, partly also because the practice was associated with usages not compatible with true female modesty (comp. with the πλέγματα of the one apostle and the ἐμπλοκή of the other, the περίπλοκαι ἐταιρικαὶ τῶν τριχῶν of Clem. Alex. Pedag. iii. 11). It is to this style of dressing the hair that Isaiah seems to allude under the expression כְּשֵׁי מֶלֶךְ

(iii. 24) 'well-set hair' A. V., rather 'braided hair,' i.e., 'hair artificially made up into braids and interwoven, and stiffened with ribbands and other materials' (Henderson, in loc.) In the Song of Songs are various allusions to modes of dressing the hair. Thus (ch. v. 11) we have לִתְלוּחַת, flowing, waving locks, from לָחַל to vibrate (Sept. ἐλάται; Vulg. elathæ palmarum); in vii. 6 we have כְּסֵי = locks arranged in rows like channels by which water is conveyed (A. V. 'galleries,' by mistake [GALLERY]); and in the same verse קָדָה

('hair,' A. V.) means hanging tresses (Sept. πλόκιον, Syr. ḥor intorsiones, cincinni), from לָחַל to hang down, be pendulous; comp. Ar. دالية, dalya, the pendulous filaments at the top of the lofty palm. Whether צִמָּה (iv. 1, 3; vi. 7) and עֲנָן (iv. 9) refer to the hair is doubtful; the former probably means veil, and the latter necklace. In Ezek. viii. 3 the word צִמָּה occurs, denoting a lock, perhaps a forelock, curling round the forehead like a flower (צִמָּה).

In the Talmud frequent references are made to women who were professional hair-dressers for their own sex, and the name applied to whom was גְּזֵלָה 'femina gnara alere crines' (Maimon. in Tr. Shabbath x. 6; comp. also Wagenseil, Sota p. 137; Jahn, Archæol. P. i. vol. 2, p. 114). As גְּזֵלָה is formed from גָּזַל, to twine or plait, it may be presumed that the principal duty of these artistes was to plait the hair into locks or arrange it in tresses.]

From the great value attached to a profuse head of hair arose a variety of superstitious and emblematic observances, such as shaving parts of the head, or cropping it in a particular form; parents dedicating the hair of infants (Tertullian, De Anima) to the gods; young women theirs at their marriage; warriors after a successful campaign; sailors after deliverance from a storm; hanging it up on consecrated trees, or depositing it in temples; burying it in the tomb of friends, as Achilles did at the funeral of Patroclus; besides shaving, cutting off, or plucking it out, as some people did; or allowing it to grow in sordid negligence, as was the practice with others, according as the calamity that befel them was common or extraordinary, and their grief was mild or violent.

Various metaphorical allusions are made to hair by the sacred writers, especially the prophets. 'Cutting off the hair' is a figure used to denote the entire destruction of a people by the righteous retributions of Providence (Is. vii. 20). 'Gray hairs here and there on Ephraim' portended the decline and fall of the kingdom of Israel (Hos. vii. 9). 'Hair as the hair of women' forms part of the description of the Apocalyptic locusts, and historically points, as some suppose, to the prevailing head-dress of the Saracens, as well as the voluptuous effeminacy of the Antichristian clergy (Rev. ix. 8). And finally, 'hair white as wool' was a prominent feature in the appearance of the glorified Redeemer, emblematic of the majesty and wisdom that belong to him (Rev. i. 14).—J. K.

HAKKOZ (חֲקֹז, Haggots; Sept. δ Ἠκός; Alex. Ἀκκός), a priest who was set over the seventh of the courses in the service of the sanctuary by David (1 Chron. xxiv. 10). The rendering of the LXX. raises the question whether the חֲ here is not the definite article, in which case the name would be Qols or Koz. The same word occurs Ezra ii. 61; Neh. iii. 4, 21; vii. 63; where the A. V. gives simply Koz. That there was a priestly family bearing this name we learn from 1 Chron. iv. 8.—†

HALACHA. [MIDRASH.]

HALAH (חָלַח; Sept. Ἀλαε and Χαλαε). One of those places in Assyria in which Tiglath-pileser placed the captive Israelites:—'In the ninth year of Hoshea the King of Assyria took Samaria, and carried Israel away into Assyria, and placed them in Halah, and in Habor, the river of Gozan,' etc. (2 Kings xvii. 6; xviii. 11; 1 Chron. v. 26). The position of Halah has been disputed. Ptolemy mentions Calacene, a province of northern Assyria (Geogr. vi. 1), which Bochart would identify with Halah (Opp. i. 194). It seems to be the same place which Strabo calls Calachene, and describes as embracing a section of the great plain of the Tigris around Nineveh (xvi. 1). The name is probably derived from the very ancient city of Calah, whose site is now marked by the mounds of Kalah Sherhat [CALAH]. This city, however, is distinct, as the name would indicate (חָלַח, Halah; חָלַח, Calah), from Halah. Ptolemy mentions another province in Mesopotamia, beside Gausanitis (Gozan), and this appears to be the true Halah (Geogr. v. 18). It lay along the banks of the upper Khabûr, extending from its source at Ras el-Ain, to its junction with the Jeruher. It is worthy of note that one of the mounds, marking the site of an ancient city, on the side of this river, bears the name of Kalah. Here, as in most other places in central and western Asia, we find the primeval name clinging to the ruins of a primeval city. Halah, Habor, and Gozan were situated close together on the left bank of the Euphrates (Rawlinson, Ancient Monarchies, i. 246; Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, 312, note).—J. L. P.

HALAK, THE MOUNT (הַהָר הַחֲלָק; Sept. ὄρος Ἀλάκ, and τοῦ Χελαχά). This name is applied to a mountain on the southern border of Palestine, apparently on account of its bare or bald aspect. It is used by Joshua, as Beersheba was used by later writers, to mark the southern limit of the country—'So Joshua took all that land . . . From the Mount Halak, that goeth up to Seir, even unto Baal-gad in the valley of Lebanon, under Mount Hermon' (xi. 17; xii. 7). The situation of the mountain is here pretty definitely indicated. It adjoins Edom, and lay on the southern border of Palestine; it must, consequently, have been in, or very near, the great valley of the Arabah. The expression, 'that goeth up to Seir' (הַהָר הַחֲלָק שֶׁעוֹר), is worthy of note. Seir is the mountainous province of Edom [SEIR]; and Mount Halak would seem to have been connected with it, as if running up towards it, or joining it to a lower district. About ten miles south of the Dead Sea a line of naked white cliffs, varying in height from 50 to 150 feet, runs completely across the Arabah. As seen from the north the cliffs resemble a ridge of hills (and in this aspect the word חֲלָק may be legitimately applied to them) shutting in the deep valley, and connecting the mountain chain on the west with the mountains of Seir on the east. It is doubtless this ridge which is referred to in Num. xxxiv. 3, 4, and Josh. xv. 2, 3, under the name 'Ascent of Akrabim,' and as marking the south-eastern border of Judah; and it might well be called the bald mountain, which ascends to Seir. It was also a natural landmark for the southern boundary of Palestine, as it is near Kedesh-barnea on the one side, and the northern ridge of Edom on the other. To this ridge bounding the land in the great valley on the south, is very appropriately opposed, on the north, 'Baal-gad in the valley of Lebanon' (Keil on Joshua, xi. 17). The cliffs, and the scenery of the surrounding region, are minutely described by Robinson (Bib. Res., ii. pp. 113, 116, 120).—J. L. P.

HALDANE, ROBERT, Esq., a Scottish gentleman of fortune, who devoted himself to the service of religion, and to Biblical and theological studies. He was born in London 28th Feb. 1764, and died at Edinburgh 12th Dec. 1842. Having resolved to establish a mission for preaching the Gospel in Bengal, he sold his paternal estate of Airthrey, near Stirling, intending to employ the proceeds in furthering this scheme; but obstacles having been put in his way by the Government of the day, he relinquished the attempt, and resolved to employ his efforts and resources in evangelistic labours at home. These he carried on to a large extent in Scotland, aided by his brother, Mr. J. A. Haldane, and a band of devoted men of like mind, some of whom had been clergymen of the national Church. He afterwards devoted himself in the same way in the south of France and Switzerland, and to him instrumentally the revival of religion in these parts is primarily and chiefly due. When at Geneva he delivered lectures on the Epistle to the Romans in French, and these he subsequently published (2 vols. Paris, 1819). This was the commencement of a work which occupied much of his time and thought in his later years, and which he at length issued, in its completed form, in 1842, under the title Exposition of the Epistle to the Romans, 3 vols., 3d edit. He published also Evidences and Authority of Divine Revelation, 2 vols. 8vo, 1834; 3d edition, 3 vols. 12mo, 1843; besides many controversial pamphlets and books. He was a man of a vigorous intellect, with great clearness of perception, power of reasoning, and force of expression. His exposition of the Romans is a masterly work. It is to be viewed rather as a theological than as a philological or strictly exegetical commentary; but so viewed, it may be pronounced a work of the highest order. The author's stringent Calvinism is somewhat too forcibly enunciated, and an occasional air of dogmatism pervades the work; but most competent readers will, we feel persuaded, confess that after perusing it they understand, as they never did before, the train of the Apostle's thought and reasoning in that epistle. The work has been translated into French and German. His brother, Mr. J. A. Haldane, also published an Exposition of the Epistle to the Galatians, 1848; and since his death, which took place in Feb. 1851, an Exposition of the Epistle to the Hebrews, from his pen, has appeared. Neither of these works approach in ability the Exposition of the Romans by the older brother. The two brothers were somewhat differently endowed; but no two men have left a deeper mark on the religious character of their age, both at home and on the Continent, than have they. HALES, WM., A. M., and afterwards D.D., of Trinity College, Dublin, of which he was also sometime Fellow, as well as Professor of Oriental Languages in the University, was born about the middle of the last century, and died A.D. 1831, at his Rectory of Killesandra, in the county of Cavan, and diocese of Kilmore, Ireland. He was an accomplished scholar of very various learning. His earlier publications related almost entirely to mathematical science and were written in Latin; among them occur, 'Sonorum doctrina ex Newtoni scriptis,' and 'De motibus planetarum secundum theoriæ Newtonianam Dissertation.' Besides these he was the author of sundry works connected more or less with religious politics, such as a Treatise On the Political Influence of the Pope's Supremacy. In the year 1807, he issued his Prospectus of an analysis of Ancient Chronology, the harbinger of a work which he had been some time preparing, and for the reputation of which he deserves a place in this Biblical Cyclopædia. In the interim, however, between the issuing of this prospectus and the appearance of the work itself, Dr. Hales, in the year 1808, published his Dissertations on the principal Prophecies respecting the divine and human character of our Lord Jesus Christ. The next year appeared the first instalment, in a 4to volume, of his New Analysis of Chronology; vols. ii., iii., and iv., completing the work, were published respectively in the years 1811, 1812, and 1814. A revised and corrected edition of this elaborate treatise was published in the year 1830, in four volumes 8vo. Dr. Hales' system is a revision of the longer Biblical chronology, based upon the Septuagint, in opposition to the usually received system of Archbishop Ussher, which was founded upon the Masoretic text. In accomplishing his scheme the author relied with greater confidence than is deemed safe, on the aid of Josephus, many of whose leading dates, adulterated as he thought by early editors, in order to make them correspond with the Jewish system, he corrected and modified. On the precarious ground of this part of Dr. Hales' labours the reader will find more information in vol. i. pp. 508, 509, of the present work. Extravagant commendation has been bestowed on Hales' Analysis (see Dr. A. Clark's Commentary [Introd.]; Horne's Introduction [ed. 9] vol. v. p. 465; Watt's Bibliotheca Britan. i. 4570). Inherent defects, however, arising from the author's system, as well as the changes which subsequent discoveries have occasioned in chronological literature, have considerably modified critical opinions respecting the great work of Dr. Hales. Its title in full runs thus—'A new Analysis of Chronology and Geography, History and Prophecy, in which their elements are attempted to be explained, harmonized, and vindicated upon scriptural and scientific principles; tending to remove the imperfection and discordance of preceding systems, and to obviate the cavils of sceptics, Jews, and infidels.' It is in the evolution of this ambitious complexity of purpose, that the author's work is most valuable to the general student; for using all the resources of his undoubtedly great learning he has thrown much light upon many parts of Holy Scripture. Thus, as in the case of many other useful writers, Dr. Hales has produced a work which will be more valued for its collateral subjects than for the success with which it has accomplished its direct purpose. The Geographical portion of the work was designed by the author 'to remedy the imperfection or incorrectness of the explanations of sacred geography as given by Wells, Cellarius, Reland, etc., in several material points;' and it must be admitted that he accomplished his object not only with learning and great resources of illustration, but with an agreeable luminousness of style, which will long secure for his elaborate treatise the favourable attention and respect of the Biblical student.—P. HALHUL (חַלְחֻל; Sept. Ἀλουά; Alex. Ἀλουά).

A town of Judah, mentioned in a group of six lying on the north of Hebron; among which are Gedor and Bethzur (Josh. xv. 58). Jerome describes it as, in his day, a village belonging to the region of Aelia (Jerusalem), near Hebron, and called Alula (Onomast., s.v. Elul). Four miles north of Hebron, and about a mile east of the road leading to Jerusalem, an old mosque, dedicated to Neby Vernas (Prophet Jonah), stands on the top of a hill; and just below it on the eastern slope is the village of Hal-hal, encompassed by fields and fine vineyards. This is unquestionably the ancient Halhul, and both Bethzur and Gedor are within a few miles of it to the north-west. A Jewish traveller of the 14th century (J. Chelo in 1334, Carmoly, p. 242) says it contains the tomb of Gad, David's seer (2 Sam. xxiv. 11; Robinson, Bib. Res. i. 216; iii. 282, seq.) The village was for a time a place of Jewish pilgrimage (Wilson, Lands of the Bible, i. 384). The modern name, حلول, is identical with the Hebrew; and the name has thus remained unchanged for more than 3300 years!—J. L. P.

HALI (הלל; Sept. Ἀλλή; Alex. Ὀλλει). One of the cities mentioned by Joshua, on the border of Ashur (xix. 25). Its position is not stated in Scripture, and we have no other guide to its site. Van de Velde suggests its identity with Alia, a ruin about five hours north-east of Acre, 'where the rock-hewn foundations of a large city are seen' (Memoir, p. 318). But the two names, עלי and הלל, though somewhat similar in sound, are radically distinct.—J. L. P.

HALICARNASSUS (Ἀλικαρνασσοί), a large and strong city of Caria, situated on the Ceramian gulph. In 1 Maccab. xv. 25 it is mentioned as a place where the Jews had settled; and Josephus has preserved a decree of the Romans, by which the Jews at Halicarnassus are allowed the free exercise of all their sacred rites, according to their own laws, and the privilege of τὰς προσευχὰς ποιεῖσθαι πρὸς τῇ θαλάσῃ κατὰ τὸ πάτριον ἔθος (Antiq. xiv. 10. 23; comp. Acts xvi. 13). Halicarnassus made a vigorous and protracted defence against Alexander the Great, which so enraged him that when he at length became master of it he destroyed it by fire—a calamity from which it never recovered.—W. HALL. This word occurs in the A. V. of the N. T. three times; twice (Matt. xxvii. 27; Mark xv. 16) in reference to the πραιτώριον, praetorium, or residence of the Roman governor at Jerusalem, which was either the palace built by the elder Herod, or the tower of Antonia; his usual abode was at Caesarea (Acts xxiii. 23). Mark uses the word αὐλή, but adds, as he is wont in other cases, an explanatory phrase, ὅ ἐστι πραιτώριον, atrium praetorii, Vulg. In Luke xxii. 55, αὐλή means the open court or quadrangle belonging to the high-priest's house, such as was common to Oriental dwellings. It has the same meaning in Matt. xxvi. 69 and Mark xiv. 66, and in both passages is incorrectly rendered Palace in the A. V., as the adverbs ἔξω and εἰς plainly distinguish the αὐλή from the οἶκος to which it was attached (Luke xxii. 54). The αὐλή was entered from the street by a προαύλιον or vestibule (Mark xiv. 68), through a πύλων or portal (Matt. xxvi. 71), in which was a θύρα or wicket (John xviii. 16; Acts xii. 13).—J. HALLEL (הלל, θνος), the designation of a particular part of the hymnal service, chanted in the Temple and in the family on certain festivals.

1. Origin of the name, contents of the service, etc.

The name Hallel (הלל, which signifies praise, is κατ' ἐξοχήν, given to this distinct portion of the hymnal service because it consists of Psalms cxiii.-cxviii., which are Psalms of praise, and because this group of Psalms begins with Hallelujah הלל יהוה. It is also called הלל המצרי, the Egyptian Hallel, because it was chanted in the Temple whilst the Passover lambs, which were first enjoined in Egypt, were being slain. There is another Halla called הלל הגדול, the Great Hallel,* which, according to R.

Jehudah (Pesachim 118) and Maimonides, comprises Psalms cxviii.-cxxxvi. (Iod Ha-Chezaqa, Illichoth Chama u. Maza, viii. 10). Others, however, though agreeing that this Hallel ends with Psalm cxxxvi., maintain that it begins with Psalm cxx. or Psalm cxxxv. 4 (Pesachim 118).

2. Time and manner in which it was chanted. This hymnal service, or Egyptian Hallel, was chanted at the sacrifice of the first and second Pesach, after the daily sacrifice on the first day of Passover (Mishna, Pesachim, v. 7), after the morning sacrifice on the Feast of Pentecost, the eight days of the Feast of Tabernacles (Mishna, Succa, iv. 8), and the eight days of the Feast of Dedication (Mishna, Taanith, v. 5), making in all twenty days in the year. 'On twelve days out of the twenty, viz., at the sacrifice of the first and second Pesach, of the first day of Pesach, of the Feast of Pentecost, and of the eight days of the Feast of Tabernacles, the flute was played before the altar when the Hallel was chanted' (Mishna, Pesachim, ii. 3), whilst after the morning sacrifice during the eight days of the Feast of Dedication, the Hallel was chanted without this accompaniment of the flute. The manner in which these hymns of praise were offered must have been very imposing and impressive. The Levites who could be spared from assisting at the slaying of the sacrifices took their stand before the altar, and chanted the Hallel verse by verse, the people responsively repeated every verse, or burst forth in solemn and intoned Hallelujahs at every pause, whilst the slaves of the priests, the Levites, and the respectable lay people, assisted in playing the flute (comp. Pesachim 64, a; Erachim 10, a, b; and Tosefta on Cap. i.; Sota, 27, b; Taanith 28, a, b). No representatives of the people (אנשי מעמד) were required to be present at the Temple at the morning sacrifices on the days when the Hallel was chanted (Mishna, Taanith, iv. 4).

The Egyptian Hallel was also chanted in private families at the celebration of the Passover on the

* So called, because of the reiterated response after every verse, 'For thy mercy endureth for ever,' in Ps. cxxxvi., which is part of this Hallel.

† The fact that every individual who brought a sacrifice had to be present in the Temple when it was offered, gave rise to the opinion that the daily morning and evening sacrifices which were brought for the whole congregation of Israel, required that the congregation should be represented in the Temple at the offering of these national sacrifices. Hence the whole people was divided into twenty-four divisions or orders, corresponding to the divisions of the priests and Levites. Every division chose a number of representatives (אנשי מעמד), one of whom was appointed chief (המנעם), and in turn sent up some of them as a deputation to Jerusalem to represent the nation at the daily sacrifices in the Temple, and pronounce the prayers and blessings in behalf of the people, whilst the sacrifices were being offered. They had also to fast four days (i. e., the second, third, fourth, and fifth day) during the week of their representation. Those of the representatives who remained at home assembled in a synagogue to pray during the time of sacrifice.

first evening of this feast. On this occasion the Hallel was divided into two parts, the part comprising Ps. cxiii. and cxiv. was chanted during the partaking of the second cup, whilst the second part, comprising Ps. cxv. and cxvi. was chanted over the fourth and finishing cup (רביעי, נומר עליו את) הלל, Mishna, Pesachim x. 7); and it is generally supposed that the singing of the hymn by our Saviour and his disciples at the conclusion of the Passover supper (Matt. xxvi. 30; Mark xiv. 26) refers to the last part of this Hallel.* In Babylon there was an ancient custom, which can be traced as far back as the 2d century of the Christian era, to recite this Hallel on every festival of the new moon (Taanith 28, a), omitting, however, Ps. cxv. 1-11, and cxvi. 1-11.

The great Hallel (הלל הגדול) was recited on the first evening at the Passover supper by those who wished to have a fifth cup, i. e., one above the enjoined number (Maimonides, Jod Ha-Chesaka, Hilchoth Chamez u. Maza, viii. 10). It was also recited on occasions of great joy as an expression of thanksgiving to God for special mercies (Mishna, Taanith iii. 9).

3. Present use of the Hymnal Service.—The Jews to the present day recite the Egyptian Hallel at the morning prayer immediately after the Eighteen Benedictions (שמונה עשרה) on all the festivals of the year except New Year and the Day of Atonement, omitting Ps. cxv. 1-11 and cxvi. 1-11 on the last six days of the Feast of Passover, and on the new moon. Before the Hallel is recited they pronounce the following benediction: 'Blessed art thou, Lord our God, King of the world, who hast sanctified us with thy commandments, and enjoined upon us to recite the Hallel!' At the Passover supper, on the first two evenings of the festival, both the Egyptian Hallel and the Great Hallel are now recited, the former is still divided in the same manner as in the days of our Saviour.

4. Institution of this Hymnal Service.—It is now impossible to ascertain precisely when this service was first instituted. Some of the Talmudists affirm that it was instituted by Moses, others say that Joshua introduced it, others derive it from Deborah, David, Hezekiah, or Hananiah, Mishaël and Azariah (Pesachim 117, a). From 2 Chron. xxxv. 15 we see that the practice of the Levites chanting the Hallel while the Paschal lambs were being slain was already in vogue in the days of Josiah, and it is not at all improbable that it was customary to do so at a much earlier period.

5. Literature.—Maimonides, Jod Ha-Chesaka, Hilchoth Chamez u. Maza, sections vii. and viii. vol. i. p. 263-265; Buxtorf, Lexicon Chaldaicum Talmudicum et Rabbinicum, s. v. הלל, col. 613-616; and Bartolocci, Bibliotheca Magna Rabbinica, vol. ii. 227-243, have important treatises upon this subject, but their information is most uncritically put together, and no distinction is made between earlier and later practices. A thoroughly masterly and critical investigation is that of Krochmal, More Neboche Ha-Seman, Leopoli 1851, p. 135, ff.; comp. also Edelman's edition of the Siddur, with Landshuth's Critical Annotations, HALLELUJAH (הללֵיָהּ) or ALLELUIA (Ἀλληλουῖα), a word which stands at the beginning of many of the Psalms. From its frequent occurrence in this position it grew into a formula of praise, and was chanted as such on solemn days of rejoicing. This is intimated by the Apocryphal book of Tobit (xiii. 18), when speaking of the rebuilding of Jerusalem, 'And all her (Jerusalem's) streets shall sing Alleluia' (comp. Rev. xix. 1, 3, 4, 6). This expression of joy and praise was transferred from the synagogue to the church, and is still occasionally heard in devotional psalmody.

HALLETT, JOSEPH, a learned nonconformist minister born at Exeter in the year 1692. He was the son of Joseph Hallett, one of the pastors of the presbyterian congregation in Exeter, and was the grandson of another Joseph Hallett who was ejected from Chesleborough in Somersetshire by the Act of Uniformity. He was educated for the Christian ministry at a seminary conducted by his father and his father's colleague, J. Pierce; and when, in the year 1719, Messrs. Hallett and Pierce were removed from their pastoral charge in consequence of the avowal of Arian opinions, young Hallett was appointed co-pastor with Pierce over the new congregation assembling in what was called James's Meeting. He died in 1744. In addition to some minor works on controversial topics, he published—1. Index Librorum MSS. Græcorum et Versionum antiquarum Novi Fœderis, quos viri eruditissimi J. Millius et L. Kusterus cum tertia editione Stephanica contulerunt, Lond. 1728, 8vo. This work was published as an aid to the use of Kuster's edition of Mill's New Testament, and contains an account of the several MSS. referred to by these editors. 2. A free and impartial study of the Holy Scriptures recommended, being notes on some Peculiar Texts, with Discourses and Observations, etc., 3 vols., Lond. 1729, 1732, 1736, 8vo. Besides the notes on various texts of Scripture, and some discussions on doctrinal and practical topics, these volumes contain dissertations on the quotations from the O. T. in the Apocrypha; on the Septuagint version; on the errors in the present Hebrew copies of the O. T.; on the original meaning of the ten commandments, and on the Agape or Love Feasts. 3. A Paraphrase, and notes on the three last Chapters of the Epistle to the Hebrews, Lond. 1733, 4to. This was designed to be a supplement to Pierce's paraphrase and notes on this Epistle, a work which had been published in an unfinished state in consequence of the death of its author. Prefixed are two introductory dissertations, one on the authorship, and the other on the language, of the epistle. The former supports the Pauline authorship, and is still valuable for its trustworthy array of historical testimonies, the author having, as he tells us, 'trusted to no second-hand quotations, but taken every passage immediately from the original authors themselves.' In the second dissertation he advocates the opinion of a Hebrew or Syriac original, the translation into Greek being made probably by Luke.—S. N.

HAM or CHAM (חם; LXX. Σαμ; Vulg.

Cham) was one of the three sons of Noah.

Ham's place in his Family. Idolatry connected with his Name.—Like his brothers he was married at the time of the Deluge, and with his wife was saved from the general destruction in the ark which his father had prepared at God's command. He was thus with his family a connecting link between the antediluvian population and those who survived the Flood. The salient fact of his impiety and dishonour to his father has also caused him to be regarded as the transmitter and representative in the renovated world of the worst features of idolatry* and profaneness, which had grown to so fatal a consummation amongst the antediluvians. The old commentators, full of classical associations, saw in Noah and his sons the counterpart of Κρόνος, or Saturn, and his three divine sons, of whom they identified Jupiter or Ζεύς with Ham, especially, as the name suggested, the African Jupiter Ammon (Ἀμμών γάρ [or, more correctly, Ἀμμών, so Gaisford and Baehr], Ἀγῶνιστοι καλέουσι τὸν Δία, Herod. Euterp., 42; Plutarch explains Ἀμμών by the better known form Ἀμμων, Is. et Osir. ix. In Jer. xlvii. 25, 'the multitude of No' is אֲמֹן מִנָּה, Amon of No; so in Nahum iii. 8, 'Populous No' is No-Amon, אֲמֹן נֹחַ. For the identification† of Jupiter Ammon with Ham, see J. Conr. Dannhauer's Politica Biblica, ii. 1; Is. Vossius, de Idol., lib. ii. cap. 7). One of the reasons which leads Bochart (Phaleg. i. 1, ed. Villemand, p. 7) to identify Ham with Jupiter or Zeus, is derived from the meaning of the name. חם (from the root חָמַם, to be hot) combines the ideas hot and swarthy (comp. Ἀΐδης); accordingly St. Jerome, who renders our word by calidus, and Simon (Onomast. p. 103) by niger, are not incompatible. In like manner Ζεύς is derived a servendo, according to the author of the Etymol. Magn., παρὰ τὴν ζέω, θερμότητος γὰρ ὁ ἀήρ, ἢ παρὰ τὸ ζέω, to scethe, or boil, fervere. Cyril of Alexandria uses Σεραφίας as synonymous (l. ii. Glaphyr. in Genes.) Another reason of identification, according to Bochart, is the fanciful one of comparative age. Zeus was the youngest of three brothers, and so was Ham in the opinion of this author. He is not alone in this view of the subject.* Gesenius (Thes. p. 489) calls him 'filius natu tertius et minimus'; similarly Fürst (Hebr. Wörterb. i. 408), Knobel (die Gen. erkl. p. 101), Delitzsch (Comment. über die Gen. p. 280), and Kalisch (Genesis, p. 229), who lays down the rule in explanation of the בְּנֵי חָמֶן applied to Ham in Gen. ix. 24, 'if there are more than two sons, בן נורא, the eldest, בן קטן the youngest son,' and he aptly compares I Sam. xvii. 13, 14. The LXX., it is true, like the A. V., renders by the comparative—ὁ νεώτερος, 'his younger son.' But, throughout, Shem is the term of comparison, the central point of blessing from whom all else diverge. Hence not only is Ham the חָמֶן ὁ νεώτερος, in comparison with Shem, but Japheth is relatively to the same הַנּוֹרָא, ὁ μεῖζων (see Gen. x. 21). That this is the proper meaning of this latter passage, which treats of the age of Japheth, the eldest son of Noah, we are convinced by the consideration just adduced, and our conviction is supported by the LXX. translators, Symmachus, Raschi,† Abenezra, Luther, Junius, and Tremellius, Piscator, Mercerus, Arias, Montanus, Clericus, Dathius, J. D. Michaelis, and Mendelssohn, who gives a powerful reason for his opinion: 'The tonic accents make it clear that the word הַנּוֹרָא, the elder, applies to Yapheth; wherever the words of the text are obscure and equivocal, great respect and attention must be paid to the tonic accents, as their author understood the true meaning of the text better than we do' (De Sola, Lindenthal, and Raphall's Trans. of Genesis, p. 43). In consistency with this seniority of Japheth, his name and genealogy are first given in the Toldoth Beni Noah, of Gen. x. ‡

* Josephus (Antiq. i. 6. 3) expressly calls Ham the youngest of Noah's sons, ὁ νεώτατος τῶν παίδων.

† Raschi says: 'From the words of the text I do not clearly know whether the elder applies to Shem or to Japheth. But as we are afterwards informed that Shem was 100 years old, and begat Arphaxad two years after the deluge (xi. 10), it follows that Japheth was the elder, for Noah was 500 years old when he began to have children, and the deluge took place in his 600th year. His eldest son must consequently have been a hundred years old at the time of the flood, whereas we are expressly informed that Shem did not arrive at that age until two years after the deluge.'

‡ Shem's name stands first, when the three brothers are mentioned together, probably because the special blessing (afterwards to be more fully developed in his great descendant Abraham) was bestowed on him by God. But this prerogative by no means affords any proof that Shem was the eldest of Noah's sons. The obvious instances of

* Lactantius mentions this ancient tradition of Ham's idolatrous degeneracy: 'Ille [Cham] profugus in ejus terrae parte consedit, quæ nunc Arabia nominatur; eaque terra de nomine suo Chanaan dicta est, et posterum ejus Chananæi. Hæc fuit prima gens quæ Deum ignoravit, quoniam princeps ejus [Cham] et conditor cultum Dei a patre non accepit, maledictus ab eo; itaque ignorantiam divinitatis minoribus suis reliquit.' (De orig. erroris, ii. 13; De falsa Relig., 23.) See other authors quoted in Beyer's Addit. ad Seldeni Syntag. de Diis Syris (Ugol. Thes. xxiii. 288). This tradition was rife also among the Jews. R. Manasse says 'חָמֶן בֶּן נֹחַ שִׁמְרָה אֶת אוֹנִים וְנָן', moreover Ham, the son of Noah, was the first to invent idols, etc. The Tyrian idols called חֲמָנִים, Chamanim, are supposed by Kircher to have their designation from the degenerate son of Noah (see Spencer, de legg. Hebr. [ed. Pfaff.] pp. 470-482).

† This identification is, however, extremely doubtful, eminent critics of modern times reject it; among them Ewald (Geschichte des Volkes Israel, i. 375 [note]), who says: 'Mit dem ägyptischen Gotte Amôn oder Hammôn ihn zusammenzubringen hat man keinen Grund,' u. s. w.

[The table, which we present in a genealogical method, will speak for itself. The abbreviations denote the names of the commentators quoted; the italicised words indicate the countries in which the descendants of Ham settled; and the Greek words are those by which Josephus renders the proper names which occur in Ham's history, as he states it, in his Antiq. Jud. i. 4. 1 and 6. 2.]

Descendants of Ham, and their locality.—With the particulars of this important document we have here no further to do than so far as it has relation to the posterity of Ham, i.e., with the second section contained in vers. 6-20. The loose distribution, which assigns ancient Asia to Shem, and ancient Africa to Ham, requires much modification; for although the Shemites had but little connection with Africa, the descendants of Ham had, on the contrary, wide settlements in Asia, not only on the shores of the Syrian, Mediterranean, and in the Arabian peninsula, but (as we learn from linguistic discoveries, which minutely corroborate the letter of the Mosaic statements, and refute the assertions of modern rationalism) in the plains of Mesopotamia. One of the most prominent facts alleged in Gen. x. is the foundation of the earliest monarchy by the grandson of Ham, in Babylonia. ‘Cush [the eldest son of Ham] begat Nimrod . . . the beginning of whose kingdom was Babel [margin, Babylon], and Erech, and Accad, and Calneh, in the land of Shinar’ (vers. 6, 8, 10). Here we have a primitive Babylonian empire distinctly declared to have been Hamitic, through Cush. For the complete vindication of this statement of Genesis from the opposite statements of Bunsen, Niebuhr, Heeren, and others, we must refer the reader to Rawlinson’s Five great Monarchies, vol. i. chap. iii., compared with his Historical Evidences, etc. [Bampton Lectures], pp. 18, 68, 355-357. The idea of an ‘Asiatic Cush’ was declared by Bunsen to be ‘an imagination of interpreters, the child of despair’ (Phil. of Univ. Hist. i. 191). But in 1858 Sir H. Rawlinson having obtained a number of Babylonian documents more ancient than any previously discovered, was able to declare authoritatively, that the early inhabitants of South Babylonia were of a cognate race with the primitive colonists both of Arabia and of the African Ethiopia (Rawlinson’s Herodotus i. 442). He found their vocabulary to be undoubtedly Cushite or Ethiopian, belonging to that stock of tongues which in the sequel were everywhere more or less mixed up with the Semitic languages, but of which we have the purest modern specimens in the Mahra of Southern Arabia and the Galla of Abyssinia (Ibid, note 9). He found also that the traditions both of Babylon and Assyria pointed to a connection in very early times between Ethiopia, Southern Arabia, and the cities on the lower Euphrates. We have here evidence both of the widely-spread settlements of the children of Ham, in Asia, as well as Africa, and (what is now especially valuable) of the truth of the 10th chapter of Genesis, as an ethnographical document of the highest importance.* This is not the place to give full details of the settlement of Ham’s posterity in Asia and Africa. As, however, the subject is of growing interest, and in order to present the reader with a general view of facts, which are spread over many volumes, we propose to collect in a table the various opinions of some leading commentators as to the several countries, which were colonised by the descendants of Ham, referring the reader for our own views of the details to the different articles in this work which are devoted to the subject.

* Some writers push the settlements of Ham still more towards the east; Feldhoff (Die Völkertafel der Genesis, p. 69), speaking generally of them, makes them spread, not simply to the south and south-west of the plains of Shinar, but east and south-east also; he accordingly locates some of the family of Cush in the neighbourhood of the Paropamisus chain [the Hindu Kōosh], which he goes so far as to call the centre whence the Cushites emanated (Vielleicht gar ist der Hindu Kusch

Seth, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Judah, Joseph, Ephraim, Moses, David, and Solomon (besides this of Shem), give sufficient ground for observing that primogeniture was far from always securing the privileges of birthright and blessing, and other distinctions (comp. Gen. xxv. 23; xlviii. 14, 18, 19, and 1 Sam. xvi. 6-12).

I. CUSII (Χούσι) 'reigned over the Ethiopians' [African Cushites], Joseph. ; 'Æthiopia' (vaguely), Jer. (in Quest. Hebr. in Genes.); 'Both the Arabian Ethiopia, which was the parent country, and the African, its colony' [Abyssinia = Cush in Vulg. Syriac], Ros.* after M. ; but these gradations (confining Cush first, with Joseph., to the western shore of the Red Sea, and then, with M. and Ros., extending the nation to the Arabian Peninsula) require further extension ; modern discoveries tally with this most ancient ethnographical record in placing Cush on the Euphrates and the Persian Gulf, R. The earliest empire, that of Nimrod, was Cushite, literally and properly, not per catachresin, as Heeren, Bunsen, and others, would have it, R.† According to V., the term Ethiopian, coextensive with Cush, included even the Hindus ; he seems, however, to mean the Southern Arabians, who were, it is certain, sometimes called Indians,‡ especially the Yemenese ; J. indeed, on the ground of Sanscrit affinities ('Cus or Cush being among the sons of Brahma, i. e., among the als Mutterland aller kuschitischen Stämme), and he peoples the greater part of Hindustan, Birmah, and China, with the posterity of the children of Cush (see under their names in this art.) The late Dr. Prichard (Analysis of the Egyptian Mythology) compares the philosophy and the superstitions of the ancient Egyptians with those of the Hindus, and finds 'so many phenomena of striking congruity' between these nations that he is induced to conclude that they were descended from a common origin. Nor ought we here to omit that the Armenian historian Abulfaragius among the countries assigned to the sons of Ham expressly includes both Scindia and India (by which he means such parts of Hin-

والسند Greg. Abul-Pharagii, Hist. Dynast. [Ed. Pocock, Oxon. 1673], Dyn. i. p. 17.

* When Ros. (Scholia in Gen. in loc.) claims Josephus for an 'Asiatic Cush', as well as an 'African' one, he exceeds the testimony of the historian, who says no more than that 'the Ethiopians of his day called themselves Cushites, and not only they, but all the Asiatics, also gave them that name' (Antiq. i. 6. 2). But Joseph. does not specify what Ethiopians he means : the form of his statement leads to the opposite conclusion rather, that the Ethiopians were Africans merely, excluded from all the Asiatics (ὁπὸ ταυτῶν τε καὶ τῶν ἐν τῇ Ἀσίᾳ πᾶσι), the ταυτῶν referring to the Ἀἰθίοπες just mentioned. (For a better interpretation of Joseph. here, see V. Système Geog. des Hébreux, v. 224.)

† J. (On the Origin and Families of Nations, Works, iii. 202) shows an appreciation of the wide extent of the Cushite race in primæval times, which is much more consistent with the discoveries of recent times than the speculations of the neocritical school prove to be ; 'The children of Ham,' he says, 'founded in Iran (the country of the lower Euphrates) the monarchy of the first Chaldeans, invented letters, etc. etc.' (comp. R. as above quoted).

‡ In Menologio Græco, p. ii. pag. 197. Felix Arabia India vocatur ... ubi felix vocatur India Arabica, ut ab Æthiopica et Gangetica distinguitur.' Assemani Bibl. Orient. iii. (2.) 569.

progenitors of the Hindus, and at the head of an ancient pedigree preserved in the Ramayan'), goes so far as to say, 'We can hardly doubt that the Cush of Moses and Valmiki was an ancestor of the Indian race.' J., however, might have relied too strongly on the forged Purana of Wilford (Asiatic Researches, iii. 432) ; still, it is certain that Oriental tradition largely (though in its usual exaggerated tone) confirms the Mosaic statements about the sons of Noah and their settlements. 'In the Rozit ul Suffah it is written that God bestowed on Ham nine sons,' the two which are mentioned at the head of the list (Hind, Sind, with which comp. Abul. as quoted in one of our notes above), expressly connected the Hindus with Ham, although not through Cush, who occurs as the sixth among the Hamite brethren. See the entire extract from the Khelasut ul Akhbar of Khondemeer in Ros. (Bibl. Geog. append. to chap. 3, vol. i. p. 109 [Bibl. Cab.]) Boh. (Genes. in loc.), who has a long but indistinct notice of Cush, with his Sanscrit predilections, is for extending Cush 'as far as the dark India,' claiming for his view the sanction of Ros., Winer, and Schumann. When Job (xxviii. 19) speaks of 'the topaz of Ethiopia' [פְּתוֹר־יָפֶת], Boh. finds a Sanscrit word in पथरत, and consequently a link between India and Cush [פֶּתֶר, Ethiopia.] He refers to the Syriac, Chaldean, and Saadians versions as having India for Cush, and (after Braun, de Vest. Sacerd. i. 115), assigns Rabbinical authority for it. Assemani, who is by Boh. referred to in a futile hope of extracting evidence for the identification of Cush and India (of the Hindus), has an admirable dissertation on the people of Arabia (Bibl. Or. iii. (2), 552, ff.), one element of the Arab population he derives from Cush (see below). We thus conclude that the children of Ham, in the line of Cush, had very extensive settlements in Asia, as far as the Euphrates and Persian Gulf at least, and probably including the district of the Indus ; while in Africa they both spread widely in Abyssinia, and had settlements apparently among their kinsmen, the Egyptians ; this we feel warranted in assuming on the testimony of the Arabian geographers ; e. g., Abulfeda (in his section on Egypt, tables, p. 110 in the original, p. 151 trans. by Reinaud) mentions a Cush or rather Cus [قوص] as the most important city in Egypt after the capital Fosthaht ; its port on the Red Sea was Cosseyr, and it was a place of great resort by the Mohammedans of the west on pilgrimage. We have dwelt the longer on these particulars about the Cushites, because we wish to give greater prominence to their Asiatic settlements than has been done by some writers ; this we would do and at the same time avoid the extravagance of opinions which (like those of Feldhoff, for instance) cover all Southern Asia to the Pacific with an Hamitic population. We conclude this part of our art. with some remarks of Br. on the enterprise of the Cushites, and the affinity of the primitive Chaldeans and Egyptians, so corroborative of Holy Scripture, — 'The sons of Cush where they once got possession were never totally ejected. If they were at any time driven away, they returned after a time and recovered their ground ; for which reason I make no doubt but many of them in process of time returned to Chaldæa, and mixed with those of their family who resided there. Hence arose the tradition, that the Babylonians not only conquered Egypt, but that the learning of the Egyptians came originally from Chaldaea: and the like account from the Egyptians, that people from their country had conquered Babylon, and that the wisdom of the Chaldeans was derived from them' (On Ancient Egypt, Works, vi. 250).

1. SEBA (Σάβας) is 'universally admitted by critics to be the ancient name for the Egyptian [Nubian] Meroë,' Boh. This is too large a statement; Bochart denies that it could be Meroë, on the assumption that this city did not exist before Cambyzes, relying on the statement of Diodorus and Lucius Ampelius. Joseph. (Antiq. ii. 10), however, more accurately says that Saba 'was a royal city of Ethiopia [Nubia], which Cambyzes afterwards named Meroë, after the name of his sister.' B. would have Seba to be Saba-Mareb in Arabia, confounding our Seba, written with a Samech [סבא], with Sheba [שבא], with a Schin.

Meroë, with the district around it, was no doubt settled by our Seba. (See G. s.v., who quotes Burckhardt, Ruppell, and Hoskins; so C. a L., Ros., and Kal.; Patr. agrees with B.; V. (who differs from B.) yet identifies Seba with the modern Arabian Sabbea; Heeren throws his authority into the scale for the Ethiopian* Meroë; so Kn.) It supports this opinion, that Seba is mentioned in conjunction with the other Nile lands (Ethiopia and Egypt) in Isaiah xliii. 3, and xlv. 14. [The Sheba of Arabia, and our Ethiopian Seba, as representing opposite shores of the Red Sea, are contrasted in Ps. lxxii. 10.] See F. (Volkertafel, 71), who, however, discovers many Sebas both in Africa (even to the south-west coast of that continent) and in Asia (on the Persian Gulf), a circumstance from which he derives the idea that, in this grandson of their patriarch, the Hamites displayed the energy of their race by widely extended settlements.

2. HAVILAH (Εὐλάς), not to be confounded with the son of Joktan, who is mentioned in ver. 29 (as he is by Ros., and apparently by Patr., after B.) Joseph. and Jer., as quoted by C. a L., were not far wrong in making the Gatulians [the people of the central part of North Africa, between the modern Niger and the Red Sea] to be descended from the Cushite Havilah. Kiepert (Bibel-Atlas, 51. I.) rightly puts our Havilah in East Abyssinia, by the straits of Báb-d-Mandeb. Ges., who takes this view, refers to Pliny, vi. 28, and Ptolemy, iv. 7, for the Avalita, now Zeilah, and adds, that Saadias repeatedly renders חוילה by زويلة or زيلة (Zeilah). Boh. at first identifies the two

Havilahs, but afterwards so far corrects himself, as to admit, very properly, that there was probably on the west coast of the Red Sea an Havilah as well as on the east of it—'just in the same way as there was one Seba on the coast of Arabia, and another opposite to it in Ethiopia.'*

3. SABTAH (Σαββάδ, Σαββάδας) is by Joseph., with great probability, located immediately north of the preceding, in the district east of Meroë, between the Astabaras (Tacaze), a tributary of the Nile, and the Red Sea, the country of the Astabari, as the Greeks called them (Σαβαστηνούς ὀνομαζοῦνται δὲ Ἀσταβάροι παρ' Ἑλλήνων, Antiq. i. 6. 2). Kal. quite agrees in this opinion, and Ges. substantially, when he places Sabtah on the south-west coast of the Red Sea, where was the Ethiopian city Σαβάρ. (See Strabo, xvi. p. 770 [ed. Casaub.], and Ptolemy, iv. 10.) Ros., Boh., and Kn., with less propriety, place it in Arabia, with whom agree Del. and Kl., while F., with his usual extravagance, identifies it with Thibet.

4. RAAMAH ('Ρέγμα, 'Ρέγμος) and his two sons Sheba (Σαβās) and Dedan ('Ιου δάδας) are separated by Joseph. and Jer., who place the last-mentioned in West Ethiopia (Αἰθιοπικὸν ἔθνος τῶν Ἑσπερίων, which Jer. translates Gens Ethiopia in occidentali plaga). Ezekiel, however, in xxvii. 20, 22, mentions these three names together in connection with Arabia. According to Niebuhr, who, in his Map of Yemen, has a province called Sabîl, and the town of Sabbea (in long. 43° 30' lat. 18'), the country south of Sabîl abounds with traces of the name and family of Cush. Without doubt, we have here veritable Cushite settlers in Arabia (Assemani Bibl. Oriental. iii. (2.) 554). All the commentators whom we have named (with the exception of F.) agree in the Arabian locality of these grandsons and son of Cush. A belt of country stretching from the Red Sea, opposite the Ethiopian Havilah, to the south of the Persian Gulf, across Arabia, comprises the settlements of Raamah and his two sons. The city called 'Ρέγμα, or 'Ρήγμα, by Ptolemy (vi. 7), within this tract, closely resembles Raamah, as it is written in the original [רעמה]; so does the island Dāden, in the Persian Gulf, resemble the name of one of the sons, Dedan.

5. SABTECHAH (Σαβακαθδ, Σαβακδθας) is by Kal. thought to have settled in Ethiopia, and the form of the word favours the opinion, the other compounds

* Meroë, the capital of Ethiopia, was one of the greatest of African cities. Among the ruins of its temples are those of a magnificent one dedicated to Ammon, the tutelary deity of the Hamitic race. (For details of this great city, see Strabo, xviii. 821; Herod. i. 29; Diod. i. 23; Pliny, ii. 73, etc.; also Heeren, African Nations, i. 335-473, for a full description of its grandeur and commerce and ruins, with plans of the Ammonium, etc.)

* There is no such difficulty as Kal. (Gen. Pref. 93) supposes in believing that occasionally kindred people should have like names. It is not more incredible that there should be a Havilah both in the family of Ham and in that of Shem (Gen. x. ver. 7 comp. with ver. 29) than that there were Enochs and Lamechs among the posterities of both Cain and Seth (comp. Gen. iv. 17, 18, with ver. 18, 25). Kalisch's cumbersome theory of a vast extent of country from the Persian Gulf running to the south-west and crossing the Red Sea, of the general name of Havilah (possessed at one end by the son of Joktan, and at the other by the son of Cush), removes no difficulty, and indeed is unnecessary. There is no 'apparent discrepancy' (of which he speaks, p. 249) in the Mosaic statement of two Havilahs of distinct races; nor any violation of consistency, when fairly judged by the nature of the case. M. and F. strangely flounder about in their opposite conjectures: the former supposes our Havilah to be the land of the Chivalisci, on the Caspian, the latter places it in China Proper, about Pekin (!)

of Sub being apparently of Ethiopic or Kushite origin. * Its obvious resemblance to the Ethiopian name Subatok, discovered on Egyptian monuments (comp. the king MD, in 2 Kings xvii. 4, and the Selechus of Manetho), renders its position in Arabia, or at the Persian Gulf, improbable; but Samyadace, in Gedrosia (as B. supposes), or Tabachosta, in Persia (as Boh. suggests), or Satakor, are out of the question. The Targum Jonathan renders here נִמְרֹד (Zings), which is the Arabic name for the African district Zanguebar, and which is not inappropriate here,* Kal.

6. NIMROD (Νεβρώδης), the mighty founder of the earliest imperial power, and the crindest name,* not only among the children of Ham, but in primeval history, must be reserved to another part of this work [NIMROD] for a detailed description. He is noticed here in his place, in passing, because around his name and exploits has gathered a mass of eastern tradition from all sources, which entirely corroborates the statement of Moses, that the primitive empire of the Chaldeans was Cushite, and that its people were closely connected with Egypt, and Canaan, and Ethiopia. R. (Five Great Mon., chap. iii.) has collected much of this tradition, and shewn that the hints of Herodotus as to the existence of an Asiatic Ethiopia, as well as an African one (iii. 94; vii. 70), and that the traditional belief which Moses of Chorene, the Armenian historian, has, for instance how that Nimrod is in fact Belus, and grandson of Cush by Mizraim (a statement substantially agreeing with that of the Bible), have been too strongly confirmed by all recent researches (among the cuneiform inscriptions) in comparative philology to be set aside by criticism based on the mere conjectures of ingenious men. It would appear that Nimrod not only built cities, and conquered extensive territories, 'subduing or expelling the various tribes by which the country was previously occupied' (R., p. 195; comp. Gen. x. 10-12 [marginal version]), but established a dynasty of some eleven or twelve monarchs. By and by (about 1500 B.C.; see R. p. 223) the ancient Chaldeans, the stock of Cush and people of Nimrod, sank into obscurity, crushed by a foreign Shemitic stock, destined after some seven or eight centuries of submission to revive to a second tenure of imperial power, which culminated in grandeur under the magnificent Nebuchadnezzar.

II. MIZRAIM (Μεσραιμ, Μεσραΐμος), that is, the father of Egypt, is the second son of Cush. Of this dual form of a man's name we have other instances in Ephraim and Shakaraïm (1 Chron. viii. 8). We must, to avoid repetition, postpone particulars of this important name to a future art. [MIZRAIM]. We simply call the reader's attention to the fact, vouched for in this genealogy of the Hamites, of the nearness of kindred between Nimrod and Mizraim. This point is of great value in the study of ancient eastern history, and will reconcile many difficulties which would otherwise be insoluble.

* Nimrod seems to have been deified under the title of Bilu-Nipru, or Bel-Nimrod, which may be translated 'the god of the chase,' or 'the great hunter.' (The Greek forms Νεβρώδ and Νεβρώδ serve to connect Nipru with נִמְרֹד). The native root is thought to be nafar, 'to pursue,' or 'cause to flee'), R. p. 196.

'For the last 3000 years it is to the Semitic and Indo-European races that the world has been mainly indebted for its advancement; but it was otherwise in the first ages. Egypt and Babylon, Mizraim and Nimrod, both descendants of Ham, led the way and acted as the pioneers of mankind in the various untrodden fields of art, literature, and science. Alphabetic writing, astronomy, history, chronology, architecture, plastic art, sculpture, navigation, agriculture, and textile industry, seem, all of them, to have had their origin in one or other of these two countries' (R. p. 75).

Land of Ham.—We shall have no more convenient place than this to notice the poetic terms by which the Psalmist designates Egypt in Ps. cv. 23 ('Jacob sojourned in the land of Ham,' בְּאֶרֶץ חָמ).

חָמ, here parallel and synonymous with מִצְרַיִם, with which comp. ver. 27, and cvi. 22, 23), and in Ps. lxxviii. 51 (where 'the tabernacles of Ham,'

מִצְרַיִם, is again parallel with מִצְרַיִם). That which is in these passages the poetical name of Egypt in Hebrew was among the Egyptians themselves probably the domestic and usual designation of their country (G.) According to G. this name of Ham ['Coptic ΧΗΕΙ,' for which Lepsius, however, substitutes another word, Hee [Memph.] or ΣΗΕ [Thebaic]]* is derived from the swarthy complexion of the people, while Lepsius says, 'not from the colour of its inhabitants, which was red, but from that of its soil, which formed a strong contrast with the adjacent countries (Comp. Herodotus' μελάγλαιον, ii. 12; and Plutarch's Ἀλεξάντρον ἐν τοῖς μάλιστα μελάγγειον οὐσαν . . . Χημία καλοῦσι, De Isid. et Osir. [Reiske] vol. vii. p. 437). In the Hieroglyphic language the name occurs as KM. The inscription of it, as it frequently occurs on the Rosetta stone, is pronounced by Champollion, Akerblad, and Spohn, Chmé (G. Theb. 489). The name by which Egypt is commonly called in Hebrew, מִצְרַיִם (מִצְרַיִם) should probably be translated Egypt in 2 Kings xix. 24; Is. xix. 6; xxxvii. 25; and Micah vii. 12; Ges. and Fürst, s. v.), was not used by the Egyptians (Baehr, Herodot. note, in l. c.), but by Asiatics it appears to have been much used of the land of the Nile, as is evident from the cuneiform inscriptions.

* What G. calls Coptic Lepsius designates by the now more usual term Memphitic: G. adds the Sahidic (Lepsius' Thebaic) form of our word KHEE (from KHEE, niger); but Lepsius denies that the name of Egypt, Ham (חָמ), has 'any direct connection' with this word; he substitutes the root Hee, or Hee [Memphitic], which is softened into Σεε, or ΣΗε, Hem, in the sister dialect of Thebes; the meaning of which is to be hot ('fervere, ardere,' Tattam, Lex. Egypt. Lat. p. 653, 671). ΧΗΕΙ, however, and KHEE, are, no doubt, the constantly used terms for the name of the country (see Tattam, pp. 155, 560, and Uhlemann, Copt. Gr. & Lex. p. 154).

The Median form of the name was Mitzariga; the Babylonian Mizir; the Assyrian Muzri. The Arabic name of the present capital of Egypt is El Maar, and the country also is مصر [Misr.]

(Sir H. Rawlinson, Jour. R. As. Soc. vol. xiv. (1.) p. 18; Lepsius, in Herzog, s. v. Egypt). Josephus (Antiq. i. 6. 2) renders the Hebrew name of Egypt by Μέστρη, and of the people by Μεστραίοι. Whether, however, we regard the native name from the father, or the Asiatic from the son, they both vouch for the Hamitic character of Egypt, which probably differed from all the other settlements of this race in having Ham himself as the actual ἀρχηγός of the nation, among whom also he perhaps lived and died. This circumstance would afford sufficient reason both why the nation itself should regard the father as their eponymus, rather than the son, who only succeeded him in the work of settlement, and why, moreover, foreigners with no other interest than simply to distinguish one Hamitic colony from another, should have preferred for that purpose the name of the son, which would both designate this particular nation, and at the same time distinguish it from such as were kindred to it. On the sons of Mizraim we must be brief; Josephus noticed the different fortune which had attended the names of the sons and of the grandsons of Ham, especially in the family of Mizraim; for while 'time had not hurt' the former, of the latter he says (Antiq. i. 6. 2), 'we know nothing but their names.' Jer. (who in these points mostly gives us only the echo of Joseph.) says similarly: 'ceteræ sex gentes ignotæ sunt nobis... quæ usque ad oblivionem præteritorum nominum pervenerunt.' They both, indeed, except two names from the obscurity which had oppressed the other six, Labim and Philistim, and give them 'a local habitation with their name.' What this is we shall notice soon; meanwhile we briefly state such identifications of the others as have occurred to commentators.

1. LUDIM (Λουδιεῖς)* is not to be confounded with Shem's son Lud (ver. 22), the progenitor of the Lydians. The Ludim are often mentioned in Scripture (Is. lxi. 19; Jer. xlv. 9; Ezek. xxvii.

* Joseph., it will be observed, renders all these plural Hebrew names by singular forms. These plurals seem to indicate clans speaking their own languages (comp. ver. 20, which surmounts our table), centered around their patriarch, from whom, of course, they derived their gentile name; thus, Ludim from Lud; Pathrusim from Pathros, etc. (F. p. 94). L. notices the fact of so many nations emerging from Egypt, and spreading over Africa (Asie occidentale, p. 244), for he understands these names to be of peoples, not individuals; so Michaelis, Spicileg. 254, who quotes Aben Ezra for the same opinion. Aben Ezra, however, does not herein represent the general opinion of the Jewish doctors. The relative כִּסְמִים אֲשֶׁר misled him; he thought it necessarily implied locality, and not a personal antecedent. Mendelssohn declares him wrong in this view, and refers to Gen. xlix. 24; 'It is probable (he adds) that Ludim and the other names were those of men, who gave their names to their descendants. Such was the opinion of Raschi, etc.,' who takes the same view as the old Jewish historian.

10; xxx. 5) as a warlike nation, skilled in the use of spear and bow, and seem to have been employed (much as the Swiss have been) as mercenary troops (G.'s Iesaia, iii. 311). B. (who placed Cush in Arabia) reserved Æthiopia for these Ludim; one of his reasons being based on their use of the bow, as he learns of Herod., Strabo, Heliodor., and Diod. Sicul. But the people of North Africa were equally dexterous in this implement of war; we have therefore no difficulty in connecting the Ludim with the country through which the river Lud or Laud ran (Pliny, v. 2), in the province of Tingitania (Tangier); so Boh., D., and F., which last writer finds other names of cognate origin in North Africa, e. g., the tribe called Ludaya, inhabiting one of the oases, and the district of Ludamar, in Nigritia. Kal. suggests the Egyptian Letopolis or Letus, and Cl. the Mareotis of Egypt; while Kl. supposes the Berber tribe Lewdath; and L. (L'Asie Occid. p. 244) the Nubians; they think a proximity to Egypt would be most compatible with the fact that the Ludim were Egyptian auxiliaries (Jer. xlv. 9).

2. AMAMIM (Ἀμαμῖμοι) are, with unusual unanimity, placed by the commentators in Egypt. C. represents the older opinion, quoting Jonathan's Targ. for the Mareotis. Kn. (with whom agree D., Kl., F.) places them in the Delta, the LXX. rendering Ἐνεμεριεμ suggesting to him Sanemhit, the Egyptian word for north country. The word occurs nowhere else in O. T.

3. LEHABIM (Λαβιέμ, Λαβίμοι) is, with absolute unanimity, including even Jer. and Joseph. [who says, Λ. τοῦ κατοικήσαντος ἐν Αἰθίῳ καὶ τὴν χώραν ἀπ' αὐτοῦ καλεῖσάντος], identified with the shorter word לִבִּים, Lubim, in 2 Chron. xii. 3; xvi. 8; and again in Nahum iii. 9; Dan. xi. 43. They are there the Libyans; B. limits the word to the Libyaegyptii, on the west frontier of Egypt, so Kn. The Hebrew word has been connected (by B.)

with לִהְבָּה, and the plur. of לִהְבָּה, which means flame; Raschi supposing that they are so called 'because their faces were inflamed with the sun's heat' [Is. xlii. 8] from their residence so near the torrid zone. Hitzig's idea that the Lehabim may be Nubians is also held* by L. (L'Asie Occid. p. 244).

4. NAPHTUHIM (Νέφθυμοι), according to B. and Ros., should be identified with Nephtys in the north of Egypt; Boh. suggests the Nobatae in Libya; C. a L. the Numidians; Patr. (after Grotius) Nepata, in Ethiopia; but none of these opinions appear to us so probable as that of Kn., who thus vindicates for the Memphitic, or Middle Egyptians, the claim to be the Naphtuhim. Memphis was the chief seat of the worship of ΠΤΔΘ,

* L.'s opinion is based upon the general principle entertained by him, that, as Cush peopled Æthiopia, and Phut Libya, and Canaan Phanicia; so to Mizraim must be appropriated Egypt, or (at least) the vicinity of that country. There is some force in this view, although the application of it in the case of the Lehabim need not confine his choice to Nubia. Libya, with which the name is associated by most writers since Josephus, is contiguous to Egypt, on its western frontier, and would answer the conditions as well as Nubia.

(Phthah) an Egyptian deity. If the plural possessive particle ΠΔ (na = ol τοῦ, Uhlemann, sec. 14.

1) be prefixed, we get the word ΠΔ-ΠΤΔΘ, the people of Phthah, ol τοῦ Φθάρ, just as the Moabites are designated the people of Chemosh (Num. xxi. 29; Jer. xlviii. 46), and the Hebrews the people of Jehovah (Ezek. xxxvi. 20).

5. PATHRUSIM (Φεθρῳσίμος) are undoubtedly the people of Upper Egypt, or the Thebaid, of which the capital Thebes is mentioned, under the name of No and No-Amon, in Nahum iii. 8; Ezek. xxx. 14-16; and Jer. xvi. 25. Pathros is an Egyptian name, signifying the South country [ΠΕΤ-ΡΗC], which may possibly include Nubia also; in Is. xi. 11, and probably Jer. xiv. 15, Pathros is mentioned as distinct from, though in close connection with, Egypt. By Greek and Roman writers the Thebaid is called Nomus Phaturites (Pliny, Hist. Nat. v. 9; Ptol. iv. 5, 69), B., Boh., D., Kal., Kl., Kn. Brugsch's suggestion, that our word comes from Pa-Nathor, that is, the Nome of Nathor, an Egyptian deity of the nether world, is an improbable one.

6. CASLUHIM (Χεσλοῖμος). In addition to what is said under the article CASLUHIM, it may be observed that the Coptic [Basmuric] name of the district called Casiotis, which Ros. writes

Chadsaieloihe, is compounded of ΘHC, mons, and ΛΩΚΞ, ardere, arere, and well indicates a rugged and arid country, out of which a colony may be supposed to have emigrated to a land called so nearly after their own home. [Comp. ἡλῶρ and ΘHCΛΩΚΞ (Cheslokhe) and Κολχίς, with the metathesis which Gesenius suggests.] This proximity to south-west Palestine of their original abode also exactly corresponds to the relation between these Casluhim and the next mentioned people, expressed in the parenthetical clause: 'Out of whom came Philistim' (Gen. x. 14); i. e., the Philistines were a colony of the Casluhim, probably drafted off into the neighbouring province in consequence of the poverty of their parental home, the very cause which we may suppose impelled some of the Casluhim themselves to seek a more favourable settlement on the south-east shore of the Black Sea, in Colchis.

PHILISTIM (Φιλιστινός), who, according to Joseph., suggested to the Greeks the name of Palestine. Of this well known Hamite people we do not propose to treat; a proper opportunity will occur in a future page [PHILISTINES]. We must, however, advert to the various readings of the Hebrew text suggested by M. (Spicleg. p. 278), who, after Raschi and Masius, would transpose the sentence thus: וְעַל כָּל אֲרָצוֹת כְּנָעַן וְעַל כָּל אֲרָצוֹת חֵט, that is, 'And Casluhim, and Caphthorim (out of whom came Philistim)'. This transposition makes Caphthorim the origin of the Philistines, according to Amos ix. 7, and perhaps Deut. ii. 23; Jer. xlvii. 4. Ros., G., and Boh., assent to this change, but there is no authority for it either in MSS., Targums, or Versions: and another rendering of the passage, 'Out of whom came Philistim and Caphthorim,' is equally without foundation. In the Hebrew text, as well as the Targums and the LXX., Philistim alone appears as a subject, all the other proper names (including the last, Caphthorim) have the objective sign לְ, לָ, and טֹוֹס. This is decisive.

7. CAPHTHORIM (Χεφθόρμιος) by Onkelos is rendered קַפְּתוֹרִי, 'Cappadocians'; in the Peshito ܠܗܝܬܐܝܢ, also 'Cappadocians.' So the other Targums, and (according to C.) 'veteres omnes ac recentiores stant pro Cappadocibus.' [CAPTHOR.] In support of the opinion advanced concerning the Caphthorim in this article, it may be observed that in the Mishna (Cethuboth [Surenh.], iii. 103), the very word of the Targum, קַפְּתוֹרִי, Cappadocia, repeatedly occurs; and (wha' escaped the notice of B.) Maimonides, an excellent authority in Egyptian topography, and Bartenora, both in their notes explain this Caphthorkaja to be Caphthor, and identify it with Damiatta in the north of Egypt, in the immediate vicinity of that Casiotis where we placed the primitive Casluhim.* It may be added, as some support to our own opinion, that Benjamin of Tudela says (Asher, p. 158; Bohm, pp. 121, 123), 'Damiatta is Caphthor in Scripture.' When the learned editors correct their honest old author on the strength of Ros. and G.'s criticism, we demur, resting on the still greater authority of Maimonides and Bartenora, to say nothing of Onkelos and the Arabic translator.

III. PHUT (Φούτης), the third son of Ham, is thus noticed by Joseph. (Antiq. i. 6. 2); 'Phut was the founder of Libya; he called the inhabitants Phutites, after himself; there is a river in the country of the Moors which bears that name: whence it is that we may see the greatest part of the Grecian historiographers mention that river and the adjoining country by the appellation of Phut; but its present name has been given it from one of the sons of Mizraim, who was called Libys [the progenitor of the Lehabim].' Jer. of course adopts this view, which has also been endorsed by B., M., Ros., G., Boh., D., Kl., and Kal. The versions corroborate it also, for in Jer. xlv. 9 [Sept. xxvi. 9] לִיבִי (Phut) is rendered 'Libyans' in A. V.; Libyes in Vulgate; and Albues in the Septuagint. Similarly the לִיבִי of Ezek. xxx. 5 is Libya in A. V.; Libyes in Vulg.; and Albues in Sept. (so xxxviii. 5).

* It is agreeable to the Egyptian locality which we have assigned to the Caphthorim, that Joseph. says, in general terms, of Mizraim's sons, amongst whom he includes 'Philistim,' making them eight in number:—Τῶν δὲ Μεστράιμου παίδων ὀκτὼ γενομένων, οἱ πάντες τὴν ἀπὸ Γάζης ἑστὴν Ἀιγύπτου γῆν κατέσχον· μόνον δὲ Φυλιστινὸν τὴν ἑταιρικήν ἢ χώραν διεφύλαξε. It will be observed that we have, in fact, on independent grounds, well nigh included all these cognate races within the bounds here set them by the historian. The Ludim and the Lehabim are the only exceptions; and with respect to the latter of these, Josephus must be regarded as intimating his belief that, if they were primevally settled somewhere, with their brethren, between Gaza and Egypt, they must at least have subsequently migrated further west, for when speaking of Phut he uses language which implies that the descendants of Libys (i. e., the Lehabim) were connected with Africa to the west of Egypt. In Nahum iii. 9, Phut and Lubim are associated; probably they were inhabitants together of the same district.

Like some of their kindred races, the children of Phut are celebrated in the Scriptures 'as a warlike, well-armed tribe, sought as allies, and dreaded as enemies'—(Kal.) PHUT means a bow; and the nation seems to have been skilled in archery, according to the statements of the Bible. We may add, in confirmation of the preceding view of the locality of Phut, that the Coptic name of Libya, nearest to Egypt, was Phaiat. The supposition of Hitzig that Phut was Πούτεια, west of Libya on the north coast of Africa, and of Kal. that it might have been Buto, the capital of the Delta, on the south shore of the Butic lake, are unlikely to find much acceptance by the side of the universal choice of all the chief writers, which we have indicated above. (Pliny, Nat. Hist. v. i., has mentioned the river, referred to by Joseph., as the Fut [or Phuth], and Ptolemy, in like manner, as the Φούδς, iv. 1. 3; comp. M. Spicileg. i. 160, and Winer, Bibl. R. W. B. ii. 291). It must be admitted that Joseph. and those who have followed him are vague in their identification. Libya was of vast extent; as, however, it extended to the Egyptian frontier,* it will, perhaps, best fulfil all the conditions of the case, keeping in view the military connection which seems to have existed between Phut and Egypt, if we deposit the posterity of Phut in eastern Libya contiguous to Egypt, not pressing too exactly the statement of Joseph., who probably meant no more, by his reference to the country of the Moors, and the river Phut, than the readily allowed fact that in the vast and unexplored regions of Africa might be found traces, in certain local names, of this ancient son of Ham.

IV. CANAAN (Χανανος), the youngest of the sons of Ham, will not require so full a treatment from us here (either in respect of his own name or those of his sons) as Ham's other posterity has demanded; because less obscurity besets the subject, and less doubt and discrepancy of opinion affect the commentators. 'Canaan, the fourth son of Ham,' says Joseph. (Antiq. i. 6. 2), 'inhabited the country now called Judæa' [τὴν νῦν καλουμένην Ἰουδαίαν]. In the time of Joseph., it must be recollected, this included the entire country which we loosely call the Holy Land], 'and called it after his own name, Canaan.' This country is more distinctly described than any other in Holy Scripture, and in the record of Ham's family in Gen. x., its boundary is sketched (see verse 19), excluding the district east of the Jordan. The name Canaan, however, is used

* The only objection to this is that this part of the country has been already assigned to the Lehabim (see above). To us, however, it seems sufficient to obviate this difficulty to hold that while the Lehabim impinged on the border of Upper Egypt, the children of Phut were contiguous to Lower Egypt, and extended westward along the north coast of Africa, and into the very interior of the continent. Phut was no doubt of much greater extent than the Lehabim, who were only a branch of Mizraim; for it will be observed that in the case of Phut, unlike his brothers, he is mentioned alone without children. Their settlements are included in the general name of their father Phut, without the subdivisions into which the districts colonised by his brothers' children were arranged. The designation, therefore, of Phut is generic; of Ludim, Lehabim, etc., specific, and in territory limited.

sometimes in a more limited sense than is indicated here and elsewhere. Thus, in Num. xiii. 29, 'the Canaanites' are said to 'dwell by the sea and by the coast of the Jordan' [i.e., obviously in the lowlands, both maritime and inland], in opposition to the Hittites and others who occupy the highlands. This limitation probably indicates the settlements of Canaan only—as a separate tribe, apart from those of his sons—afterwards to be enumerated (comp. for a similar limitation of a more extensive name, Cæsar, de Bel. Gall. i. 1, where Gallia has both a specific and a generic sense; comp. also the specific as well as generic meaning of Angle or Engle in the Saxon Chronicle (Gibson, p. 13; Thorpe, i. 21) 'of Angle comon . . . East Engla, Middeld Engla'). On the much-veiled questions of the curse of Noah (who was the object of it, and what was its extent?) we cannot treat; they hardly come within the range of such a work as this. What we have already discovered, however, of the power, energy, and widely-spread dominion of the sons of Ham, whom we have hitherto mentioned, offers some guidance to the solution of at least the latter question. The remarkable enterprise of the Cushite hero, Nimrod; his establishment of imperial power, as an advance on patriarchal government; the strength of the Egypt of Mizraim, and its long domination over the house of Israel; and the evidence which now and then appears that even Phut (who is the obscurest in his fortunes of all the Hamite race) maintained a relation to the descendants of Shem, which was far from servile or subject: do all clearly tend to limit the application of Noah's maledictory prophecy to the precise terms in which it was indited; 'Cursed be Canaan; a servant of servants shall he [not Cush, not Mizraim, not Phut; but he] be to his brethren' (Gen. ix. 25); 'that is,' says Aben Ezra, 'to Cush, Mizraim, and Phut, his father's sons'—with remarkable inattention to the context: 'Blessed be the Lord God of Shem, and Canaan shall be his servant. God shall enlarge Japhet . . . and Canaan shall be his servant' (vv. 26, 27). If we, then, confine the imprecation to Canaan, we can without difficulty trace its accomplishment in the subjugation of the tribes, which issued from him, to the children of Israel from the time of Joshua to that of David. Here would be verified Canaan's servile relation to Shem; and when imperial Rome finally wrested 'the sceptre from Judah' and ('dwelling in the tents of Shem') occupied the east and whatever remnants of Canaan were left in it: would not this accomplish that further prediction that Japhet too should be lord of Canaan, and that (as it would seem to be tacitly implied), mediately, through his occupancy of 'the tents of Shem'? We proceed to enumerate the sons of Canaan, and their localities.

1. SIDON (Σιδὼν δ' ὕψ' Ἑλλήνων καὶ νῦν καλεῖται, Joseph. Antiq. i. 6. 2), founded the ancient metropolis of Phœnicia, the renowned city called after his own name, and the mother-city of the still more celebrated Tyre: on the commercial enterprise of these cities, which reached even to the south of Britain, see SIDON, TYRE.

2. HETH (Χετταῖος) was the father of the well-known Hittites, who lived in the south of Palestine around Hebron and Beersheba; in the former of which places the family sepulchre of Abraham was purchased of them (Gen. xxiii. 3). Esau married 'two daughters of Heth,' who gave great sorrow to their husband's mother (Gen. xxvii. 46).

3. The JEBUSITE (Ἰεβουσαῖος) had his chief residence in and around Jerusalem, which bore the name of the patriarch of the tribe, the son of Canaan, Jebus. The Jebusites lost their stronghold only in the time of David.

4. The AMORITE (Ἀμορρᾱῖος) seems to have been the largest and most powerful of the tribes of Canaan. [The name 'Amorites' frequently denotes the inhabitants of the entire country.] This tribe occupied portions of territory on both sides of the Jordan, but its strongest hold was in 'the hill country' of Judah, as it was afterwards called.

5. The GIRGASITE (Γιργασαῖος) cannot be for certain identified. [Origen conjectured that the Girgasites might be the Gergesenes of Matt. viii. 18.]

6. The HIVITE (Εβᾱῖος?) lived partly in the neighbourhood of Shechem, and partly at the foot of Hermon and Lebanon.

7. The ARKITE (Ἀρουκαῖος)* lived in the Phœnician city of Arke, north of Tripolis. Under the emperors of Rome it bore the name of Cæsarea [Libani]. It was long celebrated in the time of the Crusades. Its ruins are still extant at Tel. Arka (Burckhardt, Syria, p. 162).

8. The SINITE (Σιναιος) probably dwelt near his brother, the Arkite, on the mountain fortress of Sinās, mentioned by Strabo (xv. 755), and by St. Jerome.

9. The ARVADITE (Ἀρवादῖος) is mentioned by Joseph. as occupying an island which was very celebrated in Phœnician history. (Strabo describes it in xvi. 753; see vol. i. p. 237 of this Cyclopædia.) 'The men of Arvad' are celebrated by Ezekiel xxvii. 8, 11.

10. The ZEMARITE (Σαμαραῖος) inhabited the town of Simyra (Σίμυρα, mentioned by Strabo), near the river Eleutherus, at the western extremity of the mountains of Lebanon; extensive ruins of this city are found at the present day bearing the name of Sumrah.

11. The HAMATHITE (Ἀμαθῖος). 'The entering in of Hamath' indicates the extreme northern frontier of the Holy Land, as 'the river of Egypt' does its southernmost limit (1 Kings viii. 65 et passim).

In the verse following the enumeration of these names, the sacred writer says—'Afterward were the families of the Canaanites spread abroad.' This seems to indicate subsequent conquests made by them previous to their own subjugation by the Israelites. 'To show the great goodness of God towards Israel,' says the Jewish commentator Mendelssohn, 'Moses records in Gen. x. the original narrow limits of the land possessed by the Canaanites, which they were permitted to extend by conquest from the neighbouring nations, and that (as in the case of the Amorite Sihon, Num. xxi. 26) up to the very time when Israel was ready to take possession of the whole. To prepare his readers for the great increase of the Canaanite dominions, the sacred historian (in this early chapter where he mentions their original boundaries) takes care to state that subsequently to their primitive occupation of the land, 'the families of the Canaanites spread abroad,' until their boundaries became such as are described in Num. xxiv.'

General Remarks. Such were Ham and his family; notwithstanding the stigma which claved that section of them, which came into the nearest relation to the Israelites afterwards, they were the most energetic of the descendants of Noah in the early ages of the postdiluvian world—at least we have a fuller description of their enterprise than of their brethren's as displayed in the primitive ages. The development of empire among the Euphratean Cushites was a step much in advance of the rest of mankind in political organization; nor was the grandson of Ham less conspicuous as a conqueror. The only coherent interpretation of the important passage which is contained in Gen. x. 10-12, is that which is adopted in the margin of A. V. After Nimrod had laid the foundation of his empire ('the beginning of his kingdom,' רֵאשִׁית מַמְלָכְתּוֹ, the territory of which it was at first composed—cf. Hos. ix. 10, 'as the first ripe in the fig-tree בְּרִאשִׁיתָהּ at her first time,' that is, when the tree first begins to bear—Ges.) in his native Shinar, not satisfied with the splendid acquisitions which he took at first, no doubt, from his own kinsmen, he invaded the north-eastern countries, where the children of Shem were for the first time disturbed in their patriarchal simplicity: 'Out of that land [even Shinar, Nimrod] went forth to† Asshur [or Assyria], and builded Nineveh and the city Rehoboth and Calah and Resen, between Nineveh and Calah; the same is a great city; i. e., the combination of the forementioned four formed, with their interjacent spaces, the 'great city.' This is the opinion of Knobel, answering to the theory which has connected the ruins of Khorsabad, Kōyunjik, Nimrud, and Keremlis together, as the remains of a vast quadrilateral city, popularly called Nineveh. For a different view of the whole subject the reader is referred to Mr Rawlinson's recent volume on The Five Great Monarchies, vol. i. pp. 311-315). But the genius, which moulded imperial power at first, did not avail to retain it long; the sceptre, before many ages, passed to the race of Shem,†

* The objection to this rendering is based by Rosenmüller (Schol. in loc.), after other commentators, on the absence of the ה local appended to אֲשׁוּר (which they say ought to be אֲשׁוּרָה to produce the meaning to Assyria. The ה local is, however, far from indispensable for the sense we require, which has been advocated by authorities of great value well versed in Hebrew construction; Knobel (who himself holds our view) mentions Onkelos, Targ. Jonath, Bochart, Clericus, De Wette, Tuch, Baumgarten, Delitzsch, as supporting it. He might have added Josephus, who makes Nimrod the builder of Babylon (Antiq. i. 4), and Kalisch, and Keil. To make the passage, Gen. x. 10-12, descriptive of the Shemite Asshur, is to do violence to the passage itself and its context. Asshur, moreover, is mentioned in his proper place in ver. 22, without, however, the least indication of an intention of describing him as the founder of a rival empire to that of Nimrod. Gesenius admits the probability of our view, without any objection of grammatical structure. (See, for instances of the accus. noun (without the suffix of local ה) after verbs of motion. Numb. xxxiv. 4; Gen. xxxiii. 18; 2 Chron. xx. 36. Cf. Gesenius, Gram. 130, 172, and Nordheimer's Gram., sec. 841.)

except in Africa, where Mizraim's descendants had a longer tenure of the Egyptian monarchy. It is well to bear in mind (and the more so, inasmuch as a different theory has here greatly obscured plain historic truth) that in the primeval Cushite empire of Babylon considerable progress was made in the arts of civilised society (an early allusion to which is made in Josh. vii. 21; and a later in Dan. i. 4: see Rawlinson, First Monarchy, chap. v.) In the genealogical record of the race of Ham (Gen. x.), reference is made to the 'tongues' [or dialects] which they spoke (ver. 20). Comparative philology, which is so rich in illustrations of the unity of the Indo-Germanic languages, has done next to nothing to elucidate the linguistic relations of the families of Ham. Nor is this the proper place to do more than merely point to the vast unexplored field which is now opening to inquirers. It is obvious to remark that, as the classification, which the sacred writer makes in chap. x. includes the element of various 'tongues' or dialectic variations amongst this section of the human race, the time to which we must refer it must be subsequent to the events spoken of in the beginning of the next chapter (xi.) as having happened when 'the whole earth was of one language and of one speech.' With regard to these Hamitic 'tongues,' without detaining the reader with speculations which must needs be crude, we will direct him to the few works which are the most accessible and best qualified to furnish him with some hints for the formation of an opinion. Rawlinson, Five Great Monarchies, First Mon. ch. iv.; Lenormant, Introduction à l'histoire de l'Asie occidentale, 1^{re} Appendice; Meier, Hebr. Wurzel. zw. b., 3^{te} Anhang; Gesenius, Sketch of the Hebr. Lang. (prefixed to his Grammar); Bunsen, Egypt's Place, etc., vol. i. App. 1; Wiseman, Lectures on Science and Revealed Religion, p. 445, 2d ed.; Max Müller, Science of Language, p. 269 [SHEMITIC LANGUAGES].

Theories more or less specious have been formed to account for these affinities to the Hebrew from so many points of the Hamite nations. None of these theories rise above the degree of precarious hypothesis, nor could it be expected that they should in the imperfection of our present knowledge. It is, indeed, satisfactory to observe that the tendency of linguistic inquiries is to establish the fact avouched in the Pentateuch of the original unity of human speech. The most conspicuous achievement of comparative philology, hitherto, has been to prove the affinity of the members of that large class of languages which extend from the Eastern Sanscrit to our Western Welsh; parallel to this is the comparison among themselves of the various members of the Shemitic class of languages, which has demonstrated their essential identity; but greater still will be the work of establishing, on certain principles, the natural relationship of tongues of different classes. Among these, divergences must needs be wider; but when occasional affinities crop out they will be proportionately valuable as evidences of a more ancient and profound agreement.

tribes who crushed the primitive Cushite power of Babylon, see Rawlinson, Great Empires, vol. i. pp. 222, 223. The Arabian Hamites of Yemen seem also to have merged, probably by conquest, into a Joktanite population of Shemitic descent (see for these Gen. x. 25-29, and Assemani Bibl. Orient. iii. (2) 553, 544).

It seems to us that the facts, which have thus far transpired, indicative of affinity between the languages of the Hamite and Shemitic races, go some way to shew the probability of the historical and genealogical record of which we have been treating, that the tribes to whom the said languages were vernacular were really of near kindred and often associated in abode, either by conquest or amicable settlement, with one another.

Among other points of general interest connected with our article, the reader will not fail to observe the relations in which the different sections of the Hamite race stand to each other; e.g., it is important to bear in mind that the Philistines were not Canaanites, as is often assumed through an oversight of the fact, that the former were descended from the second, and the latter from the fourth son of Ham. The Toldoth Beni Noah of Genesis is a precious document in many respects (as has been often acknowledged, see R. [Bampton Lectures], p. 68); but in no respect does it bear a higher value than as an introduction, provided by the sacred writer himself, to the subsequent history of the Hebrew nation in its relations to the rest of mankind. The intelligent reader of Scripture will experience much help in his study of that history, and indeed of prophecy also, by a constant recurrence to the particulars of this authoritative ethnological record.

We conclude this article with an extract from Mr. Rawlinson's Five Great Monarchies, which describes, in a favourable though hardly exaggerated light, some of the obligations under which the primitive race of Ham has laid the world: 'Not possessed of many natural advantages, the Chaldaean people yet exhibited a fertility of invention, a genius, and an energy, which place them high in the scale of nations, and more especially in the list of those descended from the Hamitic stock. For the last 3000 years the world has been mainly indebted for its advancement to the Semitic and Indo-European races; but it was otherwise in the first ages. Egypt and Babylon, Mizraim and Nimrod—both descendants of Ham—led the way and acted as the pioneers of mankind in the various untrodden fields of art, literature, and science. Alphabetic writing, astronomy, history, chronology, architecture, plastic art, sculpture, navigation, agriculture, textile industry—seem, all of them, to have had their origin in one or other of these two countries. The beginnings may have been often humble enough. We may laugh at the rude picture-writing, the uncouth brick pyramid, the coarse fabric, the homely and ill-shapen instruments, as they present themselves to our notice in the remains of these ancient nations; but they are really worthier of our admiration than of our ridicule. The first inventors of any art are among the greatest benefactors of their race . . . and mankind at the present day lies under infinite obligations to the genius and industry of these early ages' (pp. 75, 76).—P. H.

HAM, THEY OF (חָמִי; Sept. 'Εκ τῶν υἱῶν Χάμ; Vulg., De stirpe Cham), are mentioned in 1 Chron. iv. 40—in one of those historical fragments for which the early chapters of these Chronicles are so valuable, as illustrating the private enterprise and valour of certain sections of the Hebrew nation. On the present occasion a considerable portion of the tribe of Simeon, consisting of thirteen princes and their clansmen, in the reign of Hezekiah, sought to extend their territories (which from the beginning seemed to be too narrow for their numbers) by migrating 'to the entrance of Gedor, even unto the east side of the valley, to seek pasture for their flocks.' Finding here a quiet, and, as it would seem, a secure and defenceless population of Hamites (the meaning of 1 Chron. iv. 40 receives illustration from Judg. xviii. 7, 28) the Simeonites attacked them with a vigour that reminds us of the times of Joshua, and took permanent possession of the district, which was well adapted for pastoral purposes. The Gedor here mentioned cannot be the Gedor of Josh. xv. 58 [GEDOR]. There is strong ground, however, for supposing that it may be the Gederah of ver. 36 [GEDERAH]; or, if we follow the LXX. rendering, Γεπάρα, and read גרר for גר, it would be the well-known Gerar. This last would, of course, if the name could be relied on, fit extremely well; in its vicinity the patriarchs of old had sojourned and fed their flocks and herds (see Gen. xx. 1, 14, 15; xxvi. 1, 6, 14, and especially vers. 17-20). Bertheau (die B. der Chronik) on this passage, and Ewald (Gesch. des Volkes Israel [ed. 2], i. 322) accept the reading of the LXX., and place the Simeonite conquest in the valley of Gerar (in Williams, Holy City [ed. 2] vol. i. pp. 463-468, there is an interesting note, contributed by the Rev. J. Rowlands, on the Southern Border of Palestine, and containing an account of his discovery of the ancient Gerar [called Khirbet-d Gerar, the ruins of Gerar]; see also, for 'a confirmation of the account,' Van de Velde, Memoir, etc., p. 314). In the determination of the ultimate question, with which this article is concerned, it matters but little which of these two localities we accept as the residence of those children of Ham whom the Simeonites dispossessed. Both are within the precincts of the land of the Philistines: the latter perhaps may be regarded as on the border of the district which we assigned in the preceding article to the Cuslukim; in either case 'they of Ham,' of whom we are writing, in 1 Chron. iv. 40, must be regarded as descended from Ham through his second son Mizraim.—P. H.

HAM [הם, with He], in Gen. xiv. 5, if a proper name at all, was probably the principal town of a people whose name occurs but once in O. T., 'the Zuzims' (as rendered in A. V.) If these were 'the Zamzummins' of Deut. ii. 20, as has been conjectured by Raschi, Calmet, Patrick, etc., among the older writers; and Gesenius, Rosenmüller, Ewald (Volkes Israel, i. 308), Delitzsch, Knobel, and Keil, among the moderns, we have some clue to the site; for it appears from the entire passage in Deut., that the Zamzummins were the original occupants of the country of the Ammonites. Tuch and others have accordingly supposed that our Ham, where the Zuzims were defeated by Chedorlaomer on his second invasion, was the primitive name of Rabbath Ammon, afterwards Philadelpia (Jerome and Euseb., Onomast. s. v. AMMAN), the capital of the Ammonite territory. It is still called [the ruins of] 'Ammán, عمان, according to Robinson, Researches [ed. 1], vol. iii. 168. There is some doubt, however, whether the word in Gen. xiv. 5 be anything more than a pronoun. The Masoretic reading of the clause, indeed, is וְהָיוּ בָהֶם, the last word of which is pointed, בָּהֶם (A. V., 'In Ham'), as if there were three battles, and one of them had been fought at a place so called; and it perhaps makes for this reading that, according to Kennicott, seven Samaritan MSS. read בָּהֶם (with Heth), which can produce no other meaning than in Ham, or Cham with the aspirate. Yet the other (that is, the pronominal) reading must have been recognised in ancient Hebrew MSS. even as early as the time of the LXX. translators, who render the phrase by ἀμα αὐτοῖς, 'together with them;' as if there were but two conflicts, in the former of which the great eastern invader 'smote the Rephaims in Ashteroth-Karnaim, and the Zuzims [which the LXX. make an appellative—ἰσχυρά, 'strong nations'] along with them,' as their allies. The following note, which we extract from St. Jerome's Quaest. Hebr. Opera [ed. Bened., Ven. 1767], iii. (2) 327, proves that the Hebrew MSS. extant in his day varied in their readings of this passage: 'Porro Baem, pro quo LXX. dixerunt ἀμα αὐτοῖς, hoc est cum eis, putaverunt scribi per HE, ducti elementi similitudine, quum per HETH scriptum sit. Baem enim quum per tres literas scribitur—si mediam HE habet, interpretatur, in eis: si autem HETH, ut in praesenti, locum significat, id est, in Hom' (A. V., 'In Ham'). St. Jerome here refers to the reading, which punctuates the three letters as if they merely constituted the pronoun בָּהֶם, 'together with them.' This reading he seems to have preferred, for in his own version [Vulg.] he renders the word, like the LXX., 'cum eis.' Onkelos, however, regarded the reading evidently as a proper name, for he has translated it by בְּהֶמְתָּא, 'in Hemta,' and so has the 'Pseudo Jonathan' Targum; while the Jerusalem has בָּהֶם 'with them.' Saadias, again has the proper name هَام (in Hama). Hillerus, whom Rosenmüller quotes, identifies this Ham with the famous Ammonite capital Rabbah (2 Sam. xi. 1; 1 Chron. xx. 1); 'the two names,' he says, 'are synonymous—Rabbah meaning populous, as in Lament. i. 1, where Jerusalem is רַב־יְהוּדָה, 'the city [that was] full of people;' while the more ancient name of the same city, הָם, has the same signification as the collective word הַמֶּון, that is, a multitude.'—P. HAMAKER, H. A., one of the first Orientalists of his time, was born at Amsterdam, 25th February 1789. Destined by his parents for the profession of a merchant, his tastes led him early to learning; and the counsels of Willmet strengthened him in his ardent attachment to erudite studies, especially to the Arabic language, in which he made great progress. In 1815 he was appointed professor of the Oriental languages in the Athenæum at Franeker. In 1817 he was called to Leyden as professor extraordinary of Oriental languages; and in 1822 he became ordinary professor. Here he died on the 10th October 1837, at the early age of 47, having undermined his health by excessive study. His literary ambition was too active, hurrying him from one language to another, and injuring his reputation. Instead of being contented with the knowledge of five Semitic tongues besides the Arabic, he devoted himself without relaxation to the study of all the ancient and modern languages of Asia and Africa—a task to which human strength is unequal. The range of his Oriental erudition was great; it would have been of a profounder character if he had confined himself to fewer subjects. His works are numerous, but none bears directly on Biblical science. All are of the Oriental-literary or historical type. Those most related to the O. T. are Diatriba philologico-critica monumentorum aliquot Punicorum nuper in Africa reperorum, interpretationem exhibens; accedunt novae in nummos aliquot phanicios lapideumque Carpentoractensem conjectura, necnon tabulae inscriptiones et alphabeta Punica continentes, Leyden 1822, 4to; and Miscellanea Phénicia, sive Commentarii de rebus Phanicum quibus inscriptiones multa lapidum ac nummorum nominaque propria hominum et locorum explicantur; item Punica gentis lingua et religiones passim illustrantur, Leyden 1828, 4to. HAMAN (חָמָן, a name of the planet Mercury;

Sept. 'Amdr), a favourite of the king of Persia, whose history is involved in that of Esther and Mordecai. He is called an Agagite; and as Agag was a kind of title of the kings of the Amalekites [AGAG], it is supposed that Haman was descended from the royal family of that nation. [This name, however, may have been merely a name of reproach derived from the ancient Jewish hatred of Amalek (Stanley, Jewish Church, p. 141)]. He or his parents probably found their way to Persia as captives or hostages; and that the foreign origin of Haman was no bar to his advancement at court, is a circumstance quite in unison with the most ancient and still subsisting usages of the East. Joseph, Daniel, and Mordecai, afford other examples of the same kind.

It is unnecessary to repeat the particulars of a story so well known as that of Haman. The circumstantial details of the height which he attained and of his sudden downfall, afford, like all the rest of the book of Esther, a most faithful picture of the customs of an Oriental court and government, and furnish invaluable materials for a comparison between the regal usages of ancient and modern times. The result of such a comparison will excite surprise by the closeness of the resemblance; for there is not a single fact in the history of Haman which might not occur at the present day, even in its merely formal characteristics, and which, indeed, is not of frequent occurrence in different combinations. The boundless credit which Haman enjoyed with Ahasuerus; the homage which all the court in consequence paid to him; the royal signet-ring, the impression from which gave such authority to all written orders, and placed the doom of nations in the hands of its possessor; the price of blood which Haman offered to the king; the inquietude of that inordinate power which could endure no rival, and which the shadow of opposition offended and alarmed; and the form of poetical justice given to the final retribution in the hanging of Haman upon a gallows which he had prepared for another;—all these are traits which would at the present day be received in Asia as the unexaggerated record of current events.

Even the decree for the extermination of the Jews which was granted at the request of Haman, however startling it may appear to those whose notions are grounded upon European institutions, would appear in no wise strange under an Oriental government. Even in Europe the fanaticism and tyranny of ancient governments often produced similar proscriptions (sometimes with reference to the very same people), which, under the mildness and tranquillity of modern institutions, we are as little able to comprehend. But in the East we have still no difficulty in discovering the traces of the same excesses of despotism, the same blind submission of the people, the same respect for the seal of the sovereign, and the same passive resignation to the sword which he uplifts or to the bow-string which he sends. Even in our own day we have seen imperial firmans consign to utter destruction in the mass the Greeks, the Druses, and the Maronites; and such things must and will occur wherever the extermination of a people is unhappily so easy a matter that it costs a despot no further trouble than the drawing of a ring from his finger. Other times and other names make all the difference—the manners are the same. It may be well to observe that Haman never mentions Mordecai himself to the king; and that in speaking of the Jews he does not name them directly, but describes them as 'a certain people' dispersed through the kingdom, and living separate under laws of their own (Esth. iii. 8). That this people, or any other subject to his sceptre, should require to be thus descriptively indicated, seems to shew how little the king knew of the actual state of his dominions, or of persons beyond the immediate circle of the court. The death of Haman appears to have taken place about the year B.C. 510. [ESTHER.]—J. K.

HAMATH (חֲמַת; Sept. Ἀμαθ and Ἡμυθ). A very ancient city of Syria, and the capital of a small kingdom of the same name. Gesenius is probably right in deriving the word from the Arabic root حَمَى, to defend; with this agrees the modern name of the city Hamah (حماه). Hamath is one of the oldest cities in the world. We read in Gen. x. 18, that the youngest or last son of Canaan was the 'Hamathite'—apparently so called because he and his family founded and colonised Hamath. It was a place of note, and the capital of a principality, when the Israelites conquered Palestine; and its name is mentioned in almost every passage in which the northern border of Canaan is defined (Num. xiii. 22; xxxiv. 8; Josh. xiii. 5; etc.). Toi king of Hamath gave tribute to David after the successful campaign of the latter in northern Syria and Damascus (2 Sam. viii.). Hamath was conquered by Solomon (2 Chron. viii. 3); and its whole territory appears to have remained subject to the Israelites during his prosperous reign (verses 4-6). After it had regained its independence, probably during the reign of the first Jeroboam, it was again subdued by Jeroboam the second (circa B.C. 784; 2 Kings xiv. 28). At this period the kingdom of Hamath included the valley of the Orontes, from the source of that river to near Antioch (2 Kings xxiii. 33; xxv. 21). It bordered Damascus on the south, Zobah on the east and north, and Phœnicia on the west (1 Chron. xviii. 3; Ezek. xlvii. 17; xlviii. 1; Zech. ix. 2). In the 8th century B.C. the powerful monarchs of Assyria extended their conquests westward, and captured Hamath. It must have been then a large and influential kingdom; for Amos speaks emphatically of 'Hamath the Great' (vi. 2); and when Rabshakeh, the Assyrian general, endeavoured to terrify king Hezekiah into unconditional surrender, he said: 'Have the gods of the nations delivered them which my fathers have destroyed, as Gozan, and Haran, and Rezeph? Where is the king of Hamath, and the king of Arphad, and the king of the city of Sephervaim, Hena, and Ivah?' (Is. xxxvii. 12-14; 2 Kings xviii. 34, sq.) The frequent use of the phrase, 'the entering in of Hamath,' also shews that this kingdom was the most important in northern Syria (Judg. iii. 3). Hamath remained under the Assyrian rule till the time of Alexander the Great, when it fell into the hands of the Greeks. The Greeks introduced their noble language as well as their government into Syria, and they even gave Greek names to some of the old cities; among these was Hamath, which was called Epiphania (Ἐπιφάνεια), in honour of Antiochus Epiphanes (Cyril, Comment. ad Amos).

This change of name gave rise to considerable doubts and difficulties among geographers regarding the identity of Hamath. Jerome affirms that there were two cities of that name—Great Hamath, identical with Antioch, and another Hamath called Epiphania (Comment. ad Amos, vi.) The Targums in Num. xiii. 22, render Hamath Antukia (Reland, Pal. p. 120). Eusebius calls it 'a city of Damascus,' and affirms that it is not the same as Epiphania; but Jerome states, after a careful investigation, 'reperi Aemath urbem Coelesyriæ appellari, quæ nunc Græco sermone Epiphania dicitur' (Onomast., s. v. Aemath and Emath). Theodoret says that Great Hamath was Emesa, and the other Hamath Epiphania (Comment. ad Jerem. iv.) Josephus is more accurate when he tells us that Hamath 'was still called in his day by the inhabitants' Ἀμᾶθ, although the Macedonians called it Epiphania (Antiq. i. 6. 2). There is reason to believe that the ancient name Hamath was always retained and used by the Aramaic speaking population; and, therefore, when Greek power declined, and the Greek language was forgotten, the ancient name in its Arabic form Hamāh became universal. There is no ground whatever for Reland's theory that the Hamath spoken of in connection with the northern border of Palestine was not Epiphania, but some other city much farther south. The identification of Riblah and Zedad places the true site of Hamath beyond the possibility of doubt (Reland, Pal. p. 121; Porter, Damascus, ii. pp. 335, 354, sq.).

Epiphania remained a flourishing city during the Roman rule in Syria (Ptolemy, v. 15; Pliny, Hist. Nat. v. 19). It early became, and still continues, the seat of a bishop of the Eastern Church (Caroli a san. Paulo, Geogr. Sac., p. 288). It was taken by the Mohammedans soon after Damascus. On the death of the great Saladin, Hamath was ruled for a long period by his descendants, the Eiyubites. Abulfeda, the celebrated Arab historian and geographer, was a member of this family and ruler of Hamah (Bohadin, Vita Saladini; Schulten's Index Geographicus, s. v. Hamata).

Hamah is still a town of 30,000 inhabitants. It is beautifully situated in the narrow and rich valley of the Orontes, thirty-two miles north of Emesa, and thirty-six south of the ruins of Assamea (Antonini Itinerarium, ed. Wesseling, p. 188). Four bridges span the rapid river; and a number of huge wheels turned by the current, like those at Verona, raise the water into rude aqueducts, which convey it to the houses and mosques. There are no remains of antiquity now visible. The mound on which the castle stood is in the centre of the city; but every trace of the castle itself has disappeared. The houses are built of sun-dried bricks and timber. Though plain and poor externally, some of them have splendid interiors. The inhabitants carry on a considerable trade in silks and woollen and cotton stuffs with the Bedawin. A number of noble but decayed Muslem families reside in Hamah, attracted thither by its beauty, salubrity, and cheapness (Pococke, Travels, ii. pt. i. pp. 143, sq.; Burckhardt, Travels in Syria, pp. 146, sq.; Hanabook for S. and P., ii. p. 620).

'The entrance of Hamath,' or 'entering into Hamath' (בוא חמת; εἰσπορευομένων εἰς Ἀμᾶθ; introitum Emath) is a phrase often used in the O. T. as a geographical name. It is of considerable importance to identify it, as it is one of the chief landmarks on the northern border of the land of Israel. There can be no doubt that the sacred writers apply the phrase to some well-known 'pass' or 'opening' into the kingdom of Hamath (Num. xxxiv. 8; Josh. xiii. 5). The kingdom of Hamath embraced the great plain lying along both banks of the Orontes, from the fountain near Riblah on the south to Apamea on the north, and from Lebanon on the west to the desert on the east. To this plain there are two remarkable 'entrances'—one from the south, through the valley of Coelesyria, between the parallel ranges of Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon; the other from the west, between the northern end of Lebanon and the Nusairiyeh mountains. The former is the natural 'entrance' from central Palestine; the latter from the sea-coast. The former is on the extreme south of the kingdom of Hamath; the latter on its western border.

Until within the last few years sacred geographers have almost universally maintained that the southern opening is the 'entrance of Hamath.' Reland supposed that the land described in Num. xxxiv. 8, 10 did not extend farther north than the parallel of Sidon. Consequently he holds that the southern extremity of the valley of Coelesyria, at the base of Hermon, is the 'entrance' of Hamath (Palestina, pp. 118, sq.). Kitto set forth this view in greater detail; and he would identify the 'entrance of Hamath' with the expression used in Num. xiii. 21, 'as men come to Hamath.' The two, however, are distinct. The latter is only intended to define the position of Beth-rehob, which was situated on the road leading from central Palestine to Hamath—'as men come to Hamath;' that is, in the great valley of Coelesyria (Pictorial Bible; Cycloped. of Bibl. Lit. s. v. Hamath and Palestine, 1st ed.) Van de Velde appears to locate the 'entrance of Hamath' at the northern end of the valley of Coelesyria (Travels, ii. 470); and Stanley adopts the same view (Sin. and Pal. 399). Dr. Keith would place the 'entrance of Hamath' at that sublime gorge through which the Orontes flows from Antioch to the sea (Land of Israel, pp. 112, sq.)

The writer of this article, after a careful survey of the whole region, and a study of the passages of Scripture on the spot, was led to the conclusion that the 'entrance of Hamath' must be the opening towards the west, between Lebanon and the Nusairiyeh mountains. His reasons are as follow:—1. That opening forms a distinct and natural northern boundary for the land of Israel, such as is evidently required by the following passages: 1 Kings viii. 65; 2 Kings xiv. 25; 2 Chron. xiii. 5; Am. vi. 14. 2. The 'entrance of Hamath' is spoken of as being from the western border or seaboard; for Moses says, after describing the western border,—'This shall be your north border, from the great sea ye shall point out for you Mount Hor; from Mount Hor ye shall point out into the entrance of Hamath' (Num. xxxv. 7, 8). Compare this with Ezek. xlvii. 20, 'the west side shall be the great sea from the (southern) border, till a man come over against Hamath'; and ver. 16, where the 'way of Hethlon as men go to Zedad' is mentioned, and is manifestly identical with the 'entrance of Hamath,' and can be none other than the opening here alluded to. 3. The 'entrance of Hamath' must have been to the north of the entire ridges of Lebanon and Antilebanon (Josh. xiii. 5; Judg. iii. 3); but the opening from Coelesyria into the plain of Hamath is not so. 4. The territory of Hamath was included in the 'Promised Land,' as described both by Moses and Ezekiel (Num. xxxiv. 8-11; Ezek. xlvii. 15-20; xlviii. 1). The 'entrance of Hamath' is one of the marks of its northern border; but the opening from Coelesyria is on the extreme south of the territory of Hamath, and could not therefore be identical with the 'entrance of Hamath.'

From the above statements it is abundantly evident that the 'entrance of Hamath' must be the opening from that kingdom to the western coast between Lebanon and the Nusairiyeh mountains. The phrase was used by the sacred writers with all the definiteness of a proper name (see Porter's Damascus, ii. 354, sq.; also Robinson, B. A. iii. 568).—J. L. P.

HAMATH-ZOBAB (הַמַּת־צוֹבָב; Sept. Βαμαθ-ζωβα). In 2 Chron. viii. 3 it is recorded that 'Solomon went to Hamath-Zobah, and prevailed against it.' Zobah was a place in the same district as Hamath [ZOBAB]. The conjunction of the two names here probably indicates nothing more than that the whole country round Hamath was brought by Solomon under the power of Judah. The possession of David extended to Hamath, and included Zobah (1 Chron. xviii. 3), and Solomon probably added Hamath also to his empire; certain it is that he had possessions in that district, and that part of it at least was included in his dominion (מְחֻשְׁלוֹ, 1 Kings ix. 19). There is not the least ground for the supposition that Hamath-Zobah is the name of a different Hamath from that above noted.—W. L. A.

HAMILTON, GEORGE, an Episcopalian clergyman, rector of Killermogh in Ireland. He was a good Hebraist, and a laborious scholar. His first work was entitled—A General Introduction to the Study of the Hebrew Scriptures, with a Critical His- tory of the Greek and Latin Versions of the Samaritan Pentateuch, and of the Chaldee Paraphrases. Dublin 1814, 8vo. On each of the subjects indicated in the title, this work will be found to offer much important information, conveyed in a condensed, and yet clear and pleasing style. His other work is entitled—Codex Criticus of the Hebrew Bible, wherein Vander Hooght's text is corrected from the Hebrew MSS. collated by Kennicott and De Rossi, and from the Ancient Versions, being an attempt to form a standard text of the O. T., Lond. 1821, 8vo; a work of much learning, and a praiseworthy effort towards a corrected text of the Hebrew Scriptures. His criticisms, though not such as to give satisfaction in every case, are yet in most instances so well considered and reasonable as to invest his work with a permanent value to every student of the Hebrew Bible. The following is also deserving of being noted here—A Letter to the Rev. Solomon Herschell, D.D., chief Rabbi of the German and Polish Jews in London, shewing that the resurrection of Jesus from the dead is as credible a fact as the Exodus of the Israelites from Egypt; and that the account of the resurrection in the Tract entitled Toldoth Jesu, is no more worthy of credit than that which Tacitus has given of the Exodus, pp. 38, 8vo, Lond. 1822.—W. J. C.

HAMMATH (הַמַּת; Sept. Διμαθ, Ἡμαθ). One of the fenced cities of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 35). Von Raumer has confounded it with the great city of Hamath (Pal. p. 126); but the latter is far beyond the boundary of Naphtali. It is probably the same as Hammath-dor, which was assigned to the Levites out of the territory of Naphtali (Josh. xxi. 32), and which is called Hammon in 1 Chron. vi. 76. The word Hammath signifies 'warm baths' (from the Arabic root حَمَى, 'to be hot'), and this, along with the fact that it is grouped with Chinnereth, enables us to identify its site. Josephus says that there were warm baths in a village called Ammaus (Ἀμμαούς), at a little distance from Tiberias (Antiq. xvii. 2. 3); and adds, in another place, 'the name Ammaus in our language signifies 'warm water';' the name being derived from a warm spring which rises there, possessing sanative properties' (Bell. Jud. iv. 1. 3). Reference is frequently made to Hammath in the Talmud. It is there said to have been a mile distant from Tiberias (See in Lightfoot, Opp. ii. 224, sq.) We can have no difficulty in identifying the site of Hammath. On the shore of the Sea of Galilee, about a mile south of Tiberias, is a warm spring, still celebrated for its medicinal properties. Spacious baths were built over it by Ibrahim Pasha; but, like everything else in Palestine, they are falling to ruin. Ancient ruins are strewn around it, and can be traced along the shore for a considerable distance. This is doubtless the Hammath of the Bible, and the Ammaus of Josephus. Some writers have confounded this Ammaus with another place of the same name east of the Jordan; and have thus been led into strange topographical blunders. The Hammath of Gadara, east of the Jordan, on the banks of the river Hieromax, and the Hammath of Tiberias, are both mentioned in the Talmud, and are quite distinct. Pliny, speaking of the Sea of Galilee, says, 'ab occidente Tiberiade, aquis cali-dis salubri' (Hist. Nat. v. 15). There are four warm springs at this place. The water has a temperature of 144° Fahr.; the taste is extremely salt and bitter, and a strong smell of sulphur is emitted. The whole surrounding district has a volcanic aspect. The warm fountains, the rocks of trap and lava, and the frequent earthquakes, prove that the elements of destruction are still at work beneath the surface. It is said that at the time of the great earthquake of 1837 the quantity of water issuing from the springs was greatly increased, and the temperature much higher than ordinarily (Hanbhook for S. and P., ii. 423; Robinson, Bib. Res. ii. 385; Wilson, Lands of the Bible, ii. 397; Reland, Pal. pp. 302, 703).—J. L. P.

HAMMATH-DOR. [HAMMATH.]

HAMMEDATHA (הַמַּדְתָּה; Sept. Ἀμαδδθας), father of Haman (Esth. iii. 1, 10; viii. 5; ix. 10, 24). Gesenius regards the word as Medatha with the article prefixed; but Fürst, with more probability, identifies it with the Zendic hambdatha, i. e., 'given by Hom,' one of the Izeds.—W. L. A.

HAMMELECH (הַמֶּלֶךְ). This name occurs in the A. V. twice (Jer. xxxvi. 26; xxxviii. 6). In both instances the LXX. renders by τοῦ βασιλέως, and there is no reason for doubting that this is the correct rendering. 'The king' in the former instance is Jehoiakim, and in the latter Zedekiah.—†

HAMMER. In the A. V. this is used as an equivalent for several Hebrew words:—(1.) The first that occurs is מַכְבֵּה, Judg. iv. 21, derived from a verb signifying to hollow-or perforate; found also in 1 Kings vi. 7; Jer. x. 4; and Is. xlv. 12. In the last-mentioned passage the LXX. use τέπετρον, a borer or gimlet, in all the rest σφύρα, mal-leus, Vulg. (2.) הַלְמָת, with the addition עֲמָלִים, 'workmen's'; σφύρα κοπιωστων, LXX.; fabrorum malleos, Vulg., only in Judg. v. 26. (3.) מַטִּישׁ; Is. xli. 7, σφύρα; Jer. xxiii. 29, πᾶν; Jer. l. 23, σφύρα. (4.) מַסְפִּיחַ; Nahum ii. 1, ἐμψύων, LXX., probably reading מַסְפִּיחַ, qui dispergat, Vulg., Prov. xxv. 18, maul, A. V. (5.) כִּלְפֹּת; λαευντήριον, LXX.; ascia, Vulg., Ps. lxxiv. 6.—J. E. R.

HAMMOLEKETH (הַמֹּלֶכֶת; Sept. ἡ Μαλεχέθ), the sister of Gilead and mother of Abiezer (1 Chron. vii. 18). The Targum takes this, not as a proper name, but as appellative, and renders 'who reigned,' thus making her the ruler of a district; and with this Jewish tradition accords (Kimchi in loc.) Through the influence of this the Vulg. gives 'soror ejus Regina.' The tradition is probably without foundation, and has been suggested merely by the meaning of the word = 'the Queen.'—†

HAMMON. [HAMMATH.]

HAMMOND, HENRY, D.D., was born at Chertsey, 18th August 1605, and educated at Eton and Magdalen Colleges, Oxford, of which latter society he became a fellow. He was named after Henry Prince of Wales, his godfather, to whom Dr. John Hammond, his father, was physician. It is said that Robert Sidney, Earl of Leicester, was so much impressed with a sermon he heard him preach, that he gave him the rectory of Penshurst, 1633. In 1643 he was made Archdeacon of Chichester. Hammond was a confirmed royalist, and took part in the fruitless attempt in favour of the king at Tunbridge, when a reward of £100 was offered to the person who should apprehend him. He retired to Oxford in consequence, and resided there while the city was held by the king. He became canon of Christ Church, and public orator in 1645, and accompanied Charles I., as chaplain, to Woburn, Hampton Court, and Carisbrook, till the dismissal of his attendants in 1647. He once more retired to Oxford and became sub-dean of Christ Church. The latter part of his life was passed at Westwood, Worcestershire, the seat of Sir John Parkwood, where he died 25th April 1660. He wrote a Paraphrase and Annotations on the N. T., 1653, which was translated into Latin by Leclerc, 2 vols. 4to, 1698, Amsterdam; A Paraphrase and Annotations upon the Book of Psalms, fol. Lond. 1659; Practical Catechism, 1644; Humble Address to the Right Hon. the Lord Fairfax and his Council of War, 1649, concerning the impending trial of Charles I. Hammond's miscellaneous theological works have been well edited in the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology.—S. L.

HAMOR, CHAMOR (חָמֹר; Sept. Ἑμμώρ), a Hivite chief, prince of the district lying around Shechem, and father of Shechem, whose assault upon Dinah led to the destruction of himself, his father, and their city, by the sons of Jacob. From Hamor Jacob bought a piece of land in the vicinity of Shechem, a transaction of a perfectly peaceable kind, but which seems to have been interposed amid passages of a more hostile nature between the patriarch and his neighbours (comp. Gen. xlviii. 22). This he left as a special inheritance to the family of Joseph, and here Joseph's bones were interred (Josh. xxiv. 32). Hamor gave his name to the tribe of which he was chief; they are called Benei-Hamor (Gen. xxxiii. 19), and he himself is called Hamor Abi-Shechem (Josh. xxiv. 32; Judg. ix. 28; Acts vii. 16), with reference to his having the seat of his rule at Shechem (comp. Machir Abi-Gilead, Ashchur Abi Teqoa, Shubal Abi Qir-jath-Jearim, 1 Chron. ii. 21, 24, 50, etc.) On the confusion of Jacob with Abraham by St. Stephen, see Alford's note on Acts vii. 16.—W. L. A.

HAMUEL, prop. CHAMMUEL (חַמּוּאֵל; Sept. Ἀμουήλ), a descendant of Simeon through Shaul and Mishma, and from whom all the families of Simeon located in Palestine seem to have descended (1 Chron. iv. 26, ff.)—†

HAMUL, prop. CHAMUL (חָמֹל; Sept. Ἰεμουήλ, Ἰαμουήν), the younger son of Pharez, the son of Judah by Tamar (Gen. xlv. 12; 1 Chron. ii. 5). Whether he was born in Canaan or after the descent into Egypt, is a point not settled among chronologists. From him descended the clan of the HAMULITES (חַמּוּלִיתִּים, Num. xxvi. 21).—†

HAMUTAL, prop. CHAMUTAL (חַמּוּטָל; Sept. Ἀμιτάλ, Ἀμειράλ), the daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah, the wife of Josiah, king of Judah, and the mother of Jehoahaz and Mattaniah or Zedekiah (2 Kings xxiii. 31; xxiv. 18; Jer. lii. 1). In the last of these passages her name is given as Chamital (חַמִּיטָל), and this is probably the correct reading, as it has been followed throughout by the LXX. and Vulg. The Syr. reads ܡܡܬܐܢܝܗ, Hamtûl.—W. L. A.

HA-NAGID. [SAMUEL]

HANAMEEL (חַנַּמְיֵאל; Sept. Ἀναμεῖλ), a kinsman of Jeremiah, to whom, before the siege of Jerusalem, he sold a field which he possessed in Anathoth, a town of the Levites (Jer. xxxii. 6-12). If this field belonged to Hanameel as a Levite, the sale of it would imply that an ancient law had fallen into disuse (Lev. xxv. 34); but it is possible that it may have been the property of Hanameel in right of his mother. The transaction was conducted with all the forms of legal transfer, and was intended to evince the certainty of restoration from the approaching exile, by shewing that possessions which could be established by documents would yet be of future value to the possessor (B.C. 587).—J. K.

HANAN, prop. CHANAN (חָנָן; Sept. Ἀνδρ. Ἀνδρ.). The name of several persons mentioned in Scripture (1 Chron. viii. 23, 38; ix. 44; xi. 43; Neh. vii. 7; x. 10, 22, 26; xiii. 13; Jer. xxxv. 4). The Beni-Chanan are mentioned as amongst the Nethinim, or Temple officers, who came up from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 46; Neh. vii. 49); and at an earlier period mention is made of them as having apartments in the temple (Jer. xxxv. 4). The Chanan from whom they took their name was a prophet (חֲנַנְיָהּ הַנָּבִיא, ibid.)

The word חָנָן is probably an abbreviation of חַנַּנְיָהּ, Chananiah, or חַנַּנִּי, Jochanan (comp. חָנָן), and this may account for the reading of the LXX. in this passage Ἰωάννης Ἀναρίου (Hitzig, Exeget. Hdbuch. in loc.).—W. L. A.

HANANEEL, THE TOWER OF, מִגְדַּל חַנַּנְיָהּ; πύργος Ἀναμεῖλ), one of the towers forming part of the wall of Jerusalem; first mentioned in Nehemiah (iii. 1), where its position with respect to the sheep-gate in particular, situate on the east side of the city, is indicated. The other passages in which the name occurs (Neh. xii. 39; Jer. xxx. 38; Zech. xiv. 10), with no special reference worthy of note, pretty clearly determine the situation mentioned as correct. It was obviously near the sheep-gate, and from the direction in which the boundary-line of the city is now described, on the north side of that gate, and consequently was near the north-east corner of the city, and probably faced the east (Pict. Bible, vol. iii. 399). The tower, it is not unlikely, derived its name from the builder.—W. J. C.

HANANI, CHANANI (חַנַּנִּי, graciously; Sept. Ἀνανίας). 1. A prophet under the reign of Asa, king of Judah, by whom he was seized and imprisoned for announcing that he had lost, from want of due trust in God, an advantage which he might have gained over the king of Syria (2 Chron. xvi. 7). The precise occasion of this declaration is not known.

This Hanani is supposed to be the same who was father of another prophet, named Jehu (1 Kings xvi. 7); but circumstances of time and place seem adverse to this conclusion.

2. A brother of Nehemiah (Neh. i. 2), who went from Jerusalem to Shushan, being sent most probably by Ezra, and brought that information respecting the miserable condition of the returned Jews which led to the mission of Nehemiah. Hanani came back to Judæa, probably along with his brother, and, together with one Hananiah, was appointed to take charge of the gates of Jerusalem, and see that they were opened in the morning and closed in the evening at the appointed time. The circumstances of the time and place rendered this an important and responsible duty, not unattended with some danger (Neh. vii. 2, 3). B.C. 455.

[Three other persons of this name are mentioned, 1 Chron. xxv. 4, 25; Ez. x. 10; Neh. xii. 36.]

HANANIAH, CHANANIAH (חַנַּנְיָהּ, or with the 1 parag. חַנַּנְיָהּ; LXX. Ἀνανίας, Ananias; Vulg. Hanania, Hananias, Ananias: both in etymology and signification identical with חַנַּנִּי, Jehohanan, whence the Greek Ἰωάννης).

1. One of the sons of Shashak, of the tribe of Benjamin, 1 Chron. viii. 24.

2. A Levite, of the branch of Kohath, and one of the fourteen sons of Heman the singer, all of whom were distinguished for their skill in instrumental music, and were chosen to preside severally over fourteen of the twenty-four courses of musicians appointed by the order of David for the service of the house of God, 1 Chron. xxv. 4, 6, 23.

3. An officer of state in the service of Uzziah, 2 Chron. xxvi. 11.

4. The grandfather of Irijah, the captain of the guard, who falsely charged Jeremiah with treason, Jer. xxxvii. 13.

5. The father of Zedekiah, one of the princes of Judah in the reign of Jehoiakim, Jer. xxxvi. 12.

6. A pretended prophet, the son of Azur of Gibeon, who, in the fourth year of the reign of Zedekiah, presumed to predict the return of Jehoniah from Babylon, and the restoration of the sacred vessels. By the command of God, Jeremiah solemnly denounced the falsehood of Hananiah, and foretells his approaching death as a punishment for his presumption. Within the short space of two months Hananiah died, Jer. xxviii. 1-17.

7. One of the four Hebrew princes who were educated in the palace of Nebuchadnezzar. His Chaldean name was Shadrach, Dan. i. 6, 7, 11, 19.

8. The son of Zerubbabel, the great-grandson of Jehoiakim, 1 Chron. iii. 19, 21.

9. One of the chief priests in the days of Joiachim, son and successor of Jeshua, high-priest in the time of Zerubbabel, Neh. xii. 12.

10. One of the family of Bebai, who, at the instigation of Ezra, consented to put away his strange wife, Ezra x. 28.

11. One of the builders of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah, Neh. iii. 8. He is called 'the son of one of the apothecaries' (בְּרֵיהּ רֶקֶתִּים), by which is perhaps meant that he was a skilful compounder of the spiced unguents used for the sacred and royal anointings, Exod. xxx. 22-38, 1 Chron. ix. 30, 2 Chron. xvi. 14. It may be hence inferred that he was a priest, or at least a Levite.

12. Another builder of the wall of Jerusalem, described as the son of Shelemiah, Neh. iii. 30. By some identified with 11.

13. Governor of the citadel of the temple (שַׁר הַבְּיָרָה) under Nehemiah, Neh. vii. 2.

14. One of the chiefs of the people (רָאשֵׁי הָעָם), Neh. x. 23, Heb. 24, who joined in sealing the solemn confession and covenant which Nehemiah made on behalf of the people.—S. N.

HAND (יָד, χείρ). The ordinary usages of Scripture in regard to 'hand,' 'right hand,' etc., must be familiar to the student, and the passages on which the representations above made are founded are too easy of access, by means of a Concordance, to need being enumerated here; it may therefore be more useful to confine the rest of our remarks to one or two specific and more important points.

The phrase 'sitting at the right hand of God,' as applied to the Saviour of the world, is derived from the fact that with earthly princes a position on the right hand of the throne was accounted the chief place of honour, dignity, and power:—'upon thy right hand did stand the queen' (Ps. xlv. 9; comp. 1 Kings ii. 19; Ps. lxxx. 17). The immediate passage out of which sprang the phraseology employed by Jesus may be found in Ps. cx. 1: 'Jehovah said unto my Lord, sit thou at my right hand until I make thine enemies thy footstool.' Accordingly the Saviour declares before Caiaphas (Matt. xxvi. 64; Mark xiv. 62), 'Ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven;' where the meaning obviously is that the Jews of that day should have manifest proofs that Jesus held the most eminent place in the divine favour, and that his present humiliation would be succeeded by glory, majesty, and power (Luke xxiv. 26; 1 Tim. iii. 16). So when it is said (Mark xvi. 19; Rom. viii. 34; Col. iii. 1; 1 Pet. iii. 22; Heb. i. 3; viii. 1) that Jesus 'sits at the right hand of God,' 'at the right hand of the Majesty on high,' we are obviously to understand the assertion to be that, as his Father, so he worketh always (John v. 17) for the advancement of the kingdom of heaven, and the salvation of the world. [Knapp, Script. Var. Arg. p. 39.]

As the hand is the great instrument of action, so is it eminently fitted for affording aid to the mind, by the signs and indications which it makes. Thus to lay the hand on any one was a means of pointing him out, and consequently an emblem of setting any one apart for a particular office or dignity. Imposition of hands accordingly formed, at an early period, a part of the ceremonial observed on the appointment and consecration of persons to high and holy undertakings. In Num. xxvii. 19 Jehovah is represented as thus speaking to Moses. 'Take thee Joshua, the son of Nun, a man in whom is the spirit, and lay thine hand upon him, and set him before Eleazar the priest, and before all the congregation, and give him a charge in their sight,' etc.; where it is obvious that the laying on of hands did neither originate nor communicate divine gifts; for Joshua had 'the spirit' before he received imposition of hands; but was merely an instrumental sign for marking him put individually, and setting him apart, in sight of the congregation, to his arduous work. Similar appears to be the import of the observance in the primitive church of Christ (Acts viii. 15-17; 1 Tim. iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 6). A corruption of this doctrine was, that the laying on of hands gave of itself divine powers, and on this account Simon, the magician (Acts viii. 18), offered money, saying 'Give me also this power, that on whomsoever I lay hands he may receive the Holy Ghost,' intending, probably, to carry on a gainful trade by communicating the gift to others.

In Col. ii. 13, 14, 'the law of commandments contained in ordinances' (Eph. ii. 15), is designated 'the handwriting of ordinances that was against us,' which Jesus blotted out, and took away, nailing it to his cross; phraseology which indicates the abolition, on the part of the Saviour, of the Mosaic law (Wolffius, Curæ Philolog. in N. T. iii. 16).—J. R. B. [In the O. T. hand is sometimes used in the sense of monument, or trophy (1 Sam. xv. 12; 2 Sam. xviii. 18; Is. lvi. 5). It is supposed that this usage is traceable to the custom of sculpturing on sepulchral columns an up-lifted hand].

HANDICRAFT. In the early periods to which the Scriptural history refers, the entire circle of achievement which man had effected in the natural world, was too immediately and too obviously connected with the labour of the hands, which is, in truth, the great primary source of wealth, for any feeling regarding it to prevail but one of high estimation. When hand-labourers were seen on every side, and found in every grade of life, and when the products of their skill and industry were the chief, if not the sole, advantages which civilization gave, handicraftsmen, as they were among the great benefactors, so were they among the chief favourites of human kind. Accordingly, even the creation of the world is spoken of as the work of God's hands, and the firmament is said to shew his handy-work (Ps. viii. 3; xix. 1; Gen. ii. 2; Job xxxiv. 19). The primitive history, too, which the Bible presents is the history of hand-labourers. Adam dressed the garden in which God had placed him (Gen. ii. 15), Abel was a keeper of sheep, Cain a tiller of the ground (Gen. iv. 3), Tubal-Caina a smith (Gen. iv. 22). These references prove how soon men gave themselves to the labours of the hand, and these and similar passages serve to shew what were the earliest employments, did not the nature of the case suffice to assure us that the most necessary arts would be first cultivated. The general nature of this article does not require any extensive or detailed inquiry into the hand-labours which the Israelites practised before their descent into Egypt; but the high and varied culture which they found there declares that any history of hand-labour must be very defective the sources of which are found exclusively in the Bible. The shepherd-life which the patriarchs previously led in their own pasture-grounds, was not favourable to the cultivation of the practical arts of life, much less of those arts by which it is embellished. Egypt, in consequence, must have presented to Joseph and his father not only a land of wonders, but a source of rich and attractive knowledge. And though the herdsman-sort of life which the Hebrews continued to lead would not be conducive to their advancement in either science or art; yet it cannot be doubted that they derived in no slight degree those advantages which have always been reaped by a less cultured people, when brought into proximity or contact with a high state of civilization.

Another source of knowledge to the Hebrews of handicrafts were the maritime and commercial Phœnicians. Commerce and navigation imply great skill in art and science; and the pursuits to which they lead largely increase the skill whence they emanate. It is not, therefore, surprising that the origin of so many arts has been referred to the north-eastern shore of the Mediterranean Sea; nor is there any difficulty in understanding how arts and letters should be propagated from the coast to the interior, conferring high advantages on the inhabitants of Syria in general, as well before as after the settlement of the Hebrew tribes in the land of promise. At first the division of labour was only very partial. The master of the family himself exercised such arts as were found of absolute necessity. Among these may be reckoned not only those which pasturage and tillage required, but most of those which were of that rough and severe nature which demand strength as well as skill; such, for instance, as the preparation of wood-work for the dwelling, the slaying of animals for food, which every householder understood, together with the art of extracting the blood from the entire carcass. The lighter labours of the hand fell to the share of the housewife; such as baking bread (2 Sam. xiii. 8)—for it was only in large towns that baking was carried on as a trade—such, also, as cooking in general, supplying the house with water, no very easy office, as the fountains often lay at a considerable distance from the dwelling; moreover, weaving, making of clothes for males as well as females, working in wool, flax, hemp, cotton, tapestry, richly-coloured hangings, and that not only for domestic use, but for 'merchandise,' were carried on within the precincts of the house by the mistress and her maidens (Exod. xxxv. 25; 1 Sam. ii. 19; 2 Kings xxiii. 7; Prov. xxxi.)

The skill of the Hebrews during their wanderings in the desert does not appear to have been inconsiderable. In Exodus (xxxv. 30-35) a passage occurs which may serve to specify many arts that were practised among the Israelites, though it seems also to intimate that at the time to which it refers artificers of the description referred to were not numerous—"See, the Lord hath called by name Bezaleel, and hath filled him with the spirit of God, in knowledge and all manner of workmanship, and to devise curious works, to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass, and in the cutting of stones, to set them, and in carving of wood, to make any manner of cunning work; and he hath put in his heart that he may teach; both he and Aholiab; them hath he filled with wisdom of heart to work all manner of work of the engraver; and of the cunning workman, and of the embroiderer in blue and in purple, in scarlet and in fine linen, and of the weaver." From the ensuing chapter (ver. 34) it appears that gilding was known before the settlement in Canaan. The ark (Exod. xxxvii. 2) was overlaid with pure gold within and without. The cherubim were wrought ('beaten,' Exod. xxxvii. 7) in gold. The candlestick was of beaten gold (ver. 17, 22). Wire-drawing was probably understood (Exod. xxxviii. 4; xxxix. 3). Covering with brass (Exod. xxxvii. 2) and with silver (Prov. xxvi. 23) was practised; but the pursuits of war and the entire absorption of the energies of the nation in the one great work of gaining the land which had been given to them, may have led to their falling off in the arts of peace; and from a passage in 1 Sam. (xiii. 20) it would appear that not long after they had taken possession of the country they were in a low condition as to the instruments of handicraft. A comparatively settled state of society, however, soon led to the revival of skill by the encouragement of industry. A more minute division of labour ensued. Trades, strictly so called, arose, carried on by persons exclusively devoted to one pursuit. Thus in Judg. xvii. 4 and Jer. x. 14, 'the founder' is mentioned, a trade which implies a practical knowledge of metallurgy; the smelting and working of metals were well known to the Hebrews (Job xxxvii. 18); brass was in use before iron; arms and instruments of husbandry were made of iron. Architecture and the kindred arts do not appear to have made much progress till the days of Solomon, who employed an immense number of persons to procure timber (1 Kings v. 13, sq.); but the men of skill for building his temple he obtained from Hiram, king of Tyre (1 Kings v. 6, sq.; 1 Chron. xiv. 1; 2 Chron. ii. 7). Without pursuing the subject into all its details (see Scholz, Handb. der Bib. Archæol. p. 390, sq.; De Wette, Lehrb. der Archæol. p. 115, sq.; Winer, Realwört. art. 'Handwerke'), we remark that the intercourse which the Babylonish captivity gave the Jews seems to have greatly improved their knowledge and skill in both the practical and the fine arts, and to have led them to hold them in very high estimation. The arts were even carried on by persons of learning, who took a title of honour from their trade (Rosenmüller, Morgenl. vi. 42). It was held a sign of a bad education if a father did not teach his son some handicraft—"quicunque filium suum non docet aliquid opificium est ac si doceret eum latrocinium" (Lightfoot, p. 616; Mish. Tr. Pirke Aboth, ii. 2; Wagenseil's Sota, p. 597; Othon. Lex. Rabb. 491).

In the Apocrypha and N. T. there are mentioned tanners (Acts ix. 43), tent-makers (Acts xviii. 3); in Joseph. (De Bell. Jud. v. 4. 1) cheese-makers, τυροκόμοι; barbers (κουρείς, Antiq. xvi. 11. 6); in the Talmud, with others we find tailors, shoemakers, blood-letters, glaziers, goldsmiths, plasterers. Certain handicraftsmen could never rise to the rank of high-priest (Mish. Tr. Kiddush, 82. 1), such as weavers, barbers, fullers, perfumers, cuppers, tanners; which pursuits, especially the last, were held in disesteem (Mishna, Tr. Megillah, iii. 2; Othon. Lex. Rabb. 155; Wetstein, N. T. ii. 516). In large cities particular localities were set apart for particular trades, as is the case in the East to the present day. Thus in Jeremiah (xxxvii. 21) we read of 'the bakers' street.' So in the Talmud (Mishna, v. 169, 225) mention is made of a flesh-market; in Josephus (De Bell. Jud. v. 4. 1) of a cheese-market; and in the N. T., probably (John v. 2) we read of a sheep-market. See Iken, Antiq. Hebr. iii. ix. p. 578, sq.; Bellermann, Handb. i. 22, sq.—J. K. B.

Addendum.—To the above general statements it may be well to add a few more minute particulars respecting the different trades practised among the Jews.

1. Masons, מְבָרִים, literally wallers, from בָּרָא a wall (2 Kings xii. 18 [12, A.V.]; חֹרֵשׁ אֶבֶן קִיר, workers of wall-stone (2 Sam. v. 11; 1 Chron. xxii. 15); חֹרֵשׁ הַחֲבִים, stone-cutters or hewers (1 Chron. xxii. 2, 15 [workers of stone, A.V.]; Ezra iii. 7, etc.) The בְּנִים (2 Kings xii. 12), were probably master-masons ('builders,' A.V. ver. 11). In the time of Solomon the most skilled of these handicraftsmen came from the territories of Hiram, king of Tyre; hence the נְבָלִים of 1 Kings v. 18, erroneously rendered by 'stone-squarers' in the A. V. [GEBAL.] For the squaring of the stones a saw (מִנְהָרָה) was used (1 Kings vii. 9). [SAW.] As they also prepared the stones by hewing (1 Chron. xxii. 2) they must have used the chisel and the mallet (מַכְבֵּה, 1 Kings vi. 7), though no mention of the former occurs in Scripture (see the representation of the Egyptian mallet and chisel in Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. ii. 313, 314). They used also the plumb-line (אֶמְנָה, Am. vii. 7), the measuring-reed (קֶנֶה, Ezek. xl. 5), the measuring-line (קוֹ, Job xxxviii. 5; Zech. i. 16), and the axe (גִּרְוֹן, 1 Kings vi. 7).

2. Carpenters (חֹרֵשׁ הָעֵץ, 2 Sam. v. 11; 2 Kings xii. 12, etc., or simply חֹרֵשׁ, Is. li. 7); τέκτων, Mark vi. 3; Matt. xiii. 55). The work of the carpenter belongs to the earliest efforts of men to provide themselves with the ordinary conveniences and comforts of life. Though, therefore, the workmen employed by David and Solomon in their great buildings were chiefly Phœnicians, we must believe that the carpenter's art, at least in its ordinary applications, was familiar to the Hebrews. It would even appear that there were persons among them at both an early and a later period who could execute the finer parts of wood carving (Exod. xxxv. 33; Is. xli. 7; xlv. 13). The implements used by the carpenter were the axe (קֶרֶם) [AXE], Ps. lxxiv. 5; Jer. xli. 22; or גִּרְוֹן, Deut. xix. 5; Is. x. 15); the measuring-line (קוֹ, Is. xlv. 13); the chisel or carving tool (מַכְבֵּה, Is. xlv. 13); the compass (מִחוּנָה), the stylus or graver (שֶׁרֶד, Ibid.). They used also the קו, the same as the masons.

3. Workers in Metal.—These were copper-smiths (חֹרֵשׁ בַּחֲשֵׁי, 1 Kings vii. 14; χαλκεύς, 2 Tim. iv. 14); iron-smiths (חֹרֵשׁ בַּחֲלָה, Is. xlv. 12, or simply חֹרֵשׁ, 1 Sam. xiii. 19); and silver-smiths or gold-smiths (צֹרֶפִים, מְצֹרֶפִים, Judg. xvii. 4; Prov. xxv. 4; Is. xl. 19; Mal. iii. 2, 3; ἀργυροκόπος, Acts xix. 24), the last of whom seem to have formed a guild (Neh. iii. 8). Weapons and cooking utensils were made of copper, which was simply beat out (Num. xvii. 4) or cast into a mould (1 Kings vii. 46; Job. xxxvii. 18) and polished (1 Kings vii. 45). Workers in the precious metals also used the same methods of preparing their articles; they seem also to have understood the art of gilding and of fillagree work (Is. xl. 19; xli. 7; xlv. 12; comp. Hartmann, Die Hebräerin, etc., i. 261).

The implements they used were of the simplest kind—the anvil (בַּעַם, Is. xli. 7), the hammer (מַלְקָחִים) [HAMMER]; the tongs (מִלְקָחִים, Is. vi. 6); the bellows (מַפְחָה, Jer. vi. 29).

4. Workers in earth and clay. [See BRICKS; POTTER; GLASS; BOTTLE.]

5. The preparation of skins and works in leather of various sorts must have engaged the attention of the Hebrews; but we possess no precise information on this subject. [LEATHER; BOTTLE; SANDALS.]

6. The art of setting and engraving precious stones was known to the Israelites from a very early period (Exod. xxviii. 9, ff.) [STONES, PRECIOUS.] Works in alabaster were also common among them (בִּתֵּי הַנֶּפֶשׁ, smelling boxes, or boxes of perfume; comp. Matt. xxvi. 7, etc. [ALABASTER.]) They also adorned their houses and vessels with ivory (1 Kings xxii. 39; Amos. iii. 15; vi. 4; Song of Sol. v. 14. [IVORY.])

7. Textile arts. Among the Egyptians these flourished, and from them probably the Hebrews acquired the knowledge and skill which they from an early period displayed in these arts (Gen. xli. 42; Exod. ix. 31; Is. xix. 9). Weaving was usually the work of women (Exod. xxxv. 25; 1 Sam. ii. 19; 2 Kings xxiii. 7; Prov. xxxi. 10, ff.; Acts ix. 39; comp. Il. iii. 125, ff.; vi. 775, ff.; xxii. 439, ff.; Odys. iv. 130, ff., etc.) That it was not confined to females, however, is evident from 1 Chron. iv. 21; comp. Is. xix. 9. [WEAVING.] Besides the ordinary stuffs prepared by weaving, they had stuffs prepared by interweaving gold and silver threads with the body of the material and by needlework. [NEEDLEWORK.] After being woven, the cloth passed through the hands of the fuller and the dyer. [FULLER; COLOURS.]

8. The use of perfumes and perfumed unguents led to persons devoting themselves to the preparation of such among the Hebrews. Such an one was called רֶקֶח; fem. רֶקֶחָה (Exod. xxx. 25, 35; Neh. iii. 8, 'apothecary,' A. V.; 1 Sam. viii. 13, 'confectionary,' A. V., etc.) [ANointing; PERFUMES.] From Nehemiah's calling Hananiah 'the son of the perfumers' (בֶּן־הַרֶקֶחִים), it is supposed they formed a guild or corporation, the members of which built a portion of the wall under his superintendence, as did the goldsmiths under that of Uzziel.

9. Among more domestic arts may be ranked that of the baker, אֶפֶס (Gen. xl. 1; Jer. xxxvii. 21; Hos. vii. 4 [BREAD]); and of the barber, נִלְב (Ez. v. 1).

10. In the art of shipbuilding the Hebrews were the pupils of the Phœnicians (1 Kings ix. 27; comp. xxii. 49), though it is hardly supposable that they had not some vessels for navigating the internal lakes and seas of their country long before the time of Solomon (Judg. v. 17). The shipmen were חֹבֵל, a sailor (Jonah i. 6; Ezek. xxvii. 8, 27-29; Ναύτης, Acts xxvii. 30; Rev. xviii. 17); רֵב הַחֹבֵל, shipmaster (Jonah i. 6; Ναυκληρος, Acts xxvii. 11); מַלְיָה, mariner (Ezek. xxvii. 9, etc.; Jonah i. 5).

Labour was held in honour among the Hebrews, and therefore handicrafts were exclusively pursued by freemen. Often the same person followed more than one occupation (Exod. xxxi. 1, ff.; 2 Chron. ii. 14, etc.). An artist of a higher order, whose efforts were devoted to inventing designs for others, in whatever department, was called חֲשֵׁנִי, part. of חָשַׁן, to think, invent (2 Chron. xxvi. 15; Exod. xxvi. 1; xxxv. 30, ff.)—W. L. A.

HANDKERCHIEF, NAPKIN (σουδάριον; Vulg. sudarium), occurs in Luke xix. 20; John xi. 44; xx. 7; Acts xix. 12. The Greek word is adopted from the Latin (like κήνος, μεμβράνα, and many others), and probably, at first, had the same meaning with it, and which, being derived from sudo, to perspire, corresponds to our word (pocket) handkerchief. The Greek rhetorician Pollux (A. D. 180) remarks that the word σουδάριον had supplanted not only the ancient Greek word for handkerchief, ἡμιτύσιον or ἡμιτύμβιον, which he considers an Egyptian word, but even the more recent term καψιδρώτιον: Τὸ δὲ ἡμιτύμβιον ἐστὶ μὲν καὶ τοῦτο Αἰγύπτιον, εἴη δ' ἂν κατὰ τὸ ἐν τῇ μέσῃ κωμῳδίᾳ, καψιδρώτιον καλούμενον, ὃ νῦν σουδάριον ὀνομάζεται (Onomast. vii. 16). The influence of the Romans caused the introduction of this word even among the Orientals. The rabbins have סוּדָרִים. In the Syriac version סִידְרָא answers to the Hebrew סִמְפָּרָה, a veil (margin, sheet or apron); and in Chaldee סוּדָר or סוּדְרָא is used for a veil or any linen cloth (Buxtorf, Lex. Chal. p. 1442). It is indeed but natural to expect that a foreign word, introduced into any language, should be applied by those who borrow it in a looser sense than they do from whom it is obtained. Hence, although the Latin word sudarium is generally restricted to the forementioned meaning, yet in the Greek and Syriac languages it signifies, chiefly, napkin, wrapper, etc. These observations prepare us for the different uses of the word in Scripture. In the first instance (Luke xix. 20) it means a wrapper, in which the 'wicked servant' had laid up the pound entrusted to him by his master. For references to the custom of laying up money, etc., in σουδάρια, both in classical and rabbinical writers, see Weistein's N. T. on Luke xix. 20. In the second instance (John xi. 44) it appears as a kerchief, or cloth attached to the head of a corpse. It was perhaps brought round the forehead and under the chin. In many Egyptian mummies it does not cover the face. In ancient times among the Greeks it did. Nicolaus (De Græcor. Luctu, c. iii. sec. 6, Thiel. 1697). Maimonides, in his comparatively recent times, describes the whole face as being covered, and gives a reason for the custom (Tract Efel, c. 4). The next instance is that of the σουδάριον which had been 'about the head' of our Lord, but which, after his resurrection, was found rolled up, as if deliberately, and put in a place separately from the linen clothes, χωρὶς ἐντεταλμένον εἰς ἓνα τόπον. The last instance of the Biblical use of the word occurs in the account of 'the special miracles' wrought by the hands of Paul (Acts xix. 11); 'so that σουδάρια (handkerchiefs, napkins, wrappers, shawls, etc.) were brought from his body to the sick; and the diseases departed from them, and the evil spirits went out of them.' The Ephesians had not un-naturally inferred that the apostle's miraculous power could be communicated by such a mode of contact; and certainly cures thus received by parties at a distance, among a people famed for their addictedness to 'curious arts,' i. e., magical skill, etc., would serve to convince them of the truth of the gospel, by a mode well suited to interest their minds. The Apostle is not recorded to have expressed any opinion respecting the reality of this intermediate means of those miracles. He had doubtless sufficiently explained that these and all the other miracles 'wrought by his hands,' i. e., by his means, were really wrought by God (ver. 11) in attestation of the mission of Jesus. If he himself did not entertain exactly the same ideas upon the subject as they did, he may be considered as conceding to, or rather not disturbing unnecessarily, popular notions, rendered harmless by his previous explanation, and affording a very convenient medium for achieving much higher purposes. If the connection between the secondary cause and the effect was real, it reminds us of our Saviour's expression, 'I perceive that virtue is gone out of me' (Luke viii. 46); which is, however, regarded by many critics as a popular mode of saying that he knew that a miracle had been wrought by his power and efficacy—a mode of speaking in unison at least with the belief of the woman that she should be healed if she could but touch the hem of his garment unperceived by him, and perhaps even conceded to, in accordance with the miracles wrought through the medium of contact related in the O. T. (1 Kings xvii. 21; 2 Kings iv. 29, etc.), and in order, by a superior display, in regard both to speed and extensiveness, to demonstrate his supremacy by a mode through which the Jews were best prepared to perceive it (Luke vi. 19; Schwarz, ad Olear. de Stylo N. T. p. 129; Soler, de Pileo, p. 17; Pierson, ad Marr. p. 348; Lydii Flor. Spars. ad Pass. J. C. p. 5; Drusus, Quæst. Heb. c. 2; Rosenmüller and Kuinoel on the passages).—J. F. D.

HANES (חֲנַס). The meaning of the only passage in which this word occurs (Is. xxx. 4), is obscure, and the true reading of the original text has been questioned. The A. V. renders the whole verse thus: 'For the princes were at Zoan, and his ambassadors came to Hanes.' The Septuagint renders the latter clause καὶ ἀγγελοὶ αὐτοῦ πονηροί, 'And his ambassadors worthless.' The copy from which this translation was made may have read חֲנַס יִנְיֹו, instead of יִנְיֹו חֲנַס; and it is worthy of note that the reading חֲנַס is still found in a number of ancient MSS. (De Rossi, Varia Lectiones Vet. Test. iii. 29), and is approved by Lowth and J. D. Michaelis. The old Latin version follows the Sept., 'nuncii pessimi;' but Jerome translates from a text similar to our own, rendering the clause as follows:—'et nuncii tui usque ad Hanes pervenerunt' (Sabbatier, Bibliorum Sacrorum Lat. Verss., ad loc.) Jerome adds, in his commentary on the verse, 'intelligimus ultimam juxta Ethiopas et Blemmyas esse Aegypti civitatem.' Vitringa would identify Hanes with the Ἀνωσις of Herodotus, which he, with Gesenius and others, supposes to be the same as Herculopolis ('City of Hercules'), the ruins of which are now called Anásieh. The Coptic name was Hnes or Ehnes (Ⲭⲛⲉⲥ or Ⲭⲛⲉⲥⲏⲥ); and it was one of the ancient royal cities of Egypt. Anásieh stands on a high mound some distance west of the Nile, near the parallel of Benisuef. The great objection to this theory is the distance of Anäsieli from Zoan, which stood in the eastern part of the Delta, near the sea.

The Targum reads Tahpanhes instead of Hanes; and Grotius considers the latter to be a contraction of the former (Commentar. ad loc.) With this may be connected the remark of De Rossi—'Codex meus 380 notat ad Marg. esse תחפנהס, Jer. ii. 16' (Var. Lect., l. c.) On the whole, this seems to be the most probable theory, as Tahpanhes was situated in the eastern part of the Delta; and was one of the royal cities about the time of Isaiah [TAHPANHES].—J. L. P.

HANGING. [PUNISHMENTS].

HANGING (חָנָק; Sept. Ἐπιστάσθων), a term applied to a series of curtains suspended before the successive openings of entrance into the Tabernacle and its parts. Of these, the first hung before the entrance to the court of the Tabernacle (Exod. xxvii. 16; xxxviii. 18; Num. iv. 26); the second before the door of the Tabernacle (Exod. xxvi. 36, 37; xxxix. 38); and the third before the entrance to the Most Holy Place, called more fully פֶּרֶכֶת הַמִּסְכָּה ('vail of the covering,' A. V., Exod. xxxv. 12; xxxix. 34; xl. 21) [TABERNACLE].—W. L. A.

HANGINGS. 1. (חֲנֻכִּים; Sept. lortla), coverings of byssus for the walls of the fore-court of the Tabernacle (Exod. xxvii. 9; Num. iii. 26, etc.) These hangings were to be five cubits in height (Ex. xxxviii. 18), and consequently half the height of the Tabernacle court (xxvi. 16). They were fastened to pillars which ran along the sides of the court, and were also of five cubits in height (xxvii. 18) [TABERNACLE].

2. (בֵּיתִים, 2 Kings xxiii. 7, margin 'houses,' which is the literal rendering). What these 'houses' were is doubtful. Ewald conjectures that the reading should be בְּגָדִים, clothes, and supposes the reference to be to dresses for the images of Astarte; but this is both gratuitous and superfluous. The 'Bottim' which these women wore were probably portable sanctuaries consecrated to idols (Gesenius) or tents for the goddess Ashera (לְאִשְׁרָה), i.e., Astarte or Mylitta (Fürst).—W. L. A.

HÄNLEIN, HEINRICH KARL ALEXANDER, a German theologian, was born at Ansbach in 1762. He was professor of theology at Erlangen, and afterwards consistorialrath in Ansbach. In 1805 he was appointed at Oberkirchenrath in Munich, and subsequently became Oberconsistorial-direktor. He died in 1829. Hänlein is best known by an Introduction to the New Testament, in 2 vols. 8vo, 1794-1800. A second edition of the second part appeared in 1802. Here the results which had been already reached were given in a brief, lucid, and compact form. Hänlein added little of his own; but his judgment was good, and he did not follow either Michaelis or Eichhorn slavishly. His own mind appears throughout the work, which never obtained much repute in Germany.—S. D.

HANNAH, properly CHANNAH (חַנָּה, graciousness; Sept. 'Avva), wife of a Levite named

Elkanah, and mother of Samuel. The family lived at Ramathaim-zophim, and, as the law required, there was a yearly journey to offer sacrifices at the sole altar of Jehovah, which was then at Shiloh. Women were not bound to attend; but pious females often did so, especially when the husband was a Levite. On one of these visits to Shiloh, while Hannah prayed before returning home, she vowed to devote to the Almighty the son which she so earnestly desired (Num. xxx. 1, seq.) Before the end of that year Hannah became the rejoicing mother of a son, to whom the name of Samuel was given, and who was from his birth placed under the obligations of that condition of Nazariteship to which his mother had vowed him. B.C. 1171.

Hannah went no more to Shiloh till her child was old enough to dispense with her maternal services, when she took him up with her to leave him there, as, it appears, was the custom when one already a Levite was placed under the additional obligations of Nazariteship. When he was presented in due form to the high-priest, the mother took occasion to remind him of the former transaction: 'For this child,' she said, 'I prayed, and the Lord hath given me my petition which I asked of him' (1 Sam. i. 27). Hannah's gladness afterwards found vent in an exulting chant, which furnishes a remarkable specimen of the early lyric poetry of the Hebrews, and of which many of the ideas and images were in after times repeated by the Virgin Mary on a somewhat similar occasion (Luke l. 46, seq.)

After this Hannah failed not to visit Shiloh every year, bringing a new dress for her son, who remained under the eye and near the person of the high-priest [SAMUEL].—J. K.

HANUN, CHANUN (חֲנָנִי, bestower; Sept. Ἀνανώ), son and successor of Nahash, king of the Ammonites. David, who had in his troubles been befriended by Nahash, sent, with the kindest intentions, an embassy to condole with him on the death of his father, and to congratulate him on his own accession. The rash young king, however, was led to misapprehend the motives of this embassy, and to treat with gross and inexpiable indignity the honourable personages whom David had charged with this mission. David vowed vengeance upon Hanun for the insult; and Hanun himself, looking for nothing less than war as the consequence of his conduct, subsidized Hadarezer and other Syrian princes to assist him with their armies. The power of the Syrians was broken in two campaigns, and the Ammonites were left to their fate, which was severe even beyond the usual severities of war in that remote age [AMMONITES; DAVID] (2 Sam. x; 1 Chron. xix.)—J. K. [The name occurs twice besides, Neh. iii. 13, 30].

HAPHIRAIM, properly CHAPHARAIM, (חַפְרַיִם; Sept. Ἀγίον; Alex. Ἀφφαίμ). A town in Issachar (Josh. xix. 19). Eusebius knew it as Ἀφφαία, and Jerome as Affarea, and place it six miles north from Legio (Onom., s.v. Ἀφφαίμ).

HAPHTARA, pl. HAPHTAROTH (הַפְּטָרוֹת, theפטרות). This expression, which is found in foot notes and at the end of many editions of the Hebrew Bible, denotes the different lessons from the prophets read in the synagogue every Sabbath and festival of the year. As these lessons have been read from time immemorial in conjunction with sections from the law, and as it is to both 'the reading of the law and the prophets,' that reference is made in the N. T. (Acts xiii. 15, al.), we propose to discuss both together in the present article.

1. Classification of the lessons, their titles, signification, &c.—There are two classes of lessons indicated in the Hebrew Bible, the one consists of fifty-four sections into which the entire law or Pentateuch (תורה) is divided, and is called Parshioth (פרשיות, plur. פרשה, from פָּרַשׁ, to separate), and the other consists of a corresponding number of sections selected from different parts of the prophets, to be read in conjunction with the former, and are denominated Haphtaroth or Haf-toroth (הפטרות, plur. of הפטרה). As the signification of this term is much disputed, and is intimately connected with the view about the origin of these prophetic lessons, we must defer the discussion of it to section 4. The division of the Pentateuch into fifty-four sections is to provide a lesson for each Sabbath of those years which, according to Jewish chronology, have fifty-four Sabbaths (see sec. 2), and to read through the whole Pentateuch, with large portions of the different prophets, in the course of every year. It must be observed, however, that this annual cycle was not universally adopted by the ancient Jews. There were some who had a triennial cycle (comp. Megilla, 29, b). These divided the Pentateuch into one hundred and fifty-three or fifty-five sections, so as to read through the law in Sabbatic lessons, once in three years. This was still done by some Jews in the days of Maimonides (comp. Iod Ha-Chezaka Hilchoth Tefilla, xiii. 1), and Benjamin of Tudela tells us that he found the Syrian Jews followed this practice in Memphis (ed. Asher, vol. i., p. 148). The sections of the triennial division are called by the Massorites Sedarim or Sedaroth (סדרים, סדרות, as may be seen in the Massoretic note at the end of Exodus: 'Here endeth the book of Exodus . . . it hath eleven Parshioth (פרשיות, i. e., according to the annual division), twenty-nine Sedaroth (סדרות, i. e., according to the triennial division), and forty chapters (פרקים). Besides the Sabbatic lessons, special portions of the law and prophets are also read on every festival and fast of the year. It must be noticed, moreover, that the Jews, who have for some centuries almost universally followed the annual division of the law, denominate the Sabbatic section Sidra (סידרא), the name which the Massorites give to each portion of the triennial division, and that every one of the fifty-four sections has a special title, which it derives from the first or second word with which it commences, and by which it is quoted in the Jewish writings. To render the following description more intelligible, as well as to enable the student of Hebrew exegesis to identify the quotations from the Pentateuch, we subjoin chronological tables of the Sabbatic Festival and Fast Lessons from the law and prophets, and their titles.

As has already been remarked, this division into fifty-four sections is to provide a special lesson for every Sabbath of those years which have fifty-four Sabbaths. For the intercalary year (שנה מעברת), in which New Year (ראש השנה) falls on a Thursday, and the months Cheshvan (חשון) and Kislev (כסלו) have twenty-nine days, has fifty-four Sabbaths which require special lessons. But as ordinary years (שנות פשוטות) have not so many Sabbaths, and those years in which New Year falls on a Monday, and the months Cheshvan and Kislev have thirty days, or New Year falls on a Saturday, and the said months are regular, i.e., Cheshvan having twenty-nine days and Kislev thirty, have only forty-seven Sabbaths—fourteen of the fifty-four sections, viz., 22 and 23 (פקודי), 27 and 28 (ויקהל), 29 and 30 (אחרי מות, קדרשים), 32 and 33 (בהר, בחקותי), 39 and 40 (בלק, חקת), 42 and 43 (מטות, מסעי), 50 and 51 (נצבים, וילך), have been appointed to be read in pairs either wholly or in part, according to the varying number of Sabbaths in the current year. Thus the whole Pentateuch is read through every year. The first of these weekly sections is read on the first Sabbath after the Feast of Tabernacles, which is in the month of Tishri, and begins the civil year, and the last is read on the concluding day of this festival, Tishri 23, which is called The Rejoicing of the Law (שמחת תורה), a day of rejoicing, because on it the law is read through [TABERNACLES, FEAST OF]. According to the triennial division, the reading of the law seems to have been as follows:—Gen. i. 1—Exod. xiii. 16, comprising history from the creation of the world to the Exodus, was read in the first year; Exod. xiii. 17—Num. vi. 27, embracing the laws of both Sinai and the Tabernacle, formed the lessons for the Sabbaths of the second year; and Num. vii. 1—Deut. xxxiv. 12, containing both history (i.e., the history of thirty-nine years' wanderings in the wilderness) and law (i.e., the repetition of the Mosaic law), constituted the Sabbatic lessons for the third year (comp. Megilla, 29, b, and Volkslehrer, ii. p. 209).

3. The manner of reading the Law and the Prophets.—Every Sabbatic lesson from the Law (קריאת התורה) is divided into seven sections (evidently designed to correspond to the seven days of the week) which, in the days of our Saviour and afterwards, were read by seven different persons (שבעה קרואים), who were called upon for this purpose by the congregation or its chief (Mishna, Megilla, iv. 2; Maimonides, Iod Ha-Hezekia Hilchoth Tefilla, xii. 7). Great care is taken that the whole nation should be represented at this reading of the Law and Prophets. Hence a Cohen (כהן) or priest is called to the reading of the first portion, a Levi (לוי) to the second, and an Israel (ישראל) to the third; and after the three great divisions of the nation have thus been duly represented, the remaining four portions are assigned to four others with less care. 'Every one thus called to the reading of the Law must unroll the scroll, and having found the place where he is to begin to read, pronounces the following benediction—'Bless ye the Lord, who is ever blessed;' to which the congregation respond, 'Blessed be the Lord, who is blessed for evermore.' Whereupon he again pronounces the following benediction—'Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast chosen us from among all nations, and hast given us thy Law. Blessed art thou, O Lord, giver of the Law;' to which all the congregation respond 'Amen.' He then reads the seventh portion of the lesson, and when he has finished, rolls up the scroll, and pronounces again the following benediction—'Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast given us thy Law, the Law of truth, and hast planted among us everlasting life. Blessed art thou, O Lord, giver of the Law'' (Maimonides, ibid. xii. 5). The other six, who are called in rotation to the reading of the other six portions, have to go through the same formularies. Then the Maphtir (מפטיר), or the one who finishes up by the reading of the Haphtara (הפטרה), or the lesson from the Prophets, is called. Having read the few concluding verses of the lesson from the Law, and passed through the same formularies as the other seven, he reads the appointed section from the Prophets. Before reading it, he pronounces the following benediction—'Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast chosen good prophets, and delighted in their words, which were spoken in truth. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who hast chosen the Law, thy servant Moses, thy people Israel, and thy true and righteous prophets;' and after reading, 'Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, Rock of all ages, Righteous in all generations, the faithful God who promises and performs, who decrees and accomplishes, for all thy words are faithful and just. Faithful art thou, Lord our God, and faithful are thy words, and not one of thy words shall return in vain, for thou art a faithful King. Blessed art thou, O Lord, the God who art faithful in all thy words.' 'Have mercy upon Zion, for it is the dwelling of our life, and save speedily in our days the afflicted souls. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who wilt make Zion rejoice in her children. Cause us to rejoice, O Lord our God, in Elijah thy servant, and in the kingdom of the house of David thine anointed. May he speedily come and gladden our hearts.

Let no stranger sit on his throne, and let others no longer inherit his glory, for thou hast sworn unto him by thy holy name that his light shall not be extinguished for ever and ever. Blessed art thou, O Lord, the shield of David.' 'For the Law, the divine service, the prophets, and for 'this day of rest' [or of memorial], this goodly day of holy convocation which thou hast given to us, O Lord, for sanctification and rest [on the Sabbath], for honour and glory; for all this, O Lord our King, we thank and praise thee. Let thy name be praised in the mouth of every living creature for ever and ever. Thy word, O our King, is true, and will abide for ever. Blessed art thou, King of the whole earth, who hast sanctified the Sabbath, and Israel, and the day of memorial' (Maimonides, ibid.) After the Babylonish captivity, when the Hebrew language became an unknown tongue to the common people, an interpreter (תורגמן, מוֹתְרָגְמָן) stood at the desk by the side of those who read the lessons, and paraphrased the section from the Law into Chaldee, verse by verse, the reader pausing at every verse, whilst the lesson from the Prophets he paraphrased three verses at a time (Mishna, Megilla, iv. 4); and Lightfoot is of opinion that St. Paul, in 1 Cor. xiv. 22, refers to this circumstance (Hore Hebrae in loco). The lesson from the Law was on these occasions rendered into Chaldee pretty literally, owing to the fear which both the interpreters and the congregation had, lest a free explanation of it might misrepresent its sense, whilst greater freedom was exercised with the lesson from the Prophets. Hence loose paraphrases and lengthy expositions were tolerated and looked for both from the professional interpreter and those of the congregation who were called up to read, and who felt that they could do with edification to the audience. Hence we find that Christ, according to this custom, was asked in the synagogue, which he attended on the Sabbath, to read and explain the Sabbatic lesson, and that He, in compliance with it, read and expounded Is. lxi., which was the Haphtara for that Sabbath. The Sabbatic lesson from the Law was, as we have seen, divided into seven sections or chapters, each of which had at least three verses, according to the verses of those days, so that the whole consisted of at least twenty-one such verses. The lesson from the Prophets was not portioned out to seven different individuals, but has also at least twenty-one verses (Mishna, Megilla, iv. 4; Maimonides, Iod Ha-chezaka Hilchoth Tefilla, xii. 13). The lesson from the Law for the Day of Atonement is divided into six chapters, for Festivals into five, for New Moon into four, and for Mondays and Thursdays into three chapters or sections. The number of persons called up to the reading of the Law always corresponds to the number of sections. For Mondays and Thursdays, New Moon, and the week days of the Festivals (חול מועד), there are no corresponding lessons from the Prophets (Mishna, Megilla, iv. 1-3).

4. The Origin of this Institution.—The origin of this custom may easily be traced. The Bible emphatically and repeatedly enjoins upon every Israelite to study its contents (Deut. iv. 9; xxxii. 46); Moses himself ordered that the whole law should be read publicly at the end of every Sabbatic year (ibid. xxxi. 10-12), whilst Joshua urges that it should be studied day and night (i. 8; comp.

also Ps. i. 2, al.) Now the desire to carry out this injunction literally, and yet the utter impossibility to do it on the part of those who had to work for daily bread all the week, and who could not afford to buy the necessarily expensive scrolls, gave rise to this institution. On the Sabbath and festivals all were relieved from their labour, and could attend places of worship where the inspired writings were deposited, and where care could be taken that no private interpretation should be palmed upon the Word of God. Hence both James (Acts xv. 21) and Josephus (Contra Apion. ii. 17) speak of it as a very ancient custom, and the Talmud tells us that the division of each Sabbatic lesson into seven sections was introduced in honour of the Persian king (Megilla, 23), which shews that this custom obtained anterior to the Persian rule. Indeed Maimonides positively asserts that Moses himself ordained the hebdomadal reading of the law (Hilchoth Tefilla, xii. 1). Equally natural is the division of the law into Sabbatic sections as the whole of it could not be read at once. The only difficulty is to ascertain positively whether the annual or the triennial division was the more ancient one. A triennial division is mentioned in Megilla 29, b, as current in Palestine; with this agree the reference to 155 sections of the law in the Midrash, Esther 116, b, and the Massoretic division of the Pentateuch into 154 Sedarim. But on the other hand R. Simeon b. Eleazar, a Palestinian, declared that Moses instituted the reading of Lev. xxvi. before the Feast of Pentecost, and Deut. xxviii. before New Year, which most unquestionably presuppose the annual division of the Pentateuch into 54 Parshioth. This is moreover confirmed by the statement (ibid. 31, a) that the section תַּאֲתָהּ הַכִּבְרָה (Deut. xxxiii. 1-xxiv. 12) was read on the ninth day of the Feast of Tabernacles, thus terminating the annual cycle, as well as by the fact that the annual festival of the rejoicing of the law (שְׂמֹחֵת תּוֹרָה) which commemorates the annual finishing of the perusal of the Pentateuch [TABERNACLES, FEAST OF] was an ancient institution. We must, therefore, conclude that the annual cycle which is now prevalent among the Jews, was the generally adopted one, at least since the Maccabæan times, whilst the triennial, though the older, was the exception. It is far more difficult to trace the origin of the Haphtara, or the lessons from the prophets, and its signification. A very ancient tradition tells us that the Syrians had interdicted the reading of the law, and carried away the scrolls containing it, and that appropriate sections from the prophets were therefore chosen to replace the Pentateuch (Zunz, Gottesdienstliche Vor. p. 5), whilst Elias Levita traces the origin of the Haphtara to persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes. In his Lex. (s. v. פֶּסֶח) he says, 'the wicked Antiochus, king of Greece, prohibited the Jews to read the law publicly. They, therefore, selected sections from the prophets of the same import as the Sabbatic lessons . . . and though this prohibition has now ceased, this custom has not been left off, and to this day we read a section from the prophets after the reading of the law;' and we see no reason to reject this account. The objection of Vitringa, Frankel, Herzfeld, etc., that Antiochus, who wanted to exterminate Judaism, would not wage war against the Pentateuch exclusively, but would equally destroy the prophetic books, and that this implies a knowledge on the part of the soldiers of the distinction between the Pentateuch and the other inspired writings, is obviated by the fact that there was an external difference between the scrolls of the Pentateuch and the other sacred books,* that the Jews claimed the Pentateuch as their law and rule of faith, and that this was the reason why it especially was destroyed. This is corroborated by 1 Maccab. i. 56, where the law only is said to have been burned. Accordingly הַפְּטֵרָה, פֶּטֶר, to liberate, to free, signifies the liberating lesson, the portion from the prophets which is read instead of the portion from the law that could not be read, and which liberates from the injunction of reading the Pentateuch. For the other opinions about the signification of Haphṭara, we refer to the Literature quoted below.

HARA (הָרָא), a province of Assyria. We read that Tiglath-pileser 'brought the Reubenites, Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh, unto Halah, and Habor, and Hara, and to the river Gozan' (1 Chron. v. 26). The parallel passage in 2 Kings xviii. 11 omits Hara, and adds 'in the cities of the Medes.' Bochart consequently supposes that Hara was either a part of Media, or another name for that country. He shews that Herodotus (vii. 62) and other ancient writers call the Medes Arians, and their country Aria. He farther supposes that the name Hara, which signifies 'mountainous,' may have been given to that northern section of Media subsequently called by the Arabs Elgebal ('the mountains'; see Bochart, Opp. i. 194). All this, however, appears to be mere conjecture. The words Aria and Hara are totally different, both in meaning and origin. The Medes were a branch of the great Arian family who came originally from India, and who took their name, according to Müller (Science of Language, pp. 237, sq., 2d ed.), from the Sanscrit word Arya, which means 'noble,' 'of a good

* The law has two rollers, i. e., has a roller attached to each of the two ends of the vellum on which it is written, and every weekly portion when read on the Sabbath is unrolled from the right roller and rolled on the left; so that when the law is opened on the next Sabbath the portion appointed for that day is at once found. Whereas the prophetic books have only one roller, and the lesson from the prophets has to be sought out on every occasion (comp. Baba Bathra, 14 a). Dean Alford (The Greek Testament, vol. i. p. 449, 4th ed.), overlooking this fact, has therefore wrongly assigned to the word 'FOUND' in Matt. iv. 17, the sense of 'fortuitous (i. e., providential) finding.' It is this fact that the law is on two rollers, and the other sacred books on one, as mentioned in the above-quoted passage from the Talmud, which gave a different external appearance to the scrolls of the law, and those of the other sacred books.

family.' Its etymological signification seems to be 'one who tills the ground;' and it is thus allied to the Latin Arare (see also Rawlinson's Herodotus i. p. 401).

Hara is joined with Hala, Habor, and the river Gozan. These were all situated in western Assyria, between the Tigris and Euphrates, and along the banks of the Khabûr. We may safely conclude, therefore, that Hara could not have been far distant from that region. It is somewhat remarkable that the name is not given in either the Septuagint or Peshito version. Some have hence imagined that the word was interpolated after these versions were made. This, however, is a rash criticism, as it exists in all Hebrew MSS., and also in Jerome's version (see Robinson's Calmet, s.v., Gozan; Grant's Nestorian Christians, p. 120). The conjecture that Hara and Haran are identical cannot be sustained, though the situation of the latter might suit the requirements of the Biblical narrative, and its Greek classical name resembles Hara. The Hebrew words הָרָא and חָרָן are radically different. Hara may perhaps have been a local name applied to the mountainous region north of Gozan, called by Strabo and Ptolemy Mons Masius, and now Karja Baghlar (Strabo xvi. 23; Ptolemy v. 18, 2).—J. L. P.

HARADAH (הֶרְדָּה; Sept. Χαραδάθ), a camp or station of the Israelites (Num. xxxiii. 24) [WANDERING].

HARAM. [HOUSE.]

HARAN (חָרָן; Sept. 'Appá), son of Terah, brother of Abraham and Nahor, and father of Lot, Milcah, and Iscah. That he was Terah's youngest son is presumable from his being last mentioned; but this does not necessarily follow, because the younger son is often, honoris causa, placed before the elder. He died before his father Terah; an event which, from the manner in which it is mentioned, appears to have been a much rarer case in those days than at present (Gen. xi. 27, sq.).

2. (Sept. Áδν; Alex. 'Apáv). A Gershonite Levite of the family of Shimei, in the time of David (1 Chron. xxiii. 9).

3. (חָרָן; Sept. 'Appá; Alex. 'Appá). A son of Caleb by his concubine Ephah (1 Chron. ii. 46).

HARAN (חָרָן; Sept. and N. T., Χαράν).

In Gen. xi. 31 we read that Terah and his family left Ur of the Chaldees to go to Canaan, 'and they came to Haran and dwelt there.' Terah died there, and a portion of his family settled permanently in that city. Abraham, however, received a divine command to go to Canaan, and then he finally left Haran. The next direct reference to Haran is in connection with the flight and subsequent history of Jacob. His mother Rebekah was a native of Haran; and when by a stratagem she secured for Jacob his father's blessing, she sent him to Laban her brother (Gen. xxvii. 43). The country in which Haran was situated is called Padan-aram, or 'the plain of Aram' (xxviii. 2); and also Aram-Naharaim, 'Aram of the two rivers' (A. V. Mesopotamia, xxiv. 10). In 2 Kings xix. 12, Haran is mentioned in connection with Gozan, a province of Mesopotamia, as having been taken by the Assyrians; and Ezekiel groups it with Canneh, Eden, and other places in Assyria (xxvii. 23). These are the only indications in Scripture of the site of Haran. The translators of the Septuagint identify the Aram-Naharaim of Genesis with the well-known Greek province of Mesopotamia. Josephus also says: 'Terah hating Chaldaea on account of his mourning for Haran, they all removed to Haran of Mesopotamia (ἐς Χαββὰν τῆς Μεσοποταμίας) where Terah died' (Antiq. i. 6. 5). Jerome thus describes Haran:—'Charran, a city of Mesopotamia beyond Edessa, which to this day is called Charra, where the Roman army was cut off, and Crassus its leader taken' (Onomast., s.v. Charran). Guided by these descriptions and statements, which certainly appear sufficiently clear and full, sacred geographers have almost universally identified Haran with the Carrae (Κάρραι) of the Greeks and Romans (Strabo, xvi.; Pliny, v.

21), and the Harrân of the Arabs (Arab. حَرَّانَ ;

Schultens, Index Geogr. in Vitam Saladini, s.v.)

Harrân stands on the banks of a small river called Belik, which flows into the Euphrates about fifty miles south of the town. From it a number of leading roads radiate to the great fords of the Tigris and Euphrates; and it thus formed an important station on the line of commerce between central and western Asia. This may explain why Terah came to it, and why it was mentioned among the places which supplied the marts of Tyre (Ezek. xxvii. 23). Crassus was probably marching along this great route when he was attacked by the Parthians. The people of Haran long retained both the language and worship of the Chaldeans; and a chapel is said to have existed there dedicated to Abraham (see Asseman, Bibliotheca Orientalis, i. 327).

Dr. Beke in his Origines Biblicæ (p. 122, sq.), made the somewhat startling statement that Haran must have been near Damascus, and that Aram-Naharaim is the country between the Abana and Pharpar. After lying dormant for a quarter of a century this theory was again revived in 1860. The writer of this article visited and described a small village in the plain, four hours east of Damascus, called Harrân el-Awamid ('Harrân of the columns'). The description having met the eye of Dr. Beke (in Five Years in Damascus, i. 376), he at once concluded that this village was the site of the real 'city of Nahor.' He has since visited Harrân el-Awamid, and travelled from it to Gilead, and is more confirmed in his view, though he appears to stand alone. His arguments have not been sufficient to set aside the powerful evidence in favour of Haran in Mesopotamia. The student may see the whole subject discussed in the Athenæum for Nov. 23, 30; Dec. 7, 1861; Feb. 1, 15; March 1, 22, 29; April 6, 19; and May 24, 1862; also in Stanley's Lectures on the Jewish Church, p. 447, sq.—J. HARARITE, THE (הַרְרִי), once without the article, 2 Sam. xxiii. 11, the appellation of three of David's guard. Gesenius translates the word by mountaineer; but Fürst thinks it is a Gentile from some place called הַר. It is applied to—1. SHAM-MAH, the son of Agee (2 Sam. xxiii. 11, 33). In 1

Chron. xi. 27 he is called 'Shammoth the Harorite,' and in 2 Sam. xxiii. 25 we have הַרְרִי Harodite, in place of הַרְרִי, Harovite. 2. JONATHAN, the son of Shage (1 Chron. xi. 34). In 2 Sam. xxiii. 32 he is mentioned without any appellation or designation. 3. AHIAH, the son of Sacar (1 Chron. xi. 35). In 2 Sam. xxiii. 33 we have Sharar for Sacar, and הַרְרִי for אַרְרִי.—W. L. HARDT, HERMANN VON DER, a learned theologian and Orientalist, was born at Melle, in Westphalia, in the duchy of Osnabrück, 15th November 1660. After receiving his early education at Herfort and Osnabrück, he repaired to Koburg in his 17th year, and thence to the University of Jena, where he devoted himself to the study of theology and the Oriental languages. He then spent a year at Hamburg under the learned Edzard, and returned to Jena 1681, where, after a time, he began to give private lectures. In 1686 he repaired to Leipzig and commenced as a privat-docent. In 1690 he became ordinary professor of Oriental languages at Helmstädt. Here he led a life of unwearied literary activity, lecturing on the Oriental tongues, the exegesis of the O. and N. T., Hebrew and ecclesiastical antiquities, Biblical science, etc. He died at the age of 86, in 1746, 28th February. He was a very learned man, but full of paradoxes, eager after new views, rash, and peculiar. His writings are numerous, exceeding 300, and of a miscellaneous nature, grammatical, exegetical, and historical. The last are the most valuable to us. Those relating to Biblical literature are, Ephemerides Philologæ quibus difficiiora quedam loca Pentateuchi ad Hebraicorum fontium tenorem explicata, cum notis et epistolis pro uberiore commentatione, 1693, 1696, 1703; Brevia atque solida Hebrææ lingue fundamenta, 1694 and 1739; Elementa Chaldaica, 1693, etc.; Brevia atque solida Syriacæ lingue fundamenta, 1694, etc.; Hoseas illustratus Chaldaica Jonathanis versione et philologicis celeberrimi rabbinorum Raschi, Aben Esræ et Kimchi commentariis, 1702, 1775; Commentarii linguae Hebrææ ex Græcia apologia, 1727; Evangelicæ rei integritas in negotio Jonæ quatuor libris declarata, 1719; Enigmata prisca orbis, 1723 fol; Tomus primus in Jobum, etc., 1728 fol.—S. HARE, FRANCIS, D.D., successively Dean of Worcester, Dean of St. Paul's, Bishop of St. Asaph, and Bishop of Chichester. The deanery of St. Paul's he held with each of his episcopal appointments to his death in 1740. He was at one time a friend of Dr. Bentley, who dedicated to him, in 1713, his celebrated Remarks on the Essay on Freethinking, in acknowledgment of which Hare published his Letter entitled 'A Clergyman's thanks to Phileleutherus Lipsiensis for his Remarks, etc.' Before his elevation to the see of St. Asaph, Dr. Hare took part against Hoadley in the Bangorian controversy; amongst his published works was a sermon on this subject—'Concio ad Synodum,' on Titus ii. 8. Bishop Hare was the author of several political tracts, an edition of Terence, and a volume of sermons; but the only work which entitles him to a place in this 'Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature' was his Book of Psalms in the Hebrew, put into the original poetical metre, published in 1736. 'We learn (says Bishop Jebb, Sacred Literature, p. 12) from George Psalmanazar's memoirs.

that his lordship printed but 500 copies of his Hebrew Psalter, one-half of which he presented to his learned friends at home and abroad—the remaining copies sold but slackly, and the work was never separately republished.* Although this ingenious treatise was so soon superseded by Bishop Lowth's metrical system, it was unquestionably the first publication of any note that had appeared in England on the subject of Hebrew metre. The learned author's negative merits were not inconsiderable; he saw with clearness and exposed with convincing arguments the faults of his predecessors. Yet he fell into the self-same error which he had censured in Gomarus, of attributing to Hebrew poetry a closer affinity to Greek metre than it really possesses; nor was he exempt from the more serious fault which he justly imputed to Meibomius of wantonly altering and interpolating, without any adequate authority, the Hebrew text of the Psalmist. In his metrical theory he considered the accents of the syllables as one of the characteristics of Hebrew poetry; and although he did not discover alcaics and sapphics in the Psalms of David, he did suppose that they were replete with iambs and trochaics. Whatever progress may yet be made in discovering the laws of Hebrew poetry, it may safely be assumed that all attempts like Bishop Hare's to recover the Hebrew system of metre by means of Greek and Latin examples must be utterly futile. Our Bishop's name will be kept in remembrance in connection with this subject by the confutations of Dr. Lowth. The longer of these was written in English in a letter to Dr. Thomas Edwards, whose defence of Hare was hardly more than a virulent attack on Lowth; while the shorter one is appended to the Praelectiones under the title of 'Metricæ Harianæ brevis confutatio.' In the best Oxford edition of Lowth's great work there is reprinted a valuable review of Bishop Hare's theory by the learned German, Christian Weise, which was originally published in 1740 under the title of 'Systema Psalmorum Metricum a celeberrimo Anglo Francisco Hare nuper adornatum delineat Christianus Weisius.' There are briefer notices of Hare's system in Bishop Jebb's Sacred Literature, pp. 12-16, and Canon Roger's Book of Psalms in Hebrew, vol. i. pp. 16-19. Bishop Hare was grandfather of the late Archdeacon Hare and his brother, the well-known authors of Guesses at Truth.—P. H.

HARE (אַרְנֶבֶת arnebeth; Arab. arneb) occurs in Lev. xi. 6, and Deut. xiv. 7, and, in both instances, the animal is prohibited from being used as food, because, although it chews the cud, it has not the hoof divided. But the hare belongs to an order of mammals totally distinct from the ruminantia, which are all, without exception, bisulca, the camel's hoof alone offering a partial modification. They have all four stomachs; incisor teeth, with again some slight modification in the camel, solely in the lower jaw; molars made for grinding, and the lower jawbone articulated, so as to admit of the circular action required for that purpose, when the food, already swallowed, is forced up to be thoroughly triturated. All these characters and faculties are wanting in the hare, which belongs to the order rodentia; for, in common with porcupines, squirrels, beavers, and rats, it has incisor teeth above and below, set like chisels, and calculated for gnawing, cutting, and nibbling. The stomach of rodents is single, and the motion of the mouth, excepting when they masticate some small portion of food reserved in the hollow of the cheek, is more that of the lips; when in a state of repose the animals are engaged in working the incisor teeth upon each other. This practice is a necessary condition of existence, for the friction keeps them fit for the purpose of nibbling, and prevents their growing beyond a proper length. It is a provision of nature in the whole order of rodents; and, if by any accident the four cutting teeth be rendered inefficient by not closing upon each other at the exact line of contact, they grow rapidly beyond serviceable use, exceed the opening of the mouth, and impede feeding till the animal perishes from want. As hares do not subsist on hard substances, like most of the genera of the order, but on tender shoots and grasses, they have more cause, and therefore a more constant craving, to abrade their teeth; and this they do in a manner which, combined with the slight trituration of the occasional contents of the cheeks, even modern writers, not zoologists, have mistaken for real rumination. In the German versions, the expression wiederkauen, 'to chew again,' is much more correct than the English phrase, 'to chew the cud,' because this last implies a faculty which re-chewing does not, and which the hare does not possess.

560. Syrian Hare.

Physiological investigation having fully determined these questions, it follows that both with regard to the Shaphan and the Hare we should understand the original in the above passages, rendered 'chewing the cud,' as merely implying a second mastication, more or less complete, and not necessarily that faculty of true ruminants, which derives its name from a power to draw up aliment, after deglutition, when worked into a ball, from the first stomach into the mouth, and there to submit it to a second grinding process. The act of 'chewing the cud' and 're-chewing' being considered identical by the Hebrews, the sacred lawgiver, not being occupied with the doctrines of science, no doubt used the expression in the sense in which it was then understood. It may be added, that a similar opinion, and consequent rejection of the hare as food, pervaded many nations of antiquity, who derived their origin, or their doctrines, from a Semitic source; and that among others it existed among the British Celtæ, probably even before they had any intercourse with Phœnician merchants.

* It is, however, reprinted, with several works of like nature in Ugolini Thes. vol. xxxi.—the original title was 'Psalmorum Liber, in versiculos metricæ divisus et cum aliis criticis subsidiis tum præcipue metricæ opæ multis in locis integritati suæ restitutus, cum Dissertatione de antiqua Hebræorum poesi . . . edidit Franciscus Hare S. T. P. Episcopus Cicestrensis.'

There are two distinct species of hare in Syria, one, Lepus Syriacus, or Syrian hare, nearly equal in size to the common European, having the fur ochry buff, and Lepus Sinaiticus, or hare of the desert, smaller and brownish. They reside in the localities indicated by their trivial names, and are distinguished from the common hare, by a greater length of ears, and a black tail with white fringe. There is found in Egypt, and higher up the Nile, a third species, represented in the outline paintings on ancient monuments, but not coloured with that delicacy of tint required for distinguishing it from the others, excepting that it appears to be marked with the black speckles which characterise the existing species.—C. HARENBERG, JOHN CHRISTOPHER, a Lutheran theologian and historian, was born in 1696 at Langenholzen, in the duchy of Hildesheim. In 1715 he went to Helmstädt and studied theology, history, and the belles lettres. In 1720 he became rector of the school belonging to the chapter at Gandersheim. In 1733 he was appointed inspector-general of the schools in the duchy of Wolfenbüttel. In 1738 he was admitted into the Royal Academy of Sciences at Berlin; and from 1745 he taught ecclesiastical history and political geography at the Carolinum of Brunswick. He was soon after nominated overseer of the monastery of St. Laurence, near Schoeningen, where he died 12th November 1774. Harenberg's works are numerous, and little read in the present day. However useful at the time when they appeared, they are almost forgotten now. Those relating to the literature or explanation of the Bible are Jura Israelitarum in Palestina, Hildesheim 1724; Palestina, seu terra a Mose et Josua occupata et inter Judæos distributa per xii. tribus vulgo sancta appellata, ex observationibus astronomicis, itinerum intervallis, ac scriptis fide dignis concinnata, Augsburg 1737; Otia Gandersheimensia sacra, expone[n]dis sacris literis et historia ecclesiastica dicata, Utrecht 1739; Erklärung der Offenbarung S. Johannis, Brunswick 1759; Amos propheta expositus interpretatione nova latina, Leyden 1764; Aufklärung des Buchs Daniels, Quedlinburg, 2 vols., 1770-1772. Besides separate works, he wrote many dissertations and essays in Bibliothèques and Museums. Some are printed in Ugolini's Thesaurus.—S. D.

HARIM (חָרִים; Sept. Χαρίβ; Alex. Χαρήμ), a priest third in the four and twenty orders of the divisions of the sons of Aaron, chosen to 'the service of the house of the Lord' (1 Chron. xxiv. 8). The name repeatedly occurs in Ezra in connection with what we believe to be the descendants of the above, who came up out of the captivity of Babylon with Zerubbabel. Two families of B'ney Harim (Sept. ὡς Ἰλδμ, and ὡς Ἰρδμ) are mentioned, the first numbering 320, the other 1017 (Ezra ii. 32, 39). The names of two distinct families of B'ney-Harim also occur among those who had 'taken strange wives of the people of the land' (Ezra x. 21, 31). We find a further mention of the name, probably as representing the family in one or other of its divisions, or both, among those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 5).—W. J. C.

HARLOT, WHORE, STRANGE WOMAN, etc. (חָלָה, more fully חָלָה רָעָה; Sept. πόρνη; Vulg. meretrix; נְכָרִיָּה, זֶה, קָרְשָׁה, etc. The first of these English words, to which various etymologies have been assigned, signifies a prostitute for lust or gain, אֶחָד רָע, The mercenary motive is more evident in the second, from the German huren, Dutch hueren, 'to hire.' It is equally apparent in the Greek πόρνη, from πωρῶ, 'to sell'; and in the Latin meretrix, from merco, 'to earn' (comp. Ovid, Amor. i. 10, 21). The first Hebrew word (חָלָה) occurs frequently, and is often rendered in our version by the first of these English words, as in Gen. xxxiv. 31, etc., and sometimes, without apparent reason for the change, by the second, as in Prov. xxiii. 27, and elsewhere. The first English word is also applied to different Hebrew words, whereby important distinctions are lost. Thus in Gen. xxxviii. 15, the word is חָלָה, 'harlot,' which, however, becomes changed to קָרְשָׁה, 'harlot,' in vers. 21, 22, which means, literally, a consecrated woman, a female (perhaps priestess) devoted to prostitution in honour of some heathen idol. The distinction shews that Judah supposed Tamar to be a heathen; the facts, therefore, do not prove that prostitution was then practised between Hebrews. The following elucidation is offered of the most important instances in which the several words occur:—

First, חָלָה. From the foregoing account of Judah it would appear that the 'veil' was at that time peculiar to harlots. Judah thought Tamar to be such, 'because she had covered her face.' Mr. Buckingham remarks, in reference to this passage, that 'the Turcomann women go unveiled to this day' (Travels in Mesopotamia, i. 77). It is contended by Jahn and others that in ancient times all females wore the veil (Bibl. Archæol. p. 127). Possibly some peculiarity in the size of the veil, or the mode of wearing it, may have been (חָלָה, Lev. xxi. 7) a harlot. Josephus extends the law to all the Hebrews, and seems to ground it on the prohibition against oblations arising from prostitution. Deut. xxiii. 18 (Antiq. iv. 8. 23). The celebrated case of Rahab has been much debated [RAHAB]. The next instance introduces the epithet of 'strange woman.' It is the case of Jephthah's mother (Judg. xi. 2), who is also called a harlot (מְרִירָה; meretrix); but the epithet אִשָּׁה אֲחֵרָה, 'strange woman,' merely denotes foreign extraction. Josephus says ξένος καὶ τῇ μητρὶ, 'a stranger by the mother's side.' The masterly description in Prov. vii. 6, etc., may possibly be that of an abandoned married woman (vers. 19, 20), or of the solicitations of a courtesan, 'fair speech,' under such a pretension. The mixture of religious observances (ver. 14) seems illustrated by the fact that 'the gods are actually worshipped in many Oriental brothels, and fragments of the offerings distributed among the frequenters' (Dr. A. Clarke's Comment. in loc.) The representation given by Solomon is no doubt founded upon facts, and therefore shews that in his time prostitutes plied their trade in the 'streets' (Prov. vii. 12; ix. 14, etc.; Jer. iii. 2; Ezek. xvi. 24, 25, 31). Since the Hebrews regarded Jehovah as the husband of his people, by virtue of the covenant he had made with them (Jer. iii. 1); therefore, to commit fornication is a very common metaphor in the Scriptures to denote defections on their part from that covenant, and especially by the practice of idolatry [FORNICATION]. Hence the degeneracy of Jerusalem is illustrated by the symbol of a harlot (Is. i. 21), and even that of heathen cities, as of Nineveh (Nah. iii. 4). Under this figure the prophet Ezekiel delivers the tremendous invectives contained in ch. xvi. xxiii. In the prophecy of Hosea the illustration is carried to a startling extent. The prophet seems commanded by the Lord to take 'a wife of whoredoms and children of whoredoms' (ch. i. 2), and to 'love an adulteress' (ch. iii. 1). It has, indeed, been much disputed whether these transactions were real, or passed in vision only; but the idea itself, and the diversified applications of it throughout the prophecy, render it one of the most effective portions of Scripture [HOSEA].

Secondly, קדשה (occurs Gen. xxxviii. 15, 21, 22; Deut. xxiii. 17; Hos. iv. 14). It has been already observed that the proper meaning of the word is consecrated prostitute. The very early allusion to such persons, in the first of these passages, agrees with the accounts of them in ancient heathen writers. Herodotus refers to the 'abominable custom of the Babylonians, who compelled every native female to attend the temple of Venus once in her life, and to prostitute herself in honour of the goddess' (i. 199; Baruch, vi. 43). Strabo calls prostitutes, who, it is well known, was at Athens dedicated to Venus, λεπόδουλοι γυναῖκες, 'consecrated servants,' 'votaries' (Geog. viii. p. 378; Grotius, Annotat. on Baruch; Beloe's Herodotus, Notes, vol. i. p. 272, Lond. 1806). The transaction related in Num. xv. 1-15 (comp. Ps. cvi. 28) seems connected with idolatry. The prohibition in Deut. xxiii. 17, 'there shall be no קדשה, 'whore,' of the daughters of Israel,' is intended to exclude such devotees from the worship of Jehovah (see other allusions, Job xxxvi. 14; 1 Kings xiv. 24; xv. 12).

Thirdly, נכריה, 'the strange woman' (1 Kings xi. 1; Prov. v. 20; vi. 24; vii. 5; xxiii. 27; Sept. ἀλλοτρία; Vulg. aliena, extranea). It seems probable that some of the Hebrews in later times interpreted the prohibition against fornication (Deut. xxii. 21) as limited to females of their own nation, and that the 'strange women' in question were Canaanites and other Gentiles (Josh. xxiii. 13). In the case of Solomon they are specified as Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, Zidonians, and Hittites. The passages referred to discover the character of these females. To the same class belongs זונה, 'the strange woman' (Prov. v. 3, 20; xxii. 14; xxiii. 33; γυνή πόρνη, ἀλλοτρία, meretrix, aliena, extranea): it is sometimes found זונה (Prov. ii. 16; vii. 5). To the same class of females belongs כסילית, 'the foolish woman,' i.e., by a common association of ideas in the Shemith dialects, sinful (Ps. xiv. 1). The description in Prov. ix. 14, etc., illustrates the character of the female so designated. To which may be added זונה, 'the evil woman' (Prov. vi. 24).

In the N. T. πόρνη occurs in Matt. xxi. 31, 32; Luke xv. 30; 1 Cor. vi. 15, 16; Heb. xi. 31; James ii. 25. In none of these passages does it necessarily imply prostitution for gain. The likeliest is Luke xv. 30. It is used symbolically for a city in Rev. xvii. 1, 5, 15, 16; xix. 2, where the term and all the attendant imagery are derived from the O. T. It may be observed in regard to Tyre, which (Is. xxiii. 15, 17) is represented as 'committing fornication with all the kingdoms of the world upon the face of the earth,' that these words, as indeed seems likely from those which follow, may relate to the various arts which she had employed to induce merchants to trade with her' (Patrick, in loc.). So the Sept. understood it, ἐστὶ ἐμπόριον πᾶσαις ταῖς βασιλείαις τῆς οἰκουμένης ἐπὶ πρόσποντον τῇ πόλει. Schleusner observes that the same words in Rev. xviii. 3 may also relate to commercial dealings. (Winer's Realwörterb., s. v. HURE; RAHAB; Fesseli Adversar. Sacr. ii. 27. 1, 2, Witteb. 1650; Frisch, De muliere peregrina ap. Hebr., Lips. 1744).—J. F. D.

HARMER, REV. THOMAS, a learned congregational minister, was born at Norwich 1715, educated under Mr. Eames, F.R.S., tutor of a dissenting academy in London, and ordained, in his twentieth year, as pastor of the congregational church at Watesfield, in Suffolk, where he continued beloved and useful till his death in 1788, aged 73. His works entitling him to a notice here are: 1. Observations on divers passages of Scripture, placing many of them in a light altogether new by means of circumstances mentioned in books of voyages and travels into the East. A new edition of this work, the best, was edited by Dr. Adam Clark in 1816, 4 vols. 8vo. Here Harmer broke new ground, and led the way in the application of Oriental travel to the elucidation of Scripture, in which he has been since successfully followed by many others. 2. Outlines of a new Commentary on Solomon's Song, drawn by the Help of Instructions from the East, etc., Lond. 1768, 2d edition, 1775. This work has been much esteemed by some, but pronounced 'singularly confused' by others. According to the author the essence of the Song is the marriage of Solomon with an Egyptian princess, which greatly displeases Shulamith, his Hebrew queen; the whole transaction being typical of the marriage of the Messiah with the Gentile Church, and the displeasure of the Jewish Church thereat. 3. An account of the Jewish Doctrine of the Resurrection from the Dead. HARMONIES. The object of Harmonies is to arrange the Scriptures in chronological order, so that the mutual agreement of the several parts may be rendered apparent, and the true succession of events clearly understood. With this view various scholars have compiled harmonies of the Old Testament, of the New, and of particular portions of both. Harmonies of the O. T. exhibit the books disposed in chronological order; as is done by Lightfoot in his 'Chronicle of the Times, and the order of the Texts of the Old Testament'; and by Townsend in his 'Old Testament arranged in Historical and Chronological order.' Harmonies of the N. T. present the gospels and epistles distributed in like order; the latter being interspersed among the Acts of the Apostles. In this way Townsend has proceeded in his valuable work entitled, 'The New Testament arranged in Chronological and Historical order.' Books, however, of this kind are so few in number, that usage has almost appropriated the term harmony to the gospels. It is this part of the N. T. which has chiefly occupied the attention of those inquirers whose object is to arrange the Scriptures in their true order. The memoirs of our Lord written by the four Evangelists, have chiefly engaged the thoughts of those who wish to shew that all agree, and mutually authenticate one another. Accordingly, such compositions are exceedingly numerous. The four gospels narrate some of the events connected with our Lord's abode on earth, from his birth to his ascension. There must therefore be a general resemblance between them; though that of John contains little in common with the others, being apparently supplementary to them. Yet there are considerable diversities, both in the order in which facts are narrated, and in the facts themselves. Hence the difficulty of weaving the accounts of the four into a continuous and chronological history. Those portions of the Gospels that relate to the resurrection of the Saviour have always presented the greatest obstacles to the compilers of harmonies; and it must be candidly admitted that they are not easily reconciled. Here the labours of West and Townson, especially the latter, have served to remove some contradictions. In addition to them may be mentioned Greswell, Robinson, and Stroud, who have tried the same problem with greater success.

In connection with harmonies, the term diatessaron frequently occurs. It denotes a continued narrative selected out of the four Gospels, in which all repetitions of the same or similar words are avoided. It is thus the result of a harmony; since the latter, properly speaking, exhibits the entire texts of the four Evangelists, arranged in corresponding columns. In popular language the two are often used synonymously (see, however, Davidson's State of the Old Testament Text considered, etc. etc., p. 541, 2d ed.)

The following questions relative to harmonies demand attention:—

1. Have all or any of the Evangelists observed chronological arrangement in their narratives?

2. What was the duration of our Lord's ministry?

1. It was the opinion of Osiander and his followers, that all the Evangelists record the facts of the Saviour's history in their true order. When therefore the same transactions are placed in a different order by the writers, they were supposed to have happened more than once. It was assumed that they took place as often as they were differently arranged. This principle is too improbable to require refutation. Instead of endeavouring to solve difficulties, it boldly meets them with a clumsy expedient. Improbable however as it is, it has been adopted by Macknight. It is our decided conviction that the Evangelists have not followed chronological arrangement.

The question then arises, have all neglected the order of time. Newcome and many others espouse this view. 'Chronological order,' says this writer, 'is not precisely observed by any of the Evangelists; St. John and St. Mark observe it most; and St. Matthew neglects it most.' Bishop Marsh supposes that Matthew probably adhered to the order of time, because he was for the most part an eye-witness of the facts. The others, he thinks, neglected the succession of events. The reason assigned by the learned prelate in favour of Matthew's order proves too much; because John was also an eye-witness; yet his order differs from Matthew's. The fact of one being an eye-witness has no conclusive relation, by itself, to the arrangement of written materials.

A close inspection of Matthew's Gospel will shew that he did not intend to mark the true succession of events. He gives us no definite expressions to assist in arranging his materials in their proper order. Very frequently he passes from one occurrence to another without note of time; sometimes he employs a τότε, sometimes ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις ἐκείναις, ἐν ἐκείνῳ τῷ καιρῷ, or ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ὥρᾳ, ἐκεῖθεν. Rarely is he so minute as to use μεθ' ἡμέρας ἔξ (xvii. 1). In short, time and place seem to have been subordinated to the grand object which he had in view, viz., the lively exhibition of Jesus as the Messiah promised in the O. T. With this design, he has often brought together similar facts and discourses. Although, therefore, Kaiser founds upon the phrases we have adduced a conclusion the very reverse of ours, we believe that Matthew did not propose to follow chronological order. The contrary is obviously implied.

Mark again is still more indefinite than Matthew. Even the general expressions found in the first Gospel are wanting in his. He uses καὶ . . . πάλιν, καὶ πάλιν, ἐν ἐκείναις ταῖς ἡμέραις πάλιν. Facts themselves, not their true succession, were the object of his attention. Chronological order is not observed in his Gospel, as is now generally admitted. Yet Cartwright, in his Harmony, published about 1627, makes Mark's arrangement the rule of his method.

With regard to Luke, some infer from the use of καθεξῆς at the beginning of his Gospel, that he intended to arrange everything in its true chronological place. Such was the opinion of Beza, adopted by Olshausen. But an examination of the work itself, which is unconnected and unchronological, shews another object. He uses καὶ ἐγένετο, καὶ, and δέ. His expressions of time are indeterminate. Indeed he frequently passes from one transaction to another without any note of time; or gives μετὰ ταῦτα, ἐν μιᾷ τῶν ἡμερῶν. All that can be fairly deduced from the word καθεξῆς is, that Luke designed to pursue a systematic plan, connecting events together according to the predominating idea with which he set out, which was not the chronological principle.

John's Gospel has so little in common with the rest that it cannot be conveniently drawn into a harmony with them. It is obvious that his arrangement is not chronological. In general he carefully notes whether one, two, or three days elapsed between certain events.

The Gospels are fragmentary. They do not profess to record all the sayings and doings of Jesus, but give a selection from the materials of his life. The basis of each was oral tradition, combined in some cases with the use of documents. A spiritual idea, not the principle of accurate sequence, guided and controlled both their selection of materials and the form it assumed in their hands. Each evangelist had his own plan and object. Matthew had Jews and Jewish Christians in view; and therefore he places the facts of the Gospel in connection with the revelation of the Old Testament. Mark designed to give prominent facts in the life of Jesus, accompanied by minute and vivid details. Luke, who had become acquainted with the Pauline circle and type of ideas, meant to present such particulars as should show most convincingly that the man Jesus came to give light to mankind, and not merely to Israel after the flesh. Thus each evangelist had his peculiar purpose and method. The outward sequence of events was always subordinate to a higher idea. Of John this may be said pre-eminently.

Existing data are insufficient to enable the inquirer to compose a harmony in chronological order. As times and places have been left indeterminate, it is hopeless to conceive of a diatessaron accurate in all particulars. The problem may continue to exercise the ingenuity of critics, without furnishing an adequate reward for the time and labour bestowed on it. Diversity in unity pervades the Gospels, and all that can be properly done is to illustrate both. If it can be demonstrated that the evangelical memoirs do not contradict one another in any important particular; but that they present the same facts and discourses in a different light, according to the object the writers had in view, and perhaps their own idiosyncracies, we may be satisfied with the conclusion. The attempts of ill-judging advocates to force them into agreement in every minute point cannot be reprobated too much; for a degree of discrepancy, while violating no rational theory of inspiration, shows independence and veracity. We do not believe that all variations between them can be fairly reconciled; but that circumstance does not weaken our faith in the general credibility of the narratives. In our view, a complete harmony belongs to the range of the impossible.

2. What was the duration of our Lord's ministry?

This is a question upon which the opinions of the learned have been much divided; and which cannot be settled with conclusive certainty. In order to resolve it, it is necessary to mark the different Passovers which Christ attended. Looking to the Gospels by Matthew, Mark, and Luke, we should infer that he was present at no more than two; the first at the time of his baptism, the second immediately before his crucifixion. But in John's Gospel three Passovers at least are named during the period of our Lord's ministry (ii. 13; vi. 4; xi. 55). It is true that some writers have endeavoured to adapt the Gospel of John to the other three, by reducing the Passovers mentioned in the former to two. So Priestley, Vossius, and Mann. In order to accomplish this, it was conjectured that πασχα, in ch. vi. 4, is an interpolation; and then that ἐορτή denotes some other Jewish festival. Bishop Pearce went so far as to conjecture that the entire verse has been interpolated. For these rash speculations there is no authority. The received reading must here be followed (Lücke's Commentar über Johannes, dritte Aufl., zweiter Theil, s. 104). In addition to these passages, it has been thought by many that another Passover is referred to in John v. 1, where although πασχα does not occur, ἡ ἐορτή is supposed to denote the same feast. But this is a subject of dispute. Irenæus is the oldest authority for explaining it of the Passover. Many have adopted the same opinion; as Luther, Calovius, Grotius, Jansen, Scaliger, Cornelius a Lapide, Lightfoot, Lampe, Paulus, Kinnoel, Süßkind, Klee, Ammon, Greswell, Hengstenberg, Robinson.

Cyril and Chrysostom refer it to the feast of Pentecost; as do also Erasmus, Calvin, Beza, Maldonatus, and Bengel.

Keppeler seems to have been the first who thought that it means the feast of Purim. He was followed by Petau, Lamy, D'Outrein, Hug, Olshausen, Wieseler, Neander, Clausen, Krabbe, Lange, Maier, Meyer.

Cocceius, followed by Kaiser, Krafft, and Ebner, referred it to the feast of Tabernacles; while Keppeler and Petau intimated that it may possibly have been the feast of Dedication; but Lucke, De Wette, and Luthardt leave the matter indeterminate.

The choice lies between the Passover and the feast of Purim. But the arguments advanced on behalf of either are scarcely conclusive. The true meaning of ἐορτή is still uncertain. Those who wished it to be understood of the Passover inserted the article before ἐορτή; which Lachmann and Tischendorf have rightly expunged. It appears to us most probable that Purim is meant. From John iv. 35, it follows that it was then in the end of November or December; and from vi. 4 that the Passover was approaching. Hence v. 1 agrees well with the feast of Purim, which was in March. Robinson's three reasons from Hengstenberg against this interpretation of ἐορτή are neither powerful nor conclusive. That the Jews were not required by their law to go up to Jerusalem at Purim argues nothing against Jesus's going up at that time that he might exercise his ministry in the city. When it is alleged that Purim was never celebrated on a Sabbath, the assertion is hazardous as Wieseler has shewn; and were it even well-founded, the narrative does not prove that the Sabbath on which the infirm man was healed belonged to the festival. The Sabbath may have been before or after the festival of Purim, as far as the account shews. It is no argument against Purim that the Passover occurred a month later; at which Jesus would necessarily go up to Jerusalem.

We are thus inclined to believe that only three Passovers are named during our Lord's ministry, at which he attended. The fourth, in the passage we have been considering, is more than doubtful. If we are correct, his ministry lasted about two years and a half. A fourth would add another year; and that is a very common, perhaps the most prevailing, opinion on the subject.

Sir Isaac Newton and Macknight suppose that five Passovers intervened between our Lord's baptism and crucifixion. This assumption rests on no foundation. Perhaps the term ἐορτή in John vii. 2 may have given rise to it; although ἐορτή is explained in that passage by σκηνοπηγία.

It has been well remarked by Bishop Marsh, that the Gospel of John presents almost insuperable obstacles to the opinion of those who confine Christ's ministry to one year. Yet it was commonly believed during the first three centuries that Christ's ministry lasted but a year, or a year and some months. Such was the opinion of Clemens Alexandrinus and Origen. Eusebius thought that it continued for above three years; an opinion which became general. The ancient hypothesis, which confined the time to one year, was revived by Mann and Priestley; but Newcome, with more judgment, defended the common view, refuting Priestley's arguments. In interweaving the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke, with that of John, the intervals between the Passovers are filled up by various transactions. Were the number of these feasts determinate and precise, there would be a general agreement in the filling up of the times between them; but in consequence of the uncertainty attaching to the subject, harmonies are found materially to differ in their modes of arrangement. One thing is evident, that the moderns in their endeavours after a chronological disposition of the Gospels, adopt a far more rational course than the ancients. The latter strangely supposed that the first six chapters of John's Gospel relate to a period of Christ's ministry prior to that with which the other three evangelists begin their accounts of the miracles. Thus John alone was supposed to narrate the events belonging to the earlier part of his ministry; while Matthew, Mark, and Luke related the transactions of the last year.

The most ancient Harmony of the Gospels of which we have any account was composed by Tatian of Syria in the 2d century; but it is lost (see H. A. Daniel's Tatianus der Apologet., Halle, 1837, 8vo). In the 3d century Ammonius* was the author of a Harmony supposed to be still extant. Eusebius of Cæsarea also composed a Harmony of the Gospels about A.D. 315. In it he divided the Gospel history into ten canons or tables, according as different facts are related by one or more of the evangelists. These ancient Harmonies, however, differ in character from such as belong to modern times. They are summaries of the life of Christ, or indexes to the four Gospels, rather than a chronological arrangement of different facts, accompanied by a reconciliation of apparent contradictions. In modern times, Andreas Osiander published his Harmony of the Gospels in 1537. He adopted the principle that the evangelists constantly wrote in chronological order. Cornelius Jansen's Concordia Evangelica was published in 1549; R. Stephanus, Harmonia Evang. (1553); J. Calvin, Harmonia (1553); Cluver (1628), Calov (1680), Sandhagen (1684), Bunting (1689). Martin Chemnitz's Harmony was first published in 1593, and afterwards with the continuations of Leyser and Gerhard, in 1704. Chemnitz stands at the head of that class of harmonists who maintain that in one or more of the four Gospels chronological order has been neglected; while Osiander is at the head of those who maintain that all the Gospels are arranged in chronological order. Other harmonies were published by Calixt (1624), Cartwright (1627), Lightfoot (1654), Cradock (1668), Lamy (1689), Le Clerc (1699), Toinard (1707), Burmann (1712), Whiston (1702), Rus (1727-8-30), Bengel (1736), Hauber (1737), Büsching (1766), Doddridge (1739 and 40), Filkington (1747), Macknight (1756), Bertling (1767), Griesbach (1776, 97, 1809, 22), Newcome (1778), Priestley (1777 in Greek, and 1780 in English), Michaelis (1788, in his Introduction), White (1799), Planck (1809), Keller (1802), Mutschelle (1806), De Wette and Lücke (1818), Hess (1822), Sebastiani (1806), Matthæi (1826), Kaiser (1828), Roediger (1829), Clausen (1829), Greswell (1830), Chapman (1836), Carpenter (1838), Reichel (1840), Gehringer (1842), Robinson (1845 in Greek, English in 1846), Stroud (1853), Anger (1851), Tischendorf (1851).

In connection with Greswell's Harmonia Evangelica, the same author's Dissertations upon the Principles and Arrangement of a Harmony of the Gospels, of which a second edition has been published, deserve notice. These dissertations are exceedingly elaborate, and demand a patient perusal. The learned writer has greatly distinguished himself as the most laborious of modern harmonists. His work is the most copious that has appeared, at least since the days of Chemnitz's folios. Some of his fundamental principles, however, are questionable. Rather than admit considerable diversity in the writers' narrations of the same events or discourses, he has recourse to the expedient of making two out of one, and placing them at different times. On the whole, were we confined to one Harmony of the Gospels, we should prefer that of Robinson to any other. Yet this scholar has strained words and distorted narratives for the purpose of forcing a literal agreement, the result of a narrow theory of inspiration. To adopt any harmony implicitly is more than the enlightened inquirer can do. We should therefore recommend a minute examination of the works published by Robinson, Greswell, Stroud, Tischendorf, and Anger.

The above list contains the best Harmonies and Diatessarons of the Gospels. Some are written in Greek, or Greek and Latin, others in Latin, others in German and Greek, others in English. The entire number of Harmonies is very great. Those who wish to see lists tolerably complete may consult Fabricii Bibliotheca Græca, vol. iv., ed. Harles; Walchii Bibliotheca Theologica, tom. iv.; Michaelis's Introd., by Marsh, vol. iii., with the translator's very valuable notes; and Robinson's Harmony in Greek.—S. D.

HAROD (חָרוֹד; Sept. ἡ Ἀπέδ. 'The fountain (A. V., "well") of Harod'), a fountain which became the scene of one of the most remarkable victories, and one of the most memorable defeats, in the annals of Israel. Its site is fixed by one or two incidental notices in the Bible. When the Midianites and Amalekites invaded western Palestine, 'they pitched in the valley of Jezreel' (Judg. vi. 33). Gideon hastily summoned around him the warriors of the northern tribes, and marched against them. He 'pitched beside the well of Harod, so that the host of the Midianites were on the north side of them by the hill of Moreh, in the valley' (vii. 1). 'The valley' of Jezreel here referred to is an eastern arm of the great plain of Esdraelon, bounded on the south by Gil-

* This Ammonius is not to be confounded with Ammonius Saccas the philosopher, although Eusebius and Jerome in ancient, as also Bayle and Basnage in modern times, have fallen into this mistake. The same blunder is committed by the writer of the article 'Ammonius Saccas' in Smith's Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology. See Neander's Allgem. Geschichte, i. 3. S. 1183; Murdock's Mosheim, vol. i. p. 174, note 18 (3d edit., New York).

boa, and on the north by a parallel ridge called the 'hill of Moreh.' It is about three miles wide. The Midianites were encamped along the base of Moreh, and probably near the town of Shunem. On the south side of the valley at the base of Gilboa, and nearly opposite Shunem, is the large fountain of Ain-Jâlûd. There can scarcely be a doubt that this is Harod. It is about a mile east of Jezreel; and hence it was also called the 'fountain of Jezreel.' It is a singular coincidence that before the fatal battle of Gilboa the Philistines encamped on the ground formerly occupied by the Midianites, while Saul and his host gathered round the fountain (1 Sam. xxviii. 4; xxix. 1). It has been suggested that the name Harod ('trembling') may have arisen from the testing command given to the followers of Gideon (Judg. vii. 3): 'Whosoever is fearful and trembling, let him return.'

Ain Jâlûd is a large fountain. The water bursts out from a rude grotto in a wall of conglomerate rock, which here forms the base of Gilboa. It first flows into a large but shallow pond, and then winds away through the rich green vale past the ruins of Bethshean to the Jordan. The side of Gilboa rises over the fountain steep and rugged. Some have thought it strange that the Midianites should not have seized on this fountain; but as many of the Israelites probably lurked in the mountain, the Midianites may have deemed it more prudent to encamp in the open plain to the north, where there are also fountains. The Jerusalem Itinerary seems to indicate that the name Ain-Jâlûd, 'Fountain of Goliath,' arose from an ancient tradition that the adjoining valley was the site of David's victory over the giant (ed. Wesseling, p. 586). The fountain was a noted camping-ground for both Christians and Saracens during the crusades. William of Tyre calls it Tubania (Gesta Dei per Francos, p. 1037; Bohadin, Vita Saladin, p. 53). The valley of Jezreel still forms a favourite haunt of the wild Bedawin, who periodically cross from the east side of the Jordan. The writer visited their camp beside this fountain in the spring of 1858; and when he saw their numerous tents and vast flocks, was forcibly reminded of the words of Judg. vi. 5, 'They came up with their cattle, and their tents, and they came as grasshoppers for multitude; both they and their camels were without number' (Handbook for S. and P. ii. 355; Stanley, S. and P. 334; Robinson, B. R. ii. 324).—J. L. P.

HARORITE. [HARARITE.]

HAROSHETH OF THE GENTILES (חֲרוֹשֶׁת הַגִּיטִּים)

הַגִּיטִּים; Sept. Ἀραιῶν; Alex. Ἀραιῶν τῶν Ἑθνῶν), a town of northern Palestine, the home of Sisera (Judg. iv. 2). At Harosheth the army and chariots of Jabin were marshalled under the great captain before they invaded Israel, and defiled from the northern mountains into the broad battle-field of Esdraelon (ver. 13). And after the terrible defeat and slaughter on the banks of the Kishon, to this place the fugitives of the army returned, a shattered and panic-stricken remnant. Barak and his victorious troops followed them into the fastnesses of their own mountains, unto the gates of Harosheth (ver. 16). The city is not again mentioned in the Bible; nor is it referred to by Josephus, Jerome, or any ancient writer. Its position is not stated; but from the fact of its having been the gathering-place of Jabin's army, it could not have been far from Hazor; and from the appellative הַגִּיטִּים it would seem to have been one of the towns of the region anciently called 'Galilee of the Gentiles' (cf. Is. ix. 1; גליל חנוני). The etymology of the name Harosheth, 'wood-cuttings,' joined with the above facts, may justify us in locating the city on the upland plains of Naphtali, probably on one of those ruin-crowned eminences still existing, from which the mother of Sisera, looking out at her latticed window, could see far along that road by which she expected her son to return in triumph (Judg. v. 28). Deborah in her beautiful ode doubtless depicted the whole features of the scene. Remnants of the old forests of oak and terebinth still wave here over the ruins of the ancient cities; and the writer has seen the black tents of the Arabs—fit representatives of the Kenites (iv. 17)—pitched beneath their shade (Handbook for S. and P., ii. 442, sq.; Stanley, Lectures on Jewish Church, 318, sq.)—J. HARP. [MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.]

HARRIS, SAMUEL, D.D., was born in the county of Middlesex about the year 1683. He was educated in Merchant Taylor's school, of which he was head boy in 1697, and was admitted a pensioner of Peter House, Cambridge, May 15, 1700. Upon the foundation of the chair of Modern History in the university of Cambridge by George I. in 1724, Harris was appointed the first professor. He died Dec. 21, 1733. He was the author of,—1. Scripture knowledge promoted by catechizing, Lond. 1712, 8vo. 2. A Commentary on the Fifty-third chapter of Isaiah, with an appendix of Queries concerning Divers Antient Religious Traditions and Practices, and the sense of many texts of Scripture which seem to allude to or express them, Lond. 1735 (not 1739 as frequently stated), 4to. In some copies this work has a different title-page, namely, Observations, Critical and Miscellaneous, on several remarkable Texts of the Old Testament, to which is added a Commentary, &c. Prefixed are three dissertations,—1. On a Gnozer or Advocate; 2. On a Dour or Generation; and 3. On the ancient method of propounding important points by way of question. This work was published shortly after the death of the author by his widow. It exhibits much curious learning, and is several times referred to by Doddridge in his lectures.—S. N.

HARRIS, THADDEUS MASON, D.D., chiefly noted for his ardent devotion to the principles of Freemasonry, for the illustration and vindication of which he published various discourses and addresses. He claims to be noticed here for the following work—A Dictionary of the Natural History of the Bible, or a description of all the quadrupeds, birds, fishes, reptiles, and insects, trees, plants, flowers, gums, and precious stones mentioned in the Sacred Scriptures; Collected from the best authorities, and alphabetically arranged; a new edition, with corrections and considerable additions, 12mo, Lond. 1833.—W. J. C.

HARRIS, WILLIAM, D.D., an eminent minister of the English Presbyterian Church, born in London in the year 1675, died 1740. He wrote and published various works of note, but claims notice here chiefly as one of the continuators of Matthew Henry's Commentary. The notes on the Epistles to the Philippians and Colossians are from his pen. They are strictly practical, and in keeping with the general character of the Commentary. He also published a volume of discourses On the Principal Representations of the Messiah throughout the Old Testament. These are controversial, and were written chiefly in refutation of Collins' Discourses on the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion.—J. W. C.

HARROW. The Hebrew word thus translated in the A. V., 2 Sam. xii. 31; 1 Chron. xx. 3, חֲרֹשׁ (ῥιβολος, σκέραρον, LXX.; carpenta, Vulg.), means, according to the best lexicons (Gesenius, Furst, etc.), a threshing instrument. A very different word, חֲרָד, is translated to harrow, or to break the clods, in Job xxxix. 10; Is. xxviii. 24; Hos. x. 11 [AGRICULTURE, p. 35, Kitto, D.B.I., iii. 39; vi. 397.].—J. E. R.

HART. [AJAL]

HARTMANN, ANTHONY THEODORE, a German Orientalist and theologian, was born at Dusseldorf on the 25th June 1774. Having studied the classics at the Gymnasium of Osnabrück and Dortmund, he devoted himself to theology at Göttingen. In 1797 he was appointed co-rector of the Gymnasium at Soest; in 1799 pro-rector of that at Herfort; and in 1804 a professor in the Gymnasium of Oldenburg. In 1811 he became professor of theology in the University of Rostock, where also in 1818 he received the charge of the cabinet of medals. He died there 21st April 1838. Hartmann was a good Orientalist; but his knowledge of theology was not profound. As a writer he was heavy and uninteresting. His acquaintance with the literature and antiquities of the Hebrews was extensive. He was a voluminous author. Among his works the chief are—Aufklaerungen ueber Asien für Bibelforscher, 1806, 1807, 2 vols.; Die Hebræerinn am Putzische und als Braut, 1809, 1810, 3 vols.; Supplementa ad J. Buxtorfii et W. Gesenii Lexica, 1813; Thesauri linguae Hebraicae e Mishna augendi, 1825, 1826, 3 parts; Linguistische Einleitung in das Studium der Bücher des A. T., 1818; Historisch-Kritische Forschungen ueber die Bildung, das Zeitalter, und den Plan der fünf Bücher Moses, u. s. w., 1831; Die enge Verbindung des alten Testaments mit dem neuen, 1831; Blicke in den Geist der Urchristenthums, 1802.—S. D.

HARWOOD, EDWARD, Dr., an Arian minister of considerable attainments, but whose moral reputation was far from unblemished. He was born in 1729. After residing in Bristol and other places as a classical teacher and a preacher, he removed to London, where he died 1794, in very reduced circumstances. Besides a small volume on the various editions of the Greek and Roman classics, which passed through four editions in his lifetime, he published two works in connection with Biblical literature:—(1.) A Liberal Translation of the New Testament; being an attempt to translate the Sacred Writings with the same freedom, spirit, and elegance, with which other English translations from the Greek classics have lately been executed: the design and scope of each author being strictly and impartially explored, the free signification and force of the Original critically observed, and, as much as possible, transferred into our language, and the whole elucidated and explained upon a new and rational plan: with select notes, critical and explanatory, London, 1768, 2 vols. 8vo. As a verbose and absurd travesty of the Sacred Volume (though not so intended by the translator, who appears to have been the dupe of his own bad taste, and incapacity for appreciating the divine simplicity of the inspired writers), it stands, and will ever stand, unsurpassed. How far the work sustains the pretensions of the title-page may be inferred from the following specimens. John the Baptist's annunciation of the Messiah is given thus:—'Behold yonder is the amiable object of the divine love who is appointed to reform mankind!' John i. 29. The injunction, 'He that hath ears to hear, let him hear,' is liberally translated, 'Let every one who is endowed with the powers of reason and understanding, employ them in the diligent study of truth and virtue,' Mark iv. 9; and the parable of the Prodigal Son begins with, 'A gentleman of a splendid family and opulent fortune had two sons,' Luke xv. 11. (2.) A new Introduction to the Study and knowledge of the New Testament, 2 vols. 8vo, London, 1773.—J. E. R.

HASHABIAH (חֲשַׁבְיָה, or with the 1 parag.

חֲשַׁבְיָהוּ; LXX. Ἀρεβί, Ἀραβίας, Ἀραβία, Заβля; Vulg. Hasabia, Hasebia).

1. One of the descendants of Merari the son of Levi, 1 Chron. vi. 45 (Heb. 30.) It is probably the same who is referred to in 1 Chron. ix. 14 and Neh. xi. 15. The close agreement of these two passages constrains the conclusion that the persons spoken of are the same in both; and that the Hashabiah mentioned in them is identical with the Hashabiah of 1 Chron. vi. 45 is shewn to be highly probable by a comparison of ver. 46 with Neh. xi. 15. In the former verse the descent from Merari is traced through Bani (בְּנֵי), in the latter Hashabiah is said to be the son of Bunni (בְּנֵי), forms so closely related that in the connection in which they occur they may with good reason be taken to be the names of the same person.

2. One of the sons of Jeduthan the harper, and leader of the twelfth course of musicians appointed by David to conduct the service of song in the house of the Lord, 1 Chron. xxv. 3, 19.

3. A Levite, a descendant of Hebron, the son of Kohath, and one of David's men of valour, 1 Chron. xxvi. 30. It is probably the same who (1 Chron. xxvii. 17) is called the son of Kemuel, and said to have been appointed ruler of the Levites.

4. A chief of the Levites in the reign of Josiah, 2 Chron. xxxv. 9; 1 Esdras i. 9.

5. A descendant of Merari, and one of the priests whom Ezra took up with him to Jerusalem to minister in the temple, and to whom he entrusted the care of the vessels of silver and gold during the journey from Ahava, Ezra viii. 19, 24. It is to the same, probably, that reference is made in Neh. xii. 24.

6. A Levite, one of the builders of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah, Neh. iii. 17; and one of those who sealed the covenant, Neh. x. 11 (Heb. 12).

7. One of the descendants of Asaph, Neh. xi. 22, c. 17.—S. N.

HASHMANNIM (חֲשִׁמָּנִים; Sept. πρόβεις), a word which only occurs in Ps. lxxviii. 31. In the A. V. it is rendered 'princes.' Hebraists are divided as to the origin and meaning of the word; some, deriving it from Arabic sources, give it the meaning of fat ones, rich and powerful personages; others, regarding it as a proper name, derive it from the old civil name of Hermopolis Magna, the famed city of the Egyptian Hermes, the God of Wisdom, and take it to mean the inhabitants of that city, the Hermopolites. The Psalmist would thus appear to mean that the wisest, rather than the opulent and wealthy, would come and do homage in the temple, as well as the Cushites or Ethiopians who lived at a distance. We may add that the name Hashmonean which was given to the Maccabees or Jewish princes in the interval between the O. and N. T. was, it is supposed, derived from Hashmannim (Hengstenberg, Psalms, vol. ii. 369).—W. J. C.

HASHMONAH (חֲשִׁמוֹנָה; Sept. Σελμωνά; Alex. Ἀσέλμωνά), a station of the Israelites, the next before Moseroth (Num. xxxiii. 29), which was in the vicinity of Mount Hor (comp. Deut. x. 6 with Num. xx. 28).

HASHUB, or more correctly HASSHUB, according to the Hebrew חֲשִׁיב, which always reduplicates the second letter. The A. V. has followed the Vulgate in its rendering of the form of this proper name; in the first passage where it occurs, the A. V. has Hashhub, and the Vulg. Hasub, each with double s, like the original; in the other four passages, where the Latin version has only one s (Hasub), our version resembles it in its deviation from the Hebrew, and writes Hashub. The passages in which the name occurs are these: I Chron. ix. 14; Neh. iii. 11; iii. 23; x. 23; xi. 15. In Chronicles the LXX. rendered the word Ἀσώβ, in all the passages in Nehemiah Ἀσούβ.*

(1) In the first and the last of these verses the same person (though his name is differently spelled in the A. V.) is undoubtedly meant. He was a descendant of Merari, the third son of Levi and father of Shemaiah, a leading man of the Levites, chosen by lot for the somewhat perilous duty of residence in Jerusalem, which was at that time the object of malignant hatred to the enemies of the Jews. Raschi accounts for the greater fulness of the list in I Chron. than that of Nehemiah, by supposing that the latter gives only the names of such as were selected by lot, while the former included also such as volunteered to live in the metropolis (see Neh. xi. 1, 2).

(2) The next person who bears this name (Neh. iii. 11) was one of the energetic band of men who helped to build the wall of Jerusalem under the difficult circumstances narrated in the preceding chapter. The name of his father, Pahath-Moab, occurs in Ezra ii. 6 and Neh. vii. 11, as the head of a large clan which accompanied Zerubbabel on his return from Babylon.

(3) The same name was borne by another man engaged in the same good work of rebuilding the city wall. The statement (verse 23) that he built such portion as was 'over against his house' proves him to have been one of the residents of Jerusalem, instead of a stranger from the country, as many were who were occupied in this labour. We should not be extravagant if we supposed that this was the Levite already mentioned (1); we know that among the builders some of the Jewish clergy assisted (see ver. 1).

(4) The last person who is mentioned as bearing this name (which was an honourable and not infrequent one among the Jews, of the same signification as Tuaios or Timaios among the Greeks, see Simonis Onomast. p. 265, who refers to the fact that the same name was borne by a Jew of Jericho in Mark x. 46) is described in Neh. x. 23 as one of the forty-four 'chiefs of the people,' who joined the Tirshatha in the pious office of subscribing and sealing the covenant of reformation and dedication to God. The epithet, 'one of the heads of the people,' very well suits our second Hashub, the son of Pahath-Moab, who was evidently a man of distinction and influence (Beithau, Die Bücher Esra, u. s. w. p. 231). The Levite is certainly excluded by this epithet as well as by the fact that all the subscribing Levites are expressly mentioned (vers. 9-13). From verses 28 and 29, however, it follows that the Levite Hashub was a consenting party to the covenant which his namesake, the honourable layman, had the privilege of signing. It thus seems that in all our passages only two Hashubs are really designated.—P. H.

HATTUSH (חֲטָוֶשׁ; Χαττούς, Χεττούς, Ἀττούς).

The first of the sons of Shechaniah (I Chron. iii. 22), and the same probably as the Hattush mentioned in the roll of 'the priests and Levites that went up with Zerubbabel' from Babylon (Neh. xii. 2). Another Hattush (whether a nephew of the above, as Lord A. Hervey supposes, Genealogies, 307, 322, sq., or the representative of another family, it is impossible to say) is also recorded to have accompanied Ezra when 'he went up from Babylon in the reign of Artaxerxes the king (Ezra viii. 2, 3). The name is also mentioned among those who took part in the sealing of the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 4).

(Ἀττούς υἱός Ἀσβανία) the son of Hashbaniah, was one of Jeremiah's co-workers in the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 10).—W. J. C.

HAURAN (חֲרָן; Sept. Ἀραρίτις, and Ἀραρίτις; Vulg. Auran), a province of Palestine, east of the Jordan, embracing a portion of the ancient kingdom of Bashan. Ezekiel is the only one of the sacred writers who mentions it. In describing the northern border of the 'promised land,' he gives as one of its landmarks 'Hazor-hatticon, which is by the coast of Hauran' (ch. xlvii. 16); and in defining the east border he says, 'Ye shall measure from between (חֲרָן; Sept. ἀναμέσσω; Vulg. de medio) Hauran, and from between Damascus,' etc. (ver. 18). These statements would seem to indicate that Hauran lay on the north of Damascus, or at least extended as far north as that city; and this, as we shall see below, was quite correct.

The Greek province of Auranitis was one of the four into which the kingdom of Bashan was divided. The names of these provinces were all Semitic, though the Greeks remodelled them. Thus Ba- tanea is בָּשָׁן; Gaulanites, גּוּלָן; Trachonites, טְרַכּוֹנִיטָא (called in the Bible אֲרָנִי); and Auranitis, אֲוָרָנִי (see Joseph. Antiq. iv. 5, 3; Bibl. Jud. iii. 3, 5; iv. 7, 3; Lightfoot, Opp. i. 316; ii. 474; Reland, Pal. pp. 199, sq.; Journal of Sacred Literature for July 1854). These were doubtless the most ancient divisions of the country, inhabited by distinct tribes; but when brought under one rule, perhaps by Og, the name Bashan was given to the whole (Deut. iii.) Yet the names of the older provinces were still occasionally used (Deut. iv. 43; 1 Kings iv. 13; Ezek. xlvii. 18). On the conquest of the country by the Assyrians, that political unity which the Jews maintained was destroyed, and the old sectional names came again into common use (Josephus, l.c.) Of the four provinces Gaulanitis lay on the west, along the banks of the Jordan; Batanea on the extreme east, bordering on Arabia; Trachonitis on the north, between the former two, and adjoining the territory of Damascus; and Auranitis, south of Trachonitis, including the whole of that fertile plain which extends from Mezareib to Sukhud, and from the Lejah to Um el-Jemal. In the midst of it lie the ruins of its once great and splendid capital Busrah (Porter's Damascus, ii. 250, sq.) On a careful examination of the references in ancient authors to this whole region, we find that very often the name of one province is applied to the whole. Thus the evangelist Luke says Philip was tetrarch of 'Iturea and the region of Trachonitis;' and we know that under the latter name were comprised both Auranitis and Batanea (Luke iii. 1; cf. Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 11. 4). So again Josephus uses the name Batanea to designate the whole of Bashan (Antiq. iv. 7. 4). Eusebius employs it in the same way (Onomast., s. v. Basan; Reland, Pal. p. 197, sq.)

By Arabic authors the name Hauran (حوران) :

Heb. חֲוָרָן; Greek, Ἀυρανίτις) is used in the same general way. Bohadin, in his Life of Saladin, makes it include the whole country north of Peræa (ed. Schultens, p. 70); and Abulfeda describes it as 'a wide region under the rule of Damascus, toward the south, in which are large towns and villages; Busrah is its capital, and in it are Edhra, Zera, and other towns' (Index Geog. in vitam Saladinii, s. v.) In the present day the name Hauran is usually applied to the whole country reaching from the plain of Damascus to Bozrah—that is, to all Bashan. But the natives, when speaking more accurately, confine it to the plain south of the Lejah—that is, to the small province called by the Greeks Auranitis (Porter's Damascus, l.c.) In the more extended signification it appears to have been used by Ezekiel; and hence he rightly represents it as running as far to the north as Damascus. Hauran in this case was not equivalent to the Greek province Auranitis, which lay much farther southward, but to the kingdom of Bashan.

Lightfoot (Opp., l.c.), Reland (l.c.), and other more recent geographers (Wells, Geography of the O. T., i. 298; and even Winer, Realwoerterbuch, s. v. Hauran), have overlooked the above facts, and have thus been led into serious errors. The Hauran of Ezekiel included the wild and rugged province of Lejah (TRACHONITIS); the mountainous district of Batanea, where the oaks of Bashan still flourish around the ruins of its old cities; and the district of Hauran proper. The latter is one uniform plain of surpassing fertility. Not a rock or stone can be seen except on the little conical hills that appear here and there on its surface. It is thickly studded with ruined towns and villages, numbering above a hundred in all—most of them now deserted, though not ruined! The houses in them are most remarkable. The flat roofs, massive doors, and even window-shutters are of stone, and in many cases perfect. The dates on some of them shew that they are older than our era; and their simple and massive style of architecture seems to indicate that these are the very cities referred to so emphatically by Moses (Deut. iii. 5; see Handbook for S. and P., ii. 507, sq.; Graham in Cambridge Essays, 160; Stanley's Lectures on the Jewish Church, 213, sq.)—J. L. P.

HÄVERNICK, HEIN. ANDR. CHRIST., was born in 1805, at Kröplin, in Mecklenburg, and died at Königsberg in 1845. He studied theology first at Halle, but having been involved in the troubles which disturbed that university in consequence of the prosecution for anti-Christianism brought against Wegscheider and Gesenius, the evidence in support of which was chiefly supplied from the notes of Hävernicks and Rehrkorn, he left Halle and completed his course at Berlin, where he attached himself closely to Hengstenberg. In 1833 he became a teacher in the theological school at Geneva; in 1834 he went to Rostock, where he taught theology first as a privatim docens, afterwards as one of the extraordinary professors; and in 1840 he was appointed ordinary professor at Königsberg. His works are—Commentar über das B. Daniel, Hamb. 1833; Mélanges de Théologie réformée, 2 parts, Gen. 1833-9 (in conjunction with Steiger); Handbuch der Histor.-Krit. Einleit. in d. A. T., Erlang. 1836-1844, 2 vols. in 4 parts (unfinished); Neue Krit. Untersuchungen über d. B. Daniel, Hamb. 1838; Commentar über d. Proph. Esaias, Erlang. 1843; Vorlesungen über die Theologie des A. T. (published after his death by Dr. H. A. Hahn), Erlang. 1848. Of his Einleitung, two portions—the General Introduction to the O. T., and the Introduction to the Pentateuch—have been translated into English, and form part of Clark's Foreign Theol. Library. Hävernicks also contributed several articles to this Cyclopædia. He was a great scholar, who never tired in the pursuit of knowledge, and wore himself out prematurely by his excessive labour as a student, a teacher, and a writer. He was withal one of the honestest of men—a little too open and outspoken, perhaps, for his own personal ease; but impressing all who came near him with a sense of his sincerity, earnestness, and zeal for truth. His services to the cause of evangelical truth in Germany were great; and his works will long remain a storehouse of sound learning and candid reasoning, to attest his eminent abilities and attainments, and to suggest what might have been expected from his diligence, learning, and scientific precision had his life been prolonged.—W. HAVILAH (חַבִּילָה, Gen. ii. 11; LXX. Εὐλάδ, Gen. x. 7, Εὐλά; Gen. x. 29, Εὐελά). In the genealogy of nations (Gen. x.) Havilah is set down —1. as a son of Cash (v. 7.); as a son of Joktan (v. 29). Since in the other places where the word occurs it is always used to designate a country, we may doubt whether persons of this name ever existed; the more so as other names of countries (Ophir, Mizraim, Canaan, Sidon), and the collective names of tribes (Kittim, Dodanim), are freely introduced into the genealogy, which is undoubtedly arranged with partial reference to geographical distribution, as well as direct descent (see Sheba, Deban, etc., and Kalisch, Genesis, p. 287). On this supposition it is not difficult to account for the fact that the people of Havilah appear as descendants both of the Hamites and of the Shemites. If they were originally of Semitic extraction (and on this point we have no data which could enable us to decide), we must suppose that by peaceful emigration or hostile invasion they overflowed into the territory occupied by Hamites, or adopted the name and habits of their neighbours in consequence of commerce or intermarriage, and are therefore mentioned twice over in consequence of their local position in two distinct regions. It would depend on circumstances whether an invading or encroaching tribe gave its name to, or derived its name from, the tribe it dispossessed, so that whether Havilah was originally Cushite or Joktanite must be a matter of mere conjecture; but by admitting some such principle as the one mentioned, we remove from the book of Genesis a number of apparent perplexities (Ur; and Kalisch, Gen. p. 459). To regard the repetition of the name as due to carelessness or error is a method of explanation which does not deserve the name of criticism. [HAM.]

Assuming then, that the districts indicated in Gen. x. 7, 29, were continuous, if not in reality identical, we have to fix on their geographical position. Various derivations of the word have been suggested, but the most probable one, from חול, 'sand' (Bochart, Phaleg, ii. 29), is too vague to give us any assistance. Looking for preciser indications, we find in Gen. xxv. 18, that the descendants of Ishmael 'dwelt from Havilah unto Shur that is before Egypt as thou goest towards Assyria; and in 1 Sam. xv. 7 we read that Saul 'smote the Amalekites from Havilah until thou comest to Shur that is over against Egypt.' Without entering into the question why the Amalekites are represented as possessing the country which formerly belonged to the Ishmaelites, it is clear that these verses fix the general position of Havilah as a country lying somewhere to the southwards and eastwards of Palestine. Further than this, the Cushite Havilah in Gen. x. 7 is mentioned in connection with Seba, Sabtah, and Raamah; and the Joktanite Havilah (Gen. x. 29), in connection with Ophir, Jobab, etc. Now, as all these places lay on or between the Arabian and Persian Gulfs, we may infer, with tolerable certainty, that Havilah 'in both instances designates the same country, extending at least from the Persian to the Arabian Gulf, and on account of its vast extent easily divided into two distinct parts' (Kalisch, Gen., p. 93).

The only method of fixing more nearly the centres of these two divisions of Havilah, is to look for some trace of the name yet existing. But although Oriental names linger with great vitality in the regions whence they have arisen, yet the frequent transference of names, caused by trade or by political revolutions, renders such indication very uncertain (Von Bohlen, on Gen. x. 7). We shall therefore content ourselves with mentioning that Strabo, quoting Eratosthenes, places the Ἰαλωραίων near the Nabathœi, north of the Arabian gulf (Strabo xvi. 4), and that Ptolemy (iv. 7) mentions the Αὔλαϊται on the African coast near Bab-el-Mandeb, the modern Zeylah (cf. Plin. vi. 28; Gesen., Thes. i. 452). Niebuhr also finds two Khâwlians in Yemen, one a town between Sanaa and Mecca, the other a district some miles to the south-east of Sanaa (Beschr. Arab. 270, 280; see further, Buschung, Erdbeschr. v. i. 601; Michaelis, Spicil. i. 189; ii. 202; Forster, Geogr. of Arab. i. 40, 41, etc.) These names may very possibly be traces of the great Biblical country of Havilah.

The further question still remains, is the Havilah (LXX. Εὐλάτ) of Gen. ii. 11 the same country as the Havilah we have already identified? All we are told of it is that Pison, one of the rivers of Eden, 'compassed' it, and that it produced fine gold, bdellium (b'dolach), and onyx (shoham). It is natural to assume that in the same book the same name would not be used for two entirely different countries, and the region mentioned meets the new conditions required, especially if we understand 'b'dolach' to mean 'pearls' or 'gum,' and 'shoham' to mean 'crystal' or some transparent stone. Havilah is mentioned in connection with Ophir and Sheba, both of which countries were formerly celebrated for their gold. In this case we must, however, understand the Pison (Gen. ii. 11) to mean either an arm of the sea, or 'all the rivers that fall into the Persian gulf'; or, allowing for the notorious ἀγνοῦμεν of the ancients we must suppose that the course of the Indus was most erroneously imagined to make an enormous bend towards the west. The latter is the more natural, and for other reasons the more probable supposition.

Without entangling ourselves in any discussion of the geography of Eden, we may mention that on grounds of very slight and untenable conjecture, the Havilah of Gen. ii. has been identified with Colchis, with the Τχάλα of Herodotus iv. 9, with the Chvalisci on the Caspian Sea, with Kampila in the north-west of India, with Ava, and numerous other countries. These conjectures have persuaded very few except those who originated them. Discussions about the site of Havilah will be found in all the chief Biblical commentators ancient and modern, as well as in Hottinger (Enneas Dissult.); Huet (De Lit. Parad.); Bochart (Phaleg, ii. 28); Michaelis (Spicil. 202; Suppl. 685); Schultness (Parad. p. 105); Niebuhr (l. c.), and many other writers. The clearest and best account may be derived from Kalisch (Genesis, pp. 93, 249, 287, etc.), who also gives a long list of those who have examined the subject (pp. 109-102).—F. W. F.

* We do not know on what certain grounds Mr. G. Williams decides that Havilah was originally Cushite (Dict. of Geogr., s. v.); other writers are equally positive of the contrary (Mr. Stanley Poole in Smith's Dict. of the Bible).

HAVOTH-JAIR (חֹת הַיַּר) Sept. Ἐπαύλει 'Taip; Alex. Ἰαίρ, and κώμας, and Αὐλώ; Vulg.

Havoth-Jair, id est, villas Jair; and oppida Jair, the name given to a group of 'villages' or 'towns' in Gilead, from the fact of their having been taken by Jair a descendant of Manasseh. The word Havoth, חֹמֶת, is the plural of חֹמָה, and is probably derived from the Arabic root حָجَى, 'to collect.'

It signifies a collection of dwellings of any kind, whether tents or houses. The very same places which are called Havoth in Num. xxxii. 41, are termed עָרִים, 'cities,' in 1 Kings iv. 13; consequently we cannot receive the interpretation of some recent writers, who say they were not 'cities,' but Bedouin 'villages of tents' (Stanley, S. and P., 321 and 514). The origin of the appellation is thus explained in Num. xxxii. 40, 41: 'Moses gave Gilead unto Machir, the son of Manasseh; and he dwelt therein. And Jair, the son of Manasseh, went and took the small towns (חֹמֶת) thereof, and called them Havoth-jair.' Another Jair, apparently a descendant of the former, was one of Israel's famous judges; and it is said of him, 'He had thirty sons that rode on thirty asscolts, and they had thirty cities, which are called Havoth-jair unto this day, which are in the land of Gilead' (Judg. x. 3, 4). This appears to be only a new application of an old name. The original number of the towns conquered by Jair was twenty-three, as we read in 1 Chron. ii. 22: 'Segub begat Jair, who had three and twenty cities in the land of Gilead.' The number was subsequently increased like the Decapolis.

The ancient province of Gilead was bounded on the north by the river Hieromax, which separated it from Bashan (GILEAD); and that portion of it which fell to the lot of the half tribe of Manasseh lay north of the Jabbok (Num. xxxii. 33; Deut. iii. 12, 13). Consequently those towns of Gilead which were called Havoth-jair must have been situated in the mountainous district between Mahanaim and the Hieromax (Josh. xxi. 38; xiii. 24-30).

Considerable confusion has been caused in the geography of this region by confounding the Havoth-jair of Gilead with Bashan-havoth-jair. The following passages prove that they were entirely distinct, and even far apart—Josh. xiii. 30; 1 Kings iv. 13; 1 Chron. ii. 22, 23. Eusebius recognises the distinction; but Jerome either mistakes his meaning, or, more probably, had another idea of his own (Onomast., s. v. Avoth-jair; Reland, p. 483; Porter's Damascus, ii. 270). The towns of Havoth-jair were situated in Gilead south of the river Hieromax; while those of Bashan-havoth-jair were in Bashan, and identical with the sixty great cities of Argob (Deut. iii. 14; 1 Kings iv. 13; see TRACHONITIS).—J. HAY. [CHATZIR.]

HAYES, CHARLES, an English gentleman of extensive scientific and literary attainments, was born in the year 1678. In his early life he devoted himself principally to scientific studies, and was the author of the first treatise on Fluxions published in the English language. Subsequently, he gave himself to the study of ancient history, with especial reference to the history contained in the Scriptures, and his various works bear testimony to a vast amount of learned research. He had a knowledge of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and also of several modern languages. He died at the advanced age of eighty-two, Dec. 18, 1760. The following Biblical works were all published anonymously; but their authorship is attested by a writer in the Gentleman's Magazine, Dec. 1761, in whose hands Hayes's papers had been placed.

1. A vindication of the History of the Septuagint, Lond. 1736, 8vo.

2. A Critical Examination of the Holy Gospels according to St. Matthew and St. Luke, with regard to the History of the Birth and Infancy of our Lord Jesus Christ, Lond. 1738, 8vo. 3. A dissertation on the Chronology of the Septuagint, with an Appendix shewing that the Chaldean and Egyptian Antiquities, hitherto esteemed fabulous, are perfectly consistent with the computations of that most ancient Version of the Holy Scriptures, Lond. 1741, 8vo. In this work he enters at length into an examination of the variations in the ages of the patriarchs as given in the Hebrew, the Septuagint, and Josephus; and offers some suggestions in defence of the integrity of the Hebrew and Greek texts. 4. Chronographia Asiatica et Aegyptiaca specimen in quo i. Origo Chronologiae LXX. Interpretum investigatur ii. Conspectus totius operis exhibetur, 1759, 8vo. This was issued partly as a prospectus of a large work on Asiatic and Egyptian chronology, from the creation of the world unto the birth of Christ, which although completed has never been published.—S. HAZAEŁ (חֲזַקְיָה, vision of God; 'Aṣṭāh), an officer of Benhadad, king of Syria, whose eventual accession to the throne of that kingdom was made known to Elijah (1 Kings xix. 15); and who, when Elisha was at Damascus, was sent by his master, who was then ill, to consult the prophet respecting his recovery. He was followed by forty camels bearing presents from the king. When Hazael appeared before the prophet, he said, 'Thy son Benhadad, king of Syria, hath sent me to thee, saying, Shall I recover of this disease?' The answer was, that he might certainly recover. 'Howbeit,' added the prophet, 'the Lord hath shewed me that he shall surely die.' He then looked steadfastly at Hazael till he became confused: on which the man of God then wept; and when Hazael respectfully inquired the cause of this outburst, Elisha replied by describing the vivid picture then present to his mind of all the evils which the man now before him would inflict upon Israel. Hazael exclaimed, 'But what? Is thy servant a dog that he should do this great thing?' The prophet explained that it was as king of Syria he should do it. Hazael then returned, and delivered to his master that portion of the prophetic response which was intended for him. But the very next day this man, cool and calculating in his cruel ambition, took a thick cloth, and, having dipped it in water, spread it over the face of the king, who, in his feebleness, and probably in his sleep, was smothered by its weight, and died what seemed to his people a natural death (2 Kings viii. 8, etc.) B.C. 885. We are not to imagine that such a project as this was conceived and executed in a day, or that it was suggested by the words of Elisha. His discomposure at the earnest gaze of the prophet, and other circumstances, shew that Hazael at that moment regarded Elisha as one to whom his secret purposes were known. In that case, his cry, 'Is thy servant a dog,' etc., was not, as some suppose, a cry of joy at the first view of a throne, but of horror at the idea of the public atrocities which the prophet described. This was likely to shock him more than it would do after he had committed his first crime, and obtained possession of a throne acquired at such a cost.

The further information respecting Hazael which the Scriptures afford is limited to brief notices of his wars with Ahaziah and Joash, kings of Judah, and with Jehoram, Jehu, and Jehoahaz, kings of Israel (2 Kings viii. 28; ix. 14; x. 32; xii. 17; xiii. 3; 2 Chron. xxii. 5). It is difficult to distinguish the several campaigns and victories involved in these allusions, and spread over a reign of forty years; but it is certain that Hazael always had the advantage over the Hebrew princes. He devastated their frontiers, rent from them all their territories beyond the Jordan, traversed the breadth of Palestine, and carried his arms into the states of the Philistines; he laid siege to Jerusalem, and only retired on receiving the treasures of the temple and the palace. The details of these conquests redeemed to the very letter the appalling predictions of Elisha. This able and successful, but unprincipled usurper, left the throne at his death to his son Benhadad.

HAZAR-ADDAR (הַצֵּר אֲדָר; Sept. Ἐραυλὶς Ἀράδ; Vulg. villa nomine Adar), a town on the southern border of Palestine, near Kadesh-barnea (Num. xxxiv. 4). The site of the latter has been fixed by Dr. Robinson at Ain el-Weibeh, in the Arabah, about thirty-five miles south of the Dead Sea (B. R. ii. 175). If this be the true site of Kadesh, then Hazar-addar stood on the desert plateau westward, a region as yet unexplored. In Josh. xv. 3 it is called Adar (Sept. Σάραδα; Vulg. Addar).

The word Hazar, when joined to places situated in the desert or on the outskirts of the inhabited country, as it frequently is, probably denoted a piece of ground surrounded by a rude but strong fence, where tents could be pitched, and cattle kept in safety from marauders. Such places are very common at the present day in the outlying districts of Palestine. In other cases Hazar may denote a 'castle,' or 'fortified town.'—J. L. P.

HAZAR-ENAN (הַצֵּר עֵינָן and חַ עֵינָן; Sept. Ἀρραναῖν, and Ἀρραναῖν; villa Enan), a town on the north-eastern boundary of the promised land (Ezek. xlvii. 17; xlviii. 1). It could not have been far distant from Riblah (Num. xxxiv. 9, 10). It lay on the border of the kingdoms of Damascus and Hamath. Eusebius mentions it as δριον Δαμσκού (Reland, p. 706). Hazar-enan signifies 'the village of fountains.' These facts, together with a careful survey of the region between Damascus and Hamath, led the writer to identify it with the modern village of Kuryetin, which lies at nearly an equal distance from these two cities, and about forty miles east of Riblah. Kuryetin signifies 'the two villages,' and the Arabic قرية may in this place be regarded as equivalent to the Hebrew הַצֵּר. It is a large village, with noble fountains, the only ones in a wide region. The writer found some fragments of columns and other ruins in its lanes, and in the gardens adjoining it. Under the Greek name Kopadala, Coradæa, we find it mentioned as an episcopal city of the province of Phœnicia Libani (S. Paulo, Geographia Sacra, p. 295). It still contains a small community of Christians belonging to the Jacobite Church (Wood's Palmyra, p. 34; Porter's Damascus, i. 252).—J. L. P.

HAZAR-GADDAH (הַצֵּר גַּדָּה; Sept. and Ἀσεργὰδδᾶ; Aser-gadda), a town on the extreme southern boundary of Judah towards Edom (Josh. xv. 27). It is mentioned in connection with Moladah, which is situated about ten miles east of Beersheba. Hazar-gaddah probably lay between these two towns. The Alexandrine MS. of the Septuagint makes Ἀσέρ and Γαδδᾶ distinct names; and so also does Eusebius. The former he locates between Ascalon and Ashdod, where there is still a village called Yazâr; but this can have no connection with Hazar of Josh. xv. 27. Gadda he places in the utmost boundary of Darom; and Jerome adds that it lay 'on the east over the Dead Sea' (Onomast., s.v. Aser and Gadda). Von Raumer would identify this Gadda with the great fortress of Sebbeh or Masada, one of the most remarkable ruins of Palestine (Winer, Real-Wörterbuch, s.v. Hazar; Robinson, B. R. i. 525; Reland, 707). Such a theory is altogether at variance with the Biblical topography.—J. L. P.

HAZAR-HATTICON (הַצֵּר חַתִּיכֹן; αὐλή τοῦ Σαῦδᾶν; Alex. Εὐνὴν; Domus Tichon), a place mentioned by Ezekiel only, who gives it as one of the landmarks of the north-eastern border of the 'Land of Promise'—Hazar-hatticon, which is by the coast of Hauran (xlvi. 16). The site is unknown; but it could not have been far distant from Damascus, probably to the east of that city.—J. L. P.

HAZARMAVETH (הַצֵּר מַאֲוֶת; Sept. Σαρμῶθ), the third son of Joktan (Gen. x. 26), whose name is preserved in the Arabian province of Hadramaut [ARABIA].

HAZAR-SHUAL (הַצֵּר שְׁעָל; Ἀσαρσουλά, Vat. Ἐσερσουλά, Ἀρσουλᾶ, and Χολασουλᾶ; Hazersual), a city in the extreme south of Judah, grouped with Beersheba (Josh. xv. 28). Though within the territory of Judah, it was given to the tribe of Simeon (xix. 3), and was occupied by the family of Shimei, whose sixteen sons dwelt at Beersheba, Moladah, and Hazar-shual (1 Chron. iv. 28). It was occupied by the Israelites after the captivity, but we hear no more of it in history. Van de Velde conjectures that its site may be marked by the ruins of Sauweh, between Beersheba and Moladah (see his Map of Palestine).—J. L. P.

HAZAR-SUSAH (הַצֵּר סוּסָה; Ἀσαρσουσίμ, Vat. Σαρσουσίμ; Hazersusa), a town of Simeon near the southern border of Palestine, and apparently not far from Ziklag (Josh. xix. 5). Like Hazar-shual it was occupied by the family of Shimei, as we learn from 1 Chron. iv. 31, where it is called Hazar-susim (סוּסִים; Ἡμισουσισίμ; Hazersusim). The name signifies 'village of horses'; and Stanley says, 'In Bethmarkaboth, 'the house of chariots,' and Hazar-susim, 'the village of horses,' we recognize the depôts and stations for the horses and chariots, such as those which in Solomon's time went to and fro between Egypt and Palestine' (Sin. and Pal., p. 160). It is doubtful whether there were any such communication between those countries as early as the time of Joshua; but may not the rich grassy plains around Beersheba (Robinson, B. R. i. 203) have been used at certain seasons by the ancient tribes of southern Palestine for pasturing their war and chariot horses, just as the grassy plains of Jaulán are used at the present day by the Druze chiefs of Lebanon, and the Turkish cavalry and artillery at Damascus?—J. L. P.

HAZEL. [Luz.]

HAZEROTH (חֲזֵרוֹת; 'Ἀσρωθ; Haseroth), one of the stations of the Israelites in the wilderness. It was situated apparently four days' march from Sinai (Num. x. 33; xi. 35), towards the north-west. It was also the first place after Sinai where the camp remained for a number of days. Here Aaron and Miriam attempted to excite a rebellion against Moses; and here the guilty Miriam was smitten with leprosy (Num. xii.). The accurate determination of the site of Hazeroth is of considerable importance, as it enables us to define with a near approach to accuracy the line of march of the Israelites from Sinai to Kadesh.

In a wild and dreary waste, among naked hills, eighteen hours from Sinai, is a little fountain called d-Hudherah, الحضره, a word radically identical with Hazeroth. Its distance from Sinai accords with the Scripture narrative, and would seem to warrant us in identifying it with Hazeroth. This was first suggested by Burckhardt (Travels in Syria, p. 495); and is advocated by Robinson (B. R. i. 151). There is some difficulty, however, in the position. The country around the fountain is exceedingly rugged, and the approaches to it difficult. It does not seem a suitable place for a large camp. Dr. Wilson mentions an undulating plain about fifteen miles north of Sinai, and running 'a long way to the eastward,' called d-Hadherah; and here he would locate Hazeroth (Lands of the Bible, i. 256). Professor Stanley thinks that the fountain called d'Ain, some distance north of the fountain of Hudherah, ought rather to be regarded as the site of Hazeroth, because 'Ain is the most important spring in this region, 'and must, therefore, have attracted around it any nomadic settlements, such as are implied in the name Hazeroth, and such as that of Israel might have been' (Sinai and Pal. 82). The approach to 'Ain is easy; the glens around it possess some good pastures; and the road from it to the Aelanitic gulf, along whose shore the Israelites appear to have marched, is open through the sublime ravine of Wefir. Still those familiar with the East know with what tenacity old names cling to old sites; and it seems in the highest degree probable that the old name Hazeroth is retained in Hudherah. But probably the name may have been given to a wide district (Handbook for S. and P. i. 37, sq.)—J. L. P.

HAZEON-TAMAR. [EN-GEDI.]

HAZO (חֲזוֹ, Chazo; Sept. 'Aḡaū), a son of Nahor (Gen. xxii. 22), whose posterity settled somewhere on the east of the Euphrates. Probably in חֲזוֹנִי, the name of a region of Assyria mentioned by Strabo (xvi. p. 736), and also a region in Mesopotamia (Steph. Byzant.), we have traces of their occupancy. The Syrian writers name a חֲזוֹ which they identify with Strabo's Chazene.—W. L. A.

HAZOR (חֲזוֹר; 'Ἀσώρ; Asor), an ancient and celebrated royal city of Canaan, situated near the waters of Merom. Jabin, king of Hazor, was the recognised chief of a number of small principalities (Josh. xi. 10). When the Israelites invaded Palestine, Jabin assembled his forces and allies on the shores of the Lake Merom. Joshua attacked and utterly defeated them, and burned Hazor with fire (Josh. xi. 1-12). The city was allotted to Naphtali (xix. 36). After the death of Joshua Hazor was rebuilt by the Canaanites, and under another king, with the hereditary name or title Jabin, attained to great power, and even held the Israelites in subjection for twenty years. At length the forces of Jabin, including 600 chariots of iron, were led by Sisera into the plain of Esdraelon, probably to complete the conquest of all Palestine; but they were met and routed by Barak and Deborah, and the power of Hazor was broken for ever (Judg. iv.) The city was afterwards fortified by Solomon (1 Kings ix. 15); and it was among those captured by the Assyrians on their first invasion of Palestine (2 Kings xv. 29). It is probably the same place which Josephus refers to in the time of the wars of the Maccabees. Demetrius was encamped at Cadesh, and Jonathan marched from the Sea of Galilee to 'the plain called Asor' to meet him (Antiq. xiii. 5. 6, 7; 1 Maccab. xi. 67).

The site of Hazor has not yet been satisfactorily identified. The incidental notices in Josh. xix. 36, and 2 Kings xv. 29, would seem to locate it to the south of Kedesh in Naphtali; and Josephus says it was situated over the Lake Semechonitis, and apparently so close to it that the plain round the lake was called by its name (i.e. and Antiq. v. 5. 1). Neither Eusebius nor Jerome appears to have known the site (Onomast., s. v. Asor).

The name Hazor still lingers in several places around the upper valley of the Jordan (Robinson, B. R. iii. 63, 81, 401). There is one Hasûry on a commanding site above Caesarea Philippi, and close to the great castle of Subeibeh. Here Keith (Land of Israel, 374) and Stanley (Sin. and Pal. 389) would place the ancient capital of Canaan. But the territory of Naphtali did not extend so far eastward. The writer discovered another Hasûr in the plain a few miles west of the site of Dan; but neither does this site quite accord with the Scripture notices (Porter's Damascus, i. 304; Van de Velde, Memoir, 318). Dr. Robinson would place Hazor at Tell Khureibeh, a rocky peak a few miles south of Kedesh. There are, as the name Khureibeh, 'ruins,' implies, some ancient ruins on the Tell; but they are those of a village. In the year 1850 the writer visited the ruins of an ancient town which occupy a commanding site on the south bank of Wady Hëndäj, overlooking the valley and lake of Merom, and about six miles south of Kedesh. This seems to be a more probable site for the ancient Hazor than Tell Khureibeh (Robinson, B. R. iii. 363, 365); and the plain beneath it, stretching to the shore of the lake, might take the name of the city Asur, as Josephus seems to indicate (i.e.)

2. A town on the southern border of Judah, near Kadesh (Josh. xv. 23; Sept. 'Ασσιωραίν; Vulg. Asor). The site has not been identified.

3. A town of Benjamin occupied after the captivity, and grouped with Nob and Ramah (Neh. xi. 33); it must thus have been situated a few miles north of Jerusalem. The verse in which the name occurs is omitted in the Septuagint; but Jerome renders it Asor in his version. Robinson suggests the identity of Hazor and the modern Tell Asur (تل عصور), a ruin on a little hill about six miles north of Bethel. This, however, appears to be too far from Ramah (Bib. Res. ii. 264, note). Tobler mentions a ruin called Khurbet Arsor, near Ramah, a little to the west, the situation of which would answer better to Hazor (Topogr. ii. 400; Van de Velde, Memoir, 319).

4. Jeremiah mentions a Hazor in connection with Kedar; 'concerning Kedar, and concerning the kingdoms of Hazor,' etc. (Jer. xlix. 28). The Septuagint renders this τῇ Κηδάρ τῇ Βασιλείᾳ τῆς αὐλῆς, 'To Kedar, the queen (or kingdom, see Schleusner, s. v.) of the fold.' Jerome translates it, 'ad Cedar, et ad regna Asor.' The name Hazor is probably applied by the prophet to some noted town or camping-ground of the Arab tribes of Arabia. May it not be that the country colonised by the descendants of Hazarmaveth is meant (Gen. x. 26)? This province, called by Arab historians Hadramaut, is situated in Yemen on the south coast of Arabia (HAZARMAVETH). The tribes of Arabia are divided into two classes—Nomads, who live exclusively in tents and wander from place to place; and those settled in towns or villages. The latter are called أَهْلُ أَحْضَر, or simply حَوَاضِر. The Arabic word حَضْر signifies locus habitatus fixus; and may thus be regarded as equivalent to the Hebrew מְנַחֵם (see Pococke, Specimen Historiæ Arabum, p. 2; Winer, R. W., s. v. Hazor).—J. L. P.

HEAD (שֵׁרָא; Greek, κεφαλή). As the head is the topmost part of the human body, it came derivatively to signify that which is highest, chief, the highest in position locally being regarded as highest in office, rank, or dignity; whence, as the head is the centre of the nervous system, holds the brain, and stands above all the other parts, it has generally been considered as the abode of the intellect or intelligence by which man is enlightened and his walk in life directed; while the heart, or the parts placed near it, have been accounted the place where the affections lie (Gen. iii. 15; Ps. iii. 3; Eccles. ii. 14). The head and the heart are sometimes taken for the entire person (Is. i. 5). Even the head alone, as being the chief member, frequently stands for the man (Prov. x. 6). The head also denotes sovereignty (1 Cor. xi. 3). Covering the head, and cutting off the hair, were signs of mourning and tokens of distress, which were enhanced by throwing ashes on the head, together with sackcloth (Amos viii. 10; Job i. 20; Lev. xxi. 5; Deut. xiv. 1; 2 Sam. xiii. 19; Esther iv. 1); while anointing the head was practised on festive occasions, and considered an emblem of felicity (Eccles. ix. 8; Ps. xxiii. 5; Luke vii. 46). It was usual to swear by the head (Matt. v. 36).—J. R. B.

HEART. All the phrases, more or less metaphorical, in which this word occurs, are rendered intelligible, without detailed examples, when we are told that the heart was, among the Hebrews, regarded poetically not only as the seat of the passions and emotions, as of love, pleasure, and grief, but also of the intellectual faculties—the mind, the understanding. [PHILOSOPHY, BIBLICAL.] In the original Scriptures, as well as in the English and other translations, the word 'heart,' therefore, constantly occurs where 'mind' is to be understood, and would be used by a modern English writer. We say modern, because the ancient usage of the English word 'heart' was more conformable than the present to that of the Hebrews.

HEARTH. None of the Hebrew terms translated hearth in the A. V. can be regarded as perfectly synonymous with it. In Gen. xviii. 6, a single word, עֹנֶה (ἐγκρηφίς, LXX.), stands for the 'cakes upon the hearth' of the A. V., or the 'subcinericijs panes' of the Vulgate. מִקְרָה, in Ps. cii. 3, means fuel or firewood (lignum ardens, sarmenta, Gesenius; φῶρυγος, LXX.; cremum, Vulg.); the plural מִקְרָהִים, Is. xxxiii. 14, is rendered in the A. V. burnings; ardoribus, Vulg.; incendium, Gesenius; כִּיּוֹר, Zech. xii. 6, with the addition of אֵשׁ, means a vessel for holding burning coals; elsewhere a laver, Exod. xxx. 18; Lev. viii. 11; and once for the pulpit (scaffold, A. V.), used by Solomon at the dedication of the Temple, 2 Chron. vi. 13. Another word translated hearth, מִנְיָה, Jer. xxxvi. 22, 23 (ἐσχάρα, LXX.; arula, Vulg.), appears to mean a fire-basket or chafing-dish, such as is still common in the East.—J. E. R.

HEATH, THOMAS, a learned layman of the Church of England, sometime resident at Exeter, the author of a work entitled—An Essay towards a new English version of the Book of Job from the original Hebrew, with a commentary and some account of his life, Lond. 1756, 4to. This version of Job is in prose, and on the whole is a correct and forcible rendering of the original. The notes are learned and discover considerable acquaintance with the literature of the subject. The author believes Job to have been a real person; but the poem he thinks was written long subsequent to Job's decease, and by a person wholly unacquainted with the doctrines of a future state and the resurrection of the body. These and cognate matters are discussed with special reference to the great controversy of the time, originating in the views promulgated by Bishop Warburton in his work on the Divine Legation of Moses.—W. HEAVEN, HEAVENS. Definitions and Distinctions.—The ancient Hebrews, for want of a single term like the Kόσμος and the Mundus of the Greeks and the Latins, used the phrase heaven and earth (as in Gen. i. 1; Jer. xxiii. 24; and Acts xvii. 24, where 'H. and E.' = 'the world and all things therein') to indicate the universe, or (as Barrow, Sermons on the Creed, works [Oxford Ed.], vol. iv. p. 556, expresses it) 'those two regions.

superior and inferior, into which the whole system of things is divided, together with all the beings that do reside in them, or do belong unto them, or are comprehended by them' (comp. Pearson on the Creed, who, on art. i. ('Maker of H. and E.') adduces the Rabbinical names of a triple division of the universe, making the sea, ד' , distinct from the שמים , h' okoumém. Compare also the Nicene Creed, where another division occurs of the universe into 'things visible and invisible.') Deducting from this aggregate the idea expressed by 'earth' [EARTH; GEOGRAPHY], we get a residue of signification which exactly embraces 'heaven.' Barrow (l. c.) well defines it as 'all the superior region encompassing the globe of the earth, and from it on all sides extended to a distance inconceivably vast and spacious, with all its parts and furniture and inhabitants—not only such things in it as are visible and material, but also those which are immaterial and invisible (Col. i. 16).' The same writer (p. 558, with whom comp. Grotius and Drusus on 2 Cor. xii. 2) ascribes to the Jews the notion that there are three heavens; * Calum nubiferum, or the firmament; Calum astriferum, the starry heavens; Calum angeliferum, or 'the heaven of heavens,' where the angels reside, 'the third heaven' of St. Paul. This same notion prevails in the Fathers. Thus St. Gregory of Nyssa (Hexaem. tom. i. p. 42) describes the first of these heavens as the limited space of the denser air ($\text{τὸν ὅρον τοῦ παχυμερεστέρου ἀέρος}$), within which range the clouds, the winds, and the birds; the second is the region in which wander the planets and the stars ($\text{ἐν ᾗ δὲ πλανῆται τῶν ἀστέρων διαπορεύονται}$), hence aptly called by Hesychius $\text{καθῆστριαμένον τόπον}$, locum stelliferum; while the third is the very summit of the visible creation ($\text{τὸ οὐν ἀκρότατον τοῦ αἰσθητοῦ κόσμου}$), St. Paul's third heaven, higher than the aerial and stellar world, cognisable [not by the eye but] by the mind alone ($\text{ἐν στασίμῳ καὶ νοητῇ φύσει γεωόμενος}$), which Damascene calls the heaven of heavens, the prime heaven beyond all others ($\text{οὐρανὸς τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, ὁ πρῶτος οὐρανός, Orthod. Fid. lib. ii. c. vi. p. 83}$); or, according to St. Basil (In Jesaiam, visione ii. tom. i. p. 813), the throne of God (θρόνος Θεοῦ), and to Justin Martyr (Quaest. ad Resp. ad Græcos, ad ult. Quaest. p. 236), the house and throne of God ($\text{οἶκος καὶ θρόνος τοῦ Θεοῦ}$).

Scripture Passages arranged according to these Distinctions.—This division of the celestial regions is very convenient and quite Biblical. I. Under the first head [calum nubiferum] the following phrases naturally fall—(a) 'Fowl,' or 'fowls of the heaven, of the air'; see Gen. ii. 19; vii. 3, 23; ix. 2; Deut. iv. 17; xxviii. 26; 1 Kings xxi. 24; Job xii. 7; xxviii. 21; xxxv. 11; Ps. viii. 8; lxxix. 2; civ. 12; Jer. vii. 33 et passim; Ezek. xxix. 5 et passim; Dan. ii. 38; Hos. ii. 18; iv. 3; vii. 12; Zeph. i. 3; Mark iv. 3 ($\text{τὰ πετεινὰ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ}$); Luke viii. 5; ix. 58; xiii. 19; Acts x. 12; xi. 6—in all which passages the same original words in the Hebrew, Chaldee, and Greek Scriptures [שמים , שָׁמַיִם , oûpavoi] are with equal propriety rendered indifferently 'air' and 'heaven'—similarly, we read of 'the path of the eagle in the air,' Prov. xxx. 19; of 'the eagles of heaven,' Lam. iv. 19; of 'the stork of the heaven,' Jer. viii. 7; and of 'birds of heaven' in general, Eccl. x. 20; Jer. iv. 25. In addition to these zoological terms, we have meteorological facts included under

* Wetstein (in a learned note on 2 Cor. xii. 2) and Eisenmenger (Entdecktes Judenthum, vol. i. p. 460) state the Rabbinical opinion as asserting seven heavens. For the substance of Wetstein's note, see Dr. Stanley, Corinthians, l. c. This number arises confessedly from the mystic value of the numeral seven; 'omnis septenarius dilectus est in seculum—in superis.' According to Rabbi Abia, there were six ante-chambers, as it were, or steps to the seventh heaven, which was the 'raueion in quo Rex habitat'—the very presence-chamber of the Divine King himself. Comp. Origen, Contra Celsum, vi. p. 289, and Clemens Alex. Strom. iv. p. 636; v. p. 692. In the last of these passages the prophet Zephaniah is mentioned, after some apocryphal tradition, to have been caught up into 'the fifth heaven, the dwelling-place of the angels, in a glory sevenfold greater than the brightness of the sun.' In the Rabbinical point of view, the superb throne of King Solomon, with the six steps leading up to it, was a symbol of the highest heaven with the throne of the Eternal, above the six inferior heavens (1 Kings x. 18-20). These gradations of the celestial regions are probably meant in Amos ix. 6, where, however, the entire creation is beautifully described by 'the stories [or steps] of the heaven,' for the empyreal heaven; 'the troop [or globular aggregate, the terra firma, see A. Lapide, in loc.] of the earth,' and 'the waters of the sea' [including the atmosphere, whence the waters are 'poured out upon the face of the earth']. As for the threefold division of the celestial regions mentioned in the text, Meyer thinks it to be a fiction of the learned Grotius, on the ground of the Rabbinical seven heavens. But this censure is premature; for (1) it is very doubtful whether this hebdomadal division is as old as St. Paul's time; (2) it is certain that the Rabbinical doctors are not unanimous about the number seven. Rabbi Judah (Chagiga, fol. 12. 2, and Aboth Nathan, 37) says there are 'two heavens,' after Deut. x. 14. This agrees with Grotius' statement, if we combine his nubiferum [רקיע] and astriferum [שמים] into one region of physical heavens (as indeed Moses does himself in Gen. i. 14, 15, 17, 20), and reserve his angeliferum for the שמי השמים , 'the heaven of heavens,' the supernal region of spiritual beings, Milton's 'Empyrean' (P. L. vii.

sub fin.) See Bp. Pearson's note, On the Creca [ed. Chevallier], p. 91. The learned note of De Wette on 2 Corinthians xii. 2, is also worth consulting. (3) The Targum on 2 Chron. vi. 18 [as quoted by Dr. Gill, Comment. 2 Corinth. l. c.] expressly mentions the triple distinction of supreme, middle, and lower heavens. Indeed, there is an accumulation of the threefold classification. Thus, in Tzeror Hammor, fol. 1. 4, and 3. 2, 3, and 83. 2, three worlds are mentioned. The doctors of the Cabbala also hold the opinion of three worlds, Zohar, Numb. fol. 66. 3. And of the highest world there is further a tripartite division, of angels, $\text{עֲלֵי הַמַּלְאָכִים}$; of souls, נַפְשֹׁת ; and of spirits, עֲלֵי הָרוּחִי . See Buxtorf's Lex. Rabbin. p. 1620, who refers to D. Kimchi, on Psalm xix. 9. St. Paul, besides the well-known 2 Cor. xii. 2, refers again, only less pointedly, to a plurality of heavens, as in Ephes. iv. 10. See Olshausen [Ed. Clark] on the former passage.

the same original words; e. g. (b) 'The dew of heaven,' Gen. xxvii. 28, 39; Deut. xxxiii. 28; Dan. iv. 15 et passim; Hag. i. 10; Zech. viii. 12; (c) 'The clouds of heaven,' 1 Kings xviii. 45; Ps. cxlvii. 8; Dan. vii. 13; Matt. xxiv. 30; xxvi. 64; Mark xiv. 62; (d) 'The frost of heaven,' Job xxxviii. 29; (e) 'The winds of heaven,' 1 Kings xviii. 55; Ps. lxxviii. 26; Dan. viii. 8; xi. 4; Zech. ii. 6; vi. 5 [see margin]; Matt. xxiv. 31; Mark xiii. 27; (f) 'The rain of heaven,' Gen. viii. 2; Deut. xi. 11; xxviii. 12; Jer. xiv. 22; Acts xiv. 17 [οὐρανὸν ὑετοῦς]; James v. 18; Rev. xviii. 6; (g) 'Lightning, with thunder,' Job xxxvii. 3, 4; Luke xvii. 24. II. (Cælum astriferum). The vast spaces of which astronomy takes cognizance are frequently referred to: ex. gr. (a) in the phrase, 'host of heaven,' in Deut. xvii. 3; Jer. viii. 2; Matt. xxiv. 29 [δυνάμεις τῶν οὐρανῶν]; a sense which is obviously not to be confounded with another signification of the same phrase, as in Luke ii. 13 [ANGELS]: (b) 'Lights of heaven,' Gen. i. 14, 15, 16; Ezek. xxxii. 8; (c) 'Stars of heaven,' Gen. xxii. 17; xxvi. 4; Exod. xxxii. 13; Deut. i. 10; x. 22; xxviii. 62; Judg. v. 20; Neh. ix. 23; Is. xiii. 10; Nahum iii. 16; Heb. xi. 12.* III. (Cælum angeliferum). It would exceed our limits if we were to collect the descriptive phrases which Revelation has given us of Heaven in its sublimest sense; we content ourselves with indicating one or two of the most obvious: (a) 'The heaven of heavens,' Deut. x. 14; 1 Kings viii. 27; 2 Chron. ii. 6, 18; Neh. ix. 6; Ps. cxv. 16; cxlviii. 4; (b) 'The third heavens,' 2 Cor. xii. 2; (c) 'The high and lofty [place], Is. xlvii. 15; (d) 'The highest,' Matt. xxi. 9; Mark xi. 10; Luke ii. 14, compared with Ps. cxlviii. 1. This heavenly sublimity was graciously brought down to Jewish apprehensions in the sacred symbol of their Tabernacle and Temple, which they revered (especially in the adytum of 'the Holy of Holies') as 'the place where God's honour dwelt' (Ps. xxvi. 8), and amidst the sculptured types of His celestial retinue, in the cherubim of the mercy-seat (2 Kings xix. 15; Ps. lxxx. 1; Is. xxxvii. 16).†

Meaning of the terms used in the Original. 1. The by far most frequent designation of Heaven in the Hebrew Scriptures is שָׁמַיִם, which the older lexicographers [see Cocceius, Lex. s. v.] regarded as the dual, but which Gesenius and Fürst have restored to the dignity, which St. Jerome gave it, of the plural of an obsolete noun, שָׁמַיִם as (נִימִין plur. of נִי and מִי from שָׁמַיִם). According to these recent scholars the idea expressed by the word is height, elevation (Gesenius, Thes. p. 1453; Fürst, Hebr. Wört. ii. 467). In this respect of its essential meaning it resembles the Greek οὐρανός [from the radical ορ, denoting height]; Pott, Etymol. Forsch. i. 123, ed. 1. Pott's rendering of this root ορ, by 'sich erheben,' reminds us of our own beautiful word heaven, which thus enters into brotherhood of signification with the grand idea of the Hebrew, Chaldee, and Greek. Professor Bosworth in his Anglo-Sax. Dict., under the verb hebban, to raise or elevate, gives the kindred words of the whole Teutonic family, and deduces therefrom the noun heofon or heofen, in the sense of heaven. And although the primary notion of the Latin cælum (akin to καὸλος and our hollow) is the less sublime one of a covered or vaulted space, yet the loftier sense of elevation has prevailed, both in the original (see White and Riddle, s. v. Cælum) and in the derived languages (comp. French ciel, and the English word ceiling).

2. Closely allied in meaning, though unconnected in origin, with שָׁמַיִם, is the oft-recurring קִרְוֹם. This word is never Englished heaven, but 'heights,' or 'high place,' or 'high places.' There can, however, be no doubt of its celestial signification (and that in the grandest degree) in such passages as Ps. lxxviii. 18 [Hebr. 19]; xciii. 4; cii. 19 [or in the Hebr. Bib. 20, where קִרְוֹם is equal to the שָׁמַיִם of the parallel clause]; similarly, Job xxxi. 2; Is. lviii. 15; Jer. xxv. 30. Dr. Kalisch, Genesis, Introd. p. 21, says, 'It was a common belief among all ancient nations that at the summit of the shadow of the earth, or on the top of the highest mountain of the earth, which reaches with its crest into heaven . . . the gods have their palace or hall of assembly,' and he instances the Babylonian Albordsch, the chief abode of Ormuzd, among the heights of the Caucasus; and the Hindoo Meru; and the Chinese Kulkun (or Kaen-lun); and the Greek Olympus (and Atlas); and the Arabian Caf; and the Parsee Tirih. He, however, while strongly and indeed most properly censuring the identification of Mount Meru with Mount Moriah (which had hastily been conjectured from 'the accidental resemblance of the names'), deems it improbable that the Israelites should have entertained, like other ancient nations, the notion of local height for the abode of Him whose 'glory the heaven and the heaven of heavens cannot contain;' and this he supposes on the ground that such a notion 'rests essentially on polytheistic ideas.' Surely the learned commentator is premature in both these statements. (1.) No such improbability, in fact, unhappily, can be predicated of the Israelites, who in ancient times (notwithstanding the divine prohibitions) exhibited a constant tendency to the ritual of their בְּמֹת, or 'high places.'

Gesenius makes a correcter statement, when he says [Hebr. Lex. by Robinson, p. 138], 'The Hebrews, like most other ancient nations, supposed that sacred rites performed on high places were particularly acceptable to the Deity. Hence they were accustomed to offer sacrifices upon mountains

* These two divisions are sometimes, as we have said in the previous note, regarded as one, the physical or material heavens, in opposition to the spiritual region. Poole, in synopsis on Gen. i., has with quaint succinctness and propriety indicated the characteristics of the physical heavens, in respect of their three classes of occupants, thus, 'tres regiones, ubi aves, ubi nubes, ubi sidera.'

† Heaven, as the eternal rest and reversion of the saints (Matt. v. 12; 1 Pet. i. 4, and many other passages), and as used in the phrase kingdom of heaven—the ultimate development of the state of grace and salvation to the blessed company of all faithful people—we do not propose to treat of here; the beauty and glory of that subject is too much connected with practical and devotional theology to be admitted into this work; for the same reason we must refer to theological treatises for a commentary on Christ's glorious 'Ascension into Heaven' [the Cælum Angeliferum of our art.], and 'Session' there on His mediatorial throne at God's right hand.

and hills, both to idols and to God Himself, 1 Sam. ix. 12, sq.; 1 Chron. xiii. 29, sq.; 1 Kings iii. 4; 2 Kings xii. 2, 3; Is. lxxv. 7; and also to build there chapels, fane, tabernacles, בְּתֵי הַמִּזְבֵּחַ, 1 Kings xiii. 32; 2 Kings xvii. 29; with their priests and other ministers of the sacred rites, כְּהֵנֵי הַמִּזְבֵּחַ, 1 Kings xii. 32; 2 Kings xvii. 32. And so tenacious of this ancient custom were not only the ten tribes, but also all the Jews, that, even after the building of Solomon's temple, in spite of the express law of Deut. xii., they continued to erect such chapels on the mountains around Jerusalem.' (2.) Neither from the character of Jehovah, as the God of Israel, can the improbability be maintained, as if it were of the essence of polytheism only to localise Deity on mountain heights. 'The High and Lofty One that inhabiteth eternity whose name is Holy,' in the proclamation which He is pleased to make of His own style, does not limit His abode to celestial sublimities; in one of the finest passages of even Isaiah's poetry, God claims as one of the stations of His glory the shrine of 'a contrite and humble spirit' (Is. lvii. 15). His loftiest attributes, therefore, are not compromised, nor is the amplitude of His omnipresence compressed, by an earthly residence. Accordingly, the same Jehovah who 'walketh on the high places, בְּמִצְוֹת, of the earth' (Amos iv. 13); who 'treadeth on the fastnesses, בְּמִצְוֹת, of the sea' (Job ix. 8); and 'who ascendeth above the heights, בְּמִצְוֹת, of the clouds,' was pleased to consecrate Zion as His dwelling-place (Ps. lxxxvii. 2), and His rest (Ps. cxxxii. 13, 14). Hence we find the same word, מְרוֹם, which is often descriptive of the sublimest heaven, used of Zion, which Ezekiel calls 'the mountain of the height of Israel,' הַר מְרוֹם יִשְׂרָאֵל (xvii. 23; xx. 40; xxxiv. 14).

3. בְּלִילַיָּה. This word, which literally meaning a wheel, admirably expresses rotatory movement, is actually rendered 'heaven' in A. V. of Ps. lxxvii. 18. 'The voice of thy thunder was in the heaven,' בְּלִילַיָּה [LXX. εἰς τὴν τροχίαν; Vulg. In rotā.] Luther's version agrees with A. V. In Himmel; and Dathe renders per orbem, which is ambiguous, being as expressive, to say the least, of the globe of the earth as of the circle of heaven. The Targum (in Walton, vol. iii.) on the passage, gives בְּנִלְלָה (in rota), which is as indeterminate as the original, as the Syriac seems also to be. De Wette (and after him Justus Olshausen, Die Ps. erklärt, l. c.) renders the phrase, im Wirbelwinde, 'in the whirlwind.' Maurer, who disapproves of this rendering, explains the phrase rotans se, or rotatur, 'rotated.' But amidst the uncertainty of the versions, we are disposed to think that it was not without good reason that our translators, in departing from the previous version (see Psalter, in loc., which has, 'the voice of thy thunder was heard round about'), deliberately rendered the passage in the heaven, as if the בְּנִלְלָה were the correlative of תְּהִלָּה, both being poetic words, and both together equalled the heaven and the earth. In James iii. 6, the remarkable phrase, ὁδὸς τροχῶν τῆς γῆς καὶ οὐρανοῦ, the course, circuit, or wheel of nature, is akin to our

בְּנִלְלָה. The Syriac renders the τροχῶν by the same word, which occurs in the Psalm as the equivalent of בְּלִילַיָּה, namely בְּלִילַיָּה (from the Hebrew, 'ejecta secunda radicali,' Schaaß's Lex. Syr.; and of the same indefiniteness of signification). That the general sense 'heaven' best expresses the force of Ps. lxxvii. 18, is rendered probable, moreover, by the description which Josephus gives (Antiq. ii. 16. 3) of the destruction of Pharaoh's host in the Red Sea, the subject of that part of the Psalm, 'Showers of rain descended from heaven, ἀπ' οὐρανοῦ, with dreadful thunders and lightning, and flashes of fire; thunderbolts were darted upon them, nor were there any indications of God's wrath upon men wanting on that dark and dismal night.'

4. As the words we have reviewed indicate the height and rotation of the heavens, so the two we have yet to examine exhibit another characteristic of equal prominence, the breadth and expanse of the celestial regions. These are שָׁחַק (generally used in the plural) and רָקִיעַ. They occur together in Job xxxvii. 18; 'Hast thou with Him spread out (רָקִיעַ) the sky or expanse of heaven?'—(לְשָׁחִיקִים, where ל is the sign of the objective). We must examine them separately. The root שָׁחַק is explained by Gesenius to grind to powder, and then to expand by rubbing or beating. Meier (Hebr. Wurzel w. b., p. 446) compares it with the Arabic سَحَقَ, to make fine, to attenuate (whence the noun سَحَقٌ, a thin cloud). With him agrees Fürst (Hebr. w. b., ii. 433). The Hebrew subst. is therefore well adapted to designate the skyey region of heaven with its cloud-dust, whether fine or dense. Accordingly, the meaning of the word in its various passages curiously oscillates between sky and cloud. When Moses, in Deut. xxxiii. 26, lauds Jehovah's 'riding in His excellence on the sky'; and when in 2 Sam. xxii. 12, and repeated in Ps. xviii. 11 (12), David speaks of 'the thick clouds of the skies,' when Job, xxxvii. 18, asks, 'Hast thou with Him spread out the sky?' when the Psalmist, Ps. lxxvii. 17 (18), speaks of 'the skies sending out a sound,' and the prophet, Is. xlv. 8, figuratively, of their 'pouring down righteousness,' when finally Jeremiah, li. 9, by a frequently occurring simile [comp. Apoc. xviii. 5, ἡκολούθησαν αὐτῆς αἱ ἀμαρτίαι ὅμοιοι τοῦ οὐρανοῦ], describes the judgment of Babylon as 'lifted up even to the skies,' in every instance our word שָׁחִיקִים in the plural* is employed. The same word in the same form is translated 'clouds' in Job xxxv. 5; xxxvi. 28; xxxvii. 21; xxxviii. 37; in Ps. xxxvii. 5 (6); lvii. 10 (11); lxxviii. 34 (35) [margin, 'heavens']; lxxviii. 23; in Prov. iii. 20; viii. 28. The prevalent sense of this word, we thus see, is a meteorological one, and falls under our first head of cælum nubiferum: its connection with the other two heads is much slighter. It bears probably an astronomical sense in Ps. lxxxix. 37 (38), where 'the faithful witness in heaven' seems to be in apposition to the sun and the moon (Bellarmine, in loc.); although some suppose the expression to mean the witness, 'the witness' of God's covenant with Noah; Gen. ix. 13, seq., (see J. Olhausen, in loc.) This is perhaps the only instance of its falling under the class cælum astriferum; nor have we a much more frequent reference to the higher sense of the cælum angeliferum, Ps. lxxxix. 6 containing the only explicit allusion to this sense; unless, with Gesenius, Thess. s. v., we refer Ps. lxxviii. 35 also to it. More probably in Deut. xxxiii. 26 (where it is parallel with שָׁמַיִם), and in the highly poetical passages of Is. xlv. 8 and Jer. li. 9, our word שָׁמַיִם may be best regarded as designating the empyreal heavens.

5. We have already noticed the connection between שָׁמַיִם and our only remaining word רָקִיעַ, from their being associated by the sacred writer in the same sentence, Job xxxvii. 18; it tends to corroborate this connection, that on comparing Gen. i. 6 (and seven other passages in the same chapter) with Deut. xxxiii. 26, we find רָקִיעַ of the former sentence, and שָׁמַיִם of the latter, both rendered by the LXX. στερέωμα and firmamentum in the Vulgate, whence the word 'firmament' passed into our A. V. This word is now a well-understood term in astronomy, synonymous with sky or else the general heavens, undivested by the discoveries of science of the special signification, which it bore in the ancient astronomy [FIRMAMENT]. For a clear exposition of all the Scripture passages which bear on the subject, we may refer the reader to Professor Dawson's Archæia (or 'Studies of the Cosmogony and Natural History of the Hebrew Scriptures'), especially chap. viii.; and to Dr. M'Caul on the Mosaic Record of Creation, in 'Aids to Faith'; (or, what is substantially the same treatise in a more accessible form, his Notes on the First Chapter of Genesis, sec. ix., pp. 32-44). We must be content here, in reference to our term רָקִיעַ, to observe, that, when we regard its origin (from the root רָקַע, to spread out or expand by beating; Ges. s. v.; Fuller, Misc. Sacr. i. 6; Fürst, Hebr. W. B. s. v.), and its connection with, and illustration by, such words as שָׁמַיִם clouds, and the verbs טָפַח (Is. xlviii. 13, 'My right hand hath spread out the heavens') and נָטָה (Is. xl. 22, 'Who stretcheth out the heavens like a curtain' [literally, like fineness]), 'and spreadeth them out as a tent', we are astonished at the attempt to control*

* We extract the following from a scientific writer of the present time, whose work is an able protest against the hasty assumptions of the modern critical school:—'In Is. xl. 22, it is said of God, that 'it is He that stretcheth out the heavens like a curtain'; and on this passage an accomplished Hebrew scholar remarks: 'The Hebrew word here used for curtain means something tremulous, and as Gesenius gives it, a curtain hanging, so called from its tremulous motion.' This is a most apt illustration of what modern physical inquirers conceive to be the undulatory motion of the ether. It is not a movement of translation, but simply a wave-like agitation, without any bodily transportation of material. It is fre-the meaning of an intelligible term, which fits in easily and consistently with the nature of things, by a few poetical metaphors, which are themselves capable of a consistent sense when held subordinate to the plainer passages of prose.

The Physics of the Bible.—A few general remarks on this subject in reference to recent speculations will suitably conclude this article. Notwithstanding the tendency of critics to interpret the statements of Scripture on physical facts by the wrong theories, and the national and temporary prejudices of antiquity, we are persuaded that on a deeper examination of the sacred text, these statements will be found to comport, with admirable precision, with the profoundest scientific conceptions of modern times. A thoughtful writer has very lately said with much force and propriety: 'These utterances [on physical facts contained in the Bible] are in the mode of a personal consciousness that is older than the material framework of the creation; they sound like the Creator's recollections of an eternity past! If they contain no definite anticipations of the results of modern science, they are marvellously exempt from any approximate error akin to the misapprehensions of later times. It is as if He who framed the world out of nothing would speak of His own work to a certain limit, and not beyond it; the truth is uttered, but not the whole truth' (Isaac Taylor on the Spirit of the Hebrew Poetry, p. 146). When the word רָקִיעַ, in addition to the sense of expansion, which is so applicable to the aerial and etherial spaces which surround the earth, and stretch away to the abysses beyond, has the idea of firmness assigned to it (in the LXX. στερέωμα, and Vulg. firmament), nothing in fact could better suit the requirement of the case than this combination of stability and expansion. (1) If we regard only the atmospheric firmament, and contemplate the enormous quantity of water which is suspended over the earth—how enormous we may gather from the fact that the waters of all the rivers which flow into the sea, are but a part of the overflows of the vast atmospheric reservoir—we, instead of wasting ingenuity in trying to construct a solid vault out of the Hebrew phrases, would be more congenially furthering the interests of true criticism, if we patiently looked out for opportunities of adapting these phrases to the meteorological facts which reveal the need of a firmament, unsolid, indeed, but yet stable, in which the Almighty may 'separate the waters which are above the firmament from the waters below the firmament,' and so defend us from an outburst of the aqueous element, which would reduce our earth to its primeval chaos. 'When we see a cloud resolve itself into rain, and pour out thousands of gallons of water, we cannot comprehend how it can float in the atmosphere' (Kæmtz, Course of Meteorology), but we can appreciate the beautiful provision of that רָקִיעַ, in which 'God bindeth up the waters in quently likened to the waving or tremulous motion of a shaken table-cloth or sheet—but the foregoing comparison [of the prophet] is far better' (Professor Young, Science elucidative of Scripture and not antagonistic to it, pp. 76, 77).

His thick clouds, and the cloud is not rent under them' (Job. xxvi. 8). Is. Vossius long ago rightly caught this idea by explaining the LXX. στε-

πέλωμα, by 'fulcimentum, aut firmamentum;' the cloud system being, as he says, the prop for maintaining and upholding the moisture of the firmament—'nubes per hoc fulcimentum [פֶּלֶאָמָה] intelligendæ sunt tanquam fulcra, vehicula et στερεώματα * humorum' (Auctar. Castig. ad Scriptt. de Ætat. Mundi, p. 15). (2) If we extend our view beyond the atmospheric to the sideral firmament, we again require the same combination of expansion and stability as before. 'The close of cent. xviii,' says Humboldt, 'through the new paths opened to the investigation of astronomical truths by the improvement of the infinitesimal calculus, has the merit of having demonstrated 'the stability of the planetary system' (Cosmos iii. 451, 452). A thoughtful reader, who peruses Humboldt's statement of 'the principal elements of this stability,' will not be at a moment's loss to detect in these profound discoveries of modern science a much more congruous idea of the 'firmament,' or strength of the פֶּלֶאָמָה, than in the cosmological dreams of solid heavens and crystalline vaults. (3) A third illustration of the suitability of the word firmament is well supplied by Professor Young:—'The term is not so inappropriate as objectors have imagined. If there be any one thing in the whole of material creation which is permanent in situation, firmly and immovably continuing ever in the same place, that thing is the ethereal fluid to which the term is applied. What we call its motion is mere vibratory agitation, without any bodily translation of material. There is not the slightest reason to suppose, from any thing that science makes known respecting it, that the great body of the ether in which all the heavenly luminaries are placed—the firmament—has ever stirred from the position in which the Creator at first placed it. Look, too, at the most ordinary phenomena of light. It is never blown about by the winds, or in the least agitated by atmospheric commotions; for in the most violent storm we see the shadow of an unmoving object remaining still unmoved. Light pursues its course unaffected by these surrounding disturbances, and what would prostrate even the firmest oak cannot so much as bend aside the slenderest sunbeam (Science elucidative of Scripture, pp. 100, 101). Surely no word could more happily express such subtle fixity as פֶּלֶאָמָה; while the versions στερεώματα and firmamentum are only defective in the idea of expansion, not erroneous in their idea of firmness and stability.'†

mentum are only defective in the idea of expansion, not erroneous in their idea of firmness and stability.'†

* Dr M'Caul (Aids to Faith, p. 225; Notes on Genesis i, p. 38), to the same purport remarks: 'Stereoma was chosen not to express something itself solid, but something which strengthened, or made firm, the heavenly bodies. They took the word in the transitive sense, like βεβαίωμα, δόλωμα, πλήρωμα, etc.; and this is proved by the Vulgate having firmamentum, which form of word signifies something that makes firm, like ornamentum, alimmentum, monumentum, etc. In this sense stereoma is elsewhere used by the LXX. as in Ezek. xiii. 5; Esther ix. 29; Ps. xvii. 3.'

† For another instance of the applicability of a large Scripture phrase to a very high scientific theory of modern times, see Dr. Whewell's Theory of the Solar System. His opinion, that the remoter planets are 'spheres of water and of aque-

Poetical Descriptions of Physical Facts.—We have already censured that quality in the new criticism which sets a literal construction on a passage of poetry, and on that ground condemns its statement as erroneous. We will take a prominent instance for the purpose of illustrating the absurdity of the practice. In Job. xxxvii. 18, Elihu asks: 'Hast thou with Him spread out the sky which is strong and as a molten looking-glass?' This, it is contended, supports the theory of a solid firmament.* But this is to destroy the difference between the simplicity of prose and the metaphor of poetry. How much truer to common sense, the basis of sound criticism, was Luther's view, when he interpreted the metallic firmness of the sky here 'to have respect not to the material but to the divine word, which can make the softest thing in nature into the strongest and the firmest' (On Genesis i. 6). Luther's comment is the more reasonable, because the word sky is שָׁמַיִם, which we have seen signifies clouds. Now no one who has carefully watched the clouds, will wonder at Elihu's description—for the fantastic grandeur of these skye prodigies has inspired still more striking exaggerations of poetic fancy. It would be easy to illustrate this by quotations from the poets and descriptive writers even of recent times, whose works abound in gorgeous pictures of massive cloudland and solid heavens, which all feel must not critically be construed as representing literal but phenomenal facts. We see that such descriptions coexist side by side with rigorous science, without giving or receiving injury or discredit; that therefore the Hebrew poetry when indulging in highly-wrought but yet perfectly imaginable expressions, cannot, according to the rules of reasonable interpretation, be deemed incompatible with true and unexaggerated science, any more than the fancy flights of modern poetry, when depicting natural phenomena in their fantastic phases, can be legitimately held to be, in any critical sense, con-ous vapour,' has been conjecturally applied by Dr. M'Caul to Moses' statement about the waters above the firmament. . . . In this he follows F. Von Meyer, Drs. Kurtz (Bible and Astronomy) and Delitsch. We have no difficulty in believing that the Holy Scripture is often in advance of science, never behind it (Aids to Faith, p. 229; Notes on Gen. i. p. 43).

* Gesenius, Knobel, and others, refer, in illustration, to Homer's epithets of the sky or heavens. His οὐρανὸς is iron (σίδηρος, Odys. xv. 329) and copper (χαλκός, Iliad, xvii. 425; πολύχαλκος, Od. iii. 2). These descriptions, like those of the Scriptures, must be taken as the fanciful license of poetry, and certainly not as philosophic guesses; astronomical theories of the solid heavens, etc., were long posterior to Homer. Dr. Kalisch strangely enough construes the Homeric epithets literally! and accordingly will not admit them as illustrative of the Hebrew phrases (Genesis Introd. p. 20). In this he is surely uncritical. The fact is, that both in the Homeric and Scripture passages you have the phenomenal painting of poetical fancy, which does not wait for the restraints and precision of philosophy and science. Carlyle does not hesitate to apply the epithet 'copper' to the clouds of heaven (comp. Gladstone's Homer and the Homeric Age, vol. iii. pp. 483, 495, 499).

tradictory to the declarations of the most advanced modern philosophy.

We have omitted, while treating of the original words for heaven, to adopt the usual practice of giving in every case the equivalents in the LXX. and the Vulgate. The extreme variations would have greatly increased our labour, without commensurate advantage, as one instance will at once shew; the noun $\pi\eta\psi$ (see above, 4) is rendered twice in the Sept. by $\delta\eta\rho$, eight times by $\nu\epsilon\phi\acute{\epsilon}\lambda\eta$, four times by $\nu\acute{\epsilon}\phi\omicron\varsigma$, once by $\omicron\upsilon\rho\alpha\nu\acute{\omicron}\varsigma$, once by $\sigma\tau\epsilon\rho\acute{\epsilon}\omega\mu\alpha$, and once by $\delta\alpha\sigma\tau\rho\omicron\nu$ (besides twice by $\rho\omicron\pi\eta$, and once by $\pi\alpha\lambda\alpha\iota\omega\mu\alpha$, in passages which hardly fall under the subject of our article); Aquila rendered this word by $\delta\eta\rho$, and Symmachus by $\alpha\delta\eta\rho$. The Vulgate is much more uniform; fifteen times it has translated the word nubes, twice athera, and as often calos, and once (Is. xl. 15) pulvis. The extremely frequent word שמים and the N. T. $\omicron\upsilon\rho\alpha\nu\acute{\omicron}\varsigma$, $\omicron\upsilon\rho\alpha\nu\omicron\iota$ are (as might be expected) rendered commonly, if not always, by calum, and pl. cali-orum, -os, in the Vulg. [and $\omicron\upsilon\rho\alpha\nu\acute{\omicron}\varsigma$, (not often $\omicron\upsilon\rho\alpha\nu\omicron\iota$ plur.) in the O. T. by LXX.]—P. H.

HEBER, properly 'EBER (עֵבֶר, one of the other side; Sept. 'Eβep and 'Eβep), son of Salah, who became the father of Peleg at the age of 34 years, and died at the age of 464 (Gen. x. 24; xl. 14; 1 Chron. i. 25). His name occurs in the genealogy of Christ (Luke iii. 35), where it is written 'Eβep. Though simply mentioned in the line of descent, there is a degree of interest connected with him from the notion, which the Jews themselves entertain, that the name of Hebrews, applied to them, was derived from this recorded ancestor of Abraham. [HEBREW.]

HEBER (חֵבֶר; Sept. Χαβερ), a descendant of Hobab, son of Jethro, and brother of the wife of Moses. His wife was the Jael who slew Sisera, and he is called Heber the Kenite (Judg. iv. 11, 17; v. 24), which seems to have been a name for the whole family (Judg. i. 16). Heber appears to have lived separate from the rest of the Kenites, leading a patriarchal life, amid his tents and flocks. He must have been a person of some consequence, from its being stated that there was peace between the house of Heber and the powerful king Jabin. At the time the history brings him under our notice his camp was in the plain of Zaanaïm, near Kesesh in Naphtali. [JAEI; KENITES.]

[Five other persons of this name are mentioned in the O. T., viz., A grandson of Asher (Gen. xli. 17; Num. xxvi. 45; 1 Chron. vii. 31, Σοθάρ and Σοθέρ); one of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 18, 'Aβέρ); one of the children of Gad (v. 13, 'Ωβήδ); a Benjamite (viii. 17, 'Αβάρ); another Benjamite (viii. 22, 'Ωβήδ).]

HEBREW (עִבְרִי, 'Eβραϊος), a designation of the people of Israel, used first of their progenitor Abraham (Gen. xiv. 13; LXX. τῷ περάτῃ). This name is never in Scripture applied to the Israelites except when the speaker is a foreigner (Gen. xxxix. 14, 17; xli. 12; Exod. i. 16; ii. 6; 1 Sam. iv. 6, 9, etc.), or when Israelites speak of themselves to one of another nation (Gen. xl. 15; Exod. i. 19; Jonah i. 9, etc.), or when they are contrasted with other peoples (Gen. xliii. 32; Exod. i. 3, 7, 15, Deut. xv. 12; 1 Sam. xiii. 3, 7).^{*} By the Greek and Latin writers this is the name by which the descendants of Jacob are designated when they are not called Jews (Pausan. v. 5, 2; vi. 24, 6; Plut. Sympos. iv. 6, 1; Tacit. Hist. v. 1); and Josephus, who affects classical peculiarities, constantly uses it. On these facts two opposing hypotheses have been raised; the one that Israelite or Jew was the name by which the nation designated itself (just as the Welsh call themselves Cymry, though in speaking of themselves to a Saxon they would probably use the name Welsh); the other is that 'Hebrew' is a national name, merely indicative of the people as a people, while Israelite is a sacred or religious name appropriate to them as the chosen people of God. This latter opinion Gesenius dismisses as 'without foundation' (Lexicon by Robinson, s.v.); but it has received the deliberate sanction of Ewald (Ausführ. Lehrb. der Heb. Spr., p. 18, 5th ed.)

According to the sacred writer, עֵבֶר, Hebrew, is a derivative from עֵבֶר, 'Eber, the ancestor of Abraham; at least the same persons who are called Hebrews are called בְּנֵי עֵבֶר E'ney 'Eber, sons of 'Eber (Gen. x. 21); and עֵבֶר 'Eber (Num. xxiv. 24); and this is tantamount to a derivation of the name Hebrew from 'Eber. In support of this, it may be urged that עֵבֶר is the proper form which a patronymic from עֵבֶר would assume; according to the analogy of מוֹאבִּי, a Moabite, דָּנִי, a Danite, כְּלָבִי a Calebite, etc. (Hiller, Onomast. Sac. c. xiv., p. 231 ff.) What adds much force to this argument is the evident antithesis in Gen. xiv. 13, between אֲבִירָם הָעֵבֶרִי and מֶמְרָא הָאֲמֹרִי; the former of these is as evidently a patronymic as the latter. The objections to this etymology are of little weight. Theodoret (Quaest. in Gen. 61) urges against it that the Hebrews were not the only descendants of 'Eber, and, therefore, could not appropriate his name; and the objection has been often repeated. To meet it recourse has been had to the suggestion, first adduced, we believe, by Ibn Ezra (Comment. ad Jon. i. 9) that the descendants of Abraham retained the name Hebrew from 'Eber, because they alone of his descendants retained the faith which he held. This may be; but we are hardly entitled to assume it in order to account for the fact before us. It is better to throw the onus probandi on the objector, and to demand of him, in our ignorance of what determined the use of such patronymics in one line of descent and not in others, that he should show cause why it is inconceivable that Abraham might have a good and sufficient reason for wishing to perpetuate the memory of his descent from 'Eber, which did not apply to the other descendants of that patriarch. Why might not one race of the descendants of 'Eber call themselves by pre-eminence sons of 'Eber, just as one race of the descendants of Abraham called themselves by pre-eminence sons of Abraham. But 'Eber, it is objected, is a name of no note in the history; we know nothing of him to entitle him to be selected as the person after whom a people should call themselves. But is our ignorance to be the measure of the knowledge of Abraham and his descendants on such a point? Because we know nothing to distinguish 'Eber, does it follow that they knew nothing? Certain it is that he was of sufficient importance to reflect a glory on his father Shem, whose highest designation is 'the father of all the children of 'Eber' (Gen. x. 21); and certain it is that his name lingered for many generations in the region where he resided, for it was as 'Eber' that the Mesopotamian prophet knew the descendants of Jacob, and spoke of them when they first made their appearance in warlike force on the borders of the promised land (Num. xxiv. 24). These considerations raise a strong presumption against the objection, to say the least.

Those who reject the derivation of Hebrew from 'Eber, prefer tracing עֵבֶר to the verb עָבַר, to pass over, or the noun עֵבֶר, the region or country beyond. By those who favour the former etymology, 'Hebrew' is regarded as equivalent to 'the man who passed over'; by those who favour the latter, it is taken to mean 'the man from the region beyond'; and under both suppositions it is held to be applied by the Canaanites to Abraham as having crossed the Euphrates or come from the region beyond the Euphrates to Canaan. Of these etymologies the former is now generally abandoned; it is felt that the supposition that the crossing of the Euphrates was such an unparalleled achievement as to fix on him who accomplished it a name that should descend to his posterity, and become a national appellation, is somewhat too violent to be maintained; and besides, as the verb עָבַר signifies, to pass from this side to that, not from that side to this, it would not be the term applied by the people of Canaan to designate the act of one who had come from the other side of the Euphrates to them. The other etymology has more in its favour. It is that sanctioned by the Greek translators (LXX. δ̄ περάτης, Aq. πεατήης); it is in accordance with the usage of the phrase עֵבֶר הַנָּהָר, which was employed to designate the region beyond the Euphrates (Josh. xxiv. 2, 3; 2 Sam. x. 16; 1 Chron. xix. 16); and it is not improbable that Abraham, coming among the Canaanites from beyond the Euphrates, might be designated by them 'the man from the region beyond,' just as we might call an American 'a transatlantic.' But though Bleek very confidently pronounces this view 'ohne zweifel das richtige' (Einleit. ins A. T., p. 72), it is open to some serious, we think fatal objections.

1. There is no instance of עֵבֶר by itself denoting the region beyond the Euphrates, or any other river; the phrase invariably used is עֵבֶר הַנָּהָר.*
2. If עֵבֶר was the proper designation of those who lived on the other side of the Euphrates, we should find that name applied to such as continued to dwell there, not to a race descended from one who had left that region never to return. 3. Though Abraham, as having been originally a transfluvian, might be so called by the Canaanites, it is improbable that they should have extended this name to his posterity, to whom it in no sense applied. No one would think of continuing the term 'transatlantic' to persons born in Britain, on the ground that a remote ancestor had come from across the Atlantic to settle in this country? As to the sanction which this etymology derives from the LXX., no great weight can be attached to that when we remember how often these translators have erred in this way; and also that they have given ἑσπαίους as the rendering of עֵבֶר in Num. xxiv. 24; 'Plus vice simpliciter hallucinati sunt interpretes Græci eorum ut nobis standum cadendumve non sit autoritate' (Carpzov, Crit. Sac. V. T., p. 171). We may add that the authority of the LXX. and Aquila on such a point is urged with a bad grace by those who treat with contempt the etymologies of the Hebrew text as resting on mere Jewish tradition; if a Jewish tradition of the time of Moses is subject to suspicion, à fortiori is one of the age of Ptolemy Lagi and of Alexandrian origin. Ewald pronounces this derivation 'quite uncertain' (ganz unsicher).

* Rosenmüller, following Hyde (Histor. Relig. Vet. Pers., p. 51), seeks to supply this desiderate instance by taking עֵבֶר as epexegetical of אֲשׁוּר in Num. xxiv. 24 = 'affligent Assyriam et totam transfluvialiem regionem.' But the learned writer has in his zeal overlooked the second עֵנָּה, which quite precludes his exegesis. Knobel avoids this error by simply taking אֲשׁוּר = Assyria, and עֵבֶר = Mesopotamia; but in this case it is the proper name עֵבֶר, 'Eber, and not the preposition עָבַר, trans, which is in question.

Parkhurst, whose works present occasionally suggestions worth consideration, has advanced the opinion that עֵבֶר is a derivation from the verb עָבַר in the sense of passing through, or from place to place (comp. Gen. xviii. 5; Exod. xxxii. 27; Ezek. xxxv. 7; 2 Chron. xxx. 10, etc.); so that its meaning would be a sojourner, or passer through, as distinct from a settler in the land. This undoubtedly exactly describes the condition of Abraham and his immediate descendants, and might very naturally be assumed by them as a designation; for, as the apostle says, 'they confessed they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth' (Heb. xi. 13). In this case the statement in Gen. x. 21, Num. xxiv. 24, must be understood as referring to the posterity of 'Eber generally, and not to the Hebrews specially or exclusively. The most serious objection to Parkhurst's suggestion arises from the form of the word עֵבֶר. A word from עָבַר, to convey the meaning of transitor, or one passing through, we should expect to find in the form עֹבֵר, or עָבַר.

On the whole the derivation of 'Ibri (Hebrew) from 'Eber seems to have most in its favour and least against it. (See on this side Augustin, *de Civit. HEBREW BIBLE, ancient various readings. [KERI and KETHIV; MIDRASH; TARGUM.]

HEBREW LANGUAGE. 1. Hebrew as a spoken Language.—The Hebrew language is that which was the national idiom of those descendants of 'Eber which received the distinctive name of the People of Israel, and, as such, was that in which all the books of the O. T. (with the exception of the few Chaldee passages occurring in those written after the Babylonian captivity) were originally composed. It belongs to the Semitic, or, as it is more appropriately called, the Syro-Arabian family of languages; and it occupies a central point amidst all the branches of this family, as well with reference to the geographical position of the country in which it prevailed, as with reference to the degree of development to which it attained. In point of antiquity, however, it is the oldest form of human speech known to us, and, from the early civilization, as well as from the religious advantages of the Hebrews, has preserved to us the oldest and purest form of the Syro-Arabian language.*

If we except the terms 'lip of Canaan' (שפת כנען) in Is. xix. 18—where the diction is of an elevated character, and is so far no evidence that this designation was the one commonly employed—the only name by which the Hebrew language is mentioned in the O. T. is 'Jewish' (יהודית), used adverbially, Judaic, in Jewish, 2 Kings xviii. 26, 28; Is. xxxvi. 11, 13; 2 Chron. xxxii. 18†), where the feminine may be explained as an abstract of the last formation, according to Ewald's Hebr. Gram. secs. 344, 457, or as referring to the usual gender of שפה understood. In a strict sense, however, 'Jewish' denotes the idiom of the kingdom of Judah, which became the predominant one after the deportation of the ten tribes. It is in the Greek writings of the later Jews that 'Hebrew' is first applied to the language, as in the ἐβραϊστί of the prologue to Ecclesiasticus and in the γλῶσσα τῶν Ἑβραίων of Josephus. (The ἐβραϊστί διαλέκτος of the N. T. is used in contradistinction to the idiom of the Hellenist Jews, and does not mean the ancient Hebrew language, but the then vernacular Aramaic dialect of Palestine.) Our title to use the designation Hebrew language is, therefore, founded on the fact that the nation which spoke this idiom was properly distinguished by the ethnographical name of Hebrews.

The best evidences which we possess as to the form of the Hebrew language, prior to its first historical period, tend to shew that Abraham, on his entrance into Canaan, found the language then prevailing among almost all the different tribes inhabiting that country to be in at least dialectual affinity with his own. This is gathered from the following facts: that nearly all the names of places and persons relating to those tribes admit of Hebrew etymologies; that, amidst all the accounts of the intercourse of the Hebrews with the nations of Canaan, we find no hint of a diversity of idiom; and that even the comparatively recent remains of the Phœnician and Punic languages bear a manifest affinity to the Hebrew. But whether the Hebrew language as seen in the earliest books of the O. T., is the very dialect which Abraham brought with him into Canaan; or whether it is the common tongue of the Canaanite nations, which Abraham only adopted from them, and which was afterwards developed to greater fulness under the peculiar moral and political influences to which his posterity were exposed, are questions which, in the absence of conclusive arguments, are generally discussed with some dogmatical prepossessions. Almost all those who support the first view contend also that Hebrew was the primitive language of mankind. S. Morinus, in the work above cited, and Löschner, in his De Causis Ling. Hebr., are among the best champions of this opinion; but Hävernick has recently advocated it, with such modifications as make it more acceptable (Einleit. in das Alte Test., l. i. p. 148, sq.) The principal argument on which they depend is that, as the most important proper names in the first part of Genesis (as Cain, Seth, and others) are evidently founded on Hebrew etymologies, the essential connection of these names with their etymological origins involves the historical credibility of the records themselves, and leaves no room for any other conclusion than that the Hebrew language is coeval with the earliest history of man. The advocates of the other opinion attach some weight to the cogency with which they infer, from the phenomena of the Hebrew language itself, that its roots were at one period biliteral, and were afterwards developed to the compass of three consonants. They also rest on the evidence which Gen. xxxi. 47 affords, that the near relatives of Abraham, residing too in the country from which he had recently emigrated, spoke Aramaic; and they think this warrants the conclusion that Aramaic must have been the vernacular dialect of Abraham himself. Lastly, Gesenius lays some stress on the circumstance that the language not only denotes west by ד, sea, but that it does not possess any other word to express that sense.

The history of the Hebrew language, as far as we can trace its course by the changes in the diction of the documents in which it is preserved, may be here conveniently divided into that of the period preceding, and that of the period succeeding, the Exile. If it be a matter of surprise that the thousand years which intervened between Moses and the Captivity should not have produced sufficient change in the language to warrant its history during that time being distributed into subordinate divisions, the following considerations may excuse this arrangement. It is one of the signal characteristics of the Hebrew language, as seen in all the books prior to the Exile, that notwithstanding the existence of some isolated, but important, archaisms, such as in the form of the pronoun, etc. (the best collection of which may be seen in Hävernick, l. c. p. 183, sq.), it preserves an unparalleled general uniformity of structure. The extent to which this uniformity prevails may be estimated either by the fact that it has furnished many modern scholars, who reason from the analogies discovered in the changes in other languages in a given period, with an argument to shew that the Pentateuch could not have been written at so remote a date as is generally believed (Gesenius, Gesch. der Hebr. Sprache, sec. 8); or, by the conclusion, à fortiori, which Hävernick, whose express object it is to vindicate its received antiquity, candidly concedes, that 'the books of Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah are the earliest in which the language differs sensibly from that in the historical portions of the Pentateuch' (Einleit. i. p. 180). We are here solely concerned with the fact that this uniformity of type exists. The general causes to which it is to be ascribed are to be sought in the genius of the language itself, as less susceptible of change; in the stationary civilization of the Hebrews during the period; and in their comparative isolation, as regarded nations of foreign language (see Ewald's Hebr. Gram. sec. 7). The particular causes depend on the age and author assigned to each book falling within this period, and involve questions utterly alien to the scope of this article.

* It may suffice here to refer generally to Ewald's Hebrew Grammar, secs. 1-18, 135-160, where the whole subject of this article is treated of.

† The passage in Neh. xiii. 24 is not included here, because, as will be seen below, it is a disputed point at what time the Hebrew language ceased to be a living tongue; and it depends on the decision of that question whether the 'Jewish' of Nehemiah means Hebrew or Aramaic.

In the canonical books belonging to the first period, the Hebrew language appears in a state of mature development. Although it still preserves the charms of freshness and simplicity, yet it has attained great regularity of formation, and such a precision of syntactical arrangement as ensures both energy and distinctness. Some common notions of its laxity and indefiniteness have no other foundation than the very inadequate scholarship of the persons who form them. A clearer insight into the organism of language absolutely, joined to such a study of the cognate Syro-Arabian idioms as would reveal the secret, but no less certain, laws of its syntactical coherence, would shew them to what degree the simplicity of Hebrew is compatible with grammatical precision.

One of the most remarkable features in the language of this period is the difference which distinguishes the diction of poetry from that of prose. This difference consists in the use of unusual words and flexions (many of which are considered to be Aramaisms or Archaisms, although in this case these terms are nearly identical), and in a harmonic arrangement of thoughts, as seen both in the parallelism of members in a single verse, and in the strophic order of longer portions; the delicate art of which Ewald has traced with pre-eminent success in his Poetische Bücher des Alt. Bundes, vol. i. [HEBREW POETRY, iii. 553.]

The Babylonian captivity is assigned as the commencement of that decline and corruption which mark the second period in the history of the Hebrew language; but the Assyrian deportation of the ten tribes, in the year B.C. 720, was probably the first means of bringing the Aramaic idiom into injurious proximity to it. The Exile, however, forms the epoch at which the language shews evident signs of that encroachment of the Aramaic on its integrity, which afterwards ended in its complete extinction. The diction of the different books of this period discovers various grades of this Aramaic influence, and in some cases approaches so nearly to the type of the first period, that it has been ascribed to mere imitation.

An interesting question has been raised as to the precise time at which the Hebrew ceased to be the living vernacular language of the Jews. Some learned men, among whom are Kimchi, Buxtorf, and Walton, maintain that the Jews entirely lost the living use of Hebrew during the Captivity. Others, as Pfeiffer and Löschner, argue that it is quite unreasonable, considering the duration and other circumstances of the Exile, to suppose that the Jews did not retain the partial use of their native tongue for some time after their return to Palestine, and lose it by slow degrees at last. The points on which the question chiefly turns, are the sense in which the words מִשְׁכָּן and יְהוּדִית, in Neh. viii. 8; xiii. 24, are to be taken; and Hengstenberg, in his Authentic des Daniel, p. 299, sq., and Gesenius, in his Gesch. d. Hebr. Sprache, sec. 13, are the best modern advocates of either view. But, on whichever side the truth may be here, it is certain that the language continued to be understood and used in writing by the educated, for some time after the Exile, as is evident from the date of the latest Biblical books; and it is found in the inscriptions on the coins of the Maccabees. No decisive evidence, however, shews at what exact time it became a virtually dead language; although there is every reason to conclude that, more than a century before the Christian era, it gave place altogether in writing, as before in speech, to that corrupt Aramaic dialect, which some have called the Syro-Chaldaic, and that it was thenceforth solely studied, as the language of the sacred books, by the learned.

The palæographical history of the Hebrew language requires a brief notice, at least as far as regards the results of modern inquiries. The earliest monuments of Hebrew writing which we possess are the genuine coins of the Maccabees, which date from the year B.C. 143. The character in which their inscriptions are expressed bears a very near resemblance to the Samaritan alphabet, and both are evidently derived from the Phœnician alphabet. The Talmud also, and Origen and Jerome, both attest the fact that an ancient Hebrew character had fallen into disuse; and, by stating that the Samaritans employed it, and by giving some descriptions of its form, they distinctly prove that the ancient character spoken of was essentially the same as that on the Hasmonæan coins. It is, therefore, considered to be established beyond a doubt that, before the Exile, the Hebrews used this ancient character (the Talmud even calls it the 'Hebrew'). At what period, however, the square Hebrew character of our printed books was first adopted, is a matter of some dispute. The Talmud, and Origen and Jerome, ascribe the change to Ezra; and those who, like Gesenius, admit this tradition to be true in a limited sense, reconcile it with the late use of the ancient letters on the coins, by appealing to the parallel use of the Kufic character on the Mohammedan coins, for several centuries after the Nischi was employed for writing; or, by supposing that the Maccabees had a mercantile interest in imitating the coinage of the Phœnicians. The other opinion is that, as the square Hebrew character has not, to all appearance, been developed directly out of the ancient stiff Phœnician type, but out of an alphabet bearing near affinity to that found in the Palmyrene inscriptions, a combination of this palæographical fact with the intercourse which took place between the Jews and the Syrians under the Seleucids, renders it probable that the square character was first adopted at some inconsiderable but undefinable time before the Christian era. Either of these theories is compatible with the supposition that the square character underwent many successive modifications in the next centuries, before it attained its full caligraphical perfection. The passage in Matt. v. 18 is considered to prove that the copies of the law were already written in the square character, as the jod of the ancient alphabet is as large a letter as the aleph; and the Talmud and Jerome speak as if the Hebrew MSS. of the O. T. were, in their time, already provided with the final letters, the Taggin, the point on the broken horizontal stroke of ף, and other calligraphical minutiae.*

The origin of the vowel-points is to be ascribed to the effort which the Jewish learned men made to preserve the pronunciation of their sacred language, at a time when its extinction as a living tongue endangered the loss of the traditional memory of its sound. Every kind of evidence renders it probable that these signs for the pronunciation were first introduced about the seventh century of the Christian era, that is, after the completion of the Talmud, and that the minute and complex system which we possess was gradually developed, from a few indispensable signs, to its present elaborateness. The existence of the present complete system can, however, be traced back to the eleventh century. The skilful investigation of Hupfeld (in the Studien und Kritiken for 1830) has proved that the vowel-points were unknown to Jerome and the Talmud; but, as far as regards the former, we are able to make a high estimate of the degree to which the traditional pronunciation, prior to the use of the points, accorded with our Masoretic signs: for Jerome describes a pronunciation which agrees wonderfully well with our vocalisation. We are thus called on to avail ourselves thankfully of the Masoretic punctuation, on the double ground that it represents the Jewish traditional pronunciation, and that the Hebrew language, unless when read according to its laws, does not enter into its full dialectal harmony with its Syro-Arabian sisters.—J. N.

[In the N. T. the expression 'Hebrew tongue' (Ἑβραϊστὴ, ἡ Ἑβραϊσὶς διὰλεκτος, John v. 2; xix. 20; Acts xxi. 40; xx. 2, etc.) is used to designate the Syro-Chaldaic dialect of the people of Palestine at the commencement of the Christian era.]

2. History of Hebrew Learning.—It is not till the closing part of the 9th century that we find, even among the Jews themselves, any attempts at the formal study of their ancient tongue. In the Talmudic writings, indeed, grammatical remarks frequently occur, and of these some indicate an acute and accurate perception of the usages of the language; but they are introduced incidentally, and are to be traced rather to a sort of living sense of the language than to any scientific study of its structure or laws. What the Jews of the Talmudic period knew themselves of the Hebrew they communicated to Origen and Jerome, both of whom devoted themselves with much zeal to the study of that language, and the latter of whom especially became proficient in all that his masters could teach him concerning both its vocabulary and its grammar (Euseb. Hist. Eccles.; Hieron. Adv. Rufin. i. p. 363; Epist. ad Damas. Praef. ad Job. ad Paralipom., etc.; Carpzov, Crit. Sac. vi. sec. 2). As represented by Jerome the Church was quite on a par with the synagogue in acquaintance with the language of the ancient Scriptures; but how imperfect that was in many respects may be seen from the strange etymologies, which even Jerome adduces as explanatory of words, and from his statement that from the want of vowels in Hebrew 'the Jews pronounce the same words with different sounds and accents, pro voluntate lectorum ac varietate regionum' (Ep. ad Evangelum).

Stimulated by the example of the Arabians, the Jews began towards the end of the 9th century to bestow careful study on the grammar of their ancient tongue; and with this advantage over the Arabian grammarians, that they did not, like them, confine their attention to one language, but took into account the whole of the Semitic tongues. An African Jew, Jehuda ben Qarish, who lived about A.D. 880, led the way in this direction; but it was reserved for Saadia ben Joseph of Fayum, Gaon (or spiritual head) of the Jews at Sora in Babylonia, and who died A.D. 942, to compose the first formal treatise on points of Hebrew grammar and philology. To him we are indebted for the Arabic version of the O. T., of which portions are still extant [ARABIC VERSIONS]; and though his other works, his commentaries on the O. T., and his grammatical works, have not come down to us, we know of their existence from, and have still some of their contents in, the citations of later writers. He was followed by R. Jehuda b. David Chajug, a native of Fez, who flourished in the 11th century, whose services have procured for him the honourable designation of 'chief of grammarians' [CHAJUG]. From him the succession of Jewish grammarians embraces the following names [for details see separate articles]. R. Salomo Isaaki, (רש"י Rashi) a native of Troyes in France, d. ab. 1105; Abu'l Walid Mervan ibn Ganach, a physician at Cordova, d. 1120; Moses Gikatilla, ab. 1100; Ibn Esra, d. 1194; the Kimchis, especially Moses and David, who flourished in the 13th century; Isaak b. Mose (Ephodæus, so called from the title of his work מִצְחָה אִפְחָדָּא); Solomon Jarchi wrote a grammar, in which he sets forth the seven conjugations of verbs as now usually given; Abraham de Balmes de Lecci; and Elias Levita (1472-1549). The earliest efforts in Hebrew lexicography with which we are acquainted is the little work of Saadia Gaon, in which he explains seventy Hebrew words; a codex containing this is in the Bodleian library at Oxford, from which it has been printed by Dukes in the Zeitschrift für die Kunde des Morgenlandes, Bd. 5, Hft. 1, p. 115, ff. In the same codex is another small lexicographical work by Jehuda b. Qarish, in which Hebrew words are explained from the Talmud, the Arabic, and other languages; excerpts from this are given in Eichhorn's Biblioth. der Bibl. Litt. iii. 951-980. More copious works are those of Ben Ganach, where the Hebrew words are explained in Arabic,

* Some have attempted to find, in the discrepancies between the Septuagint and the Hebrew text, the basis for discovering in what character the MSS. from which they translated must have been written, by trying to reduce these discrepancies to mistakes of one letter for another. Eichhorn favours the notion that the Septuagint was made from MSS. in the Samaritan character; while Gesenius decides that the letters which are interchanged are only alike in the square character. The decision of this question would in some degree affect the view entertained of the antiquity of the square character. The latest author on this subject, however, Frankel, asserts that the evidence does not preponderate on either side (Vorstudien zu der Septuaginta, 1841, p. 213).

of R. Menahem ibn Saruk, whose work has been printed with an English translation by Herschell Philipowski, Lond. 1854; of R. Salomo Parchon (ab. 1160), specimens of whose work have been given by De-Rossi in his collection of Various Readings, and in a separate work entitled Lexicon Heb. select. quo ex antiquo et inedito R. Parchonis Lexico novas et diversas rariorum et difficiliorum vocum significaciones sistit, J. B. De-Rossi, Parm. 1805; of David Kimchi in the second part of his Michlol, entitled ספר השו"ס (often printed; best edition by Bienthal and Leberecht, 2 vols., Berl. 1838-47); and of Elias Levita (Tishbi, Bas. 1527, and with a Latin translation by Fagius, 4to, 1541). The Concordance of Isaac Nathan (1437) also belongs to this period.

The study of the Hebrew language among Christians, which had only casually and at intervals occupied the attention of ecclesiastics during the middle ages, received an impulse from the revived interest in Biblical exegesis produced by the Reformation. Something had been done to facilitate the study of Oriental literature, and to call attention to it by the MSS., Hebrew and Arabic, which the Emperor Frederic II. brought into Europe after the fourth crusade in 1228 (Cuspinian, de Caesaribus, p. 419; Boxhorn, Hist. Univ., p. 779); and a few men such as Raymund Martini, a native of Catalonia (b. 1236), Paulus Bugensis, Libertas Cominetus, who is said to have known and used fourteen languages, etc., appeared as lights in the otherwise beclouded firmament of Biblical learning. But it was not until the beginning of the 16th century that any general interest was awakened in the Christian church for the study of Hebrew literature. In 1506 appeared the grammar and lexicon of Reuchlin, which may be regarded as the first successful attempt to open the gate of Hebrew learning to the Christian world; for though the work of Conrad Pellican, De Modo legendi et intelligendi Hebraea, Bas. 1503, had the precedence in point of time, it was too imperfect to exert much influence in favour of Hebrew studies. A few years later Santes Pagnini, a Dominican of Lucca issued his Institutionum Hebraicarum Lib. ii., Lyon 1526; and his Thesaurus Ling. Sanct., lb. 1529; but the former of these works is inferior to the Grammar of Reuchlin, and the latter is a mere collection of excerpts from David Kimchi's Book of Roots, often erroneously understood. No name of any importance occurs in the history of Hebrew philology after this till we come to those of Sebastian Munster, and the Buxtorfs. The former translated the grammatical works of Elias Levita, and from these chiefly he constructed his own Dictionarium Hebr., adj. Chald. vocabulis, Bas. 1523; and his Opus Grammaticum ex variis Elian's libris concinnatum, Bas. 1542. The latter rendered most important service to the cause of Hebrew learning. [BUXTORF.] The grammars and lexicons of the older Buxtorf were for many years the principal helps to the study of Hebrew in the Christian Church, and one of them, his Lexicon Chald. Talmud. et Rabbinicum, Bas. 1640, is still indispensable to the student who would thoroughly explore the Hebrew language and literature. The names also of Förster and Schindler may be mentioned as marking an epoch in the history of these studies. Previous to them scholars had followed almost slavishly in the track of rabbinical teaching.

By them, however, an attempt was made to gather materials from a wider field. Förster in his Dict. Heb. Nov., Bas. 1557, sought to determine the meaning of the words from the comparison of the different passages of Scripture in which they occur, and of allied words, words having two consonants in common, or two consonants of the same organ. Schindler added to this the comparison of different Shemitic dialects for the illustration of the Hebrew, in his Lex. Pentaglotton, Han. 1612. The example thus set was carried forward by Sain. Bohle, a Rostock professor (Dissert. pro formali Signif. S. S. eruenda, 1637); though by his fondness for metaphysical methods and conceits, he was often betrayed into mere trifling; by Christian Nolde, professor at Copenhagen (Concordant. particularum Hebrae. Chald. V. T., Ham. 1679); by Joh. Cocceius (Coch), professor at Leyden (Lex. et Comment. serm. Hebr., Lond. 1669); by Castell (Lex. Heptaglot., Lond. 1669); by De Dieu in his commentaries on the O. T.; and by Hottinger in his Etymologicum Orient. sive Lex. harmonicum heptaglot., Frank. 1661. Sol. Glass also in his Philologia Sacra, 1636, rendered important service to Hebrew learning and O. T. exegesis. [See the articles under these names.]

Meanwhile a new school of Hebrew philology had arisen under the leading of Jakob Alting and Johann Andr. Danz. The former in his Fundamenta punctationis linguae sanctae sive Grammat. Heb., Grön. 1654; and the latter in his Nucifragibulum, Jena 1686, and other works, endeavoured to shew that the phenomena which the Hebrew exhibited in a grammatical respect, the flexions, etc., had their basis in essential properties of the language, and could be rationally evolved from principles. Peculiar to them is the 'systema morarum,' a highly artificial method of determining the placing of long or short vowels, according to the number of more appertaining to each or to the consonant following, a method which led to endless niceties, and no small amount of learned trifling. The fundamental principle, however, which Alting and Danz asserted is a true one, and their assertion of it was not without fruits. Nearly contemporary with them was Jacques Gousset, professor at Gröningen, who devoted much time and labour to the preparation of a work entitled Commentarii Ling. Heb., Amst. 1702, in which he follows strictly the method of deducing the meanings of the Hebrew words from the Hebrew itself, rejecting all aid from Rabbin, Versions, or Dialects. The chief merit of Gousset and his followers, of whom the principal is Chr. Stock (Clavis Ling. Sanct. V. et N. T. Lips. 1725), consists in the close attention they paid to the usus loquendi of Scripture, and Hävernick thinks that adequate justice has not been done to Gousset's services in this respect (Introd. to O. T., p. 221, E. Tr.)

Hitherto not much attention had been paid to etymology as a source for determining the meaning of Hebrew words. This defect was in part remedied by Caspar Neumann and Valentin Loescher; the former of whom in different treatises, the latter in his treatise De Causis Ling. Heb., Frank. and Leips. 1706, set forth the principle that the Hebrew roots are bilitera, that these are the 'characteres significationis' as Neumann called them, or the 'semina vocum,' as they were designated by Loescher, and that from them the triliterals, of which the Hebrew is chiefly composed, were formed. They contended also that the fundamental meaning of the biliterals is to be ascertained from the meaning of the letters composing each; and for this purpose they assigned to each letter what the former called 'significatio hieroglyphica,' and the latter 'valor logicus.' This last is the most dubious part of their system; but as a whole their views are worthy of respect and consideration (see Hupfeld, De emendanda lexicog. Semit. ratione, p. 3).

A great advance was made in the beginning of the 18th century by the rise almost simultaneously of two rival schools of Hebrew philology; the Dutch school, headed by Albert Schultens, and the school of Halle, founded by the Michaelis family. In the former the predominating tendency was towards the almost exclusive use of the Arabic for the illustration of Hebrew grammar and lexicography. Schultens himself was a thorough Arabic scholar, and he carried his principle of appealing to that source for the elucidation of the Hebrew to an extent which betrayed him into many mistakes and extravagances; nevertheless, to his labours Hebrew philology owes an imperishable debt of obligation. Besides his commentaries on Job and Proverbs, which are full of grammatical and lexicographical disquisition, he wrote Origines Hebrææ seu Heb. Ling. antiquissima natura et indoles ex Arabiæ penetrabilibus revocata, Francf. 1723; and Institutiones ad fundamenta Ling. Heb., Leyd. 1737. To this school belongs Schröder, professor at Groningen, who published in 1776 a Hebrew grammar of great excellence, and which has passed through many editions, under the same title as the second of the works of Schultens above noted; and Robertson, professor at Edinburgh (Grammatica Hebr., Edin. 1783, sec. ed.) Both these works excel that of Schultens in clearness and simplicity; and in neither is the Arabic theory so exclusively adhered to. Venema, as a commentator, was also one of the luminaries of this school.

The school of Halle was founded by John Henry and Christian Benedict Michaelis; but its principal ornament in its earlier stage was the son of the latter, John David, professor at Göttingen [MICHAELIS]. The principle of this school was to combine the use of all the sources of elucidation for the Hebrew—the cognate dialects, especially the Aramaic, the versions, the rabbinical writings, etymology, and the Hebrew itself as exhibited in the sacred writings. The valuable edition of the Hebrew Bible, with exegetical notes, the conjoint work of John Henry and Christ. Benedict, some grammatical essays by the latter, and the Hebräische Grammatik (Halle 1744), the Supplementa ad lexica Hebr. (6 parts, Gött. 1785-92), and several smaller essays of John David, comprise the principal contributions of this illustrious family to Hebrew learning. To their school belong the majority of more recent German Hebraists—Moser (Lex. Man. Heb. et Chald., Ulm 1795), Vater (Heb. Sprachlehre, Leipz. 1797), Hartmann (Anfangsgründe der Heb. Sprache, Marb. 1798), Jahn (Grammatica Ling. Heb., 1809), and the facile princeps of the whole, Gesenius (Hebr. Deutsches Hdwörterbuch, 2 vols. Leipz. 1810-12; Heb. Grammatik, 1813; 18th ed. by Rödiger, 1857; Geschichte der Heb. Spr. und Schrift, 1815; Ausführliches Gram.-Krit. Lehrgebäude der Heb. Spr., 1817; Lexicon Manuale, 1833, 1847; Thesaurus Phil. Crit. Ling.

Hebr. et Chald., 3 tom. 4to, 1835-1858). [GESENIUS.] Gesenius has been followed closely by Moses Stuart in his Grammar of the Hebr. Language, of which many editions have appeared. Under the Halle school may be also ranked Joh. Simonis (Onomast. Vet. Test., Halle 1741; Lexicon Man. Heb. et Chald., 1756; re-edited by Eichhorn in 1793, and with valuable improvements by Winer in 1828); but though a pupil of Michaelis, Simonis shews a strong leaning towards the school of Schultens.

Among recent Hebraists the names of Lee (Grammar of the Heb. Lang. in a series of Lectures, Lond. 3d edit. 1844; Lexicon Heb. Chald. and Engl., 1840), Ewald (Krit. Gramm. der Heb. Spr. Ausführlich bearbeitet, Leipz. 1827; 6th ed. 1855, under the title of Ausführliches Lehrb. der Heb. Spr. des A. B.), and Hupfeld (Exercitationes Adhæpica, 1825; De emend. Lexicogr. Sem. ratione Comment., 1827; Ueber Theorie d. Heb. Gr. in the Theol. Studien und Kritiken for 1828; Ausf. Hebr. Gram., 1841), are the most prominent. Each of these pursues an independent course; but all of them incline more or less to the school of Altling and Danz. Lee avows that the aim of his grammatical investigations is to 'study the language as it is, that is, as its own analogy collected from itself and its cognate dialects exhibits it' (Grammar, Pref. p. iv., new edition, 1844). Ewald has combined with his philosophical analysis of the language, as it exists in its own documents, a more extended use of the cognate dialects; he contends that, to do justice to the Hebrew, one must first be at home in all the branches of Shemitic literature, and that it is by combining these with the old Hebrew that the latter is to be called from the dead, and piece by piece endowed with life (Grammatik, Vor. p. ix.) Hupfeld's method is eclectic, and does not differ from that of Gesenius, except that it assigns a larger influence to the philosophic element, and aims more at basing the grammar of the language on first principles analytically determined; by him also the Japhetic languages have been called in to cast light on the Shemitic, a course to which Gesenius too, after formally repudiating it, came in his later works to incline.

Among the Jews the study of Hebrew literature has been much fettered by rabbinical and traditional prejudices. Many able grammarians, however, of this school have appeared since the beginning of the 16th century, among whom the names of the brothers David and Moses Provençale, Lonzano Norzi, Ben Melech, Süsskind, and Lombroso, are especially to be mentioned. A more liberal impulse was communicated by Solomon Cohen (1709-62); but Mendelsohn was the first to introduce the results and methods of Christian research among his nation. Fürst (Lehrgeb. d. Aram. Idiome mit bezug auf die Indo-Germ. Spr. I. Chald. Gram., 1835; Charuz Peninim, 1836; Concordantie Libr. Vet. Test., 1840; Hebr. und Chald. Hdwörterbuch üb. d. A. T., 2 vols. 1857) seeks to combine the historical with the analytical method, taking note of all the phenomena of the Hebrew itself, illustrating these from the cognate tongues, and those of the Indo-Germanic class, and at the same time endeavouring on philosophic grounds to separate the accidental from the necessary, the radical from the ramified, the germ from the stem, the stem from the branches, so as to arrive at the laws which actually rule the language. All his works are of the highest value. Mr. Hurwitz, a Jew resident in London, has published an excellent Hebrew Grammar in two parts, Lond. 1835. Worthy of notice also is the Grammar of Isaac Nordheimer, a German Jew who spent his later years in the United States, where he died, in 1842, in his thirty-fourth year. His Grammar is in 2 vols. 8vo, New York, 1838-42 (Wolf, Biblioth. Hebr. 1715-53; Löscher, de Causis Ling. Ebr., libb. iii. 1706; Hezel, Gesch. der Heb. Spr. und Litter., 1776; Gesenius, Gesch. der Heb. Spr., 1815; Delitzsch, Jeshurun, Isagoge in Gramm. & Lexicogr. ling. Heb., 1838; Fürst, *Biblioth. HEBREW OF THE HEBREWS (Ἑβραῖος δὲ Ἑβραίων, Phil. iii. 5), emphatically a Hebrew, one who was so by both parents, and that by a long series of ancestors, without admixture of Gentile or even proselyte blood. Of this the Jews were as proud as were those Christians in Spain, who called themselves Old Christians, of having no mixture of Moorish blood.—J. K.

HEBREWS, EPISTLE TO THE. In the received text this composition appears as part of the Canonical Scriptures of the N. T., and also as the production of the apostle Paul. For neither of these assumptions is the evidence allowed on all hands to be conclusive; and hence the greatest diversity of opinion prevails among critics as to the claims of this epistle, some contending for its canonical authority and Pauline origin, some denying both of these, and some admitting the former, whilst they repudiate the latter. We shall consider—

1. Its Canonicity.—In the Western Church this book underwent a somewhat singular fate. Received and quoted by Clement of Rome, it seems after his time to have come under some doubt or suspicion in the West. It is not cited or referred to by any of the earlier Latin Fathers, except Tertullian, who ascribes it to Barnabas, and says it was 'receptor apud ecclesias illo apocrypho pastore moschorum,' that is, the Pastor of Hermas (De Pudicit. c. 20). Irenæus is said by Eusebius to have made quotations from it in a work now lost (Hist. Eccl. v. 26); but he did not receive it as of Pauline authorship (Phot. Biblioth. Cod., 252, p. 904, cited by Lardner, ii. 165), and as Eusebius connects the Wisdom of Solomon with the Epistle to the Hebrews, as cited by Irenæus, it is probable the latter viewed the two as on the same footing. It is omitted by Caius, who only reckons thirteen Pauline epistles (Euseb. H. E. vi. 26; Hieron. De Vir. illust. c. 59); Hippolytus expressly declared it not to be St. Paul's (Phot., p. 301); it is omitted in the Muratori fragment; and by the Roman Church generally it seems to have been suspected (Euseb. H. E. iii. 3; vi. 20). Victorinus has one or two passages which look like quotations from it, but he does not mention it, and certainly did not receive it as the work of St. Paul (Lardner, iii. 300). In the 4th century it began to be more generally received. Lactantius, in the beginning of the century, apparently borrows from it; Hilary of Poitiers, Lucifer of Cagliari, Faustinus, and Marcellinus (who cites it as divina Scriptura); Victorinus of Rome, Ambrose, Philaster (though admitting that some rejected the epistle); Gaudentius, Jerome, and Augustine, in the latter

In the Eastern churches it was much more generally, and from an earlier date, received. It is doubtful whether any citation from it is made by Justin Martyr, though in one or two passages of his writings he seems to have had it in his eye. Clement of Alexandria held it to be St. Paul's, originally written by him in Hebrew, and translated by St. Luke (Euseb. H. E. vi. 14). Origen wrote Homilies on this epistle; he frequently refers to it as canonical, and as the work of St. Paul, and he tells us he had intended to write a treatise to prove this (Lardner, ii. 472, ff.) Origen further attests that the ancients handed it down as St. Paul's (Euseb. H. E. vi. 25), by which, though he cannot be understood as intending to say that it had never been questioned by any of those who had lived before him, we must understand him at least to affirm that in the church of Alexandria it had from the earliest period been received. Dionysius of Alexandria acknowledged it as part of sacred Scripture, and as written by St. Paul. By Basil, the Gregories, Theodore of Mopsuestia, Chrysostom, and all the Greeks, as Jerome attests, it was received. Eusebius, though he ranks it in one place among the ἀποκρυφόμενα, in deference to the doubts entertained respecting it in the Roman Church, nevertheless asserts its apostolic authority, and includes it among the books generally received by the churches. In public documents of the Eastern Church also, such as the Epistle of the Synod at Antioch, the Apostolical Constitutions, the Catalogue of the Council, its claims are recognised. In the Syrian churches it was received; it is found in the Peshito version; it is quoted by Ephrem as St. Paul's; and it is included among the canonical Scriptures in the catalogue of Ebedjesu (Lardner, iv. 430, 440). To this uniform testimony there is nothing to oppose, unless we accept the somewhat dubious assertion of Jerome that it was rejected by the heretical teacher Basilides (Proem. in Ep. ad Tit., but comp. Lardner, ix. 305).

2. Authorship.—From the above testimonies it will be perceived that the assertion of the canonicity of this book is mostly identified with the assertion of its Pauline authorship. The former of these positions does not, it is true, necessarily depend upon the latter, for a book may be canonical yet not be the production of any individual whose name we know; but as the case stands, the external evidence for the canonicity of the book is so nearly commensurate with that for the Pauline authorship of the book, that we cannot make use of the one unless we admit the other. This gives immense importance to the question on which we now enter; for if it could be shewn that this epistle is not Paul's, the entire historical evidence for its canonicity must be laid aside as incredible.

Before entering on the consideration of the evidence bearing directly on this point, we shall glance at the different hypotheses which have been advanced by those by whom the Pauline origin of the epistle have been derived. Of these some have advocated the claims of Barnabas, others those of Luke, others those of Clement of Rome, others those of Silas, others those of Apollos, others those of some unknown Christian of Alexandria, and others those of some 'apostolic man,' whose name is no less unknown.

(1.) Silas.—The claims of this companion of St. Paul to the authorship of one epistle find no support from the testimony of antiquity. The suggestion of them is entirely modern, having been first advanced by Böhme in the introduction to his commentary on this epistle (Lips. 1825), and by Mynster in the Studien und Kritiken, bd. ii., s. 344; but they have adduced nothing in support of these claims which might not with equal plausibility have been urged on behalf of any other of the apostle's companions.

(2.) Clement of Rome.—Origen tells us that the tradition which had reached him was, that some held this epistle to have been written by Clement, bishop of Rome, whilst others said it was written by Luke, the evangelist (ap. Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 25). Erasmus espoused the claims of Clement, and Calvin inclined to the same view. Some evidence in favour of this hypothesis has been thought to be supplied by the resemblance of some passages in Clement's first epistle to the Corinthians to passages in one epistle; but these have much more the appearance of quotations from the former or reminiscences of it on the part of the author of the latter than such similarities of thought and expression as would indicate a community of authorship for the two. A close comparison of the one with the other leaves the impression very strongly that they are the productions of different minds; neither in style nor in the general cast of thought is there any pervading affinity between them. Clement, also, was in all probability a convert from heathenism, whereas the author of the epistle to the Hebrews was undoubtedly by birth and education a Jew. Perhaps what Origen records means nothing more than that Clement or Luke acted as the party who reduced the epistle to writing, leaving the question of the authorship, properly so called, untouched. His whole statement is—'not heedlessly (οὐκ εὐκρίν) had the ancients handed it down as Paul's; but who wrote the epistle God truly knows. But the story which has come down to us from some, is, that Clement who was bishop of Rome wrote the epistle; from others that it was Luke who wrote the Gospel and the Acts.' Jerome, also, in referring to the tradition explains it thus—'quem [Clementem] aiunt ipsi adiunctum sententias Pauli proprio ordinasse et ornasse sermone' (De Viris illust. c. 5).

(3.) Luke.—The claims of Luke apparently rise a degree higher from the circumstance that, besides being named by Origen and Jerome, as dividing with Clement the honours which, as these writers testify, were in certain quarters assigned to the latter, there is a character of similarity in respect of language and style between this epistle and the acknowledged productions of the evangelist. This has led several eminent scholars to adopt the hypothesis that, whilst the thoughts may be Paul's, the composition is Luke's. But on this circumstance no stress, we think, can legitimately be laid towards such a conclusion. For, 1st, where there is no other evidence, or at least none of any weight, in favour of identity of authorship, mere general similarity of style cannot be allowed to possess much force. 2dly, Assuming the epistle to be the production of Paul, it is easy to account for the resemblance of its style to that of Luke, from the fact that Luke was for so many years the companion and disciple of Paul; for it is well known that when persons for a long time associate closely with each other, and especially when one of the parties is an individual of powerful intellect whose forms of thought and modes of speech imperceptibly impress themselves on those with whom he associates, they fall insensibly into a similarity of tone and style both of speaking and writing. To this, indeed, Chrysostom, whose authority in all such matters must be allowed to stand very high, expressly ascribes the similarity of Luke's style to that of Paul, when, contrasting the language of the former with that of Mark, he says, ἕκαστος δὲ ὁμοίως τὸν διδάσκαλον ἐμιμήσατο. ὁ μὲν [ὁ Λουκᾶς] τὸν Παῦλον ὑπὲρ τοὺς ποταμοὺς ῥέοντα· ὁ δὲ [ὁ Μάρκος] τὸν Πέτρον βραχυλογίας ἐπιμελούμενον (Hom. iv. in Matt., quoted by Forster, Apostolical Authority of the Epistle to the Hebrews, p. 648). 3dly, It is not in the epistle to the Hebrews alone that a resemblance to the style of Luke may be detected: the same feature pervades all Paul's epistles, especially those of a later date, as has been frequently observed by critics. This argument, then, if used against the Pauline origin of the epistle to the Hebrews would prove too much, as it would go to invalidate the claims of almost all the acknowledged writings of the apostle. In fine, whilst there are such resemblances of style, etc., as have been referred to between this epistle and the writings of Luke, there are differences of a nature so weighty as completely to overbalance these resemblances, and authorise the conclusion that the author of the latter could not also be the author of the former. Both Stuart (Comment. vol. i. p. 333, Lond. 1828) and Eichhorn (Einleit. bd. iii. s. 465) justly lay stress on the greater predominance of Jewish feelings in the Epistle to the Hebrews than in any of Luke's writings, and still more on the marked familiarity with the peculiarities of the Jewish schools displayed by the writer of the epistle, but of which no traces are apparent in any of the writings of the evangelist. Both writings display the combined influence of the Palestinian and the Hellenistic character on the part of their author; but in the Epistle to the Hebrews the former so decidedly predominates over the latter, whilst the reverse is the case with the writings of Luke, that it seems to the last degree improbable that the same person could have written both. Luke, moreover, was a convert from heathenism; whereas the author of the epistle to the Hebrews was evidently a Jew. It appears, therefore, that for the theory which ascribes the composition of this epistle to Luke, there is no evidence of any kind which will bear examination, but, on the contrary, not a little against it.

(4.) Barnabas.—The hypothesis which claims the authorship of this epistle for Barnabas has in its support the testimony of Tertullian (De Pudicitia, c. 20), with whom, as we learn from Jerome (Epist. 129, ad Dardanum), several (plerique) among the Latins concurred.* For this opinion Tertullian,

* Ullmann (Stud. und Krit. i. 391) and Wieseler have laboured to show that the 'plerique' in this passage must be understood of persons belonging to the Eastern church, the 'Græci sermonis scriptores,' of whom Jerome speaks in the same sentence. But what Jerome says is, that though in his day 'plerique eam vel Barnabæ vel Clementis arbitrantur,' it was viewed as Paul's 'non solum ab ecclesiis Orientis, sed ab omnibus retro [i. e.]

in the passage referred to, assigns no reasons, and Jerome appears to have treated it as a mere conjecture resting upon Tertullian's authority alone; for, in his catalogue of ecclesiastical writers (c. 5), he refers to this opinion as one 'juxta Tertullianum,' whilst he says that the opinion that Luke was the author was one 'juxta quosdam.' Hug is of opinion (Introd. p. 596, Fosdick's transl.), that in this passage we have not Tertullian's own view so much as a concession on his part to those whom he was opposing, and who, because of the very passage he is about to quote from the Epistle to the Hebrews (vi. 4-8), were inclined to reject the claims of that epistle to be esteemed the production of Paul. This conjecture is of use, as it tends to show that Tertullian might have another reason for ascribing this epistle to Barnabas than his total ignorance that it had ever been imputed to Paul, as has been confidently inferred by several writers from the fact that it was obviously to the interest of his argument to uphold the Pauline origin of this epistle had he been aware of it. In recent times the ablest defender of this hypothesis is Ullmann, who has devoted to it an article in the first volume of his journal, the Studien und Kritiken; but the evidence he adduces in favour of it is very feeble. After enlarging on the testimony of Tertullian, he proceeds to the internal evidence in favour of Barnabas; but of the six reasons he assigns for ascribing the epistle to him, none possesses any force. The first, viz., the traces in the epistle of an Alexandrian education on the part of the author, supposing it granted, would not apply particularly to Barnabas, who was a native of Cyprus, and who, though Ullmann says 'he had perhaps been in Alexandria,' for aught we know had never seen that seat of allegorical learning. The second, viz., that Barnabas being a Levite was the more likely, on that account, to understand the Jewish ritual, as we see the author of this epistle did, is of no weight, for there is nothing stated in the epistle on that head which any intelligent Jew might not have known, whether a Levite or not. The third, viz., that what the author of this epistle says concerning the law, divine revelation, faith, etc., is very Pauline, and such as we might expect from a companion of Paul, such as Barnabas was; the fourth, viz., that the tenor of the epistle is worthy such a man as Barnabas; the fifth, viz., that the writer of this epistle speaks of the Saviour very frequently by the appellation $\delta \text{ } \text{I}\eta\sigma\omega\upsilon\varsigma$, which Dr. Ullmann thinks indicates that the writer must have known our Lord during his personal ministry, which was probably the case with Barnabas; and the sixth, viz., that the names of persons mentioned in this epistle are names which Barnabas might have referred to had he written it—are reasons such as it would be idle to refute, and such as fill us with surprise that a man of Ullmann's learning and vigour should have gravely adduced them. With regard to the fifth also, Olshausen has justly observed (Opusc. Theologica, p. 115) that if it were certain that Barnabas had enjoyed the advantage of our Lord's personal ministry, it would clearly prove that he was not the author of this epistle, for the latter distinctly classes himself with those by whom this advantage had not been enjoyed (ch. ii. 3). Stuart and some others have laid great stress on the contrast afforded by this epistle to the extant epistle which passes under the name of Barnabas, in respect of style, tone, and general character, as supplying indubitable evidence that the former is the production of a different and a far superior mind. Of this there can be no question, and, were we quite certain that the epistle ascribed to Barnabas was really his production, the argument would be conclusive. But though some very distinguished names may be cited in support of its authenticity, the greater weight, both of authority and evidence, is against it [BARNABAS, EPISTLE OF]. The total absence of any reason in favour of imputing the authorship of the Epistle to the Hebrews to Barnabas affords sufficient ground for rejecting this hypothesis without our attempting to adduce dubious and uncertain reasons against it.

(5.) Some Alexandrian Christian.—This hypothesis rests on certain features of the epistle which are said to betray Alexandrian culture, habits, and modes of thought on the part of the writer. These have been much insisted upon by Eichhorn, Schulz, Bleek, and others; but they are not such, we think, as carry with them the weight which these writers have allowed to them. The standard of comparison by which the supposed Alexandrian tone of this epistle is evinced, is supplied by the writings of Philo, between which and this epistle it is affirmed that there is so close a resemblance that it can be accounted for only on the supposition that the author of the latter was, like Philo, an Alexandrian Jew. Now before this reasoning can be so much as looked at, it behoves those who use it to point out clearly how much of Philo's peculiar style and sentiment was owing to his Jewish, and how much to his Alexandrian, education or habits of thought; because, unless this can be done, it will be impossible to show that any alleged peculiarity necessarily bespeaks an Alexandrian origin, and could not possibly have appeared in the writings of a pure Jew of Palestine. No attempt, however, of this sort has been made; on the contrary, it has been assumed that whatever is Philonian is therefore Alexandrian, and hence all resemblances between the writings of Philo and the Epistle to the Hebrews have been urged as certain proofs that the latter must have been written by a converted Jew of Alexandria. Such an assumption, however, we would by no means concede; and we feel confirmed in this by an examination of the evidence adduced in support of the alleged Alexandrian character of this epistle. As Stuart has, we think, clearly shown (i. 321), and as even Tholuck, though obviously inclining the other way, has candidly admitted (Comment. on the Hebrews, i. p. 68, sec. 7), there is nothing in this evidence to shew that this epistle might not have been written by a Jew who had never left the bounds of Palestine. It is worthy of notice that several of the points on which Eichhorn chiefly insists as favouring his view, such as the prevalence of typical expositions of the Mosaic ritual in this epistle, and the greater elegance of its language and style (Einleit. iii. 443, ff.), are given up by Bleek, and that of the two chiefly insisted upon by the latter, viz., the close affinity between this epistle and the writings of Philo, and the alleged mistake in regard to the furniture of the tabernacle which Bleek charges upon the author of this epistle in ch. ix. 3, 4, and which he thinks no

Jew of Palestine could have committed, both are relinquished by Tholuck as untenable (comp. the valuable remarks of Hug, Introd. p. 584, note, Fosdick's transl.) With regard to the latter, it may be remarked that, even supposing it proved that the writer of this epistle had erred in asserting that the pot containing the manna and Aaron's rod were placed in the ark of the testimony, and that, supposing θυμιατόριον to denote the altar of incense, and not the censer, he had fallen into the mistake of placing this within instead of without the vail, nothing could be thence deduced in favour of the Alexandrian origin of the author. For, with regard to the former of these, it was a matter on which the Jews of Palestine had no better means of information than those of any other place, since, in the Temple as then standing, none of the furniture of the Holy of Holies had been preserved; and with regard to the latter, as it could not be the result of ignorance either in a Jew of Palestine or in a Jew of Alexandria, but must have been a piece of mere inadvertence on the part of either, it seems rather too much to conclude that it was such as the latter alone was capable of committing. That, however, there is no blunder in the case, has, we think, been very satisfactorily shewn by Deyling (Obs. Sac. tom. ii. No. 47) and others (comp. Stuart, Tholuck, and Delitzsch, in loc.)

(6.) Apollos.—The first to suggest Apollos as the probable author of this epistle was Luther (Werke, ed. Walch, xii. 204, 1996, etc.) He has been followed by the majority of recent German scholars, many of whom have supported his conjecture with much ingenuity. It has been undoubtedly shewn by them that Apollos may have been the writer; and they have, we think, proved that of all Paul's companions this is the one who was most fitted by education, life-circumstances, modes of thought, and religious stand-point, to have accomplished such a task had it fallen to his lot. Beyond this, however, their arguments seem to us signally to fail. What weight they have is derived almost entirely from the assumed Alexandrian tone of the epistle; so that in setting aside this we of necessity invalidate what has been built on it. But it may be permitted us to remark that, even supposing the former established, the latter would by no means follow, any more than because a work produced in Germany in the present day was deeply tinged with Hegelianism, it would follow from that alone that it must be the production of some certain individual rather than of any other disciple of Hegel's school. The adoption of this theory by Dr. Tholuck, after his exposure of the unsoundness of Bleek's reasonings, has filled us with surprise. 'Still,' says he (i. 69), 'could it be rendered probable that any distinguished person having intercourse with Paul, were an Alexandrian, and of Alexandrian culture, we might, with the greatest appearance of truth, regard him as the author of the epistle. Now such an one is found in the person of Apollos.' What is this but to say, 'The arguments for the Alexandrian origin of this epistle, I must confess, prove nothing; but shew me an end to be gained by it and I will admit them to be most conclusive!' Such a statement affords, we think, very clear evidence that the disposition to ascribe this epistle to Apollos is to be traced not to any constraining force of evidence, but exclusively to what Olshausen in his strictures on Bleek (Opusc. p. 92) justly denounces as the main source of that able writer's errors on this question — 'Quod non ab omni partium studio alienum animum servare ipsi contigit.' It may be added that if this epistle was the product of Apollos or any other Alexandrian convert, it is very strange that no tradition to this effect should have been preserved in the church at Alexandria, but, on the contrary, that it should be there we find the tradition that Paul was the author most firmly and from the earliest period established.

We now pass on to the question of the Pauline origin of this epistle. Referring our readers for particulars to the able and copious discussion of this question furnished by the works of Stuart (Commentary, vol. i.), Forster (The Apostol. Authority of the Ep. to the Hebrews, etc.), and Hug, we shall attempt at present a condensed outline of the evidence, both for and against the Pauline authorship of this epistle. Following the example of Hug and Forster, we shall commence with the internal evidence, taking up first that in favour of the Pauline origin of the epistle.

1. A person familiar with the doctrines on which Paul is fond of insisting in his acknowledged epistles, will readily perceive that there is such a correspondence in this respect between these and the Epistle to the Hebrews, as supplies good ground for presuming that the latter proceeded also from his pen. That Christianity as a system is superior to Judaism in respect of clearness, simplicity, and moral efficiency; that the former is the substance and reality of what the latter had presented only the typical adumbration; and that the latter was to be abolished to make way for the former, are points which, if more fully handled in the Epistle to the Hebrews, are familiar to all readers of the Epistles of Paul (comp. 2 Cor. iii. 6-18; Gal. iii. 22; iv. 1-9, 21-31; Col. ii. 16, 17, etc.) The same view is given in this epistle as in those of Paul, of the divine glory of the Mediator, not simply as θεοῦ υἱός, but specifically as the ἐκὼν τοῦ Θεοῦ, the reflection or manifestation of Deity to man (comp. Col. i. 15-20; Phil. ii. 6; Heb. i. 3, etc.) His condescension is described as having consisted in an impoverishing, and lessening, and lowering of himself for man's behalf (2 Cor. viii. 9; Phil. ii. 7, 8; Heb. ii. 9); and his exaltation is set forth as a condition of royal dignity, which shall be consummated by all his enemies being put under his footstool (1 Cor. xv. 25-27; Heb. ii. 8; x. 13; xii. 2). He is represented as discharging the office of a μεσίτης, a word which is never used except by Paul and the writer of this epistle (Gal. iii. 19, 20; Heb. viii. 6); his death is represented as a sacrifice for the sins of man; and the peculiar idea is announced in connection with this, that he was prefigured by the sacrifices of the Mosaic dispensation (Rom. iii. 22-26; 1 Cor. v. 7; Eph. i. 7; v. 2; Heb. vii.-x.) Peculiar to Paul and the author of this epistle is the phrase ὁ Θεὸς τῆς ἐλπίδος (Rom. xv. 33, etc.; Heb. xiii. 20); and both seem to have conceived of the χαρὰ under the aspect of διαπλοῆς and μεσολαβήματος (1 Cor. xii. 4; Heb. ii. 4). It is worthy of remark also that the momentous question of a man's personal acceptance with God is answered in this epistle in the same peculiar way as in the acknowledged Epistles of Paul. All is made to depend upon the individuals exercising what both Paul and the author of this epistle call πίστις, and which they both represent as a realizing apprehension of the facts, and truths, and promises of revelation.* By both also the power of this πίστις is frequently referred to and illustrated by the example of those who had distinguished themselves in the annals of the Jewish race (comp. Rom. iii. 4; v. 2; Heb. iii. 6; Gal. iii. 5-14; Heb. x. 38; xi. 40). On all these points the sentiments of this epistle are so obviously Pauline, that not only did Origen remark that it contained τὰ νοήματα Παύλου, but even the most decided opponents of its Pauline authorship in recent times have laid it down as undeniable that it must have been written by some companion and disciple of Paul. 2. Some of the figures and allusions employed in this epistle are strictly Pauline. Thus the word of God is compared to a word (Eph. vi. 17; Heb. iv. 12); inexperienced Christians are children who need milk, and must be instructed in the elements, whilst those of mature attainments are full-grown men who require strong meat (1 Cor. iii. 1, 2; xiv. 20; Gal. iv. 9; Col. iii. 14; Heb. v. 12, 13; vi. 1); redemption through Christ is an introduction and an entrance with confidence unto God (Rom. v. 2; Eph. ii. 18; iii. 12; Heb. x. 19); afflictions are a test or strife, ἀγών (Phil. i. 30; Col. ii. 1; Heb. x. 32); the Christian life is a race (1 Cor. ix. 24; Phil. iii. 14; Heb. xii. 1); the Jewish ritual is a law (Rom. ix. 4; Heb. ix. 1, 6); a person under the constraint of some unworthy feeling or principle is enslaved (Gal. v. 1; Heb. ii. 15), etc. The fact that these and other such like figurative phrases occur only in this epistle and in the acknowledged Epistles of Paul, affords strong evidence that the former is his production, for in nothing does a writer more readily betray himself than by the use of peculiar and favourite figures. 3. Certain marked characteristics of Paul's style are found in this epistle. This department of the internal evidence has more perhaps than any other been canvassed by recent critics, and in some cases opposite conclusions have been drawn from the same phenomena. Thus the occurrence of ἀναξ λεγόμενα in this epistle has been adduced by the German scholars against the Pauline origin of it, whilst Stuart and Forster have both rested on this fact as strongly in favour of that conclusion; and as it appears to us with justice, for if it be made out from Paul's acknowledged writings that the use of unusual words is a characteristic of his style (and this has been placed by these writers beyond all question), it is obvious that the occurrence of the same characteristic in this epistle, so far from being an argument against, is, as far as it goes, an argu-

* Bleek and Tholuck have both endeavoured to shew that the πίστις of the Epistle to the Hebrews is not the same as the πίστις of Paul's acknowledged writings, but, in our view, with singular want of success. Tholuck's chief argument, and which he urges as of more weight than any Bleek has advanced is, that the writer has not here contrasted νόμος and πίστις, the ἔργα νόμου, and the ἔργα πίστεως, as Paul would have done. But how can this be said when the great lesson of the epistle is, that always, even under the law itself, πίστις was the medium of acceptance and the channel of divine blessing to men? When Paul says, 'We walk by faith not by sight' (2 Cor. v. 7), and the writer to the Hebrews says that faith, by which the just live, is the evidence of things not seen (x. 28; xi. 1), what essential difference in their notion of faith and its working can be discerned?

ment for our ascribing it to Paul. On arguments, however, based on such minute phenomena, we are not disposed to rest much weight on either side. Every person must be aware that an author's use of words is greatly modified by the circumstances under which he writes, or the design he has in writing; and the literature of every country presents us with numerous cases of authors, whose works, written at different periods, and with different designs, present far greater diversities of expression than any which have been pointed out between the Epistle to the Hebrews and the acknowledged Epistles of Paul. Hence cautious critics have declined to rest much in questions of literary parentage upon what Bentley calls (Dissert. on Phalaris, p. 19, Lond. 1699) 'censures that are made from stile and language alone,' and which, he adds, 'are commonly nice and uncertain, and depend upon slender notices.' Apart, however, from such minute niceties, there are certain marked peculiarities of style which attach to particular writers, and flow so directly from the character of their genius or education, that they can hardly express themselves in discourse without introducing them. Now such peculiarities the writings of Paul present, and the occurrence of them has always been felt to afford no small evidence of the authenticity of any production claiming to be his in which they are found. Paley, in enumerating these (Horæ Paulinæ, ch. vi., No. 2, 3), has laid stress chiefly on the following: A disposition to the frequent use of a word, which cleaves as it were to the memory of the writer, so as to become a sort of cant word in his writings; a propensity 'to go off at a word,' and enter upon a parenthetic series of remarks suggested by that word; and a fondness for the peronomasia, or play upon words. In the Epistle to the Hebrews these peculiarities of Paul's style are richly exemplified; an evidence in favour of its Pauline origin, which can never be enfeebled by adducing words, phrases, or features of style peculiar to this epistle, unless it can be first shewn that it was impossible for Paul to have used such. 4. There is a striking analogy between Paul's use of the O. T. and that made by the writer of this epistle. Both made frequent appeals to the O. T.; both are in the habit of accumulating passages from different parts of the O. T., and making them bear on the point under discussion (comp. Rom. iii. 10-18; ix. 7-33, etc.; Heb. i. 5-14; iii. 1; x. 5-17); both are fond of linking quotations together by means of the expression καὶ πάλιν (comp. Rom. xv. 9-12; 1 Cor. iii. 19, 20; Heb. i. 5; ii. 12, 13; iv. 4; x. 30); both make use of the same passages, and that occasionally in a sense not naturally suggested by the context whence they are quoted (1 Cor. xv. 27; Eph. i. 22; Heb. ii. 8; Rom. i. 17; Gal. iii. 11; Heb. x. 38); and both, in one instance, quote the same passage in the same way, but in a form in which it does not agree with the Sept., and with an addition of the words λέγει Κύριος, not found in the Hebrew; thereby indicating that the passage is given in both instances as it was present to the memory of one and the same writer (comp. Rom. xii. 19; Heb. x. 30). On the other hand, great stress has been laid by the opponents of the Pauline origin of this epistle on the fact, that whilst Paul in his acknowledged writings quotes from the Hebrew original in preference to the Sept. where the latter differs from the former, the author of this epistle quotes exclusively from the Sept. even when it departs very widely from the Hebrew. To this it may be replied : 1st, That both Paul and the author of this epistle quote generally from the Sept. ; 2dly, That where the Sept. differs from the Hebrew, Paul does not always follow the Hebrew in preference to the Sept. (comp. Rom. ii. 24 ; x. 11-18 ; xi. 27 ; xv. 12 ; 1 Cor. i. 19, etc.) ; and, 3dly, That the writer of this epistle does not always follow the Sept. where it differs from the Hebrew, but occasionally deserts the former for the latter (ex. gr. x. 30 ; xiii. 5) ; (comp. Davidson, Introd. iii. 231). There is no ground, therefore, for this objection to the Pauline origin of this epistle. In fine: The Epistle to the Hebrews contains some personal allusions on the part of the writer which strongly favour the supposition that he was Paul. These are the mention of his intention to pay those to whom he was writing a visit speedily, in company with Timothy, whom he affectionately styles 'our brother,' and whom he describes as having been set at liberty, and expected soon to join the writer (Heb. xiii. 23) ; the allusion to his being in a state of imprisonment at the time of writing, as well as of his having partaken of their sympathy while formerly in a state of bondage among them (Heb. xiii. 19 ; x. 34) ; and the transmission to them of a salutation from the believers in Italy (Heb. xiii. 24) ; all of which agree well with the supposition that Paul wrote this epistle while a prisoner at Rome.

Such is an outline of the internal evidence furnished by this epistle of its Pauline origin. Let us now glance at the main objections which from various sources have been urged against it.

1. It is unaccountable that Paul, had he written this epistle, should have withheld his name. But is it less unaccountable that Clement, or Apollos, or Luke, had any of them been the author, should have withheld his name ? Might not Paul write anonymously as well as any other man ? Why he should have done so in this case we admit our inability to say satisfactorily ; the only apparent reason, as far as we have been able to see, being the more rhetorical character of the production, which might induce the author to waive the usual form of epistolary address. But our inability to assign the reason why this work should have been issued anonymously cannot surely be held to be an argument against its authenticity, else it would be impossible to establish the authenticity of any anonymous production unless we could satisfactorily shew what were the author's reasons for withholding his name—a thing which in five cases out of six it is impossible to do.

2. 'This epistle is more calmly and logically written than it was possible for the energetic Paul to have written ; all the analogies between Judaism and Christianity are calmly investigated and calmly adduced ; the materials are arranged in the strictest order, and carefully wrought out according to this disposition, and conclusion follows conclusion with the greatest regularity ; the language also is rotund and choice, and the representation unusually clear. All this is unlike Paul' (Eichhorn, Einleit. iii. 459). It will perhaps surprise our readers to find the author of the Epistle to the Romans pronounced so utterly incapable of calm, connected, and logical reasoning, that it is inconceivable he should have written the Epistle to the Hebrews. If there be one thing for which Paul's writings are more remarkable than another, it is their dialectic accuracy ; and as for calmness, whilst we admit that as a whole there is less of ardour and vehemence in this epistle than in the majority of Paul's acknowledged epistles, we think this is to be ascribed to the fact that a large portion of it is occupied with remarks of an explanatory and illustrative kind—remarks which are usually made in a calmer tone than where the design of the writer is to expose error, or to exhort to duty ; and, on the other hand, we would assert that in those parts of the epistle where his subject calls the writer to the utterance of reproof, warning, or exhortation, the language is equally ardent with that used in any analogous passages in the writings of Paul. This brings us to the closing part of Eichhorn's objection, which relates to the use in this epistle of a more rotund, elegant, and perspicuous style than we find usually in the epistles of Paul. Now, it must be admitted here that this composition does partake much more of the character of a flowing, continuous discourse, than is found in the apostle's acknowledged productions. The question, however, is not, Whether Paul might not for some sufficient reason prefer attempting such a discourse in this particular case ? a question which it would surely be absurd to discuss ; but, Whether, supposing him to make the attempt, it is conceivable that he should succeed in it to the extent realized by the writer of this epistle ? Eichhorn concludes in the negative ; but on what grounds ? Apparently on the grounds that the apostle's acknowledged writings present no specimens of such success ; so that his argument is this : Supposing Paul to have attempted to write rhetorically, it is impossible he should have succeeded so well, because we find that, where he makes no such attempt, his style is far from being rhetorical ! Of such reasoning we are content to say, 'Valeat quantum valere potest.' We may also hint that, in our opinion, there is no passage in the Epistle to the Hebrews, imposing as it is, which might not have flowed from the same pen which composed the 8th chapter of Romans, and the 13th of 1st Corinthians. 3. 'Whilst we occasionally meet Pauline termini, we find precisely in the leading ideas of the epistle a terminology different from that of Paul' (Tholuck, i. 39, Eng. transl.) The instances specified by Dr. Tholuck are the use of ἐρευνᾶν, ποιεῖν, and ἀποστόλος, as designations of Christ ; of ὁμολογία, which he says is confined to this epistle ; of ἐργάζεσθαι τῷ Θεῷ ; and of τελειοῦν, with its derivatives in the sense in which it is used, Heb. vii. 19. Now, with regard to this objection, it may be observed, 1st, That supposing all the instances adduced by Tholuck to be unimpeachable, and supposing no reason could be assigned why Paul should use such in writing to Hebrews, when he did not use them in writing to others, still the objection cannot have much weight with any person accustomed to weigh evidence, because not only is the number of Pauline termini found in this epistle far greater than the number of termini which, according to Tholuck, are 'foreign to the apostle to the Gentiles ;' but it is always less likely that the peculiar phrases of a writer should be borrowed by another, than that a writer noted for the use of peculiar words and phrases should, in a composition of a character somewhat different from his other productions, use terms not found elsewhere in his writings. But, 2dly, let us examine the instances adduced by Tholuck, and see whether they bear out his reasoning. 'Paul nowhere calls Christ priest.' True ; but though Paul, in writing to churches composed more or less of Gentile con-

rites, whose previous ideas of priests and priestly rites were anything but favourable to their receiving under sacerdotal terms right notions of Christ and his work, never calls Christ a priest, is that any reason for our concluding that in writing to Jews, who had amongst them a priesthood of divine organization, and writing for the express purpose of shewing that that priesthood was typical of Christ, it is inconceivable that the apostle should have applied the term priest to Christ? To us the difficulty would rather seem to be to conceive how, in handling such a topic, he could avoid calling Christ a priest.—‘Paul nowhere calls Christ a shepherd and an apostle, as the writer of this epistle does. But the whole weight of this objection to the Pauline origin of this epistle must rest on the assumption that Paul never uses figurative appellations of Christ in his writings; for if he do, why not here as well as elsewhere? Now, it could only be the grossest unacquaintedness with the apostle’s writings which could lead any to affirm this. The very opposite tendency is characteristic of them. Thus we find Christ termed τέλος νόμου (Rom. x. 4), διάκονος περιτομῆς (xv. 8), τὸ πᾶσχα ἡμῶν (1 Cor. v. 7), ἡ πέτρα (x. 4), ἀπαρχή (xv. 23), ἐν ἀνδρὶ (2 Cor. xi. 2), ἀκρογωνιαίου (Eph. ii. 20), etc. With these instances before us, why should it be deemed so utterly incredible that Paul could have called Christ ἀπόστολος and ποιμήν, that the occurrence of such terms in the epistle before us is to be held as a reason for adjudging it not to have been written by him? With regard to the use of ὁμολογία in the sense of religious profession, the reader may compare the passages in which it occurs in this epistle with Rom. x. 9; 2 Cor. ix. 13; 1 Tim. vi. 12, and judge for himself how far such a usage is foreign to the apostle. The phrase ἐργάσεν τῷ θεῷ occurs once in this epistle (vii. 19), and once in James iv. 8; Paul also once uses the verb actively (Phil. ii. 30); and, on the other hand, the author of this epistle once uses it intransitively (x. 25). As there is thus a perfect analogy in the usage of the verb between the two, why it should be supposed improbable that Paul should use it in reference to God, or why a phrase used by James should be deemed too Alexandrian to be used by Paul, we feel ourselves utterly at a loss to conceive. With regard to the use of τελειοῦν, Dr. Tholuck himself contends (Appendix, ii. 297) that it everywhere in this epistle retains the idea of completing; but he cannot understand how Paul could have contemplated the work of redemption under this term in this epistle, since in no other of his epistles is it so used. This difficulty of the learned professor may, we think, be very easily removed, by remarking that it does not appear to have been Paul’s design elsewhere, so fully at least as here, to represent the superiority of Christianity over Judaism, as that arises from the former being sufficient, whilst the latter was not sufficient, to complete men in a religious point of view, i. e., to supply to them all they need, and advance them to all of which they are capable. That this is the theme of the writer, the passages in which the word in question occurs show; and we see no reason why such an idea might not have occurred to Paul as well as to any other man.

Such are the objections on which the more recent impugnors of the Pauline authorship of this epistle seem inclined to lay most stress. A multitude of others have been urged by Bertholdt, Schulz, Seyffarth, etc., which have been carefully noticed and replied to by Stuart, but which it is unnecessary to adduce here, as their futility seems very generally admitted even by those who take the anti-Pauline side.

It appears, therefore, that from the epistle itself nothing can be gathered materially unfavourable to the opinion that Paul was its author, whilst there is much in it strongly tending to support that opinion. It yet remains that we should look at the external evidence bearing on this question.

Passing by, as somewhat uncertain, the alleged testimony of Peter, who is supposed (2 Pet. iii. 15, 16) to refer to the Epistle to the Hebrews as the composition of Paul, and passing by, also, the testimonies of the apostolic fathers, which, though very decisive as to the antiquity and canonical authority of this epistle (see Forster’s Inquiry, sec. 13), yet say nothing to guide us to the author, we come to consider the testimony of the Eastern and Western Churches upon this subject. As respects the former there are two facts of much importance. The one is, that of the Greek fathers not one positively ascribes this epistle to any but Paul; the other is, that it does not appear that in any part of the Eastern Church the Pauline origin of this epistle was ever doubted or suspected (comp. Olshausen, Opusc. Theolog. p. 95).

In the Western Church this epistle did not, as we have seen, meet with the same early and universal reception. But of what value is the state of opinion in the early churches of the West in the question of evidence now before us? To judge of this, we must bear in mind that the sole amount of evidence arising from the testimony of the Latin churches is negative; all we can conclude from it, at the most, is that they had no sufficient evidence in favour of this epistle being Paul’s; they do not seem to have had a shadow of historical evidence against its being his. The claims of Barnabas, Clement, and Luke, rest upon mere individual conjecture, and have no historical support. Supposing, then, that the rejection of this epistle by the Latins cannot be accounted for by circumstances peculiar to them, still this fact cannot diminish the weight of evidence accruing from the unanimity of the Greeks and Asiatics. Had the Latins been as unanimous in favour of Apollon or Clement as the Eastern churches were in favour of Paul, the case would have been different. The value of Paul’s claims would in that case have been equal to the difference between the value of the Eastern tradition and the value of the Western. This would have furnished a somewhat puzzling problem; though even in that case the superiority of the Eastern witnesses to the Western would have materially advocated the claims of the apostle. As the case stands, all the positive external evidence extant is in favour of the Pauline authorship of this epistle; and the only thing against it is that in the Latin churches there appears to have been no commonly received tradition on the subject. Under such circumstances, the claims of the apostle are entitled to be regarded as fully substantiated by the external evidence.

The result of the previous inquiry may be thus stated. 1. There is no substantial evidence, external or internal, in favour of any claimant to the authorship of this epistle except Paul. 2. There is nothing incompatible with the supposition that Paul was the author of it. 3. The preponderance of the internal, and all the direct external evidence, go to show that it was written by Paul.

3. Time and Place of Writing.—Assuming the Pauline authorship of the epistle, it is not difficult to determine when and where it was written. The allusions in ch. xiii. 19, 21, point to the closing period of the apostle's two years' imprisonment at Rome as the season during 'the serene hours' of which, as Hug describes them (Introd., p. 603), he composed this noblest production of his pen. In this opinion almost all who receive the epistle as Paul's concur; and even by those who do not so receive it, nearly the same time is fixed upon, in consequence of the evidence furnished by the epistle itself of its having been written a good while after those to whom it is addressed had become Christians, but yet before the destruction of the Temple.

4. To whom Addressed.—That the parties to whom this epistle was addressed were converted Jews, the epistle itself plainly shows. Ancient tradition points out the church at Jerusalem, or the Christians in Palestine generally, as the recipients. Stuart contends for the church at Caesarea, not without some show of reason; but the preponderance of evidence is in favour of the ancient tradition. Two things make this clear, says Lange, the one is, that only the Christians in Jerusalem, or those in Palestine generally, formed a great Jewish-Christian church in the proper sense; the other is, that for the loosening of these from their religious sense of the Temple-worship there was an immediate and pressing necessity (Apostol. Zeitalt. i. 176). We know of no purely Jewish-Christian community, such as that addressed in this epistle, out of Palestine; whilst the whole tone of the epistle indicates that those for whom it was intended were in the vicinity of the Temple. The inscription of the epistle, πρὸς Ἑβραίους, which is of great antiquity, favours the same conclusion (Roberts, Discussions on the Gospels, p. 215, ff.)

An early opinion that the epistle was first written in Hebrew or Aramaic, and then translated into Greek, has found in Michaelis a strenuous defender (Introd. iv., p. 221). The arguments he adduces, however, are more specious than sound; and it has been abundantly shown by Lardner, Hug, Eichhorn, and others, that this opinion is untenable. Why Paul should have written in Greek to persons residing in Judæa is best answered by the reasons which Hug (Introd., p. 326, seq.) and Diodati (De Christo Grace loquente exercitatio, etc., edited by O. T. Dobbin, L.L.B., Lond. 1843) have adduced, to shew that Greek was at that time well known to the mass of the Jews (comp. Tholuck, i. 78).

5. Some have doubted whether this composition be justly termed an epistle, and have proposed to regard it rather as a treatise. The salutations, however, at the close, seem rather to favour the common opinion; though it is of little moment which view we espouse.

6. The design of this epistle is to dissuade those to whom it is written from relapsing into Judaism, and to exhort them to hold fast the truths of Christianity which they had received. For this purpose the apostle shows the superiority of the latter dispensation over the former, in that it was introduced by one far greater than angels, or than Moses, from whom the Jews received their economy (i. iii.), and in that it affords a more secure and complete salvation to the sinner than the former (iv. x.) In demonstrating the latter position the apostle shows that in point of dignity, perpetuity, sufficiency, and suitableness, the Jewish priesthood and sacrifices were far inferior to those of Christ, who was the substance and reality, whilst these were but the type and shadow. He shows, also, that by the appearance of the anti-type the type is necessarily abolished; and adduces the important truth, that now, through Christ, the privilege of personal access to God is free to all. On all this he founds an exhortation to a life of faith and obedience, and shows that it has ever been only by a spiritual recognition and worship of God that good men have participated in his favour (xi.) The epistle concludes, as is usual with Paul, with a series of practical exhortations and pious wishes (xii.-xiii.)

HEBREWS, THE (οἱ Ἑβραῖοι). [HELLENIST.]

HEBRON (חֶבְרֹן; Sept. Χεβρών), the third son of Kohath, the son of Levi, and younger brother of Amram, the father of Moses and Aaron (Ex. vi. 18; Num. iii. 19; 1 Chron. vi. 2, 18; xxiii. 12). From him descended the family or clan of the Hebronites (Num. iii. 27; xxvi. 58; 1 Chron. xxvi. 23, 30, 31), or B'ney-Hebron (1 Chron. xv. 9; xxiii. 19). In the reign of David we find them under the chieftainship of Jerijah settled at Jazer of Gilead, to the number of 2700 'mighty men of valour,' whom the king placed as overseers over the tribes of Reuben and Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh, 'for any matter pertaining to God and affairs of the king' (1 Chron. xxvi. 31, 32; comp. xxiii. 19; xxiv. 23). Another section of them, numbering 1700, under the leadership of Hashabiah, discharged the same office at the same time on the western side of the Jordan (מַעְבֵּר לַיַּרְדֵּן מַעְבְּרָה, litt. from beyond Jordan westward, i.e., coming westward; comp.

HEBRON (חֶבְרוֹן; Sept. Χεβρών), a town in the south of Palestine and in the tribe of Judah, 18 miles south from Jerusalem, in 31° 32' 30" N. lat., 35° 8' 20" E. long., at the height of 2664 Paris feet above the level of the sea (Schubert). It is one of the most ancient cities existing, having, as the sacred writers inform us, been built 'seven years before Zoan in Egypt,' and being mentioned even prior to Damascus (Num. xiii. 22; Gen. xiii. 18; comp. xv. 2). Its most ancient name was Kirjath-arba, that is, 'the city of Arba,' from Arba, the father of Anak and of the Anakim who dwelt in and around Hebron (Gen. xxiii. 2; Josh. xiv. 15; xv. 13; xxi. 11; Judg. i. 10). It appears to have been also called Mamre, probably from the name of Abraham's Amoritical ally (Gen. xxiii. 19; xxxv. 27; comp. xiv. 13, 28). The ancient city lay in a valley; and the two remaining pools, one of which at least existed in the time of David, serve, with other circumstances, to identify the modern with the ancient site (Gen. xxxvii. 14; 2 Sam. iv. 12). Much of the lifetime of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob was spent in this neighbourhood, where they were all entombed; and it was from hence that the patriarchal family departed for Egypt by way of Beersheba (Gen. xxxvii. 14; xlv. 1). After the return of the Israelites, the city was taken by Joshua and given over to Caleb, who expelled the Anakim from its territories (Josh. x. 36, 37; xiv. 6-15; xv. 13-14; Judg. i. 20). It was afterwards made one of the cities of refuge, and assigned to the priests and Levites (Josh. xx. 7; xxi. 11, 13). David, on becoming king of Judah, made Hebron his royal residence. Here he reigned seven years and a half; here most of his sons were born; and here he was anointed king over all Israel (2 Sam. ii. 1-4, 11; 1 Kings ii. 11; 2 Sam. v. 1, 3-5). On this extension of his kingdom Hebron ceased to be sufficiently central, and Jerusalem then became the metropolis. It is possible that this step excited a degree of discontent in Hebron which afterwards encouraged Absalom to raise in that city the standard of rebellion against his father (2 Sam. xv. 9, 10). Hebron was one of the places fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 10); and after the exile the Jews who returned to Palestine occupied Hebron and the surrounding villages (Neh. xi. 25).

Hebron is not named by the prophets, nor in the N. T.; but we learn from the first book of Maccabees, and from Josephus, that it came into the power of the Edomites, who had taken possession of the south of Judah, and was recovered from them by Judas Maccabæus (1 Maccab. v. 65; Joseph. Antiq. xii. 8. 6). During the great war, Hebron was seized by the rebel Simon Giorides, but was recaptured and burnt by Cerealis, an officer of Vespasian (Joseph. De Bell. Jud. iv. 9. 7, 9). Josephus describes the tombs of the patriarchs as existing in his day; and both Eusebius and Jerome, and all subsequent writers who mention Hebron down to the time of the Crusades, speak of the place chiefly as containing these sepulchres. In the course of time the remarkable structure enclosing the tombs of Abraham and the other patriarchs was called the 'Castle of Abraham;' and by an easy transition this name came to be applied to the city itself; till in the time of the Crusades the names of Hebron and Castle of Abraham were used interchangeably. Hence, as Abraham is also distinguished among the Moslems by the appellation of el Khulil, 'the Friend' (of God), this latter epithet became among them the name of the city; and they now know Hebron only as el Khulil (Robinson's Researches, ii. 456).

The modern town of Hebron lies low down on the sloping sides of a narrow valley (of Mamre), chiefly on the eastern side, but in the southern part stretches across also to the western side. The houses are all of stone, high, and well built, with windows and flat roofs, and on these roofs are small domes, sometimes two or three to each house. This mode of building seemed to Dr. Robinson peculiar to Judæa, as he had not observed it further north than Nablus. It is, however, common in the countries farther east, where wood is scarce. The streets are narrow, seldom more than two or three yards in width; the pavement, where one exists, is rough and difficult. The bazaars are to a considerable extent covered, either by some kind of awning, or by arches springing from the tops of the houses, and spanning the street. The goods in them are thus secured from the effects of the sun and rain, but the streets are rendered gloomy as well as damp. The shops are well furnished, better indeed than those of towns of the same class in Egypt, and the commodities are of a very similar description. The only display of local manufactures is the produce of the glass-works, for which the place has long been celebrated in these parts. The articles manufactured consist almost exclusively of glass lamps, many of which are exported to Egypt, and rings of coloured glass worn by females on the arms. Gates are placed not only at the entrance of the city, but in different parts of the interior, and are closed at night for the better preservation of order, as well as to prevent communication between the different quarters. This is a rude contrivance much resorted to in Eastern towns from the want of an efficient ambulatory night-watch.

There are nine mosques in Hebron, none of which possess any architectural or other interest, with the exception of the massive structure which is built over the tombs of the patriarchs. This is esteemed by the Moslems one of their holiest places, and Christians are rigorously excluded from it. Up to a recent date, the only Europeans who had found their way to the interior were Ali Bey and Giovanni Finati, the Italian servant of Mr. Banks. An account of it is furnished by the Rev. V. Monro (Summer Ramble, i. 245), and also by Ali Bey (Travels, ii. 232); but all these partial accounts are now superseded by the minute survey of the place made by Dr. Stanley in 1862, in the suite of H. R. H. the Prince of Wales, and recorded by him in the Appendix to his Lectures on the Jewish Church, i. 448.

The court in which the mosque stands is surrounded by an extensive and lofty wall, formed of large stones, and strengthened by square buttresses. This wall is the greatest antiquity in Hebron, and even Dr. Robinson supposes that it may be substantially the same which is mentioned by Josephus (Antiq. i. 14; De Bell. Jud. iv. 9. 7), and by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Arboch) as the sepulchre of Abraham. The enclosed structure is usually ascribed to the empress Helena; but Dr. Robinson thinks it more likely to have been erected by the Crusaders, and that till their time no building existed within the great wall. If, however, we rightly understand the Rabbi Benjamin, he says there was a synagogue here under the Moslems (before the Crusades); but he certainly ascribes to the Gentiles (Christians) the six sepulchres which appear above ground. If this were so, they have since been renewed by the Moslems, as those which now exist are, as described, quite similar to the Moslem shrines of Jewish saints which the present writer has seen in countries where Christians never had power. A common Moslem tomb in the neighbourhood of Hebron passes as the tomb of Abner. He was certainly interred in this city (2 Sam. iii. 32); and the head of Ishbosheth, after his assassination, was deposited in the same sepulchre (2 Sam. iv. 12); but there is slight evidence in favour of the tradition which professes to point out this locality to the modern traveller.

Besides this venerable wall, there is nothing at Hebron bearing the stamp of antiquity, save two reservoirs for rain water outside the town. One of these is just without the southern gate in the bottom of the valley. It is a large basin, 133 feet square, and 21 feet 8 inches deep. It is built with hewn limestone, of very solid workmanship, and obviously of ancient date. The depth of water of course varies at different times of the year: in May, it is 14 feet. The descent is by flights of steps at the four corners, by which the water is brought up in vessels and skins, and poured out into troughs for the flocks, or carried away for domestic uses. Just at the north end of the main part of the town is another and smaller pool, also occupying the bed of the valley, and measuring 85 feet by 55, with a depth of 18½ feet, containing (in May) 7 feet of water. These cisterns, which are connected with no perennial springs, and which are filled only by the rains, seem (at least in summer) to be the main dependence of the inhabitants for water, although that of the larger pool is neither clear nor clean. As these pools are doubtless of high antiquity, one of them is in all likelihood the 'pool of Hebron' over which David hanged up the assassins of Ishbosheth (2 Sam. iv. 12).

The environs of Hebron are very fertile. Vineyards and plantations of fruit-trees, chiefly olive-trees, cover the valleys and arable grounds; while the tops and sides of the hills, although stony, are covered with rich pastures, which support a great number of cattle, sheep, and goats, constituting an important branch of the industry and wealth of Hebron. The hill country of Judah, of which it is the capital, is indeed highly productive, and under a paternal government would be capable of sustaining a large population. That it did so once, is manifest from the great number and extent of ruined terraces and dilapidated towns. It is at present abandoned, and cultivation ceases at the distance of two miles north of the town. The hills then become covered with prickly and other stunted trees, which furnish Bethlehem and other villages with wood. See the works of travellers who have visited Hebron, and in particular, Dr. Robinson, Dr. Olin, Rev. V. Monro, Schubert, De Saulcy, Van de Velde, Wilson, and Thomson.—J. K.

HEDGE. This term is employed in the A.V.

to express four Hebrew words גֵּדֵר (and its cognates גֵּדָר and גֵּדָרָה) and מְסוּכָה (or מְסוּכָה); the former might with more propriety be rendered fence or wall, though, like the Greek φραγμός used by the LXX. for it, it does not in itself indicate the materials of which it is composed; the latter evidently means a quickset hedge. They are both used in Is. v. 5, 'I will take away the hedge thereof (מְסוּכָתָהּ) . . . and break down the wall thereof (גֵּדָרָהּ)'. See Trench, Notes on the Parables, p. 193.—J. E. R.

HEDUOSMON (Gr. ἡδύσμος, i. e., having a sweet smell), translated mint, is mentioned in Matt. xxiii. 23: 'Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye pay tithe of mint and anise (properly dill) and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law;' and, again, in Luke xi. 42: 'But woe unto you, Pharisees! for ye tithe mint and rue, and all manner of herbs, and pass over judgment and the love of God: these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone.' All the plants mentioned in the above passages belong to the smaller ones cultivated in gardens in Europe, and which usually come under the denomination of sweet herbs. Lady Calcott inquires whether mint was one of the bitter herbs which the Israelites ate with the Paschal Lamb; and infers the probability of its being so from our own practice of eating lamb with mint sauce. Dr. Harris argues that mint, anise, and cummin were not tithed, and that the Pharisees only paid tithes of these plants from an overstrained interpretation of the law. But, in the article ANETHON (DILL), it may be seen that dill was tithed, and it is one of the herbs mentioned along with mint. The meaning, therefore, seems to be, that the Pharisees, while, in conformity with the law, they paid these minute tithes, neglected the most important moral duties,—truth, justice, and mercy; for it is added, 'these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone.'

The plant ἡδύσμος or ἡδύσμος, so called 'ab odoris bonitate vel jucunditate,' was also called μύρθη and μύρθος by the Greeks, and mentha, or menta, by the Romans. The Arabs give minthee as the Greek synonym of their نَعْنَاع nana; and in India, Persian works give poderna as the Hindue name of the latter. Poderna is the common name of a species of mint cultivated in the gardens of North-Western India. These names are interesting as occurring in works on Materia Medica; because both were employed by early translators as the equivalent of ἡδύσμος in the above passages of Matthew and Luke; and all European translators, according to Celsius, concur in considering mint as intended. The species most common in Syria is mentha sylvestris, found by Russell at Aleppo, and mentioned by him as one of the herbs cultivated in the gardens there. It also occurs in Greece, Taurus, Caucasus, the Altai Range, and as far as Cashmere, whence we have obtained specimens. M. arvensis, of which M. sativa (Linn.) is one of the varieties, is also a widely diffused species, being found in Greece, in parts of Caucasus, in the Altai Range, and in Cashmere. Mint is highly esteemed in Eastern countries, and apparently was so also by the Jews. Celsius says, 'Patet olus fuisse in Judea quondam notum, et Judæis ob virtutes et præstantiam singularem acceptissimum.' It was much esteemed by the ancients, as Pliny (Hist. Nat. iii. 47) testifies: 'Mentæ nomen suavis odoris apud Græcos mutavit, cum ante mintha vocaretur: unde veteres nostri nomen declinaverunt. Grato menta mensas odore percurrit in rusticis dapibus;' and again (xx. 53), 'Mentæ ipsius odor animum excitat et sapor aviditatem in cibis, ideo embammatum mixturæ familiaris.' Dioscorides also (iii. 41) mentions it as useful to the stomach, and peculiarly grateful as a condiment. Mint was employed by the ancients in the preparation of many dishes. 'Hinc in Apicii libro coquinario, singulis fere paginis menthæ tam viridis, quam aridæ, mentio' (Cels. Hierobot. i. p. 546). 'Sic apud Ebræos in cibis receptam fuisse mentham manifeste tradunt Talmudici Tract. Shem. Ve Jobel, vii. 2; et Tract. Okelein, i. 2; Shab. vii. 1. Unde et olerum decimationi subjecta fuit' (Ib. p. 547).

It is difficult to determine the exact species or variety of mint employed by the ancients. There are numerous species very nearly allied to one another. They usually grow in moist situations, and are herbaceous, perennial, of powerful odour, especially when bruised, and have small reddish-coloured flowers, arranged in spikes or whorls. The taste of these plants is bitter, warm, and pungent, but leaving a sensation of coolness on the tongue: in their properties they are so similar to each other, that either in medicine, or as a condiment, one species may safely be substituted for another. But the species M. sylvestris and M. arvensis, which have been mentioned above, probably yielded the varieties cultivated in Palestine. J. F. R.

HEGAI (הֶגַי; Sept. Taf), an officer of the court of king Ahasuerus, to whom was entrusted the care of the young women who were in training to become concubines to the king (Esth. ii. 8, 15). After they had been presented to the king they passed under the charge of another officer, who in this narrative bears the name of Sha'ashgaz, though the LXX. gives here the same name as before, Taf. In ver. 3 and 15 the name is omitted by the LXX. altogether. Origen supplies Ρογαιο. In ver. 3 the name appears under the form הֶגַי, Hege.—W. L. A.

HEIDEGGER, JOHANN HEINRICH, a Swiss theologian, was born July 1, 1633, near Zürich. The son of a Protestant pastor, he began his studies in his native land, and went to prosecute them at Marburg and Heidelberg, under men like Hottinger and Spanheim. In 1656 he was chosen professor extraordinary of the Hebrew language in the University of Heidelberg. In 1659 he was called to Steinfurt as professor of theology and ecclesiastical history. In 1666 he was compelled to leave the place by war, and returned to Zürich, where he received the chair of theology, which he held till his death, January 28, 1698. Heidegger was a man of great influence and activity. He took part in most of the ecclesiastical controversies of his time, and obtained a wide reputation. He was benevolent and patriotic, a defender of the refugees of France and Piedmont, who found an asylum in Switzerland from the persecutions of the Romanists on account of their religion. He was the principal author of the noted Formula Consensus, which was adopted by the Synod of Zurich, held in 1675. His chief Biblical works are—De Historia sacra Patriarcharum exercitationes selectæ, 1667-1671, 2 vols. 4to; Enchiridion Biblicum succinctius, 1681, 8vo; Mysterium Babylonis, seu in divi Joannis theologi Apocalypseo prophetiam de Babylone magna diatriba, 1687, 2 vols. 4to; Exercitationes biblicæ, 1700, 4to; Labores exegetici in Josuam, Matthæum, epistolas S. Pauli ad Romanos, Corinthios, et Hebræos, 1700, 4to; Corpus theologiæ Christianæ, etc., 1700, folio; Medulla theologiæ Christianæ, 1696, 1702, 4to. Many of his writings were directed against Romanists and the proceedings of the Council of Trent.—S. D.

HEIDENHEIM, WOLF B. SIMSON, a distinguished grammarian, Massorite, and typographer, who immortalized Rödelheim, near Frankfurt-on-Maine, in the annals of Hebrew literature, by the splendid Hebrew printing-office which he established in it, and from which he issued some of the most beautiful and correctly printed editions of the Pentateuch, as well as grammatical and philological works. The works for which Hebrew philology and Biblical exegesis are indebted to Heidenheim are as follows:—1. מִשְׁפָּטֵי הַמִּסְעִים, on the laws of the accents, Rödelheim, 1808. In this most valuable treatise, which is so highly prized by grammarians, Heidenheim has largely availed himself of the works of Ben Asher, Ibn Balaam, Chajug, and other ancient philologists. 2. הַנְּחָת הַסִּפְרָה, the understanding of the Scriptures, a Hebrew commentary on the Pentateuch, with the Hebrew text, and the commentary of Rashi, Rödelheim, 1818. 3. עֵין הַסּוֹפֵר, the eye of the Scribe, being annotations on the Pentateuch, with the Hebrew text and the Massoretic glosses of Jeh. Pisa, Rödelheim, 1818-1821. 4. A German translation of the Pentateuch, with the Hebrew text, Rödelheim, 1818-1821. Heidenheim died Feb. 26, 1832, and left behind him many valuable works on philology in MS. Comp. Fürst, Bibliotheca Judaica, i. p. 369, etc.; Steinschneider,

HEIFER. [EGHEL; PARAH.]

HEIFER, RED. [SACRIFICE.]

HEINRICHS, JOHANN HEINRICH, a German theologian, was born at Hanover, 10th April 1765, where he prosecuted his studies for some time, and afterwards at Göttingen. In 1789 he became repentin in theology at the University of Göttingen; and after remaining there three years, he went to Hanover, and gave public lectures in Mathematics. In 1794 he became pastor at Quickborn. In 1799 he became archdeacon in Dannenberg; in 1806 superintendent at Klötze; and in 1810 superintendent at Burgdorf. He died 17th March 1850. His chief works are portions of Koppe's Greek Testament, viz., Acta Apostolorum, part i. 1832, 2d ed., and part ii. 1827, 2d ed.; Epistolae Pauli ad Tim., Tit., et Philem., 1828, 2d ed.; Epistolae Pauli ad Philipp. et Coloss., 1826, 2d ed.; Epistolae Pauli ad Hebraeos, 1823, 2d ed.; Apocalypsis, part i. 1818, part ii. 1821; Beiträge zur Beförderung der theologischen Wissenschaften, insonderheit der newtestamentl. Exegese, Hanover, 1804. His other writings, which are not numerous, relate for the most part to pastoral duties and preaching. Heinrichs was an inferior critic, possessing little originality or learning.—S. D.

HEINSIUS, DANIEL, one of the most learned men of his time, was born at Ghent, 1580 or 1581. He was sent by his father, at the age of fourteen, to study law at Franeker; but, contrary to parental wishes, resolved to devote himself to ancient literature; and accordingly left Franeker, and prosecuted the study of the classics under Joseph Scaliger at Leyden, where, at the age of eighteen, he explained the Latin classics, and where also, seven years afterwards, he was appointed professor of history and politics. In 1607 he was appointed librarian and secretary of the University. He held also the office of historian to the States of Holland, with a handsome salary. He acted as secretary to the Synod of Dort in 1618. His fame was European. He died Feb. 3, 1665, at the age of 75. His works are very numerous and learned. Those of them which claim for him a notice here are: 1. Aristarchus Sacer, sive ad Nonni in Johannem Metaphrasin Exercitationes, Lugd. Bat. 1627; 2. Exercitationes Sacrae ad Novum Testamentum, 1639; Cantabrigiae, 1640.—I. J.

HEIR. [BIRTHRIGHT; INHERITANCE.]

HELAM (חֶלֶם, חֶלֶם; Sept. Ἀλάμ, Χαλαμάς, Χαλαμά), the place where David defeated the Syrians under Hadarezer; it is described in Samuel as 'beyond the river,' by which is meant the west side of the river Euphrates (2 Sam. x. 16, 17). The word it will be observed is variously written both in the Hebrew and the Sept. The exact locality of Helam is unknown. Ewald, however, with some probability, supposes it to have been identical with the Alamatha of Ptolemy (v. 15), a town near to Nicephoria, and situate on the west bank of Euphrates.—W. J. C.

HELBON (חֶלְבֹן; Χελβών). The prophet Ezekiel, in describing the riches and splendour of Tyre, represents that city as the centre of the world's commerce. All other great cities and countries traded in her marts; each bringing its own staple produce or manufactures. Among these Damascus is enumerated. 'Damascus was thy merchant in the multitude of the wares of thy making, for the multitude of all riches; in the wine of Helbon, and white wool' (Ezek. xxvii. 18).

Jerome thought חֶלְבֹן was an adjective (from חֶלֶב, 'fatness') qualifying מֶיִן; and accordingly in the Vulgate he translates the clause in vino pingui. But all the best authorities are against him, and make Helbon the name of the place where the wine was produced. So it is rendered in the Septuagint οἶνος ἐκ Χελβών (the Alex. reads Χελβών), and in the old Latin vinum ex Chelbon (Sabatier, in loc.)

Hitherto sacred geographers have identified Helbon with the city of Aleppo, called by the Arabs Haleb, حَلَب. The original name of this city, according to Greek orthography, was Chalybon (Χαλυβών, a corruption of the Arabic); and the province attached to it was termed Chalybonitis (Ptolemy, v. 15). Seleucus Nicator is said to have changed the name to Beroea (Niceph. Callist. xiv. 39; Winer, R. W., s. v.) But the old name, as we see from Ptolemy, was not forgotten; and on the capture of the city by the Arabs in the 7th century, it was again resumed (Schultens, Index Geogr. in vitam Saladini, s. v. Halebum).

Chalybonian wine is several times mentioned by classic authors. Strabo tells us the Persian kings imported Chalybonian wine from Syria (xv. 3). Both Hesychius and Plutarch (Vit. Alex. ii.) speak of this famous wine. It has been generally thought that the name was derived from Chalybon, where it was supposed the wine was produced. But is it not strange that Damascus should be represented as supplying the wine of Aleppo to the marts of Tyre? Why would not the native merchants themselves carry it thither? A passage which Bochart quotes from Athenæus (i. 51) throws light on this point—ὁ Περσῶν βασιλεὺς τὸν Χαλυβώνιον μόνον οἶνον ἐπινεν· ὃν φησι Ποσειδώνιος καὶ Δαμασκὸν τῇ Συρίᾳ εἶναι. 'The king of the Persians drank Chalybonian wine alone; which, says Poseidonius, was also produced in Damascus' (Bochart, Opp. ii. 486). We are thus led, both by the statement of Ezekiel, and by that of Poseidonius, who was himself a native of Syria, to look for a Helbon, or Chalybon, at or near Damascus.

On the eastern slope of Antilebanon, about ten miles north of Damascus, is the village of Helbon, situated in a wild and beautiful glen, the sides of which are still clothed with vineyards. The present inhabitants are all Muslems, and of course make no wine; but the vintners of Damascus regard the grapes of Helbon as the best in this part of Syria. In and around the village are many remains of ancient wealth and splendour, ruins of temples, fragments of Greek inscriptions, and rock-hewn tombs. The Arabic name حَلْبُون is identical with the Hebrew חֶלְבֹן; and there cannot be a doubt that this is the long-lost Helbon (Porter, Damascus, ii. 330, sq.; see also Robinson, B. R. iii. 472). How accurate were the descriptions of the Hebrew prophet: 'Damascus was thy merchant . . . in the wine of Helbon, and white wool'—wine from the luxuriant vintage of that romantic glen on the neighbouring mountain side, and wool from the flocks that roam over the vast plains to the eastward!—J. L. P.

HELDAI (חֶלְדַּי; Sept. Χολδία; Alex. Χολδαί).

1. 'The Netophathite,' one of the captains, the twelfth, of the monthly courses in the temple service (1 Chron. xxvii. 15). 2. An Israelite from whom Zechariah was commanded to take materials for making memorial crowns (Zech. vi. 10) for Joshua the high-priest. Heldai and his companions seem to have been a deputation from Babylon sent with contributions to aid the work in which their people were engaged.—W. L. A.

HELEM (חֶלֶם; Sept. Βαγγελῆμ, joining the חֶלֶם with the proper noun; Alex. ὕδρ' Ἐλᾶμ). 1. A man named in the list of the descendants of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 35). It is supposed by some that he was the third son of Heber (ver. 32), and that of the names חֶלֶם and חֶלֶם one arose out of the other through the mistake of a transcriber; though what is the original name is uncertain. If so, the mistake must be very ancient, as it is followed by the LXX.

2. One of those to whom the memorial crowns were to be assigned (Zech. vi. 14); in all probability the same who is called Heldai in ver. 10.—W. L. A.

HELEPH (חֶלֶף; Sept. Μοολᾶμ; Alex. Μελέφ, the μ in both cases being the Heb. preposition ו incorporated with the word), a place on the northern boundary of Naphthali (Josh. xix. 33). Van de Velde would identify it with Beit Lif (Mem., p. 320; comp. Robinson, Rec. Rev., p. 61, 62). But Beit Lif lies towards what must have been the western boundary of Naphthali, between that tribe and Asher; whereas, as Keil observes, the expression 'the outgoings thereof were at Jordan,' and 'also the fact that in ver. 34 the southern boundary is drawn from the Jordan, prove that it is intended to shew the northern boundary-line of Naphthali, drawn from the west or from Asher' (Comment. in loc.)—W. L. A.

HELI does not occur in this form in the A. V. of the O. T. According, however, to the Sept. and the Vulg., the well-known name of the aged high-priest ELI is the same word. His name, אֵלִי (similar in meaning to the Greek proper name Τρόφιμος, 'a foster-child,' or still more like Διοσφεύης, a Jove nutritus ['malim certe alumnus Ἰοῦα,' pro ἡλίου, 'foster-child of Jehovah,' Gesen. Thes. 1029]), is rendered by the LXX. Ἡλὶ (Alex. Ἡλῆ); and by the Vulg. Heli, in no less than thirty passages (Dutripou, Concordantie Bibl. Sacr. Vulg. p. 600). This is, no doubt, a more correct rendering of the name than the A. V. Eli.

In the Apocryphal book 2 Esdras i. 2, HELI occurs as one of the ancestors of Esdras or Ezra. In the genealogy, however, of the canonical book, Ezra vii. 2, 3, the name is omitted, as well as two others, between Abihub and Amariah.

In Luke iii. 23, Heli occupies a prominent place in the ancestry of our Lord, owing to the discussion of the question, which the proximity of his name to that of Jesus has occasioned, how was he the grandfather of Christ? According to the letter of the gospel in the A. V. version, Heli was the father of Joseph, the reputed father of the Saviour; and this relationship has been stoutly defended of late in the learned writings of Lord A. Hervey on the Genealogy of Christ. It is impossible, however, on a strict comparison of the originals of the two ancestral tables of Jesus Christ, as given in St. Matthew (ch. i.) and St. Luke (ch. iii.), to avoid the natural conclusion that Joseph the carpenter was the real son of Jacob, and the son-in-law of Heli, through his espoused wife, the Virgin Mary. The passages in the Greek Text are, (1) Ἰακώβ δὲ ἐγέννησε τὸν Ἰωσήφ τὸν ἄνδρα Μαρίας [Matt. i. 16], and (2) Ἰωσήφ τοῦ Ἡλὶ [Luke iii. 23]. The former passage, 'Jacob begat Joseph the husband of Mary,' plainly predicates a literal and natural paternity of Jacob to Mary's husband Joseph; while the second only vaguely connects Joseph with Heli—'Joseph of Heli;' so that on the simple assumption, which the entire nature of the case forces on us, that Heli was actually the virgin's father, we need only insert the phrase 'son-in-law' between the two names [q. d. 'Joseph, who was the son-in-law of Heli,'] and the two passages will become compatible, and our Lord's natural descent from king David as the 'fruit of his loins' (Acts ii. 30) will be avouched to the satisfaction of so many prophecies and strong assertions of Holy Scripture. For a full discussion of the question the reader is referred to the article GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST, from which it will appear that while Joseph, the legal father of Christ, was only a link in law between the Saviour and His royal ancestor David, through Solomon, from whom Joseph was lineally descended through his father Jacob, Heli, the maternal grandfather of our Lord, connected Him by natural line with king David through his son Nathan, Solomon's elder brother.—P. H.

HELIODORUS (Ἡλιόδωρος). 1. The treasurer of Seleucus Philopator. This king, being impoverished by his annual tribute of 1000 talents to the Romans, and tempted by false accounts of the enormous wealth stored up in the Jewish temple, sent Heliodorus to plunder these treasures. The attempt threw the people of Jerusalem, and especially the high-priest Onias III., into great anguish of mind; and in consequence of their prayers, the sacrilege of Heliodorus was prevented by a 'great apparition' of a horse 'with a terrible rider upon him, who had complete harness of gold,' and was accompanied by two strong and lovely youths, who scourged Heliodorus 'with many sore stripes,' while the horse 'ran fiercely and smote at him with his fore feet' (2 Maccab. iii. 8-27). Heliodorus desisted from the attempt, and testified to Seleucus that the temple was defended by 'an especial power of God' (v. 38). This story of the vision of Heliodorus, familiar to all from Raphael's great picture in the Vatican, receives no support either from Josephus (Antiq. xii. 3. 3), or from the author of the 'fourth book of Maccabees.' This writer tells the story of Apollonius, but with different details. Jahn finds a supposed allusion to the story in a passage of Polybius, quoted by Josephus (Hebr. Commonwealth xci. E. T.) Heliodorus

* The writers in Herzog's Encycl. and the Dict. of Biography are mistaken in saying that the author of De Maccabees does not allude to the miracle.

afterwards poisoned Seleucus, and aimed at seizing the crown, but was suppressed by Antiochus Epiphanes, with the assistance of Eumenes and Attalus of Pergamos, B.C. 175 (Appian, Syriaca xlv. 60-70; Dan. xi. 20; Joseph. Antiq. xii. 3. 4; 2 Maccab. iii. 1; 4 Maccab.; Liv. xii. 24; Jahn, l. c.; Prideaux, Connect. ii. 162, sq.)

2. Heliodorus, son of Theodosius, and born at Emesa in Syria, about A.D. 365. He became Bishop of Tricca in Thessaly, and strictly enforced celibacy on his priests. He is the author of an admirable Greek romance called Æthiopica; and Nicephorus (H. E. xii. 34) says that, being required to suppress the book or lay down his bishopric, on the ground that the story injured the morals of the young, he chose the latter alternative (μᾶλλον ἐλεῖσθαι τὴν ἱεροσύνην λαπεῖν ἢ ἐκ μέσου τιθέναι τὸ σύγγραμμα). But the story is almost certainly false, for the Æthiopica (or Charideia, as it was sometimes called) was the most moral of Greek novels, and has no πονημάτων ἐρωτικά (Nicephor. l. c.) in it (Socrates, H. E., v. 22; Phot. Cod. 72).—F. W. F.

HELKATH (הֶלְקָת; Sept. Ἑλεκεθ; Alex.

Χελκᾶθ), a border town of Asher assigned to the Levites (Josh. xix. 25; xxi. 31). In 1 Chron. vi. 75 Hukok is substituted for Helkath in the list of Levitical towns, probably through some error of the transcriber; that the Hukkok of Josh. xix. 34 cannot be intended is evident from the fact that this town was not on the boundary of Asher, but towards Issachar. Helkath has not been identified. In the Onomasticon it is simply mentioned, by Eusebius as Ἑθᾶν, by Jerome as Elcath; but neither seems to have known it. Van de Velde proposes to identify it with Ukkrih or Ikkrith, a town with ancient ruins on the high land between Wady el-'Ayûn and Wady el-Kurn (Mém. 320), but this seems a mere random conjecture, sustained neither by the locality nor the name.—W. L. A.

meris tawn epiboulwn, apparently from their reading הֶלְקָת), a place where twelve of the servants of David, and twelve Benjamites who adhered to Ishbosheth, engaged in single combat and were all slaughtered (2 Sam. ii. 16). It was near Gibeon [GIBEON]. Ewald approves the reading which the LXX. seem to have followed, as that which alone gives a suitable meaning to the name (Gesch. Isr., ii. 575, note 1). Gesenius renders by 'the field of swords,' which can hardly be admitted, for though חֶרֶב is used in the sense of an 'edge,' it is never used simply for 'sword.' First gives Felsenkahlheit, 'rock-smoothness,' as the meaning; the place being smooth and level as a surface of rock. Aquila gives κλήρος τῶν στερῶν, and the Vulg. Ager robustorum, taking חֶרֶב in a figurative sense, of which, however, there is no other instance.—W. L. A.

HELL must be carefully freed from the well-known usage which restricts its meaning to 'the abode of the wicked after death,' if we would make it commensurate in signification with the original words represented by it in the O. and N. T. These terms, no less than the English equivalent, have occasioned much discussion as to their Biblical sense. Dr. Barrow (Serm. on the Creed [Art. 'He descended into Hell'], Works [Oxford 1830], vol.

v. pp. 416, 417) thus indicates the chief questions which have been raised on the subject: 'Is Hell a state of being, or a place? if a place, is it that where bodies are reposed, or that to which souls go? if a place of souls, is it the place of good and happy souls, or that of bad and miserable ones; or indifferently, and in common of both those; for such a manifold ambiguity these words have, or are made to have; and each of these senses are embraced and contended for.' A solution of these questions, if indeed practicable in every instance, would require too long an examination of many passages of the sacred writings for this article; we must be content with noticing the chief points; but it will be convenient first to explain the words which occur in the original for the English word 'Hell.'

On the Hebrew and Greek terms.—The three words, which all but monopolise the subject, are הֵינֶם in the O. T.; and Ἀδης and Γέννα in the N. T. הֵינֶם occurs 65 times; in 61 of these it is rendered in the LXX. by Ἀδης; twice by Θνάτος (2 Sam. xxii. 6, and Prov. xxiii. 14); and twice omitted in the common text (Job xxiv. 9; Ezek.

xxxii. 21). In the Vulg. הֵינֶם is translated 48 times by Infernus, and 17 times by Inferi [mostly Inferi (plur)]. In our A. V. it is represented 31 times by Grave, 31 times by Hell, and 3 times by Pit. In the N. T. our word Hell occurs 23 times; 12 times it stands for Γέννα, and 11 times [perhaps the twelfth should be added, see Tischendorf and Bruder (Concord.) on Rev. iii. 7] for Ἀδης. The Vulg. closely follows the original in its N. T. renderings; in all the twelve passages Γέννα is simply copied into Gehenna, while Infernus stands for every occurrence of Ἀδης, except once (Matt. xvi. 18), where the phrase πύλαι ᾧδου ('gates of hell') becomes 'portae inferi.' Since, therefore, הֵינֶם, Ἀδης, and Γέννα, are employed in the sacred original to designate the mysteries of HELL, we proceed to give first their probable derivation, and then their meaning, so far as Holy Scripture assists in the discovery thereof.

Their Derivation.—I. הֵינֶם (or, as it is occasionally written, הֵינֶם) is by most of the old writers (see Cocceius, Lex., pp. 840, 841; Schindler, Lex. Pent., 1782; Robinson, Key to Hebr. Bible, ii. 217; and Leigh, Crit. Sacra, i. 238; ii. 6) referred for its origin to נָשָׂא, to demand, seek, or ask. They are not agreed as to the mode of connecting the derivative with this root; Cocceius suggests an absurd reason, 'הֵינֶם notat eum locum in quo qui est in questione est' (!) A more respectable solution is suggested by those who see in the insatiableness of הֵינֶם (Prov. xxx. 15, 16) a good ground for connecting it with the root in question. Thus Fagius on Gen. xxxvii.; Buxtorf, Lexicon, s. v., referring to Is. v. 14; Habak. ii. 5; Prov. xxvii. 20. (Ernst Meier, Hebr. W.-w.-b. p. 187, also adopts this root, but he is far-fetched and obscure in his view of its relation to the derived word).*

Boettcher (De Inferis, p. 76, sec. 159) finds in the root לש , to be hollow, a better origin for our word. Gesenius (Theor. 1347), who adopts the same derivation, supposes that לש means to dig out, and so contrives to unite לש and לש , by making the primary idea of digging lead to the derived one of seeking (see Job iii. 21). Boettcher goes on to connect the German words Hohl (hollow) and

Höhle (cavity) with the idea indicated by לש , and timidly suggests the possibility of Hölle (Hell) coming from Höhle. Whilst decidedly rejecting this derivation, we do not object to his derivation of the Hebrew noun; amidst the avowed uncertainty of the case, it seems to be the least objectionable of the suggestions which have been offered, and, to provide an intelligible sense for the word Sheol, most in harmony with many Biblical passages. Boettcher defines the term to mean 'vastus locus subterraneus' (p. 72, sec. 153). This agrees very well with the rendering of our A. V. in so far as it has used the comprehensive word Hell, which properly signifies 'a covered or concealed place.' II. The universally allowed statement, that the N. T. has shed a light on the mysteries of life and immortality which is only in an inferior degree discovered in the O. T., is seldom more distinctly verified than in the uncertainty which attaches to Sheol (the difficulty of distinguishing its various degrees of meaning, which it is generally felt exist, and which our A. V. has endeavoured to express by an equal balance between Hell and Grave), in contrast with the distinction which is implied in the about equally frequent terms of Hades and Gehenna, now to be described. The Ἅδης of the N. T. was suggested, no doubt, by its frequent occurrence in the LXX. The word was originally unspirited, as in Homer's Ἅϊδαο πύλαι (Il. v. 646; ix. 312), and Hesiod's $\text{Ἄϊδω κύνα χαλκεόφρονον}$ (Theog. 311), and Pindar's Ἄϊδαο λαχεῖν (Pyth. v. 130). This form of the word gives greater credibility to the generally received derivation of it from a privat. and ἰδεῖν .* Plutarch, accordingly, explains it by $\text{δεῖδēs καὶ ἀόρατον}$ (De Isid. et Osir., Todten [Berne 1853], and more briefly in his art. Hades (Herzog, v. 441 [Clark's Trans. ii. 468]). His defence is based on the many passages which urge the insatiable demand of Sheol for all men, such as those we have mentioned in the text, and Gen. xxxvii. 35; 1 Sam. xxviii.; Ps. vi. 6, and lxxxix. 49. See also Venema (on Ps. xvi. 10); J. A. Quenstedt, Tract. de Sepultura Veterum, ix. 1.

* The learned authors of Liddle and Scott's Greek Lex. (s. v. Ἅδης) throw some doubt on this view of the origin of the word, because of its aspirated beginning, in Attic Greek. But surely this is precarious ground. Is it certain that even in Attic writers it was invariably aspirated? Æschylus (Sept. c. Theb [Paley] 310) has Ἄϊδα ποιάψαι (with the lenis), according to the best editing. It is true that this is in a chorus, but in the Agam. 1505, also a choral line, we read $\text{μηδὲν ἐν Ἀϊδου μεγαλαυχέτω}$ (with the aspirate); as if the usage were uncertain. Possibly in the elliptical phrase ἐν Ἀϊδου [scil. ὀκῶ] the aspirate occurs because the genitive is really the name of the God (not of the region, which might, for distinction, have been then unspirited).

p. 382), and in the Etymol. Magn. Ἅδης is defined as $\text{χωρὸς ἀφ' ἧγες, σκότους αἰωνίου καὶ ἰσοφου πεπληρωμένον . . . ἐν ᾧ οὐδὲν βλέπομεν}$. Hades is thus 'the invisible place or region;' 'Locus visibus nostris subtractus,' as Grotius defines it. III. Gehenna (Γέεννα) is composed of the two Hebrew words, גֵּי הִנּוֹם (valley), and הִנּוֹם (Hinnom, the name of the proprietor of the valley). In the Sept. Falerna is used in Josh. xviii. 16, to designate 'the valley of the son of Hinnom,' the full expression of which is גֵּי בְּרֵהֶם .

The shorter appellation גֵּי הִנּוֹם occurs in the same verse. The Rabbinical writers derive הִנּוֹם from נָהַם , 'rugire' [to groan or mourn, in Ezek. xxiv. 23], as if indicative of the cries of the children in the horrid rites of the Moloch-worship (see Buxtorf, Lex. Rab., p. 108; Glassius [ed. Dathii], Philolog. Sacr. i. 806). The etymological remarks have paved our way to the next section of our subject.

The Biblical meaning of these three terms.—I.

Meanings of Ἅϊδης . (1) The 'Grave.' Much controversy has arisen whether within the meaning of SHEOL should be included 'the grave,' indeed this is the only question of difficulty. The fact, which we have already stated, that our A. V. translates Ἅϊδης quite as often by 'grave' as by the general term 'hell,' supplies a prima facie reason for including it. Without, however, insisting on the probability that polemical theology, rather than Biblical science, influenced our translators, at least occasionally, in their rendering of the word, we may here adduce on the other side the telling fact, that of all the ancient versions not one translates in any passage the Hebrew Sheol by the equivalent of grave. The other Greek translators, like the venerable LXX., so far as their fragments shew (see Origen, Hexapla, passim), everywhere give Ἄϊδης for Ἅϊδης (sometimes they use for the locative case the older and better phrase ἐν Ἀϊδου , sometimes the more recent and vulgar ἐς τὸν Ἀϊδην , ἐν τῷ Ἀϊδῷ). The Samaritan text in the seven passages of the Pentateuch has either שְׁיֹל (Siol) or שְׁיֹאֵל . Onkelos and Jonathan everywhere, except in five passages, retain שְׁיֹאֵל . The Peschito everywhere in both Testaments renders the Hebrew Sheol and the Greek Hades by שְׁיֹאֵל [שְׁיֹאֵל , Shiul]; and, as we have already seen, the Vulgate translates the same words in both the O. T. and the N. T. by inferus (plur. Inferi mostly) and above all Infernum (see above for particulars). It is to the later Targumists (the Pseudo-Jonathan and the Jerusalem Targum), and afterwards to the Rabbinical doctors of the middle ages, that we trace the version of the 'sepulchre' and 'the grave' (thus in Gen. xxxvii. 35; xlii. 38; xlv. 29, 31, these Targumists rendered Sheol by בֵּית קְבוּרָתָא [the house of burial]; similarly did they render Ps. cxli. 7; Job vii. 9; xiv. 13; xvii. 13, 16; xxi. 13; Eccl. ix. 10, and other passages, in which it is observable how often they have been followed by our translators.* In the note below we have quoted reasons which have led learned men, who have especially examined the subject, to exclude the grave (specifically understood as a made or artificial one) from the proper meaning of Sheol. We cannot but accept their view in critical exactness. But there is an inexact and generic sense of Sheol in which the word grave well expresses the meaning of the Scripture passages just mentioned, and (in justice to A. V. it may be admitted) of most of the others, which our translators rendered by this word.* Of 319-321; and, more fully, Boettcher (pp. 68-70, sec. 146-149) who quotes Raschi and Aben Ezra [on Gen. xxxvii. 35]; D. Kimchi (Lib. Radic. s. v.

שְׁאוֹל); and other Rabbis who expressly admit the grave within the scope of the meaning of Sheol; Boettcher also quotes a very long array of commentators and lexicographers [R. Mardochai Nathan, with extravagant one-sidedness, in his Hebr. Concord, gives no other sense to Sheol but קֶבֶר, the grave], who follow the Rabbinical doctors herein; and he adds the names of such writers as deny the meaning of the 'grave' to the Hebrew Sheol: among these occur the learned Dutch divines Vitringa and Venema. The latter of these expressly affirms

'שְׁאוֹל nullo modo ad sepulchrum pertinebit' (Comment ad Ps., vol. i., p. 504). To the authorities he mentions we would add, as maintaining the same view, our own learned Henry Ainsworth (on Gen. xxxvii. 35, Works, p. 135) who draws an important distinction; 'שְׁאוֹל, the grave, the word meaneth not the grave digged or made with hands, which is named in Hebrew קֶבֶר, but it meaneth the common place or state of death'—a similar distinction is drawn by Luther [Enarr. in Genes. xlii. 38]; קֶבֶר is only the grave in which an actual interment takes place; none that die unburied can have this word used of them; their receptacle is שְׁאוֹל, 'commune quoddam receptaculum non corporum tantum sed et animarum, ubi omnes mortui congregantur' (Ann. Seneca [lib. viii. controvers. 4] observes between natural burial and artificial—'Omnibus natura sepulchrum dedit,' etc. So Lucan, vii. 818, says—'Capit omnia tellus Quæ genuit; coelo tegitur, qui non habet urnam.' Pliny (Nat. Hist. vii. 54) distinguishes between natural burial, by applying to it the word sepelire; and burial by ceremony, by using of it the synonym humare); Nicolaus (De Sepulchris Hebr. i. 8-14) who shews that שְׁאוֹל is never used of funeral pomp, nor of the burial of the body in the ground; I. Eberhard Busmann, who [in 1682] wrote Dissertatio philol. de Sheol Hebr., makes a statement to the effect that he had examined all the passages in the O. T., and pronounces of them thus—'Nullum eorum (excepto forsan uno vel altero, de quo tamen adhuc dubitari potest) de sepulchro necessario est intelligendum . . . multa tamen contra ita sunt comparata ut de sepulchro nullo modo intelligi possint, nec debeant.' Some modern writers, who have specially examined the subject, also deny that שְׁאוֹL ever means 'the grave.' Thus Breecher, on the Immortality of the Soul as held by the Jews (and Pareau, Comment. de Immort. ac vite ful. notit. 1807).

this more vague sense Ussher (Works, iii. 324) says—'When Sheol is said to signify the grave, the term grave must be taken in as large a sense as it is in our Saviour's speech, John v. 28; and in Is. xxvi. 19, according to the LXX. reading; upon which passage writes Origen thus—'Here and in many other places the graves of the dead are to be understood, not such only as we see are builded for the receiving of men's bodies—either cut out in stones, or digged down in the earth; but every place wherein a man's body lieth either entire or in part . . . otherwise they which are not committed to burial, nor laid in graves, but have ended their life in shipwrecks, deserts, and such like ways, should not seem to be reckoned among those which are said to be raised from the grave' (In Esai. lib. 28 citatus a Pamphilo, in Apol.) We have here, then, the first meaning of the Hebrew שְׁאוֹL, largely applied, as we have seen, in our A. V. to 'the grave,' considered in a universal sense (see the passages in the last note), commensurate with death itself as to the extent of its signification. (Comp. 'the grave and gate of death' of the Engl. Liturgy, Collect for Easter Even.) Though we carefully exclude the artificial grave, or קֶבֶר, from this category, there is no doubt, as Bishop Lowth has well shewn (De Sacra Poesi Hebr. Prael vii. [ed. Oxon. with notes of Michaelis and Rosenmüller, 1821], pp. 65-69), that the Hebrew poets drew all the imagery, with which they describe the state and condition of the dead, from the funeral rites and pomp, and from the vaulted sepulchres of their great men. The Bishop's whole treatment of the subject is quite worth perusal. We can only quote his final remarks—'You will see this transcendent imagery better and more completely displayed in that noble triumphal song which was composed by Isaiah (xiv. 4-27) . . . previous to the death of the king of Babylon. Ezekiel has also grandly illustrated the same scene, with similar machinery, in the last prophecy concerning the fall of Pharaoh (xxxii. 18-32).' For an excellent vindication of the A. V. in many of its translations of the grave, we refer the reader to the treatise of Archbishop Ussher (Answer to the Jesuit's Challenge, Works [ed. Elrington], vol. iii., pp. 319-324 and 332-340. We doubt not that, if grave is an admissible sense of שְׁאוֹL, our translators have, on the whole, made a judicious selection of the passages which will best bear the sense: their purpose was a popular one, and they accomplished it, in the instance of uncertain words and phrases, by giving them the most intelligible turn they would bear, as in the case before us. We undertake not to decide whether it would be better to leave the broad and generic word Sheol, as the great versions of antiquity did, everywhere; whether (e.g.) Jacob's lament (Gen. xxxvii. 35; xlii. 38) and such like xliv. 29, 31; i Sam. ii. 6; i Kings ii. 6, 9; Job vii. 9; xiv. 13; xvii. 13; xxi. 13; xxiv. 19; Ps. vi. 5 (Hebr. B. 6); xxx. 3 (4); xxxi. 17 (18); xlix. 14 (15) [twice]; xlix. 15 (16); lxxxviii. 3 (4); lxxxix. 48 (49); cxli. 7; Prov. i. 12; xxx. 16; Eccl. ix. 10; Cantic. viii. 6; Is. xiv. 11 [margin, of v. 9 has grave]; xxxviii. 10, 18; Ezek. xxxi. 15; Hos. xiii. 14 [twice]; and in Jonah ii. 2 (3) the margin has 'grave.'

passages would be more suitably, if not correctly,* rendered by the simple retention of the original word, or the equally indefinite hades. (2) The other meaning of ḥēl, rendered Hell in thirty-one passages of A. V., according to the more ancient and, as it seems to us, preferable opinion, makes it local: i. e., the place of disembodied spirits. ('Αἰδης δὲ τόπος ἡμῶν ἀείδης, ἡγουν ἀφανὴς καὶ ἀγνωστος, ὁ τὰς ψυχὰς ἡμῶν ἐντρεῦθεν ἐκδημοῦσας δεχόμενος, Andr. Caesarius in Apocal. c. 63.) A later opinion supposes the word to indicate 'not the place where souls departed are, but the state and condition of the dead, or their permansion in death,' as Bishop Pearson calls it (Creed [ed. Chevallier], p. 439). On this opinion, which that great divine 'cannot admit as a full or proper exposition,' we shall say nothing more than that it is at best only a deduction from the foregoing local definition. That definition we have stated in the broadest terms, because, in reference to Dr. Is. Barrow's enumeration (given at the beginning of this article) of the questions which have arisen on the subject before us, we believe that Holy Scripture warrants the most ample of all the positions suggested by that eminent writer, to the effect that the Sheol or Hell, of which we treat, is not merely 'the place of good and happy souls,' or 'that of bad and miserable ones,' but 'indifferently and in common of both those.' We propose to arrange the Biblical passages so as to describe, first, the state of the occupants of Sheol, and, secondly, the locality of it, in some of its prominent features. As to the first point, Sheol is (a) the receptacle of the spirits of all that depart this life.† This appears from Ps. lxxxix. 47, 48; and Is. xxxviii. 18, 19 (in which latter verse the opposition in its universal sense between sheol and the state of life in this world is to be observed). We do not hesitate with Archbishop Ussher (Works, iii. 318) to translate ḥēl in these passages 'hell' or 'sheol,' instead of 'grave,' as in A. V. Sheol, therefore, is (β') the abode of the wicked, Num. xvi. 33; Job xxiv. 19; Ps. ix. 17 (Hebr. Bib. 18); xxxi. 17 (18); Prov. v. 5; ix. 18; Is. lvii. 9; and (γ') of the good [both in their 'disembodied' condition], Ps. xvi. 10, comp. with Acts ii. 27, 31; Ps. xxx. 3 (4); xlix. 15 (16); lxxxvi. 13; Is. xxxviii. 10, comp. with Job. iii. 17-19; Hos. xiii. 14, comp. with 1 Cor. xv. 55. With regard to the second point, touching some local features of Sheol, we find it described as very deep (Job xi. 8); dark (Job x. 21, 22); (yet conspicuous and open to the eye of God, Job xxvi. 6); with 'valleys' [Gesen., Thes. 1348] or depths of various gradations (Ps. lxxxvi. 13 [comp. with Deut. xxxii. 22]; Prov. ix. 18); with bars (Job xvii. 16 [comp. with Jonah ii. 6] and gates (Is. xxxviii. 10); situated beneath us;^{*} hence the dead are said 'to go down' [דָּרָךְ] to Sheol, Num. xvi. 30, 33; Ezek. xxxi. 15, 16, 17 [comp. with Job vii. 9; Gen. xlii. 38]). We have seen how some have derived the name of Sheol from its insatiability; such quality is often attributed to it; it is all-devouring (Prov. i. 12); never satisfied (Prov. xxx. 16; Is. v. 14), and inexorable (Cant. viii. 7).

II. There is in the Hades ('Αἰδης) of the N. T. an equally ample signification with the Sheol of the O. T., as the abode of both happy and miserable beings. Its characteristics are not dissimilar; it is represented as 'a prison' (comp. 1 Pet. iii. 19, where inhabitants of hades are called τὰ ἐν φυλακῇ πνεύματα); with gates and bars (πόλαι ᾄδου, Matt. xvi. 18; comp. with the phrase εἰς Ἄδου of Acts ii. 27, 31, with the ellipsis of ὁμοῦ or οἴκον); and locks (the 'keys' of Hades, αἱ κλεῖς τοῦ Ἀδου, being in the hands of Christ, Rev. i. 18); its situation is also downwards (see the εἰς ᾄδου καταβιβασθήσῃ of Matt. xi. 23, and Luke x. 15). As might be expected, there is more plainly indicated in the N. T. the separate condition of the righteous and the wicked; to indicate this separation other terms are used; thus, in Luke xxiii. 43, Paradise (παράδεισος—no doubt different from that of St. Paul, 2 Cor. xii. 4, which is designated, in Rev. ii. 7, as ὁ παράδεισος τοῦ Θεοῦ, the supernal†

5 and elsewhere, and rendered Rephaim and Giants) is of the same form, but probably of a different origin (see Gesenius, Thes. 1302).

* Comp. Joseph. (Antiq. xviii. 1. 3), who when describing the tenets of the Jewish sects attributes to the Pharisees the belief of a future state, in which 'rewards and punishments' will be dealt out 'to men in their disembodied state' (ταῖς ψυχαῖς) 'under the earth' (ὕπὸ χθονὸς δικαιώσεις τε καὶ τιμὰς, κ. τ. λ.). On the phrase of the creed 'descended into Hell,' and sundry uses of Ἅδης and κατελθεῖν as not necessarily implying local descent, but rather 'removal from one place to another,' see Ussher, Works, iii. 392, 393.

† The distinction between the upper and the lower Paradise was familiar to the Jews. In Eusebius' Eccl. Hist. i. 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000.

* There is some force in the observation often made (see Corn-a Lapidé, on Gen. xxxvii. 35; Bellarmine and others, adduced by Leigh, Crit. Sacra, i. 239), that 'it was not the grave of Joseph which Jacob meant; for he thought indeed that his son was devoured of wild beasts and not buried.' See more on this passage in Pearson, Creed [ed. Chevallier], p. 437; Fulke, Translations, etc., p. 314; both which writers defend the version of grave. Ainsworth in loc. (among the older commentators), and Knobel (among the moderns), stand for the general word hell [Knobel, Schattenreich]. Rosenmüller learnedly states both views, and leans in favour of 'locum, ubi mortui umbrarum instar degunt,' Scholia, vol. i., p. 576.

† Among the Scriptural designations of the inhabitants of Sheol is רפאים קהל (in Prov. xxi.

16) is rendered 'congregation of the dead' (or departed), in A. V. This is better than LXX. συναγωγη γιγάντων; and Vulg. 'coetus gigantum.'

There is force in the word קהל thus applied, derived from the use of the word to designate the great 'congregation' of the Jewish nation; see vol. i. p. 554, col. 1, of this work. For the use of the word רפאים, as applicable to the dead, see, especially, Böttcher, de Infer. pp. 94-10, sec. 193-204. The word occurs in this sense also in the grand passage of Is. xiv. [In ver. 9 'Sheol stirs up its Rephaim,' on the entrance of the spirit of the king of Babylon.] רפאים is met with in six other places in the same sense of departed spirits. It is connected with רפה, 'weak,' which occurs in Num. xiii. 18, and other passages (see Fürst Hebr. W.-b. ii. 383). The gentile noun (mentioned in Gen. xiv.

Paradise; see Robinson, Lexicon, N. T., pp. 13, 547; Wahl, Clavis, N. T., p. 376; Kuinoel [Ed. Lond.] on N. T. vol. ii. 237; and, especially, Meyer, Kommentar u. d. Neue Test. [ed. 4] vi. 292, and the authorities there quoted by him) is used to describe that part of Hades which the blessed dead inhabit—a figurative expression, so well adapted for the description of a locality of happiness, that the inspired writers employ it to describe the three happiest places, the Eden of Innocence, the Hades of departed saints, and the heaven of their glorious rest [PARADISE]. Another figurative expression used to designate the happy part of Hades is 'Abraham's bosom,' ὁ κόλπος Ἀβραάμ, Luke xvi. 22. (St. Augustine, who says [Quæst. Evang. ii. 38]; 'Sinus Abrahæ requies est beatorum pauperum . . . in quo post hanc vitam recipiuntur,' yet doubts whether hades is used at all in N. T. in a good sense. It is too strong a statement to say that the great father denies this use of the word (Smith's Dict. of Bible, i. 781); he does not do this, he only expresses his doubt, arising from imperfect knowledge. He says [Ep. cxxxvii., Works ii. 689], 'Whether the bosom of Abraham, where the wicked Dives was, when in his torment he beheld the poor man at rest, were either to be deemed the same as Paradise, or to be thought to pertain to hell or hades, I cannot define,* non facile dixerim; so also he writes on Ps. lxxv. [Works, iv. 912]). For an explanation of the phrase, see ABRAHAM'S BOSOM. III. We need not linger over the Biblical sense of our last word Γέννα.† As Ἰλαδδευος is not limited to the finite happiness of Hades, but embraces in certain passages the ultimate blessedness of heaven, so there is no violence in supposing that Γέννα (from the finite signification which it possibly bears in Matt. v. 29, 30; xxiii. 15, equivalent to the Τάπρασ referred to by St. Peter, 2 Epist. ii. 4, as the place where the much of their curious opinions on the subject is collected. In p. 298 are given the seven names of the heavenly Paradise; while in the next three are contained the seven names of the lower Paradise of Hades.

* Bishop Jeremy Taylor (Works, by Heber, vol. vi. p. 552) justly censures the hesitancy of the great Latin Father: 'If Christ's soul was in Paradise, he was in Hades: in vain, therefore, does St. Austin torment himself to tell how Christ could be in both places at once, when it is no harder to tell how a man may be in England and London at the same time.' Hades is no doubt mentioned as the name of the region to which Christ's soul went after the sufferings of Calvary, previous to his resurrection, Acts ii. 31. Once (Luke xvi. 23) the same term bears undoubtedly a bad sense, equivalent to Gehenna; but this fact only proves the indefiniteness of the meaning of Αἰδης in the N. T. like that of שְׁאוֹל in the O. T.

† We think it worth while to refer the reader to a 'Discourse' by the learned Joseph Mede (Works, p. 31-33) on Gehenna, which he shews to have not been used to designate 'Hell' before the captivity. He, in the same treatise, dwells on certain Hebrew words and phrases, which were in use previous to that epoch for designating Hades and its inhabitants—among these he especially notes רַפְאִים and קֶהָל, which we have observed on above.

fallen angels are reserved unto judgment, or 'until sentence,' comp. Jude v. 6) goes on to mean, in perhaps most of its occurrences in N. T., the final condition of the lost, as in Matt. xxiii. 33, where the expression ἡ κληρονομία τῆς γέεννης means probably the condemnation [or sentence] to Gehenna, as the ultimate doom. [GEHENNA.]

Synonymous Words and Phrases.—This article would not be complete without at least a cursory enumeration of some words and phrases, which, if not strictly synonymous with, are yet illustrative of 'hell.' (Most of them are given by Eisenmenger, Entdeck. Jud., ii. 324, and Galatinus, de Arcanis, vi. 7, p. 345.) 1. גֵּהֶנְמָה, in Ps. cxv. 17, where the phrase, כָּל־יְרֵדָהּ, 'all that go down into silence,' is in LXX., πάντες οἱ καταβαίνοντες εἰς ἄδου, while the Vulg. has 'omnes qui descendunt in inferum' (comp. Ps. xciv. 17). 2. אֲבִרֹן, in Job xxvi. 6, is in poetical apposition with שְׁאוֹל (comp. Prov. xxvii. 20 [Kethib], where אֵל is in conjunction with שָׁ, forming an hendiadys for destructive hell; LXX. Αἰδης καὶ ἀπώλεια; Vulg. infernus et perditio; A. V. 'Hell and destruction').† 3. בֹּאֵר, שְׁחַת, Ps. lv. 24; A. V. 'pit of destruction'; LXX.

Φρέαρ διαφθοράς; Vulg. Puteus interitus (see also passages in which בֹּאֵר and שְׁחַת occur separately). 4. עֲצָמוֹת, with or without חֵשֶׁךְ, in Ps. cvii. 10, and other passages; LXX. Σκία θανάτου; Vulg. Umbra mortis; A. V. 'shadow of death.' 5.

תַּחְתִּיּוֹת־הָאָרֶץ, in Is. xlv. 23; A. V. 'lower parts of the earth' [Sheol or Hades, Gesen.]; LXX. Τὰ θεμέλια τῆς γῆς; Vulg. Extrema terre (comp. Ezek. xxvi. 20, etc., where the phrase is inverted, בֹּאֵר תַּחְתִּיּוֹת; of similar meaning is תַּחְתִּיּוֹת בֹּאֵר, Ps. lxxxviii. 6 (7)). 6. תַּפְתָּחַת, in Is. xxx. 33 [ac-ording to Eisenmenger]; for another application of this word see Gesenius, Thes. s. v.; and Rosenmüller, in loc. 7. The phrase first used of Abraham, Gen. xxv. 8 (where it occurs, in the solemn description of the holy patriarch's end, midway between death and burial), 'He was gathered to his fathers,' is best interpreted of the departure of the soul to Hades to the company of those who preceded him thither (see Cajetan, in loc., and Gesen. Thes., s. v. אָסַף [Niphal], p. 131, col. 1). 8. τὸ σκοτὸς τὸ ἐξωτὸν, 'the outer darkness' of Matt. viii. 12, et passim, refers probably to what Josephus (Jell. Jud. iii. 25) calls ἄδης σκοτιώτερος, 'the darker Hades.'

Confirmation of these Biblical statements in Heathen Tradition.—St. Chrysostom (Homil. ix. on 2 Corinth., Opera, x. 502; and, still more fully, De Fato et Providentia, orat. iv., Opera, ii. 766) says on this subject:—'The Greeks, though foolish in many points, and barbarians, and poets, and philosophers, and indeed all mankind, do herein agree with us, though not all alike, and say that there are certain seats of judgment in Hades: so manifest and confest a thing is this.' On no subject of revelation is witness so closely borne by heathendom as on this. The great poems of Homer (a vast deposit of primeval and patriarchal tradition, outside of Scripture revelation, see Gladstone's Homer and the Homeric Age, vol. i. pp. 7-9) are full of the doctrine of a future state (Gladstone, ii. 167-171). Hades (and below it Tartarus) is subterranean, Il. xx. 63; Od. v. 185; dark and spacious, with mountains, woods, and waters, Il. viii. 16; Od. x. 509; having strong gates, Il. viii. 366; Od. xi. 622; inhabited by the shades of all who quit life. It is a very remarkable coincidence that conspicuous among the inhabitants of the Homeric Tartarus and Hades are Giants and Titans; while the Rephaim [same word as Giants] are a considerable part of the population of the Hebrew Sheol (see above, and Gladstone, ii. 163-166, where a comparison is made between Homer and certain passages of the O. T. and the Apocrypha). We cannot but call the reader's attention to the wonderful similarity in detail between the grand passages of Is. xiv. and Ezek. xxxii. on the one hand, and the Nekyia [or as Dante calls it, the Inferno] of Odyssey xi., imitated so fully by Virgil, Æn. vi., and repeated in another relation in the beginning of Odyssey xxiv. Details are here impossible; but who can detect without admiration the similarity of thought between the sensation in Sheol which thrills through its shadowy people when the spirit of 'Lucifer' enters ['Hell from beneath is moved for thee . . . it stirreth up the dead for thee, even all the chief ones of the earth,' Is. xiv. 9], and the excitement in Hades of the spirits of the mighty dead when Achilles enters (Od. xxiv. 19-21)—

Ὅτι οὐ μὲν περὶ κείνων ὁμιλεῖν ἀγγέλλοιεν δὲ
Ἥλιδ' ἐπὶ ψυχῇ Ἀγαμέμνονος Ἀτρεΐδου
Ἀχηνάεω· περὶ δ' ἄλλαι ἀγγεγυράδ'. κ. τ. λ.

(Comp. also Ezek. xxxii. 21 ['The strong among the mighty shall speak to him,' the king of Egypt, 'out of the midst of hell,' etc.], and Od. xi. and Æn. vi., passim). On the general subject, a couplet preserved by Clement of Alex., Strom. v., ascribed to either Diphilus or Philemon, distinctly mentions the twofold division of Hades (the Elysium and the Tartarus), for the blest and the miserable:—

Καὶ γὰρ καὶ Ἄδην δύο τρίβους νομίζομεν
Μίαν δικαίων, χατέραν δαιμόνων ὁδόν.

Jewish Opinions.—For these the reader is referred to the Apocryphal books—2 Esdr. ii. 29; iv. 8; viii. 53; Tobit xiii. 2; Wisdom xvii. 14; Eccles. xxi. 10; li. 5, 6; Song of Childr. ver. 66: the doctrines here do not essentially differ from what occur in the O. T. (comp. Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 1. 3; and see Prideaux, Connection [ed. Ox.], ii. 367). Later Rabbinical opinions are copiously stated by Eisenmenger, Entdeck. Juden., vol. ii. pp. 322-369 [according to these there are two Hells (as there are two Paradieses), and a sevenfold division of abodes therein]; and by Bartolocci, Biblioth. Rabbin., ii. 128, sqq.; a shorter statement, containing both Rabbinical and classical passages, occurs in Wetstein, New Test. i. 768, 769. For Cabalistic doctrines on the subject, see Reuchlini, Cabala, lib. ii. pp. 675, 676.

Patristic Comments.—These are abundant; the opinions of the Greek Fathers are largely collected by Suicer, The. Eccles. vol. i. pp. 87-96. The reader will also find very many quoted from the Fathers of both East and West in Abb. Ussher's Answ. to Jesuit, chap. viii., Limbus Patrum, and Christ's descent into Hell. St. Jerome, in Epist. ad Ephes., Works, vii. (1) 613, holds that Hades is literally 'in inferiori parte terræ.' St. Chrysostom discourages subtle questions about the precise site of Hell; as for himself, he is inclined to suppose that it is 'somewhere out of this world'—'Ἐξω σου, ὡς ἔγωγε οἶμαι, τοῦ κόσμου τούτου παρτός (Epist. ad Rom. Homil. xxxi. [Works, ed. Bened. vol. ix. 828]). On the general subject, besides the works which we have referred to, passim, in this article (especially Böttcher's work [of which, 'Tract. ii. cap. 1,' i. e., from page 64 to 101, is very valuable], where a mass of authors is adduced, and Abb. Ussher's treatise, which is also of great use to the student), we may mention the art. Inferi in Hoffmann's Lexicon, vol. ii. p. 625; Guider's articles Hades, Hell, Gehenna (in Herzog's Real Encyclop.); Delitzsch, Comment. über d. Psalter, i. 123-126; Keil and Delitzsch, Bibl. Commentar, i. 187; Thrupp, Psalms, vol. i. pp. 110-112; Bp. Horsley, Psalms, pp. 199, 200; Calmet, Dict. [by Mansi], s. v. Infernus; Comment. [also by Mansi], vol. v. pp. 133-144, containing a treatise called, Dissert. de natura Anima et ejus post mortem statu.

Conclusion.—We have purposely abstained from discussing all points which fall under controversial theology as unsuitable to this work, such as the subject of the eternity of hell-punishment. In one sense, indeed, we must predicate a limit of such punishment. In Rev. xx. 13, 14, it is certainly intimated that Hades, as the companion of Death, has an agency [the best commentators supposing a personification of the infernal powers in this passage, see Alford, Meyer, De Wette] which will cease at a given time; but as this surrender of a special function, which was obviously temporal from the first, is admitted on all hands, the polemical question is untouched by our admission. The ἡ λυμνη τοῦ πυρός of these verses is probably equivalent to γέεννα in its permanent character, of which we have treated. Our Lord predicates of ἡ γέεννα the strong attribute of τὸ πῦρ τὸ ἀσβεστόν, Mark ix. 43-48; this attribute gives consistency to the grand statement of St. John in the passage of the Apocalypse which we have just considered.—P. H.

HELLENISTS, THE (οἱ Ἑλληισταί). This term occurs twice in the Acts of the Apostles (vi. 1; ix. 29) as the designation of a class of persons with whom the Apostles came in contact at Jerusalem at the beginning of the Gospel. In the former instance they appear as members of the church at Jerusalem; in the latter as the decided and violent adherents of Judaism, with whom Paul disputed, and by whom an attempt was made to destroy him. The word is found in another passage in the received text (Acts xi. 20); but the proper reading there seems to be Ἑλλήνας, and so it appears in all the critical editions (comp. Alford's note on the place).

All that can with certainty be concluded from the references to this class in the N. T. is, that, on the one hand, they were Jews either by descent or through proselytism, and on the other that they were in some way distinct from another class of Jews who are designated of Ἑβραῖοι. Could we determine exactly the sense in which this latter designation was used it would enable us to fix the meaning of that with which it is placed in opposition; but unfortunately it is from this very opposition that it derives the special meaning which it bears as so placed; so that we have rather to determine the sense of Ἑβραῖοι, from that of οἱ Ἕλληνας than the reverse.

Uncertainty as to the constitutive difference between these two classes seems to have existed from a very early period; as appears from the Peshito version, which in the one passages gives ܠܗܘܢ,

Greeks, in the other explains the term as ܠܗܘܢ ܕܡܕܢܚܐ

know Greek; and also from Chrysostom having found it necessary to explain the word to his hearers (Hom. xiv., in Act. App., etc.) It is not surprising, therefore, that a considerable variety of opinion on this point should have emerged. The opinions which have been advanced may be distributed under the following heads:—

1. The distinctive difference between them was simply one of language; the Hebrews speaking the Aramaic of Palestine, the Hellenists the Greek. This is the most ancient opinion, being that expressed in the Peshito, and given by Chrysostom, Theophylact, etc.; and it is the one which has received the largest number of suffrages in more recent times. Among its advocates are Joseph Scaliger, Heinsius, Drusius, Grotius, Selden, Hottinger, Hug, etc.

2. The distinction was partly of country partly of language: the Hebrew being a native of Judea, and using the Aramaic language; the Hellenist born among the Gentiles, and using the speech of the country of which he was a native. So Erasmus, Lightfoot, Bengel, Wahl, De Wette, Davidson, Alford, Baumgarten, etc.

3. The difference was one of religious history: the Hebrew being a born child of the covenant; the Hellenist a proselyte from heathenism. So Beza, Salmasius, Pearson, Basnage, Pfannkuche, etc.

4. The difference was one of principle: the Hebrew adhering to one set of beliefs or modes of thought, the Hellenist adopting another. According to some this difference had the effect of constituting the Hellenists into a distinct sect among the Jews, such as the Essenes; whilst others, without going this length, regard the two classes as standing to each other very much in the relation in which parties in the state holding different political views, or parties in the same church having different aims and modes of regarding religious truth in modern times, may stand to each other; the Hebrews being like the Conservative or High Church party, while the Hellenists advocated a more progressive, unfettered, and comprehensive scheme of thinking and acting. This latter view, in its substance, has recently found an able advocate in Mr. Roberts (Discussions on the Gospels, p. 148, ff.). According to him 'the Hellenists were those Jews, whether belonging to Palestine or not, who willingly yielded to the influence of Gentile civilisation and habits, and were thus distinguished by their free and liberal spirit; the Hebrews, again, were the rigid adherents to Judaism, who, in spite of the providential agencies, which had been long at work, endeavoured to keep up those peculiar and exclusive usages by which the Jews had for so many centuries been preserved distinct from all other nations."

We are not disposed to reject entirely any of these opinions. Each of them seems to have an element of truth in it; though the contributions they make to the whole truth on this subject are by no means of equal importance. The last alone points to what must be regarded as the fundamental and formative characteristic of Hellenism among the Jews. There can be no doubt historically that some such distinction as that to which it refers did subsist in the Jewish nation (see Jost, Gesch. des Judenthums, i. 99 ff., 345 ff.), and had come to a height at the commencement of the Christian era; and nothing can be more probable than that the existence of such a distinction should manifest itself in the very way in which the distinction between the Hebrews and the Hellenists is asserted to have shewn itself in Acts vi. 1, ff. It is in agreement with this also that Paul should have entered into discussion chiefly with the Hellenist Jews at Jerusalem; for it is probable that as his early Hellenic culture pointed him out as the person most fitted to meet them on their own ground, he may have been specially set upon this work by the other apostles. The violent hostility which existed against him on the part of the Hellenists is also wholly in harmony with this view of their peculiar characteristic as a party; for, as all history proves, the least tolerant of argumentative confutation are those who have assumed the pretensions of the enlightened and advanced thinkers of their age. The position which this view assigns to the Hebrews as a party is further wholly in accordance with the notices in the N. T. of a party designated οἱ ἐκ περιτομῆς, a phrase which, as Mr. Roberts shews, cannot be taken simply as a periphrase for 'Jews,' but always carries in it an allusion to some speciality of doctrinal opinion or religious position. On the other hand, we can hardly accept this as the whole truth of the case. If we simply say that the Hellenists were more free and unfettered in their opinions and usages than the Hebrew, we have only in a very vague way ascertained their position and the reason of their name. Grant that the Hellenists were the liberal and less fettered party among the Jews, the question still remains, In what did their liberalism shew itself? Not certainly, as Mr. Roberts seems to intimate, in a disposition to relax the rigidity of Judaic ceremonial, or to abridge the distinction between Jew and Gentile; for so far as we know anything of the Hellenist party they were as bigotedly zealous for these as were the Hebrews. But if it was not a religious liberalism which characterised them, of what kind was it? To this question any theory which places the sole characteristic of Jewish Hellenism in liberality of opinion is bound to furnish an answer before it can be accepted.

If we would proceed on solid ground in this inquiry justice must first of all be done to the word itself by which this party is designated in the N. T. That word is a formation from the verb ἡλληνίζω, which, according to the analogy of verbs in -ίζω, expresses the act or condition of one who, in language, general deportment, and manner of life, appears as a Greek; so that Hellenist applied to a Jew would indicate that he was a favourer of what was Grecian. There seems no ground for restricting this to language; at the same time, this element cannot be overlooked, because not only is it incredible that any man should be called 'Hellenist' who was destitute of the most obvious characteristic of a Hellenic, his language, but the special usage of ἑλληνίζειν in the sense of 'to speak Greek' (comp. Xenoph. Anab. vii. 3, 25; Plat. Prot. 327 E.; Meno. 82, B.; Arist. Rhet. iii. 5, 1; 12, 1; Lobeck, Phryn., p. 379), necessitates our including this meaning in Ἑλληνιστής. A Hellenist, then, was a Jew who spoke Greek. It does not follow from this, however, that he spoke only Greek, or that those Jews who were not Hellenists were ignorant of Greek. It is probable that the knowledge of Greek was so widely diffused at the time when Christianity appeared, that it was in use throughout the Jewish community. Still it is conceivable that while some spoke Greek by preference and ostentatiously, others preferred Aramaic, and used Greek only as occasion required, and that the former stood to the latter in somewhat the same relation as the Frenchified Saxons of whom Higden complains (Warton, Hist. of Engl. Poetry, i. 5) stood to their old-fashioned countrymen, both parties understanding French, but the former using it by preference (which Higden calls 'Francigenari'), the latter only from necessity. The preference of the Greek language, however, was not the only or even the principal distinction of the Hellenist. What marked him out most, and perhaps excited most the hostility of the Hebrews against him, was his adoption of heathen manners, usages, and modes of thought; his holding himself free from the restrictions under which the other conceived all true Jews to be placed; and especially his claiming to explain the Mosaic ordinances and the O. T. generally according to a free speculation unfettered by the trammels of tradition. In this we conceive lay the essential characteristic of the Hellenist. With this might coincide other peculiarities; and in point of fact it is probable that the majority of the Hellenists were born and educated out of Palestine, and that many of them were proselytes or the sons of proselytes. But these were accidents rather than essentials; that which constituted the Hellenist was his acting the Greek, living after Greek fashions, using Greek methods of speculation, affecting the exclusive use of the Greek tongue. Meyer tersely defines the word 'Ein Jude welcher Griechische nationalität hat, und besonders Griechisch redet' (Comment. in loc.) The 'besonders,' however, seems misplaced here; that which especially marked the Hellenist was his leaning to Gentile methods and forms of religious speculation. Hence to Hellenise came in the writings of the fathers to be used as a current expression for the adopting of Gentile views and doctrines (see Suicer, Thes. Eccl., sub voc.), though it is sometimes also used for the writing of good Greek or the favouring of Greek customs.

On the assumption that the Hellenists were distinguished by speaking Greek has been reared the doctrine of a Hellenistic dialect of the Greek language, a doctrine which has no foundation in the actual phenomena of the language as presented in the LXX. and the N. T. [GREEK LANGUAGE]. —W. L. A.

HELMET. [ARMS; ARMOUR.]

HELPS (ἀντιλήψεις; Vulg. opitulaciones; 1

Cor. xii. 28). The Greek word, signifying aids or assistances, has also this meaning, among others, in the classical writers (e.g., Diod. Sic. i. 87). In the Sept. it answers to עֲזָרָה (Ps. xxii. 19), עֲזָרָה (Ps. cviii. 12), and עֲזָרָה (Ps. lxxxiii. 8). It is found in the same sense, Ecclus. xi. 12; 2 Maccab. xi. 26; and in Josephus (De Bell. Jud. iv. 5. 1). In the N. T. it occurs once, viz., in the enumeration of the several orders or classes of persons possessing miraculous gifts among the primitive Christians (ut supra), where it seems to be used by metonymy, the abstract for the concrete, and to mean helpers: like the words δυνάμεις, 'miracles,' i. e., workers of miracles; κυβερνήσεις, 'governments,' that is, governors, etc., in the same enumeration. The Americans, it is well known, by a similar idiom, call their servants 'helps.' Great difficulty attends the attempt to ascertain the nature of the office so designated among the first Christians. Theophylact explains ἀντιλήψεις by ἀντεχέσθαι τῶν ασθενούντων, helping or supporting the infirm. And so Gennadius, in Ecumenius. But this seems like an inference from the etymology (see Gr. of Acts xx. 35). It has been assumed by some eminent modern writers that the several 'orders' mentioned in ver. 28, correspond respectively to the several 'gifts' of the Spirit enumerated in ver. 8, 9. In order, however, to make the two enumerations tally, it is necessary to make 'divers kinds of tongues' and 'interpretation of tongues,' in the one, answer to 'diversities of tongues' in the other, which, in the present state of the received text, does not seem to be a complete correspondence. The result of the collation is that ἀντιλήψεις answers to 'prophecy'; whence it has been inferred that these persons were such as were qualified with the gift of 'lower prophecy,' to help the Christians in the public devotions (Barrington's Miscellanea Sacra, i. 166; Macknight on 1 Cor. xii. 10-28). Another result is, that 'governments' answers 'to discerning of spirits.' To both these Dr. Hales very reasonably objects, as unlikely, and pronounces this tabular view to be 'perplexed and embarrassing' (New Analysis, etc., Lond. 1830, iii. 289). Bishop Horsley has adopted this classification of the gifts and office-bearers, and points out as 'helps,' i. e., persons gifted with 'prophecies or predictions,' such persons as Mark, Tychicus, Onesimus. Vitringa, from a comparison of ver. 28, 29, 30, infers that the ἀντιλήψεις denote those who had the gift of interpreting foreign languages (De Synag. Vet. ii. 505, Franeg. 1696); which, though certainly possible, as an arbitrary use of a very significant word, stands in need of confirmation by actual instances. Dr. Lightfoot also, according to his biographer, adopted the same plan and arrived at the same conclusion (Styrie's Life of Lightfoot, prefixed to his Works, p. 4, Lond. 1684). But Lightfoot himself explains the word 'persons who accompanied the apostles, baptized those who were converted by them, and were sent to places to which they, being employed in other things, could not come, as Mark, Timothy, Titus.' He observes that the Talmudists sometimes call the Levites מְסַעְדֵי לְכֹהֲנִים, 'the helpers of the priests' (vol. ii. p. 781). Similar catalogues of miraculous gifts and officers occur, Rom. xii. 6-8, and Eph. iv. 11, 12; but they neither correspond in number nor in the order of enumeration. In the former

'prophecy' stands first, and in the latter, second; and in the former many of the terms are of wide import, as 'ministering,' while minute distinctions are made between others, as between 'teaching' and 'exhortation,' 'giving' and 'showing mercy.' Other writers pursue different methods, and arrive at different conclusions. For instance, Hammond, arguing from the etymology of the word, and from passages in the early writers which describe the office of relieving the poor as peculiarly connected with that of the apostles and bishops by the deacons, infers that ἁγία 'denotes a special part of the office of those men which are set down at the beginning of the verse.' He also explains κυβερνήτης as another part of their office (Hammond, Comment. in loc.) Schleusner understands 'deacons who had the care of the sick.' Rosenmüller, 'Diaconi qui pauperibus, peregrinis, egrotis, mortuis, procurandis praeerant.' Bishop Pearce thinks that both these words may have been originally put in the margin to explain δυνάμεις, 'miracles or powers,' and urges that ἁγία is nowhere mentioned as a gift of the Spirit, and that it is not recapitulated in ver. 29, 30. Certainly the omission of these two words would nearly produce exactitude in the recapitulation. Bowyer adopts the same conjecture; but it is without support from MSS. or versions. He also observes that to the end of ver. 28 some copies of the Vulgate add 'interpretationes sermonum,' ἐρμηνείας λόγων; as also the later Syriac, Hilary, and Ambrose. This addition would make the recapitulation perfect. Chrysostom and all the Greek interpreters consider the ἁγία and κυβερνήτης as importing the same thing, viz., functionaries so called with reference to the two different parts of their office: the ἁγία superintending the care of the poor, sick, and strangers; the κυβερνήτης the burial of the dead, and the executorship of their effects, including the care of their widows and orphans, rather managers than governors (Blomfield's Recensio Synopt.) After all it must be confessed, with Doddridge, that 'we can only guess at the meaning of the words in question, having no principles on which to proceed in fixing it absolutely' (Family Expositor, on 1 Cor. xii. 28). (Alberti, Glossar. p. 123; Suicer, Thesaur. in voc.; Salmasius, De Fanore Trapezitico, p. 409; Wolfii Cura Philolog., Basil. 1741.)—J. F. D.

HEM OF THE GARMENT. [FRINGES.]

HEMAN (הֵמָן; Sept. Ἡμάν; Alex. Ἡμάν, Al-moudān; Alex. Almūdān). 1. A person of the tribe of Judah, named with others celebrated for their wisdom, to which that of Solomon is compared (1 Kings iv. 31; 1 Chron. ii. 6). [EZRAHITE.]

2. HEMAN (Sept. Ἡμάν), a Kohathite of the tribe of Levi, and one of the leaders of the temple-music as organised by David (1 Chron. vi. 33; xvi. 41, 42).

HEMDAN (הֵמְדָן; Sept. Ἡμδαδ), the first named among the sons of Dishon, of whom Eshban is the second (Gen. xxxvi. 26). In 1 Chron. i. 41, he is called Hamrān (חֲמֵרָן; A. V. Amram).

Among the Arab tribes is one bearing the name of 'Amrān (همران), and dwelling eastward and south-eastward from Akaba. It is divided into five clans, among which are the Usbany, the Humeidy, and the Humādy (Robinson, i. 268). These names are not far apart from Eshban and Hemdan, and this has led to the suggestion, that among the 'Amrān we are to seek the descendants of these Horite chiefs (Knobel, Gen. p. 256).—W. L. A.

HEMLOCK. [ROSH.]

HEMSEN, JOHANN TYCHSEN, a German theologian, was born at Boldixum, October 15, 1792. After studying at Copenhagen and Göttingen, he became doctor of philosophy in 1821 at the University of the latter place, where he was appointed professor extraordinary of theology in 1823. He died May 14, 1830. His chief works are—Die Authentizität der Schriften des Evangelisten Johannes (against Bretschneider's Probabilia), 1823; De Christologia Joannis Baptiste, 1824; Der Apostel Paulus, sein Leben, Wirken, und seine Schriften, published after his death, under the superintendence of Liicke and Goeschen, 1830. Hemsén was an amiable and pious man, but of very moderate abilities.—S. D.

HEN, prop. CHEN (חֵן), appears in the A. V. as the son of Zephaniah (Zech. vi. 14). The LXX. takes the word as a common noun, and translates ἐς χάριτα υἱοῦ Σοφονίου. This is approved by Ewald, Hengstenberg, and Maurer, who interpret it of the hospitality shown to the deputies by Josiah. But for this there seems no good reason.—W. L. A.

HEN. This bird is mentioned in Scripture in Matt. xxiii. 37, and Luke xii. 34, where the word used is simply ὄρνις. [COCK.]

HENA (חֵנָה; Sept. Ἡνα) twice mentioned in Scripture (2 Kings xix. 13; Is. xxxvii. 13), and one of a number of cities taken and destroyed by some of the kings of Assyria previous to the invasion of Judea by Sennacherib. What are believed to be the ruins and traces of these cities are still found on the banks of the Euphrates. Travellers are divided as to the exact situation of Hena; but the balance of probability favours the site near to Sepharvaim or Sippara (now Mosaib), where an ancient town of the name of Ana still exists, with the ruins of what appears to have been an immense city in its immediate neighbourhood (see Winer's Realwörterbuch, s.v.; Layard's Nineveh and Babylon, 355).—W. J. C.

HENADAD (חֵנָדָד; Sept. Ἡναδάδ), the head of a Levitical family, distinguished for the share they had in the rebuilding of the temple (Ezra iii. 9). It is the same person apparently who is mentioned as the father of Bavai and Binnui, who assisted in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 18, 24), and the latter of whom signed the covenant for his family (x. 9).—†

HENDERSON, EBENEZER, D.D., was born at Dunfermline, 17th Nov. 1784, and died at Mortlake in Surrey, 16th May 1858. Having devoted himself to the work of a missionary to the heathen, he set out with a view of proceeding to India by way of Denmark, direct access to the British possessions in India not being then permitted to any but the servants of the Company. Whilst at Copenhagen circumstances occurred which led to his relinquishing his intention of going to the East, and to his devoting himself to Bible circulation in the north of Europe. In this work he was engaged from 1805 to 1825, and in pursuance of it travelled through most of the northern countries, and through the south of Russia. In 1818 he published his Travels in Iceland, 2 vols. 8vo, and in 1826 his Biblical Researches and Travels in Russia, 1 vol. 8vo, both works of deep and lasting interest. While engaged in circulating the Scriptures, he was at the same time a laborious student of their contents; making himself familiar with the original languages and with all the helps which the scholarship of the Continent afforded to the exploration of their meaning. His well-known attainments in this department led to his being appointed in 1826 president of the Mission College connected with the London Missionary Society at Hoxton; and in 1830 he became professor of Theology and Biblical Literature in Highbury College. Declining strength obliged him to resign this office in 1850, when he retired to Mortlake. Here he officiated for some time as pastor of a small congregation at East Sheen; but this duty, too, he was obliged to relinquish some years before his death. Besides the works above mentioned, he published a translation of the Exposition of the Prophecies of Daniel, by M. F. Roos ('der grosse Schriftforscher voll stiller Tiefe,' as Delitzsch calls him), Edin. 1811; The great Mystery of Godliness Incontrovertible (a dissertation on 1 Tim. iii. 16), Lond. 1830; Divine Inspiration (being the congregational lecture for 1835), Lond. 1836, 3d ed., 1852; The Book of the Prophet Isaiah, translated from the Original Hebrew, with a Commentary, critical, philological, and exegetical, etc., Lond. 1840; The Book of the Twelve Minor Prophets translated, with a Commentary, etc., Lond. 1845; The Book of the Prophet Jeremiah and that of Lamentations, etc., Lond. 1851; The Book of the Prophet Ezekiel, etc., Lond. 1855; besides new editions of Buck's Theological Dictionary, and Gutbiri's Syriac Lexicon, and many minor works. Dr. Henderson was a scholar of varied and extensive attainments, especially in Oriental learning; and his contributions to Biblical literature are among the most valuable the age has produced, especially his lectures on inspiration and his commentaries on Isaiah and the minor prophets. He received the honorary degree of D.D. simultaneously from Amherst College, U.S., and from the university of Copenhagen, a spontaneous tribute to his learning, diligence, and worth.—W. L. A.

HENOCH [ENOCH]. This appears also in the A. V. of 1 Chron. i. 33 as the representative of the name which is more correctly given as Hanoch in Gen. xxv. 4. The original word חֲנוֹךְ is the same throughout.

HENRY, MATTHEW, was born at Broad Oak, on the confines of Flintshire and Shropshire, 18th October 1662, and died at Nantwich, 22d June 1714. Having received his preliminary education under his father, the Rev. Philip Henry, and a Mr. Turner, he was removed to the academy of Mr. Doolittle at Islington, whence he proceeded to become a student of law at Gray's Inn. His legal studies, however, had not proceeded far when he relinquished them for theology, to which he thenceforward devoted himself. In 1687 he became minister of a Presbyterian congregation at Chester, where he remained twenty-five years; from this he removed in 1712 to Hackney, where he was permitted only a short term of labour. His death occurred whilst on a preaching tour in the vicinity of his first charge. His great work is his Exposition of the Old and New Testaments, of which he had completed as far as the end of the Acts when his hand was arrested by death. The work was finished by others. As a popular commentary on the Scriptures, this work has not yet been surpassed. Without pretending to be elaborately exegetical, it yet throws a continuous stream of light on the meaning of the sacred writers; the author's analysis of the train of thought is generally satisfactory; and nothing can be more felicitous than his practical applications of the truths he educes. If the work does not shew deep learning, it displays unflinching good sense, discriminating thought, sterling piety, and a constant sympathy with the sacred writers, which is often of more avail for the discovery of their meaning than the profoundest learning.—W. L. A.

HEPHER (חֶפְרִי; Sept. Ὁφέρ). The founder of the family of the Hephrites. He was the son of Gilead, in the line of Manasseh, who was the first of the sons of Joseph, by his wife Asenath (Num. xxvi. 32). The daughters of his son Zelophead are noteworthy as the first to have obtained the right of inheriting a father's property (Num. xxvii. 1, sq.).

Another person of the name of Hephher (Sept. Ἡφῶλ) is mentioned in 1 Chron. iv. 6. He was the second of the sons of Ashur by his wife Naarah.

And a third is Hephher the Mecherathite, and one of 'the valiant men of the armies' of David (1 Chron. xi. 25, 36). His name is somehow omitted in the list of David's mighty men given in 2 Samuel (xxiii. 34). Kennicott is of opinion that the name as occurring in 1 Chron. xi. 36 is a corruption; and the supposition is by no means improbable if he is right in regarding the catalogue in Samuel as the original of the two.—W. J. C.

HEPHZIBAH (חֶפְזִיבָּה; Sept. Ἀψιδά; Alex. Ὁφισιδά), the wife of Hezekiah, and mother of Manasseh (2 Kings xxi. 1). There may be an allusion to her in Is. lxii. 4, where the prophet says this name shall be given to Jerusalem, 'because Jehovah delighteth (יִפְצֵּי) in thee;' or this may have been with the Jews a name of affection.—W. L. A.

HERAKLES (Ἡρακλῆς) is mentioned in 2 Mac. iv. 19, as the Tyrian god to whom the Jewish high-priest Jason sent a religious embassy (θεωροί), with the offering of 300 drachmæ of silver. That this Tyrian Hercules (Herod. ii. 44) is the same as the Tyrian Baal, is evident from a bilingual Phœnician inscription found at Malta (described by Gesenius, Monum. Ling. Phœn. i. 96), in which the Phœnician words, 'To our Lord, to Melkarth, the Baal of Tyre,' are represented by the Greek Ἡρακλεῖ Ἀρχηγέτην. Moreover, Herakles and Astarte are mentioned together by Josephus (Antiq. viii. 5. 3), just in the same manner as Baal and Ashtoreth are in the Old Testament. The further identity of this Tyrian Baal with the Baal whom the idolatrous Israelites worshipped, is evinced by the following arguments, as stated chiefly by Movers [Die Phönizier, i. 178). The worship of Baal, which prevailed in the time of the Judges, was put down by Samuel (1 Sam. vii. 4), and the effects of that suppression appear to have lasted through the next few centuries, as Baal is not enumerated among the idols of Solomon (1 Kings xi. 5-8; 2 Kings xxiii. 13), nor among those worshipped in Judah (2 Kings xxiii. 12), or in Samaria, where we only read of the golden calves of Jeroboam (1 Kings xii. 28; xv. 26). That worship of Baal which prevailed in the reign of Ahab, cannot, therefore, be regarded as a mere continuation or revival of the old Canaanite idolatry (although there is no reason to doubt the essential identity of both Baals), but was introduced directly from Phœnicia by Ahab's marriage with the Sidonian princess Jezebel (1 Kings xvi. 31). In like manner, the establishment of this idolatry in Judah is ascribed to the marriage of the king with a daughter of Jezebel. (Comp. Josephus, Antiq. viii. 13. 1; ix. 6. 6.)

The power of nature, which was worshipped under the form of the Tyrian Hercules, Melkarth, Baal, Adonis, Moloch, and whatever his other names are, was that which originates, sustains, and destroys life. These functions of the Deity, according to the Phœnicians, were represented, although not exclusively, by the sun, the influence of which both animates vegetation by its genial warmth, and scorches it up by its fervour.

Almost all that we know of the worship of the Tyrian Hercules is preserved by the classical writers, and relates chiefly to the Phœnician colonies, and not to the mother-state. The eagle, the lion, and the thunny-fish, were sacred to him, and are often found on Phœnician coins. Pliny expressly testifies that human sacrifices were offered up every year to the Carthaginian Hercules (Hist. Nat. xxxvi. v. 12); which coincides with what is stated of Baal in Jer. xix. 5, and with the acknowledged worship of Moloch.

Movers endeavours to shew that Herakles and Hercules are not merely Greek and Latin synonyms for this god, but that they are actually derived from his true Phœnician name. This original name he supposes to have consisted of the syllables מלך (as found in מלך, lion, and in other words), meaning strong, and כל, from יכל, to conquer; so that the compound means Ar conquers. This harmonizes with what he conceives to be the idea represented by Hercules as the destroyer of Typhonic monsters (l. c. p. 430). Melkarth, the Μελκαρθος of Sanchoniathon, occurs on coins only in the form מלךרת. We must in this case assume that a kaph has been absorbed, and resolve the word into מלך קרתא, king of the city, πολιοῦχος. The bilingual inscription renders it by Ἀρχηγέτης; and it is a title of the god as the patron of the city.—J. N.

HERALD. This term occurs only once in the A. V., as a translation of the Chaldee כְּרִיז, khrîz, præco, Dan. iii. 4. The verb which, as Gesenius remarks (Thesaurus, 712), belongs to a root widely diffused among the Indo-Germanic languages, is found in the same book, ver. 29, וְכִרְזוּ, ekhrîze, prædicatum est. The Greek term κηρύσσει occurs in the Apocrypha, Eccus. xx. 15, 'crier,' A. V.; also in 1 Tim. ii. 7; 2 Tim. i. 11;

2 Peter ii. 5; and the verb κηρύσσειν in 1 Cor. ix. 27, with an evident allusion to the officer employed at the Grecian games.—J. E. R.

HERDER, JOHANN GOTTFRIED VON. This truly great man, great as a poet, a philosopher, a scholar, an historian, and a divine, was born at Mohrungen, 25th August 1744. His father kept a school for girls, and the young Herder was allowed no books except a Bible and hymn-book. At the age of fifteen he became an amanuensis to Trescho, the pastor of Mohrungen, who discovered his genius, and encouraged his industry. Prevented by his keen sensitiveness from becoming a surgeon, he studied at Königsberg, and was allowed to attend Kant's lecture gratis. In 1764 he became a teacher in the school at Riga, and in 1767 began to obtain some celebrity as a preacher, and made his début in literature. In 1769 he travelled as tutor to the Prince of Holstein, and after various promotions and successes, was appointed general superintendent at Weimar. At this town he long lived in the zenith of his fame and prosperity, mingling on equal terms with such men as Wieland, Schiller, Gothe, and Jean Paul, and exercising a great and admirable influence both as court-preacher and director of education. In 1801 he became president of the higher consistory, and was soon after ennobled. He died at Weimar, 18th December 1803.

Herder's literary greatness is universally recognised, and it is admitted by all that his writings had no mean share in the work of stimulating the intellect of his countrymen, and giving that mighty impulse to the thoughtful activity of Germany which has produced such grand results. But it has been the fashion to depreciate his direct merits as a theologian, which are of the most important kind. He rendered to modern theology an inestimable service—a service the effects of which it is almost impossible to overrate—by making philosophy bear directly upon religion, and by infusing a genial and poetic spirit into inquiries which he enriched with an encyclopædic range of knowledge. Gentle, fresh, clear-sighted, tolerant, liberal, he was at the same time full of firm faith and deep reverence. The light of a pure and lofty genius, the expansiveness of a glowing heart, and the charm of an eloquent and lucid style, give a value even to those of his works which are critically weak or theologically questionable. He has been called the 'prophetic forerunner of modern theology;' and Jean Paul Richter beautifully observes that in his works 'you walk, as it were, amid moonshine, into which the red dawn is already falling; but one hidden sun is the painter of them both' (Vorschul der Ästhetik, sec. 545).

Even Herder's philosophical and literary works had an influence on theology, especially his Ideen zur Philosophie d. Geschichte d. Menschheit; and his poems are deeply religious in tone and spirit. His general views on doctrine have been selected by Augusti (Herder's Dogmatik, Jena, 1805), mainly from papers in the Christliche Schriften; and his opinions on the Christian ministry (which are of a true and lofty kind) are contained in his Provinzialblätter an Prediger, 1774, and Briefe über das Studium d. Theologie, 1780. His directly exegetical works are Erläuterungen zum N. T., and short books on the Revelation, and the epistles of James and Jude. These are perhaps the least valuable of his writings, as those on the O. T. are the most valuable. The latter are Aelteste Urkunde d. Menschengeschlechtes, 1774, an explanation of the earlier part of Genesis from a far wiser and truer standpoint than the one usually adopted; and Geist der draisichen Poesie, 1782, a work into which he threw his whole heart, and of which he wrote to Hamann that 'he had cherished the idea in his heart since childhood,' and to Müller 'that he loved it like a child' (see the Vorrede to Justi's edition, 1825). This is his greatest theological work, and though thirty years subsequent to Lowth's book, De Sacra Poet., it is no less valuable than its predecessor, and produced a wider effect in raising the poetry of the Bible from the contempt which it had incurred from the supercilious ignorance of shallow classicists. So that both those books opened a new path, and mark a great epoch in the history of Bible exegesis.

Herder's theological works (Sämmtliche Werke zur Theol. und Relig.) were published in 12 vols. at Vienna in 1823, and edited with a biography by his friend, J. G. Müller, at Tübingen, 1805-1820. His Christliche Schriften were published at Riga in 1798, and contain papers on the Gift of Tongues, the Resurrection, the Redeemer, the Son of God, on the Spirit of Christianity, and on Religion. Besides the books already mentioned he wrote Gott, einige Gespräche, Gotha, 1800; Christliche Reden und Homilien, edited by J. E. Müller, 1805 (sketches of sermons, full of thoughtful piety and suggestive eloquence); Luther's Katechismus, with an explanation for the use of schools, 1799; and Weimarisches Gesangbuch, 1800. His Ursprung d. Sprache obtained the Berlin prize in 1771. He afterwards unwisely retracted this eloquently-expounded theory under the influence of Hamann, to whose philosophic views he leant. Several of his works have been translated into English.—F. W. F.

HERDMAN. [HERDS AND FLOCKS.]

HERDS AND FLOCKS. From the earliest times the Hebrews were a pastoral people. Abraham and his sons were masters of herds and flocks, and were regulated in their movements very much by a regard to the necessities of their cattle, in which their wealth almost entirely consisted. In Egypt the Israelites were known as keepers of cattle. When they left Egypt they, notwithstanding the oppressions to which they had been subjected, took with them 'flocks and herds, even very much cattle' (Exod. xii. 38); and though during their wanderings in the wilderness their stock was in all probability greatly reduced, before they entered Canaan they had so replenished it by their conquests in the pastoral regions beyond Jordan that they took with them a goodly number of animals wherewith to begin their new life in the land that had been promised them. Of that land large tracts were suited for pasturage; certain of the tribes were almost exclusively devoted to pastoral occupations; and traces of a nomadic life among other tribes than those settled on the east of the Jordan are found even as late as the time of the monarchy (comp. 1 Chron. iv. 38-43).

The pastoral life has always had a charm for the Semitic peoples; and among them, as well as among other nations, it has always been held in honour. In the open and spacious fields bordering on the Jordan and in the hill country of Palestine, it is a life of comparative ease and of great independence even in the present day; men possessed of flocks and herds become quietly and gradually rich without any severe exertion or anxiety; and but for feuds among themselves, the oppression of superiors, and the predatory tendencies of their less respectable neighbours, their life might flow on in an almost unbroken tranquillity. The wealth of Sheykhs and Emirs is measured chiefly by the number of their flocks and herds; and men who would count it an intolerable indignity to be constrained to engage in any handicraft occupation, or even in mercantile adventure, fulfil with pride and satisfaction the duties which their pastoral life imposes upon them. It was the same in ancient times. Job's substance consisted chiefly of cattle, his wealth in which made him the greatest of all the men of the east (i. 3). The first two kings of Israel, Saul and David, came from 'following the herd' to ascend the throne (1 Sam. ix. xi. 5; Ps. lxxviii. 70). Men 'very great,' like Nabal, derived their riches from their flocks, and themselves superintended the operations connected with the care of them (1 Sam. xxv. 2, ff.) Absalom, the prince of Israel, had a sheep-farm, and personally occupied himself with its duties (2 Sam. xiii. 23). Mesha, king of Moab, was 'a sheepmaster' (מִשְׁעָה, 2 Kings iii. 4). The daughters of chiefs and wealthy proprietors did not think it beneath them to tend the flocks and herds of their family (Gen. xxix. 9 [comp. xxiv. 15, 19]; Exod. ii. 16; comp. Hom. Il. vi. 423; Odys. xii. 121; xiii. 221; Varro, De Re Rust. ii. 1). The proudest title of the kings of Israel was that of shepherds of the people (Jer. xxiii. 4; Ezek. xxxiv. 2, etc.; comp. ποιμένες λαῶν in Homer and Hesiod, passim, and Plato, De Rep. iv. 15, p. 440, D.), and God himself condescended to be addressed as the Shepherd of Israel (Ps. lxxx. 1), and was trusted in by his pious servants as their shepherd (Ps. xxiii. 1). In later times the title of shepherd was given to the teachers and leaders of the synagogues, who were called פִּרְשֵׁי טוֹרָה (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. in Matt. iv. 23); but this was unknown to the times before Christ.

By the wealthier proprietors their flocks and herds were placed under the charge of servants, who bore the designation of רֹעֵי צֹאן, רֹעֵי מִקְנֶה, or שֹׁמְרֵי, נִקְרִים. These were armed sometimes with weapons, to protect themselves and their charge from robbers or wild beasts; though, if we may judge from the case of David, their furniture in this respect was of the simplest description. Usually they carried with them a staff (שֶׁבֶט, מִקֵּל) furnished with a crook, which might be used for the purpose of catching an animal by the foot; those who had the charge of oxen carried with them a goad (מִלְכֹד, דִּרְבֵּן, Judg. iii. 31; 1 Sam. xiii. 21 [GOAD]). They had also a wallet or small bag (זִקְקָה, זִקְקָה) in which to carry provisions, ammunition, or any easily portable article (1 Sam. xvii. 40, 43; Ps. xxiii. 4; Micah vii. 14; Matt. x. 10; Luke ix. 3, 10). Their dress consisted principally of a cloak or mantle (the burnoose of the modern Arabs) in which they could wrap the entire body (Jer. xliii. 12). For food they were obliged to be contented with the plainest fare, and often were reduced to the last extremities (Amos vii. 14; Luke xv. 15). Their wages consisted in a portion of the produce, especially of the milk of the flock (Gen. xxx. 32, ff.; 1 Cor. ix. 7). That they cultivated music is not unlikely, though it hardly follows from 1 Sam. xvi. 18, for David's case may have been exceptional; in all countries and times, however, music has been associated with the pastoral life. When the servants belonging to one master existed in any number they were placed under a chief (מִקְנֵהוּ, שֵׁר, Gen. xlvii. 6; ἀρχιποιμήν, 1 Pet. v. 4); and under the monarchy there was a royal officer who bore the title of מִשְׁכֵּן הָרִעִים, 'chief of the herdsmen' (1 Sam. xxi. 7; comp. 1 Chron. xxvii. 29, and 'magister regii pecoris,' Liv. i. 4).

The animals placed under the care of these herdsmen were chiefly sheep and goats; but besides these there were also neat cattle, asses, camels, and in later times swine. It would seem that the keeping of the animals last named was the lowest grade in the pastoral life (Luke xv. 15); and probably the keeping of sheep and goats was held to be the highest, as that of horses is among the Arabs in the present day (Niebuhr, Arabia, i. 226). The herdsman led his charge into the open pasture-land, where they could freely roam and find abundant supply of food; the neat cattle were conducted to the richer pastures, such as those of Bashan, while the sheep, goats, and camels found sufficient sustenance from the scantier herbage of the more rocky and arid parts of Palestine, provided there was a supply of water.* Whilst in the fields the herdsmen lived in tents (מִשְׁכְּנֵיהֶם, Song of Sol.

i. 8; Is. xxxviii. 12; Jer. vi. 3), and there were folds (גִּרְדִּים, Num. xxxii. 16; 2 Sam. vii. 8; Zeph. ii. 6), and apparently in some cases tents (אֹהֲלִים, 2 Chron. xiv. 15) for the cattle. Watch towers were also erected, whence the shepherd could descry any coming danger to his charge; and vigilance in this respect was one of the shepherd's chief virtues (Mic. iv. 8; Nah. iii. 18; Luke ii. 8). If any of the cattle wandered, he was bound to follow them, and leave no means untried to recover them (Ezek. xxxiv. 12; Luke xv. 5); and harsh masters were apt to require at their servants' hands any loss they might have sustained, either by the wandering of the cattle or the ravages of wild beasts (Gen. xxxi. 38, ff.), a tendency on which a partial check was placed by the law, that if it was torn by beasts, and the pieces could be produced, the person in whose charge it was should not be required to make restitution (Exod. xxii. 13; comp. Amos iii. 12). To assist them in both watching and defending the flocks, and in recovering any that had strayed, they had dogs (Job xxx. 1), as have the modern Arabs, not, however, 'like those in other lands, fine faithful fellows, the friend and companion of their masters, . . . but a mean, sinister, ill-conditioned generation, kept at a distance, kicked about, and half-starved, with nothing noble or attractive about them' (Thomson, Land and Book, i. 301), a description which fully suits Job's disparaging comparison.

* The ancients seem to have had the belief that rich herbage was not favourable to the rearing of sheep. Comp. Virg., Georg. iii. 384; Colum. vii. 2, 3; Varro, De Re Rust. ii. 2, 4; etc.

The flocks and herds were regularly counted (Lev xxvii. 32; Jer. xxxiii. 13).

The pastures to which the herdsmen conducted their flocks were called מְדִינֹת, the places without, the country, the desert (Job v. 10; xviii. 17; Prov. vii. 26: comp. ἔξω ἐν ἐρήμῳ, Mark i. 45); also מְדִינֹת (Jer. xxv. 37; Amos i. 2), מְדִינֹת (Ps. lxxv. 13; Jer. ix. 9, etc.), נָוָה (1 Sam. vii. 8; Hos. ix. 13, etc.), מְדִינֹת (Ps. lxxv. 13; Is. xlii. 11; Jer. xxxiii. 10; Joel ii. 22, etc.) In summer the modern nomades seek the northern and more hilly regions, in winter they betake themselves to the south and to the plain country (D'Arvieux, iii. 315; v. 428); and probably the same usage prevailed among the Hebrews. In leading out the flocks, the shepherd went before them, and they followed him obedient to his call; a practice from which our Saviour draws a touching illustration of the intimate relation between Him and His people (John x. 4). The young and the sickly of the flock the shepherd would take in his arms and carry, and he was careful to adapt the rate of advance to the condition and capacity of the feeble or burdened portion of his charge; a practice which again gives occasion for a beautiful illustration of God's care for his people (Is. xl. 11; comp. Gen. xxxiii. 13). These usages still prevail in Palestine, and have been often described by travellers; one of the most graphic descriptions is that given by Mr. Thomson (Land and Book, i. 301, ff.; comp. Wilson, Lands of the Bible, ii. 322). As the Jews advanced in commercial wealth the office of shepherd diminished in importance and dignity. Among the later Jews the shepherd of a small flock was precluded from bearing witness, on the ground that, as such fed their flocks on the pastures of others, they were infected with dishonesty (Maimon. in Demai, ii. 3).—W. L. A.

HERESY (Aἵρεσις), as used in the N. T., means a sect or party. In this sense it is used of the Pharisees as one of the religious parties among the Jews (Acts v. 17; xv. 5; xxvi. 5; xxviii. 22); and it is in the same sense applied by them to the Christians (Acts xxiv. 5, 14). This is in accordance with the common usage of the Greek, for not only does Josephus speak of the three sects of the Jews, the Pharisees, the Sadducees, and the Essenes, as the 'three heresies of the Jews' (Antiq. xiii. 5. 9; Vita, sec. 2); but the Greeks commonly used this term to describe the schools into which their philosophers were divided.

The word itself properly means choice, or the taking of one thing in preference to another; and from this by an easy transition it passed to designate the party or body which was constituted through choosing a certain dogma or set of dogmas in preference to others. But as all such choosing implies the assertion of a right to choose, the word may come to have a bad meaning attached to it when the choice is exercised where such a right does not exist; and further, when by the exercise of such choice a small party separates itself from the great body of those who profess the same aims and the same pursuits, the application to them of the title 'heresy' may involve a censure of them as so separating themselves. Hence we find in the N. T. that the word 'heresy' came to be applied within the church to divisions among the brethren arising from arbitrary and self-willed preferences on the part of some (1 Cor. xi. 19; Gal. v. 20; 2 Pet. ii. 1), divisions to be censured and shunned. A still further departure was made in the church from the primitive usage of the word in the ages which succeeded the apostolic. From designating the section or body of persons making the lawless or wrong choice, it came to be used of the dogma or opinion by the choice of which they were distinguished; and as the standard set up was the assumed consent of the Catholic Church, a heresy came to mean any opinion in religion which was a departure from this standard. 'Hæreses,' says Tertullian, 'dictæ Græca voce ex interpretatione electionis, qua quis sive ad instituendas sive ad suscipiendas eas utitur' (De Præscript. Hæret., 6). The same change passed on the cognate adjective heretic (αἰρετικός). In the N. T. this means one who makes a party in a church, and thereby produces division (Tit. iii. 10); in subsequent ecclesiastical usage it means a man who adopts an opinion not in accordance with the assumed Catholic belief. This usage of the term is purely ecclesiastical. 'A Stoic could not have called a Peripatetic simply αἰρετικός, though he might have spoken of him as αἰρετικός τῆς Ἀριστοτελικῆς φιλοσοφίας. The Christian writers are, therefore, the first in which we find the word αἰρετικός used by itself' (Burton, Bampton Lectures, p. 11). Instances, however, occur in which the Christian fathers use the word in its original sense; as, ex. gr., when Basil (Epist. 33) speaks of his own περὶ τὸν Θεὸν αἰρέσεις. They use it also sometimes of opinions which do not pretend to be Christian; but this is a rare and improper use of the term (comp. Dorner Entwicklungsgesch. i. p. 71, note 4, Eng. Tr. I., App. Note U).—W. L. A.

HERMAS, Ἑρμᾶς, one of the Christians at Rome to whom Paul addressed special salutations in his Epistle (Rom. xvi. 14). Of his history and station in life nothing is known. By several writers, ancient and modern, he has been reputed to be the author of a work entitled The Shepherd of Hermas, which from its high antiquity and the supposed connection of the writer with St. Paul, has been usually classed with the epistles of the so-called Apostolic Fathers. A Latin version has come down to us from the time of Tertullian; of the original Greek, till very recently, only a few fragments have been known as quotations in other ancient authors. But in 1859 the first part of the original, being nearly one-fourth of the whole, was discovered by Tischendorf at the end of the Codex Sinaiticus; a fac-simile of a portion of it is given in his Notitia. A mediæval Greek re-translation of the Latin version (according to Tischendorf) was published by Dressel in his edition of the Apostolic Fathers. It has been divided by modern editors (for in the manuscript copies there is no such division) into three books; the first consisting of four visions, the second of twelve commands, and the third of ten similitudes. It is called the 'Shepherd' (ὁ Ποιμήν, Pastor), because the Angel of Repentance (Nuntius Penitentia), at whose dictation Hermas professes that he wrote the second and third books, appeared in the garb of a shepherd. It is frequently quoted by Clemens Alexandrinus, either by the author's name (Strom. i. 29, sec. 181; Opp. ed. Klotz, ii. 119; ii. 1, sec. 3; Opp. ii. 124), or by the phrase 'the Shepherd says' (Strom. i. 17, sec. 85; Opp. ii. 60; ii. 12, sec. 55; Opp. ii. 158; ii. 9, sec. 43; Opp. ii. 150; ii. 12, sec. 55; Opp. ii. 158; iv. 9, sec. 76; Opp. ii. 318; vi. 6, sec. 46; Opp. iii. 125), though he does not expressly identify the author as the Hermas in Rom. xvi. Eusebius is more definite. In his Eccles. Hist. (iii. 3) he says, 'The apostle, in the salutations at the end of his Epistle to the Romans, makes mention among others of Hermas, who, it is said, wrote the book called the Shepherd; it is to be noted that this book is called in question (ἀντιλέλεκται), so that it cannot be ranked among the books received as canonical (ἐν ὁμολογουμένοις). By others it is judged to be a most necessary book for elementary instruction. And we know that it is publicly read in churches, and that some very ancient writers make use of it.' Elsewhere he says, 'among the spurious (ἐν τοῖς νόθοις) are to be placed the Acts of Paul, the Book called the Shepherd, and the Revelation of Peter' (Hist. Eccles. iii. 25). And in giving an account of the opinions of Irenæus (Hist. Eccles. v. 8), he remarks, 'the book (τὴν γραφὴν) of the Shepherd he not only knew, but received with approbation, saying, Well spake the book (ἡ γραφὴ) which says, 'first of all believe that there is one God.' This passage has been adduced, but, perhaps, improperly, to prove that Irenæus regarded 'The Shepherd' as canonical: the word γραφὴ, by some here translated Scripture, may mean simply the book or writing (Lardner's Credibility, ch. xvii.; Works, ii. 171). Origen often quotes 'The Shepherd,' speaks of it as useful, and, in his opinion, inspired: ut paulo, divinitus inspirata (Ep. ad Rom. Comment. lib. x.; Opera, vii. 437, ed. Lommatsch). Elsewhere he describes it as 'a book circulated in the church, but not universally acknowledged to be divine' (Comment. in Evang. Matt. Hom. xiv.; Opp. iii. 316). Jerome also states that 'it was publicly read in some of the churches of Greece, though among the Latins it was almost unknown (De Illust. Vir. cap. x.) Tertullian (De Pudicitia, sec. 10) classes it with apocryphal and spurious writings. If it be admitted that 'The Shepherd' was written by the Hermas of St. Paul, its date must be fixed towards the end of the first century. Some eminent critics, however, ascribe it to Hermas, a brother of Pius, who was Bishop of Rome about A.D. 141. Mosheim argues at some length in favour of this opinion; but the only authorities he adduces on its behalf are some lines in a poem against the Marcionites, falsely attributed to Tertullian, the fragment of an anonymous work on the canon, published by Muratori in his Antiquitates Ital. Med. Ævi, and a passage in the Liber Pontificalis, respecting Easter, there said to be from a book called the Shepherd, written by Hermas, the brother of Pius, but not found in the work that has come down to us under that title (Commentaries on the Affairs of the Christians, vol. i. pp. 180-188, Vidal's transl.) The same opinion is advocated by Hefele, in the Tübinger Theol. Quart. Schrift., 1839. Neander, while he allows that it may be doubted whether 'The Shepherd' was written by the Hermas of St. Paul, seems to consider the other supposition still more questionable, since we cannot determine what credit is due to the authorities adduced in its favour, and it is difficult to reconcile with the later origination of the work, the high esteem in which it was held in the age of Irenæus and Clement of Alexandria (Allgemeine Geschichte, etc. Abth. i. Band 2, p. 1139, 2d ed.; Torrey's translation [Bohn] ii. 210). The Shepherd of Hermas was first published at Paris in 1513, and is included in the editions of the apostolic fathers by Cotelierus, Galland, Dreschel, and Hefele. Fabricius also published it in his Codex Apocryphus, Hamburgi, 1719. Archbishop Wake's translation is well known.

HERMES (Ἑρμῆς), the Mercurius of the Romans, was the messenger of the gods, and was equally characterised by adroitness of action and readiness of speech. He was also the customary attendant of Jupiter when he appeared on earth (Ovid, Fast. v. 495). These circumstances explain why the inhabitants of Lystra (Acts xiv. 12), as soon as ever they were disposed to believe that the gods had visited them in the likeness of men, discovered Hermes in Paul, as the chief speaker, and as the attendant of Jupiter. It seems unnecessary to be curious whether the representations of Mercury in ancient statues accord with the supposed personal appearance of Paul, and especially in the matter of the beard of the latter; for all known representations of the god differ in much more important particulars from the probable costume of Paul (e.g., in the absence of any garment at all, or in the use of the short chlamys merely; in the caduceus, the petasus, etc.) It is more reasonable to suppose that those who expected to see the gods mixing in the affairs of this lower world, in human form, would not look for much more than the outward semblance of ordinary men. Comp. the 'dissimulante deos' of Ovid (l. c., 504).—J. N.

HERMES (Ἑρμῆς), the name of a disciple mentioned Rom. xvi. 14. In the Greek Church his festival is kept on April 8. According to them he was one of the seventy disciples, and afterwards Bishop of Dalmatia.

HERMOGENES (Ἑρμογένης), the name of a man mentioned by St. Paul in the latest of the pastoral epistles (2 Tim. i. 15), who, with Phygelus, deserted him when 'all they which are in Asia' (οἱ ἐν τῇ Ἀσίᾳ, or perhaps 'they of or from Asia', οἱ ἐκ τῆς Ἀσίας, Conybeare and Howson, Life of St. Paul, vol. ii. p. 585) had 'turned away from him.' The 'all in Asia' cannot imply a general desertion, but only those of whom St. Paul had had trial (Alford loc.). Whether Hermogenes and Phygelus had forsaken St. Paul because they were ashamed of him when in bonds (2 Tim. iv. 16); or whether, like Hymenæus and Philetus, they had 'erred concerning the truth' (2 Tim. ii. 18), is not stated. In the Roman breviary (in Fest. S. Juc. Apost. Pars astiva, p. 485, Milan, 1851) the conversion of Hermogenes is attributed to St. James the Great, and in the legendary history of Abdias, the so-called bishop of Babylon (Fabricius, Cod. Apocryph. N. T., p. 517 seq.), Hermogenes is represented as first practising magic, and converted, with Philetus, by the same apostle. Grotius, apparently misled by the circumstance that the historian or geographer Hermogenes, mentioned by the scholiast of Apollonius

Rhodium (ii. 722, Frag. Hist. Græc., Didot. ed., vol. iii., p. 523), wrote on primitive history, and incidentally (?) speaks of Nannacus or Anacus—and may therefore probably be the same as the Hermogenes whom Josephus mentions as having treated on Jewish history (Contra Apion. i. 23)—suggests that he may be the person mentioned by St. Paul. This, however, is not likely. Nothing more is known of the Hermogenes in question, and he cannot be identified either with Hermogenes of Tarsus, a historian of the time of Domitian, who was put to death by that emperor (Suet. Domit. 10; Smith's Dict. of Biography, s. v.; Hoffmann, Lex. Univ., s. v.; Alford, 2 Tim. i. 15), nor with Hermogenes the painter, against whom Tertullian wrote (Smith's Dict. of Biography, s. v.), nor with the saints of the Byzantine Church, commemorated on Jan. 24 and Sept. 1 (Neale, Eastern Church, vol. ii., pp. 770, 781).—F. HERMON (הַרְמוֹן, and in the pl. הַרְמוֹנִים; Ἀερμών, Ἑρμωνία; Hermon), a celebrated mountain on the northern border of Palestine, on the east side of the great valley of the Jordan, and just above the sources of that river. Hence it was mentioned by Moses as marking the limit of the country conquered east of the Jordan:—'He took at that time out of the hand of the two kings of the Amorites the land that was on this side Jordan, from the river of Arnon unto Mount Hermon' (Deut. iii. 8). Hermon was a natural landmark. It could be seen from the 'plains of Moab' beside the Dead Sea, from the heights of Nebo, from every prominent spot, in fact, in Moab, Gilead, and Bashan—a pale blue, snow-capped peak, terminating the view on the northern horizon. When the people came to know the country better—when not merely its great physical features but its towns and villages became familiar to them, then Baal-Gad and Dan took the place of Hermon; both of them being situated just at the southern base of that mountain. Hermon itself was not embraced in the country conquered by Moses and Joshua; their conquests extended only to it (see Josh. xi. 17; Deut. xxxiv. 1; 1 Sam. iii. 20). Hermon was also the north-western boundary of the old kingdom of Bashan, as Salcah was the south-eastern. We read in Josh. xii. 5 that Og 'reigned in Mount Hermon, and in Salcah, and in all Bashan'; i. e., in all Bashan, from Hermon to Salcah. Another notice of Hermon shews the minute accuracy of the topography of Joshua. He makes 'Lebanon toward the sun-rising,' that is, the range of Antilebanon, extend from Hermon to the entering into Hamath (xiii. 5). Every Oriental geographer now knows that Hermon is the southern and culminating point of this range. The beauty and grandeur of Hermon did not escape the attention of the Hebrew poets. From nearly every prominent point in Palestine the mountain is visible; but it is when we leave the hill country of Samaria and enter the plain of Esdraelon, that Hermon appears in all its majesty, shooting up on the distant horizon behind the graceful rounded top of Tabor. It was probably this view that suggested to the Psalmist the words, 'The north and the south thou hast created them: Tabor and Hermon shall rejoice in thy name' (lxxxix. 12). The explanation of this passage given by Venema, Bochart, and others, that Tabor and Hermon represent the east and the west, are totally wrong

(Venema, Comment. in loc. ; Bochart, Opp. i. 447 ; Reland, p. 324).

The names of Hermon, ancient and modern, are numerous, and they are all descriptive. They appear to have been suggested by the impressions made on the minds of the several writers by the appearance of the mountain from their different points of view. Hermon is equivalent to the Arabic Khurmon, خرم, prominens montis ver- tex (Freitag, Lex. Arab.) Hilary gives a different etymology : Hermon mons est in Phœnice cujus interpretatio Anathema est (Comm. in Ps. cxxxiii.) The Amorites, we are told, called it Shenir (שֶׁנִּיר ; Sept. Σαβίρ ; Deut. iii. 9), and the Sidonians Sirion (סִרְיֹן ; Sept. Σαριών ; Deut. iii. 9 ; Ezek. xxvii. 5), words radically identical, and signifying 'a breastplate' or 'coat of mail' ; to which, as seen from the west when the sun's rays are reflected from its icy crown, it bears some resemblance. It was also called Sion (צִיּוֹן), 'the lofty,' as overtopping all its fellows (Deut. iv. 48)—a name which seems to throw light on the difficult passage in Ps. cxxxiii. 3 : 'As the dew of Hermon that descended upon the mountains of Zion.' Here Zion, צִיּוֹן, appears to be used for, or as equivalent to, שֶׁנִּיר (see Grotius and Venema, ad loc.)

Hermon is composed of a cluster of mountains, which in the distance appear to form one great cone ; but, on closer inspection, we find a number of lofty ranges, radiating from a central peak, and this peak itself resolves itself into three summits (Porter's Damascus, i. 292, sq.) Thus we see the accuracy of the Psalmist's allusion : 'Therefore will I remember thee from the land of the Hermons' (not 'Hermonites,' as in our A. V., but הרמנים). It appears, too, that occasionally the different names of the mountain were attached distinctively to different parts of the group, a practice not uncommon in Syria at the present day. Thus, in 1 Chron. v. 23, 'And the children of Manasseh dwelt in the land : they increased from Bashan unto Baal-hermon, and Senir, and unto Mount Hermon.' Now each of these names is used in other passages to denote the whole mountain (Judg. iii. 3 ; Deut. iii. 9, etc.) ; but here they seem to be distinctive. Probably that southern section of the group, where the Sidonians had their great stronghold near Paneas, was called by local writers Senir. The name Baal-hermon may have been applied to some noted sanctuary on a spur in another direction, and Mount Hermon meant the central peak itself. Its usual modern names are tain ;' and Jebel eth-Thelj, جبل الثلج, 'the snow mountain.' The latter we find in the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, which, in Deut. iii. 9, read טור תלנא (see also Abulfeda, Tab. Syr., p. 18 ; Reland, p. 323). Hermon is the only snow-crowned peak visible from Palestine during the summer months.

There can be no doubt that one of the southern peaks of Hermon was the scene of the Transfiguration. Our Lord travelled from Bethsaida on the north-east shore of the Sea of Galilee, 'to the coasts of Cæsarea-Philippi.' Thence he led his disciples 'into an high mountain apart, and was transfigured before them ;' and afterwards he returned, going towards Jerusalem through Galilee (comp. Mark viii. 22-28 ; Matt. xvi. 13 ; Mark ix. 2-13, 30-33). No other mountain in Palestine seems so appropriate to the circumstances of that glorious scene. For many centuries a monkish tradition assigned this honour to Tabor (Robinson, B. R., ii. 358) ; but it is now restored to its proper locality, and will give additional celebrity to the prince of Syrian mountains (Porter's Damascus, i. 306 ; Stanley, S. and P., 392).

Hermon is, both physically and politically, a grand central point in the geography of Syria and Palestine. From it radiate all the most noted rivers—the Jordan, whose fountains are fed by its eternal snows ; the Abana and Pharpar, 'rivers of Damascus ;' the Orontes, which swept past the walls of the classic and 'Christian' Antioch ; and the Leontes. All the great ancient kingdoms in the country also converged at Hermon—Bashan, Damascus, Phœnicia, Israel. And Hermon was the religious centre of primeval Syria. Its Baal sanctuaries not only existed, but gave it a name, before the Exodus (Josh. xi. 17). It retained its sacred character during the long rule of the Greeks and Romans ; and Jerome writes : 'Dicitur esse in vertice ejus insigne templum, quod ab ethnicis cultui habetur,' etc. (Onomast., s. v. Aermon). Recent investigations have illustrated these historic statements in a remarkable manner. Round the whole base and sides of the mountain the ruins of many ancient temples have been discovered, and all of them pointing towards the central peak ! (Handbook for S. and P., p. 457). The writer of this article ascended Hermon in 1852, and found still existing on its highest summit the remains of the very temple referred to by Jerome ; and beside it the primeval fire-altar which gave to it, in all probability, its Scriptural appellation, Baal-hermon. 'Hermon has three summits. . . . On the second of these (overhanging the deep glen in which are the sources of the Pharpar) are curious and interesting ruins. Round a rock, which forms the crest of the peak, are the foundations of a circular wall, composed of large stones, and within the circle are heaps of hewn stones, some of them bevelled, and others with a plain moulding round the edge. The foundations of a small temple can be made out. It stands on the brow of the mountain, overhanging a long steep declivity. The ruins of this temple seem to be more recent than the stones of the ring' (Handbook for S. and P., ii. p. 454). The ancient inhabitants of Canaan had their sacred places on 'the high mountains and the hills' (Deut. xii. 2 ; cf. 2 Kings xvii. 10, 11). We need not wonder then that Hermon should have been selected for the erection of an altar and the burning of a sacred fire. The glorious view obtained from it of the sun's course, from his rising in the eastern desert to his setting in the great sea, would naturally mark it as the most fitting locality for his chief worship.

The lower slopes of Hermon, and the ranges that radiate from it are thinly clothed with oak forests, chiefly evergreen. The central peak is a naked obtuse cone of gray limestone, rising from 2000 to 3000 feet above the attached ridges. During the winter the peak is covered with snow, but in summer the snow gradually dissolves until only a few streaks remain on the summit. According to the measurement of Major Scott, Hermon has an elevation of 9376 feet, being 775 feet less than the highest peak of the Lebanon range (Van de Velde, Memoir, pp. 170, 176). It is thus the second mountain in Syria. During the summer months fleecy clouds cling round the top of Hermon when the whole heavens are elsewhere cloudless. The dew on and around the mountain is very abundant. One of its southern spurs is called Abu Nady, 'the father of dew.' In the spring of 1857, the writer encamped two nights at its base, and his tent was as completely saturated as if heavy rain had fallen. HERODIAN FAMILY. We are principally indebted to Josephus for the information respecting the Herodian family, though incidental notices occur in the classical writers, especially in Strabo (xvi. c. ii. 46). It will be sufficient for our purpose to commence our consideration of their origin from Antipater the Idumæan, father of Herod I. This Antipater, or Antipas, son of an Idumæan of the same name, had embraced the Jewish religion when Idumæa was taken by John Hyrcanus (Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 9. 1). Afterwards disputes arising between Hyrcanus II. and his brother Aristobulus, the competing princes produced their case before Pompey. In B.C. 63 Pompey took Jerusalem, and Aristobulus was deposed; and in B.C. 47, when Cæsar came to Syria, he appointed Antipater governor of Judæa.

According to Nicolaus of Damascus, Antipater was of the stock of the principal Jews who came out of Babylon into Judæa (Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 1. 3). Various other accounts are given of his ancestry, but none are worthy of notice here. Josephus himself in several passages says that Antipater was of Idumæan descent, and that Antigonus, the adversary of Herod, publicly proclaimed that the Romans would not do justly if they gave the kingdom to Herod, who was an Idumæan, i.e., a half-Jew (Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 15. 2). The latter expression shews that he was of a proselyte family. In other passages he says that Antipater was of the same race as the Jews, and that Herod was by birth a Jew (Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 8. 1; xx. 8. 7). It seems, therefore, nearly certain, that the Herodian family were of Idumæan descent, and Ewald gives several forms of the names still retained in the family (Geschichte, iv. 477, note).

The splendour and magnificence of the reign of Herod shed a dazzling lustre around his government, though he was really dependent upon the empire, and wisely saw the policy, which was followed by all the members of his family, of courting his Roman masters, no doubt with the idea of forming at some time an independent Eastern monarchy. He was the first who shook the foundation of the ancient form of Jewish government as constituted by the Law. He appointed the high-priests, and removed them at pleasure, often filling the sacred office with men of low birth. In this he was followed by Archelaus, and afterwards by the Romans, so that there were in all twenty-eight high-priests from the days of Herod to the taking of the Temple by Titus, a period of 107 years (Joseph. Antiq. xx. 10).

Herod the Great had ten wives; of two of them the names have not been preserved. Accounts of the family of Herod and the combinations of relationship between the descendants of the different wives may be found in the following passages of Josephus (Antiq. xvii. 1. 3; xviii. 5. 4; Bell. Jud. i. 28. 4). The following table merely shews the relationship between those members of the Herodian family mentioned in the N. T. An elaborate table, by Mr. Westcott, giving a summary of the accounts of Josephus, which are not always consistent in detail, is in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 792.

I. HEROD, surnamed THE GREAT (Ἡρώδης), was the second son of Antipater and Cypros, an Arabian lady of noble descent (Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 7. 3). In B.C. 47 Julius Cæsar made Antipater Procurator of Judæa, and the latter divided his territories among his four sons, assigning the district of Galilee to Herod (Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 9. 3; Bell. Jud. i. 10. 4). At the time when he was invested with the government he was fifteen years of age according to Josephus (Antiq. xiv. 9. 2); but it must be a mistake. Herod died, aged sixty-nine, in B.C. 4, consequently he must have been twenty-six or twenty-five in the year B.C. 47, when he was made governor of Galilee (πέρτε καὶ εὐκροί, given by Dindorf in the ed. Didot, but no stated authority). One of his first acts was to repress the brigands who were infesting his provinces, and to put many of their leaders to death upon his own authority. This was made known to Hyrcanus, and Herod was summoned to take his trial before the Sanhedrim for his deeds of violence. Herod, instead of appearing before the Sanhedrim clothed in mourning, came in purple, attended by armed guards, and bearing in his hand a letter from the Roman commander Sextus Cæsar for his acquittal. This overawed the assembly, but Sameas, a just man (Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 9. 4), stepped forward, and boldly addressing the assembly, predicted that should the offender escape punishment, he would live to kill all those who were his judges, and would not grant the pardon which the assembly seemed inclined to extend to him. He, however, escaped, and took refuge with Sextus Cæsar, who soon appointed him governor (στυγυός) of Coele-Syria. He then determined to march against Jerusalem, and would have done so, had not his father Antipater and his family restrained him from committing any fresh acts of violence. In B.C. 44, after Cæsar's death, Cassius took the government of Syria. Herod and his father Antipater willingly assisted Cassius in obtaining the taxes levied upon the Jews for the support of the troops. For this Herod was confirmed in the government of Coele-Syria (Joseph. Bell. Jud. i. 11. 4). In B.C. 41 Antony came to Syria, and Herod, by making him valuable presents, soon formed with him a close personal intimacy (Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 12. 2). Hyrcanus, to whose beautiful granddaughter Mariamne Herod was betrothed, induced Antony to make Herod and his brother Phasael tetrarchs of Judæa (Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 13. 1; Bell. Jud. i. 12. 5). The invasion of the Parthians, who sided with Antigonus the Asmonæan, compelled Herod to give up Judæa and fly to Rome. Antony was then in great power, and took Herod under his protection, and seeing that he might prove useful to him, obtained a decree of the senate appointing him king of Judæa, to the extinction of all the living Asmonæan princes (Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 9-14; Bell. Jud. i. 10-14; Dion Cass. xlviii.) These events took place in B.C. 40, and Herod, only staying seven days at Rome, returned speedily to Jerusalem within three months from the time he had first fled.

It was not, however, so easy for Herod to obtain possession of Jerusalem or to establish himself as king of Judæa, as it had been to obtain this title from the Romans. The Jews still held firmly to Antigonus as the representative of the Asmonæan line, and it was not for several years that Herod made any material advance whatever. With the assistance of the Romans Herod made preparations to take Jerusalem. He had endeavoured to conciliate the people by marrying Mariamne, thinking that by so doing the attachment of the Jews to the Asmonæan family would be extended to him. After six months' siege the Romans entered the city (B.C. 37), and to revenge the obstinate resistance they had received, began to ransack and plunder, and it was no easy task for Herod to purchase from the conquerors the freedom from pillage of some part of his capital. Antigonus was taken and conveyed to Antioch, where, having been previously beaten, he was ignominiously executed with the axe by the order of Antony, a mode of treatment which the Romans had never before used to a king (Dion Cass. lix. 22; Joseph. Antiq. xv. 1. 2). Thus ended the government of the Asmonæans, 126 years after it was first set up (Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 16. 4). Immediately on ascending the throne Herod put to death all the members of the Sanhedrim, excepting Pollio and Sameas,* who had predicted this result, and also all the adherents of Antigonus who could be found. Having confiscated their property, he sent presents to Antony to repay him for his assistance and to further secure his favour. He then gave the office of high-priest, which had become vacant by the death of Antigonus, and the mutilation of Hyrcanus, whose ears had been cut off by Antigonus (cf. Lev. xxi. 16-24), to an obscure priest from Babylon, named Ananel. At this insult Alexandra, the mother of Mariamne and Aristobulus, to whom the office of high-priest belonged by hereditary succession, appealed to Cleopatra to use her powerful influence with Antony, and Herod was thus compelled to depose Ananel, and to elevate Aristobulus to the high-priesthood. The increasing popularity of Aristobulus, added to the further intrigues of Alexandra, so excited the jealousy of Herod, that he caused him to be drowned while bathing, and expressed great sorrow at the accident. Alexandra again applied to Cleopatra, who at last persuaded Antony to summon Herod to Laodicea to answer for his conduct. Herod was obliged to obey, but was dismissed with the highest honours (Joseph. Antiq. xv. 3. 1-8; cf. Bell. Jud. i. 22. 2). After the defeat of Antony at Actium in B.C. 31, Herod had an audience at Rhodes with Octavius, who did not think that Antony was quite powerless while Herod continued his assistance to him (Joseph. Bell. Jud. i. 20. 1). Herod so conciliated him that he obtained security in his kingdom of Judæa, to which Octavius added Gadara, Samaria, and the maritime cities Gaza and Joppa. Shortly after the regions of Trachonitis, Batanea, and Auranitis, were given him (Joseph. Antiq. xv. 5. 6, 7; 10. 1; Bell. Jud. i. 20. 3, 4; comp. Tac. Hist. v. 9). Herod's domestic life was troubled by a long series of bloodshed. Hyrcanus, the grandfather of his wife Mariamne, was put to death before his visit to Octavius, and Mariamne, to whom he was passionately attached, fell a victim to his jealousy soon after his return. His remorse for the deed is well described by Josephus, who says that Herod commanded his attendants always to speak of her as alive (Antiq. xv. 7. 7; Bell. Jud. i. 22. 5). In

* These two are the famous Hillel and Shammai of the Rabbinical writers, the founders of the two schools of doctrine.

B.C. 20, when Augustus visited Judæa in person, another extensive addition was made to his territories. The district of Paneas was taken away from its ruler Zenodorus for leaguering himself with the Arabs, and given to Herod. In return Herod adorned this place by erecting a temple, which he dedicated to Augustus (Joseph. Antiq. xv. 10. 3; Bell. Jud. i. 20. 4; Dion Cass. liv. 9). Not long after this, the death of his wife was followed by other atrocities. Alexander and Aristobulus, the sons of Mariamne, were put to death, and at last, in B.C. 4, Herod ordered his eldest son, Antipater, to be killed. Herod's painful disease no doubt maddened him in his later years, and in anticipation of his own death he gave orders that the principal Jews, whom he had shut up in the Hippodrome at Jericho, should immediately after his decease be put to death, that mourners might not be wanting at his funeral (Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 6. 5). On his deathbed, too, he must have ordered the murder of the infants at Bethlehem, as recorded in St. Matthew (ii. 16-18). The number of children in a village must have been very few, and Josephus has passed this story over unnoticed; yet it is worthy of remark that he has given an account of a massacre by Herod of all the members of his family who had consented to what the Pharisees foretold, viz., that Herod's government should cease, and his posterity be deprived of the kingdom (Antiq. xvii. 2. 4). A confused account of the massacre of the children and the murder of Antipater is given in Macrobius—'Augustus cum audisset inter pueros, quos in Syriâ Herodes, rex Judæorum, intra bimatum jussit interfici, filium quoque ejus occisum, ait: Melius est Herodis porcum (τὸν ὄν?) esse quam filium (τὸν υἱόν?)' (Sat. ii. 4). Macrobius lived in the 5th century (c.A.D. 420), and the words intra bimatum (à bimatu et infra, Matt. ii. 16, Vulg.) seem to be borrowed; the story, too, is wrong, as Antipater was of age when he was executed (Alford, in loc.) Macrobius may have made some mistake on account of Herod's wish to destroy the heir to the throne of David. Herod died in the thirty-seventh year of his reign (dating from his being made king by Antony), and in the seventieth year of his age, B.C. 4. His body was conveyed by his son Archelaus from Jericho, where he died, to Herodium, a city and fortress 200 stadia distant; and he was there buried with great pomp (Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 8. 2; Bell. Jud. i. 38. 9).

On the extirpation of the Asmonean family, finding that there was then no one who could interfere with him, Herod had introduced heathenish customs, such as plays, shows, and chariot-races, which the Jews condemned as contrary to the laws of Moses (Joseph. Antiq. xv. 8. 1); and on the completion of the building of Cæsarea he also introduced Olympic games and consecrated them to Cæsar, ordering them to be celebrated every fifth year (Joseph. Antiq. xv. 9. 6; xvi. 5. 1). Notwithstanding that he thus alienated his subjects from him, he greatly improved his country by the number of fine towns and magnificent public buildings which he had erected. He built a temple at Samaria, and converted it into a Roman city under the name of Sebaste. He also built Gaba in Galilee, and Heshbonitis in Peræa (Joseph. Antiq. xv. 8. 5), besides several other towns, which he called by the names of different members of his family, as Antipatris, from the name of his father Antipater, and Phasaelis, in the plains of Jericho, after his brother Phasael (Joseph. Antiq. xvi. 5. 2). On many other towns in Syria and Greece he bestowed money, but his grandest undertaking was the rebuilding of the Temple at Jerusalem. It was commenced in the eighteenth year of his reign (B.C. 20), and the work was carried on with such vigour that the Temple itself (ναός, i.e., the Holy House, was finished in a year and a half (Joseph. Antiq. xv. 11. 1, 6). The cloisters and outer buildings were finished in eight years (Joseph. Antiq., l. c., 11. 5). Additions and repairs were continually being made, and it was not till the reign of Herod Agrippa II. (c. A.D. 65) that the Temple (τὸ ἱερόν) was completed (Joseph. Antiq. xx. 9. 7). Hence the Jews said to our Lord, 'Forty and six years was this Temple in building [ᾠκοδομήθη—and is not even yet completed], and wilt thou raise it up in three days?' (John ii. 20). This took place in A.D. 27, just after our Lord's baptism, who 'was about thirty years of age' (Luke iii. 23), and who was born a few months before the death of Herod, in B.C. 4, according to the usual chronology, which places the nativity four years before the Vulgar era. This beautiful temple, though built in honour of the God of Israel, did not win the hearts of the people, as is proved by the revolt which took place shortly before Herod's death, when the Jews tore down the golden eagle which he had fastened to the Temple, and broke it in pieces (Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 6. 2, 3).

The diversity of Herod's nature is remarkable. On regarding his magnificence, and the benefits he bestowed upon his people, one cannot deny that he had a very beneficent disposition; but when we read of his cruelties, not only to his subjects, but even to his own relations, one is forced to allow that he was brutish and a stranger to humanity (cf. Joseph. Antiq. xvi. 5. 4). His servility to Rome is amply shewn by the manner in which he transgressed the customs of his nation and set aside many of their laws, building cities and erecting temples in foreign countries, for the Jews did not permit him so to do in Judæa, even though they were under so tyrannical a government as that of Herod. His confessed apology was that he was acting to please Cæsar and the Romans, and so through all his reign he was a Jewish prince only in name, with a Hellenistic disposition (cf. Joseph. Antiq. xv. 9. 5; xix. 7. 3). Josephus gives Herod I. the surname of Great ('Ἡρώδης τῷ μεγάλῳ). Ewald suggests that the title of elder is only intended to distinguish him from the younger Herod (Antipas), and compares the cases of 'Ἐλλάς ὁ μέγας' (Antiq. xviii. 8. 4) and Agrippa the Great, in contradistinction to Helcias, the keeper of the sacred treasure (Antiq. xx. 11. 1), and to Agrippa II. The title, 'Agrippa the Great,' is confirmed by coins, on which he is styled ΜΕΓΑΣ (Eckhel, Doct. Num. Vet., vol. iii. p. 492; Akerman, Num. Chron., vol. ix. p. 23), and so, says Ewald, 'it may similarly have been given upon the coins of Herod, and from this the origin of the surname may have been derived' (Geschichte, vol. iv. p. 473, note). There are, however, no coins of Herod I. with the title great. Jost, in his Geschichte des Judenthums, p. 319 note, in speaking of 'the tyrannical government of Herod, whom history called, as it were in derision (?), the Great,' says, 'Perhaps this (the title Great) arises from a mistaken translation of רבא, which may also mean the elder. Unfortunately he does not say from what source he obtains this word; and if it is to be found, it must be of very rare occurrence. It is best to suppose that the title in Josephus is merely a distinguishing epithet, and not meant to express greatness of character or achievements.

2. HEROD ANTIPAS ('Ἡρώδης, Matt., Mark, Luke; 'Avritas, Josephus) was the son of Herod the Great, by Malthace, a Samaritan (Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 1. 3; Bell. Jud. i. 28. 4). His father had already given him 'the kingdom' in his first will, but in the final arrangement left him the tetrarchy of Galilee and Peræa (Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 8. 1; Bell. Jud. ii. 9. 1; Matt. xiv. 1; Luke iii. 1; iii. 19; ix. 1; Acts xiii. 1), which brought him the yearly revenue of 200 talents (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 5. 1). On his way to Rome he visited his brother Philip, and commencing an intrigue with his wife Herodias, daughter of Aristobulus, the son of Mariamne, he afterwards incestuously married her. He had been previously married to a daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia Petrea, who avenged this insult by invading his dominions, and defeated him with great loss (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 5. 1). Josephus says that the opinion of the Jews was that the defeat was a punishment for his having imprisoned John the Baptist on account of his popularity, and afterwards put him to death, but does not mention the reproval that John gave him, nor that it was at the instigation of Herodias that he was killed, as recorded in the Gospels (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 5. 4; Matt. xiv. 1-11; Mark vi. 14-16; Luke iii. 19; ix. 7-9). The evangelists evidently give the true reason, and Josephus the one generally received by the people. In A.D. 38, after the death of Tiberius, he was persuaded to go to Rome to procure for himself the royal title. Agrippa [HEROD AGRIPPA I.], who was high in the favour of Caius, opposed this with such success, that Antipas was condemned to perpetual banishment at Lyons, a city of Gaul (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 7. 2), and eventually died in Spain, whither his wife Herodias [HERODIAS] had voluntarily followed him' (Bell. Jud. ii. 9. 6). He is called king by St. Matthew (xiv. 9) and by St. Mark (vi. 14).

Herod Antipas was in high favour with Tiberius. Hence he gave the name of Tiberias to the city he built on the lake of Gennesareth (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 2. 3). He enlarged and improved several cities of his dominions, and also built a wall about Sepphoris, and round Betharamphtha, which latter town he named Julias in honour of the wife of the Emperor† (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 2. 1; cf. Bell. Jud. ii. 9. 1).

* There is here some confusion. It has been suggested (Dr. Smith's Bibl. Dict. vol. i. p. 796) that the town is Lugdunum Convenarum (now St. Bertrand de Comminges), a town of Gaul situated on the right bank of the Garonne, at the foot of the Pyrenees, as a town like this would satisfy both passages.

† If Josephus means Augustus, his wife Livia did not receive the name of Julia till after the Emperor's death in A.D. 14, and it seems very improbable that Antipas should have renamed the city at so late a date as the death of Augustus. If he means Tiberius, his wife Julia, the daughter of Augustus, was not living with him when he came to the throne. Eusebius and Jerome state

VOL. II.

It was before Herod Antipas that our Lord was sent for examination when Pilate heard that He was a Galilean, as Pilate had already had several disputes with the Galilæans, and was not at this time on very good terms with Herod (Luke xiii. 1; xxiii. 6-7), and 'on the same day Pilate and Herod were made friends together' (Luke xxiii. 12; cf. Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 3. 2; Ps. lxxiii. 5). The name of Herod Antipas is coupled with that of Pilate in the prayer of the Apostles mentioned in the Acts (iv. 24-30). His personal character is little touched upon by either Josephus or the Evangelists, yet from his consenting to the death of John the Baptist to gratify the malice of a wicked woman, though for a time he had 'heard him gladly' (Mark vi. 20), we perceive his cowardice, his want of spirit, and his fear of ridicule. His wicked oath was not binding on him, for Herod was bound by the law of God not to commit murder. He was in any case desirous to see Jesus, and 'hoped to have seen a miracle from him' (Luke xxiii. 8). His artifice and cunning are specially alluded to by our Lord, 'Go ye and tell that fox' (τῇ ἀλώπεκι ταύτῃ, Luke xiii. 32). Coins of Herod Antipas bear the title ΤΕΤΡΑΡΧΟΥ.

3. HEROD ARCHELAUS ('Ἀρχελαός, Matt.; Josephus; 'Ἡρώδης, Dion Cassius; coins), son of Herod the Great and Malthace, uterine and younger brother of Herod Antipas, and called by Dion Cassius 'Ἡρώδης Παλαιστῆνός' (lib. iv. 57). His father had disinherited him in consequence of the false accusations of his eldest brother Antipater, the son of Doris; but Herod, on making a new will, altered his mind, and gave him 'the kingdom,' which had been before left to Antipas (Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 8. 1). He was saluted as 'king' by the army, but refused to accept that title till it should be confirmed by Augustus (Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 8. 2, 4; Bell. Jud. i. 1). Shortly after this a sedition was raised against him, which he quelled by killing 3000 persons, and he then set sail with his brother Antipas to Rome (Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 9. 2, 4; Bell. Jud. ii. 2. 3). Upon this the Jews sent an embassy to Augustus to request that they might be allowed to live according to their own laws under a Roman governor. Our Lord seems to allude to this circumstance in the parable of the nobleman going into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom. 'But his citizens hated him, and sent a message after him, saying, we will not have this man to reign over us' (Luke xix. 12-27). While he was at Rome Jerusalem was under the care of Sabinus the Roman procurator, and a quarrel ensued in consequence of the manner in which the Jews were treated. Quiet was again established through the intervention of Varus, the president of Syria, and the authors of the sedition were punished (Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 10). Augustus, however, ratified the main points of Herod's will, and gave Archelaus, Judæa, Samaria, and Idumæa, with the cities of Cæsarea, Sebaste, Joppa, and Jerusalem, the title of ethnarch, and a promise that he should have the royal dignity hereafter if he that Herod (I.?) had given it the name of Libias (Livias) in honour of the wife of Augustus (Onomast., s. v. Libias). Julia (Betharamphtha) must not be confounded with the Julia (Bethsaida) enlarged by Herod Philip II., and named after the daughter of Augustus (see HEROD PHILIP II.)

governed virtuously* (Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 11. 4; Bell. Jud. ii. 6. 3). When Archelaus returned to Judea he rebuilt the royal palace at Jericho, and established a village, naming it after himself, Archelais (Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 13. 1). It was evidently the alteration of Herod's will that caused Joseph to return into Galilee, which was under the milder government of Antipas (Matt. ii. 22). Shortly after Archelaus' return he violated the Mosaic law by marrying Glaphyra, the daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, and the Jews complaining again loudly of his tyranny, Augustus summoned him to Rome, and finally, A.D. 6, sent him into exile at Vienna in Gaul, where he probably died, and his dominions were attached to the Roman empire (Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 13. 2; Bell. Jud. ii. 7; cf. Strabo, xvi. p. 765; Dion Cass., iv. 25, 27). Jerome, however, relates that he was shewn the tomb of Archelaus near Bethlehem (Onomasticon, s. v.) Coins with the title ΕΘΝΑΡΧΟΣ belong to Archelaus.

4. HEROD PHILIP I. (Φίλιππος, Mark vi. 17; Ηρώδης, Josephus), was the son of Herod the Great, by a second Mariamne, the daughter of Simon the high-priest (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 5. 4), and must be distinguished from Philip the tetrarch. [HEROD PHILIP II.] He was the husband of Herodias, by whom he had a daughter, Salome. Herodias, however, contrary to the laws of her country, divorced herself from him, and married her uncle Antipas [HEROD ANTIPAS; HERODIAS] (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 5. 4; Matt. xiv. 3; Mark vi. 17; Luke iii. 19). He was omitted in the will of Herod in consequence of the discovery that Mariamne was conscious of the plots of Antipater, Herod the Great's son by Doris (Joseph. Bell. Jud. i. 30. 7).

5. HERODIAS (Ηρώδια, Matt. xiv. 1-11; Mark vi. 14-16; Luke iii. 19) was daughter of Aristobulus, one of the sons of Herod I. by the first Mariamne, and of Berenice, the daughter of Salome, Herod's sister, and was consequently sister of Herod Agrippa I. (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 5. 4; Bell. Jud. i. 28. 1). She was first married to her uncle, Herod Philip I., the son of Herod I., and the second Mariamne, by whom she had a daughter Salome, probably the one that danced and pleased Herod Antipas, and who afterwards married her uncle Philip II. Herodias soon divorced herself from him, and married Herod Antipas, who was also her uncle, being the son of Herod I. and Malthace, and who agreed, for her sake, to put away his own wife, the daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 5. 1, 4). St. John the Baptist reproved her for her crimes, in thus living in adultery and incest, and she took the first opportunity to cause him to be put to death, thus adding thereto the crime of murder. Her marriage was unlawful for three reasons; first, her former husband, Philip, was still alive (διαστὰσα ζώντος, Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 5. 4); secondly, Antipas' wife was still alive; and thirdly, by her first marriage with Philip she became the sister-in-law of Antipas, who was consequently forbidden by the Jewish law to marry his brother's wife (Levit. xviii. 16; xx. 21; cf. Alford, Matt. xiv. 4). When Antipas was condemned by Caius to perpetual banishment, Herodias was offered a pardon, and the Emperor made her a present of money, telling her that it was her brother Agrippa (I.) who prevented her being involved in the same calamity as her husband. The best trait of her character is shewn when, in true Jewish spirit, she refused this offer, and voluntarily chose to share the exile of her husband [HEROD ANTIPAS] (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 7. 2).

6. HEROD PHILIP II. (Φίλιππος, Luke; Josephus) was son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra (Γερσολυμῆτις), and was with his half brothers Archelaus and Antipas brought up at Rome* (Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 1. 3; Bell. Jud. i. 28. 4). He received as his share of the empire the tetrarchy of Batanea, Trachonitis, Auranitis, and certain parts about Jamnia, with a revenue of 100 talents (Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 11. 4; Bell. Jud. ii. 6. 3). He is only mentioned once in the N. T. (Luke iii. 1, Φίλιππου τετραρχούντος). He was married to Salome, the daughter of Herod Philip I. and Herodias, but left no children (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 5. 4). He reigned over his dominions for 37 years (B.C. 4—A.D. 34), during which time he shewed himself to be a person of moderation and quietness in the conduct of his life and government (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 4. 6). He built the city of Paneas and named it Cæsarea, more commonly known as Cæsarea Philippi (Matt. xvi. 13; Mark viii. 27), and also advanced to the dignity of a city the village Bethsaida, calling it by the name of Julias, in honour of the daughter of Augustus.† He died at Julias, and was buried in the monument he had there built (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 2. 1; 4. 6; Bell. Jud. ii. 9. 1). Leaving no children, his dominions were annexed to the Roman province of Syria (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 5. 6). Coins of Philip II. bear the title ΤΕΤΡΑΡΧΟΣ.

7. HEROD AGRIPPA I. (Ηρώδης Acts; Ἀγρίππας, Josephus) was the son of Aristobulus and Berenice, and grandson of Herod the Great (Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 1. 2; Bell. Jud. i. 28. 1). He is called 'Agrippa the Great' by Josephus (Antiq. xvii. 2. 2). A short time before the death of Herod the Great he was living at Rome, and was brought up with Drusus, the son of Tiberius, and with Antonia, the wife of Drusus (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 6. 1). He was only one year older than Claudius, who was born in B.C. 10, and they were bred up together in the closest intimacy. He, however, soon exhausted all his funds by his reckless extravagance, but ultimately obtained the appoint-

* Archelaus never really had the title of king (βασιλεύς), though at first called so by the people (Joseph. Antiq. xvii. 8. 2); yet we cannot object to the word βασιλεύει in St. Matthew, for Archelaus regarded himself as king (Joseph. Bell. Jud. ii. 1. 1), and Josephus speaks of the province of Lysanias, which was only a tetrarchy, as βασιλείαν τῇν Λυσανίου (Bell. Jud. ii. 11. 5). Herod (Antipas) the tetrarch is also called ὁ βασιλεύς (Matt. xiv. 9; Mark vi. 14).

* Josephus, in his Antiq. xvii. 8. 1, calls Philip Ἀρχελαῶν ἀδελφῷ γνησίῳ, own brother of Archelaus. In other passages he gives their descent correctly.

† This is not the Bethsaida of Galilee, but that mentioned in Luke ix. 10, where Christ fed the 5000, and in Mark viii. 22. It was in Lower Gaulonitis (Joseph. Bell. Jud. ii. 9. 1). Its situation is described by Josephus, where he says that the Jordan just passes by the city Julias, and then through the middle of the Lake of Gennesareth (Bell. Jud. iii. 10. 9) [BETHSAIDA].

ment of governor of the city of Tiberias through the instigation of his sister Herodias, and his wife Cypros, the daughter of Phasael, brother of Herod the Great (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 6. 2). In an unguarded moment he expressed the wish that Caius might soon succeed to the throne, which, being reported to Tiberius, he was arrested and thrown into prison, where he remained till the accession of Caius in A.D. 37 (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 6. 10). Caius shortly after gave him the tetrarchy of Philip, the iron chain with which he had been fastened to a soldier being exchanged for a gold one (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 6. 10). He then started to take possession of his kingdom, and at Alexandria was insulted by the people, who dressed up an idiot, and bore him in mock triumph through the streets to deride the new king of the Jews (Philo, in Flaccum, 6). After the exile of his uncle Antipas, he received from Caius the tetrarchy of Galilee and Peræa (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 7. 2); and in A.D. 41, for having greatly assisted Claudius, he received his whole paternal kingdom (Judæa and Samaria), and in addition the tetrarchy of Lysanias II.* (cf. Luke iii. 1). Agrippa now possessed the entire kingdom of Herod the Great. At this time he begged of Claudius the kingdom of Chalcis for his brother Herod (Joseph. Antiq. xix. 5. 1; Bell. Jud. ii. 11. 5). He loved to live at Jerusalem, and was a strict observer of the laws of his country, which will account for his persecuting the Christians, who were hated by the Jews (Joseph. Antiq. xix. 7. 3). Thus influenced by a strong desire for popularity, rather than from innate cruelty, 'he stretched forth his hands to vex certain of the church.' He put to death James the elder, son of Zebedee, and cast Peter into prison, no doubt with the intention of killing him also. This was frustrated by his miraculous deliverance from his jailors by the angel of the Lord (Acts xii. 1-19). Agrippa I., like his grandfather, displayed great taste in building, and especially adorned the city of Berytus (Joseph. Antiq. xix. 7. 5). In A.D. 44 Agrippa celebrated games at Cæsarea in honour of the emperor, and to make vows for his safety. At this festival a number of the principal persons, and such as were of dignity in the province, attended.† On the second day Agrippa appeared in the theatre in a garment interwoven with silver. On closing his address to the people, they saluted him as a god, for which he did not rebuke them, and he was immediately seized with violent internal pains, and died five days after (Joseph. Antiq. xix. 8. 2).

This fuller account of Josephus agrees substantially with that in the Acts. The silver dress (ἐξ ἀργύρου πεποιημένην πᾶσαν, Josephus; ἐσθῆτα βασιλικήν, Acts); and the disease (τῷ τῆς γαστρὸς ἀγχατῇ τὸν βίον κατέστρεψεν, Josephus; γενόμενος σκυληκόβρωτος ἐξέψυξεν, Acts). The owl (βούβα τῶν ἐπὶ τοῦ σχοινοῦ τῶν) which on this occasion appeared to Agrippa as the messenger of ill tidings (ἄγγελος κακῶν, Joseph. Antiq. xix. 8. 2), though on a former one it had appeared to him as a messenger of good news (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 6. 7), is converted by Eusebius (H. E. ii. ch. 10), who professes to quote Josephus, into the angel of the Acts (ἐπάταξεν αὐτὸν ἄγγελος Κυρίου, Acts xii. 23). For an explanation of the confusion, cf. Eusebius l. c., ed. Heinichen, Excurs. ii. vol. iii. p. 556; Alford, in. loc.)

8. HEROD AGRIPPA II. ('Αγρίππας, Acts; Josephus) was the son of Herod Agrippa I. and Cypros (Bell. Jud. ii. 11. 6). At the time of his father's death (A.D. 44) he was only seventeen years of age, and the emperor Claudius, thinking him too young to govern the kingdom, sent Cuspius Fadus as procurator, and thus made it again a Roman province (Joseph. Antiq. xix. 9. 2; Tac. Hist. v. 9). After the death of his uncle Herod in A.D. 48, Claudius bestowed upon him the small kingdom of Chalcis (Joseph. Antiq. xx. 5. 2; Bell. Jud. ii. 12. 1), and four years after took it away from him, giving him instead the tetrarchies of Philip and Lysanias (Joseph. Antiq. xx. 7. 1; Bell. Jud. ii. 12. 8) with the title of king (Acts xxv. 13; xxvi. 2, 7). In A.D. 55 Nero gave him the cities of Tiberias and Taricheæ in Galilee, and Julias, a city of Peræa, with fourteen villages near it (Joseph. Antiq. xx. 8. 4; cf. Bell. Jud. ii. 13. 2).

Agrippa II. exhibited the Herodian partiality for building. He much enlarged the city of Cæsarea Philippi, and in honour of Nero called it Neronias. He also supplied large sums of money towards beautifying Jerusalem and Berytus, transferring almost everything that was ornamental from his own kingdom to this latter place. These acts rendered him most unpopular (Joseph. Antiq. xx. 9. 4). In A.D. 60 king Agrippa and Berenice his sister [BERENICE], concerning the nature of whose equivocal intercourse with each other there had been much grave conversation, and who in consequence persuaded Polemo, king of Cilicia, to marry her (Joseph. Antiq. xx. 7. 3), came to Cæsarea (Acts xxv. 13). It was before him and his sister that the Apostle Paul made his defence, and almost 'persuaded him to be a Christian.'

The famous speech which Agrippa made to the Jews, to dissuade them from waging war with the Romans, is recorded by Josephus (Bell. Jud. ii. 16. 4). At the commencement of the war he sided with the Romans, and was wounded by a sling-stone at the siege of Gamala (Joseph. Bell. Jud. iv. 1. 3). After the fall of Jerusalem he retired with his sister Berenice to Rome, and there died in the seventieth year of his age, and in the third year of Trajan (A.D. 100). He was on intimate terms with Josephus, who gives two of his letters (Life, sec. 65), and he was the last Jewish prince of the Herodian line.

As regards his coins, Eckhel gives two with the head of Nero, one with the legend ΕΠΙ ΒΑΣΙΛΙΑΣ ΑΓΡΙΠΠΙΑ ΝΕΡΟΝΙΕ, confirming the account of Josephus as regards the city of Cæsarea Philippi, and the other bearing the prænomen of Marcus, which he may have received on account of his family being indebted to the triumvir Antony, or else, as Eckhel thinks, more likely from Marcus Agrippa (Eckhel, Doct. Num. Vet., vol. iii. pp. 493, 494; cf. Akerman, Num. Chron., vol. ix. p. 421). There are other coins with the heads of Vespasian, Titus, and Domitian. Most of his coins

* Josephus says, in one passage, that Caius gave him this tetrarchy (Antiq. xviii. 6. 10), but afterwards, in two places, that Claudius gave it to him (Antiq. xix. 5. 1; Bell. Jud. ii. 11. 5). Caius probably promised it, and Claudius actually conferred it.

† Josephus does not mention those of Tyre and Sidon as recorded in the Acts (xii. 20). Though Agrippa was 'highly displeased,' it does not appear that any rupture worthy of notice had taken place.

HERODIANS, a class of Jews that existed in the time of Jesus Christ, whether of a political or religious description it is not easy, for want of materials, to determine. The passages of the N. T. which refer to them are the following, Matt. xxii. 16; Mark iii. 6; xii. 13; Luke xx. 20. The particulars are these:—The ecclesiastical authorities of Judæa having failed to entrap Jesus by demanding the authority by which he did his wonderful works, especially as seen in his expurgation of the temple; and being incensed in consequence of the parable spoken against them, namely, 'A certain man planted a vineyard,' etc., held a council against him, and associating with themselves the Herodians, sent an embassy to our Lord with the express but covert design of ensnaring him in his speech, that thus they might compass his destruction. The question they put to him was one of the most difficult—'Is it lawful to pay tribute to Cæsar?' The way in which Jesus extricated himself from the difficulty and discomfited his enemies is well known.

Do these circumstances afford any light as to what was the precise character of the Herodians? Whatever decision on this point may be arrived at, the general import of the transaction is very clear, and of a character highly honourable to Jesus. That his enemies were actuated by bad faith, and came with false pretences, might also be safely inferred. Luke, however, makes an express statement to this effect, saying (xx. 18-20), 'they sought to lay hands on him; and they feared the people; and they watched him, and sent forth spies which should feign themselves just men, that they might take hold of his words, that so they might deliver him unto the power and authority of the governor.' The aim, then, was to embroil our Lord with the Romans. For this purpose the question put had been cunningly chosen. These appear to have been the several feelings whose toils were around Jesus—the hatred of the priests, the favour of the people towards himself, and their aversion to the dominion of the Romans, their half faith in him as the Messiah, which would probably be converted into the vexation and rage of disappointment, should he approve the payment of tribute to Rome; another element of difficulty had in the actual case been deliberately provided—the presence of the Herodians. Altogether the scene was most perplexing, the trial most perilous. But what additional difficulty did the Herodians bring? Herod Antipas was now Tetrarch of Galilee and Perea, which was the only inheritance he received from his father Herod the Great. As Tetrarch of Galilee he was specially the ruler of Jesus, whose home was in that province. The Herodians, then, may have been subjects of Herod, Galilæans, whose evidence the priests were wishful to procure, because theirs would be the evidence of fellow-countrymen, and of special force with Antipas as being that of his own immediate subjects (Luke xxiii. 7).

Herod's relations with Rome were in an unsafe condition. He was a weak prince, given to ease and luxury, and his wife's ambition conspired with his own desires to make him strive to obtain from the Emperor Caligula the title of king. For this purpose he took a journey to Rome, and was banished to Lyons in Gaul.

The Herodians may have been favourers of his pretensions: if so, they would be partial hearers, and eager witnesses against Jesus before the Roman tribunal. It would be a great service to the Romans to be the means of enabling them to get rid of one who aspired to be king of the Jews. It would equally gratify their own lord, should the Herodians give effectual aid in putting a period to the mysterious yet formidable claims of a rival claimant of the crown.

We do not see that the two characters here ascribed to the Herodians are incompatible; and if they were a Galilean political party who were eager to procure from Rome the honour of royalty for Herod (Mark vi. 14, the name of king is merely as of courtesy), they were chosen as associates by the Sanhedrim with especial propriety.

The deputation were to 'feign themselves just men,' that is, men whose sympathies were entirely Jewish, and, as such, anti-heathen: they were to intimate their dislike of paying tribute, as being an acknowledgment of a foreign yoke; and by flattering Jesus, as one who loved truth, feared no man, and would say what he thought, they meant to inveigle him into a condemnation of the practice. In order to carry these base and hypocritical designs into effect, the Herodians were appropriately associated with the Pharisees; for as the latter were the recognised conservators of Judaism, so the former were friends of the aggrandisement of a native as against a foreign prince.

Other hypotheses may be found in Paulus on the passage in Matt.; in Wolf, Cure Phil. i. 311, sq.; see also J. Steuch, Diss. de Herod., Lund. 1706; J. Floder, Diss. de Herod., Upsal. 1764.—J. R. B.

HERODIAS. [HERODIAN FAMILY.]

HERON. [ANAPHA.]

HESHBON (הֶשְׁבֹּן; Sept. Ἑσβεών; Euseb. Ἑσσεβών); a town in the southern district of the Hebrew territory beyond the Jordan, parallel with, and twenty-one miles east of, the point where the Jordan enters the Dead Sea, and nearly midway between the rivers Jabbok and Arnon. It originally belonged to the Moabites; but when the Israelites arrived from Egypt, it was found to be in the possession of the Amorites, whose king, Sihon, is styled both king of the Amorites and king of Heshbon, and is expressly said to have 'reigned in Heshbon' (Josh. iii. 10; comp. Num. xxi. 26; Deut. ii. 9). It was taken by Moses (Num. xxi. 23-26), and eventually became a Levitical city (Josh. xxi. 39; 1 Chron. vi. 81) in the tribe of Reuben (Num. xxxii. 37; Josh. xiii. 17); but being on the confines of Gad, is sometimes assigned to the latter tribe (Josh. xxi. 39; 1 Chron. vi. 81). After the ten tribes were sent into exile, Heshbon was taken possession of by the Moabites, and hence is mentioned by the prophets in their declarations against Moab (Is. xv. 4; Jer. xlviii. 2, 34, 45). Under King Alexander Jannæus we find it again reckoned as a Jewish city (Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 15. 4). In the time of Eusebius and Jerome it was still a place of some consequence under the name of Esbus (Ἐσβούς); but at the present day it is known by its ancient name of Heshbon, in the slightly modified form of Hesban. The ruins of a considerable town still exist, covering the sides of an insulated hill, but not a single edifice is left entire. The view from the summit is very extensive, embracing the ruins of a vast number of cities, the names of some of which bear a strong resemblance to those mentioned in Scripture. There are reservoirs connected with this and the other received towns of this region. These have been supposed to be the pools of Heshbon mentioned by Solomon (Cant. vii. 4); but, say Irby and Mangles, 'The ruins are uninteresting, and the only pool we saw was too insignificant to be one of those mentioned in Scripture.' In two of the cisterns among the ruins they found about three dozen of human skulls and bones, which they justly regarded as an illustration of Gen. xxxvii. 20 (Travels, p. 472; see also Burckhardt, George Robinson, Lord Lindsay, etc.)—J. K.

HESHMON (הֶשְׁמוֹן), a town on the southern boundary of Palestine (Josh. xv. 27). It has not been identified. To the suggestion that it is the same with the Azmon mentioned Num. xxxiv. 4 (Smith, Dict. of the Bible, s. v.), it may be objected that not only does this change the initiatory guttural, but it supposes a repetition of a name already mentioned in the boundary line (see ver. 4), and probably more to the west.—†

HETH, prop. CHETH (חֶת); Sept. Χῆτ, the father of the Hittites. [HAM; HITTITES.]

HETHLON (חֶתְלוֹן; Vulg. Hethalon. The name is wanting in the Sept.) 'The way of Hethlon' is twice mentioned by Ezekiel when describing the northern border of the land of Israel. In one passage it is spoken of as 'the way of Hethlon, as men go to Zedad' (xlvii. 15); in the other, 'the way of Hethlon, as one goeth to Hamath' (xlviii. 1). This 'way' was manifestly some noted road, or pass, leading from the sea-coast on the west to the kingdom of Hamath, in which Zedad was situated [ZEDAD]. A comparison of these passages with Num. xxxiv. 8 warrants us in concluding that 'the way of Hethlon' was identical with 'the entrance of Hamath.' It was thus the name of the great opening between the northern extremity of Lebanon and the Nusairiyeh mountains. This pass forms the only 'entrance' to the plain of Hamath from the western coast (Porter, Damascus, ii. 356; Robinson, Bib. Res. iii. 568). Winer calls Hethlon a city (Stadt), but there is no proof of this (R. W., s. v. Hethlon).—J. L. P.

HEYDENREICH, AUGUST. LUDWIG CHRISTIAN, a Protestant theologian, was born at Wiesbaden, 25th July 1773. In 1795 he was rector and preacher in Usingen; in 1797 rector and preacher in Wiesbaden; in 1800 Stadtpfarrer in Usingen; in 1809 second Stadtpfarrer in Wiesbaden; in 1813 inspector at Dotzheim; in 1818 Kirchenrath, professor and preacher in Herborn. Subsequently he became evangelical rural bishop in Wiesbaden. He died in 1856 (?). Most of his works are homiletic and practical. HEZEKIAH ('Strength of the Lord,' חִזְקִיָּהוּ and חִזְקִיָּה, and in both forms with initial י, LXX.

'Ezekias), son and successor of Ahaz, reigned twenty-nine years in Jerusalem. There is something wrong in the numbers, according to which he was twenty-five years old at the death of Ahaz, whose reign of sixteen years began when he was twenty years old; for so Hezekiah would have been born only eleven years after his father. The error cannot lie in the number sixteen, which is attested by the synchronisms; but the difficulty would be solved by supposing either Ahaz twenty-five, or Hezekiah twenty years old at accession. And as the LXX., followed by the Peshito, Arabic, and some copies of the Hebrew, does in fact read 'twenty-five' for the 'twenty' of the received text in 2 Chron. xxviii. 1, the former is the solution usually adopted. The history of the reign is contained in 2 Kings xviii.-xx., Is. xxxvi.-xxxix., and 2 Chron. xxx.-xxxii., illustrated by contemporary prophecies of Isaiah and Micah. Hezekiah is represented as a great and good king (2 Kings xviii. 5, 6), who set himself, immediately on his accession, to abolish idolatry, and restore the worship of Jehovah. The history of this Reformation, of which 2 Kings xviii. 4 ff. gives only a concise summary, is copiously related, from the Levitical point of view, in 2 Chron. xxix. ff. It commenced with the cleansing of the Temple 'in the first month' of Hezekiah's first year, i. e., in the month Nisan next after his accession, and was followed in the next month (because at the regular season neither Levites nor Temple were in a due state of preparation) by a great Passover, extended to fourteen days, to which not only all Judah was summoned, but also the 'remnant' of the Ten Tribes, some of whom accepted the invitation. Some writers (as Jahn, Keil, and Caspari) contend that this passover must have been subsequent to the fall of Samaria, alleging that the mention of the 'remnant' (2 Chron. xxx. 6) is unsuitable to an earlier period, and that, while the kingdom of Samaria still subsisted, Hezekiah's messengers would not have been suffered to pass through the land, much less would the destruction of the high-places in Ephraim and Manasse have been permitted (xxx. 1). But the intention of the chronicler at least is plain enough: the connection of xxix. 17, 'the first month,' with xxx. 2, 'the second month,' admits of but one construction—that both are meant to belong to one and the same year, the first of the reign. Accordingly, Thénius, in the kgf. exeg. Hdb. 2 Kings, p. 379, urges this as an argument against the historical character of the whole narrative of this passover, which, he thinks, 'rendered antecedently improbable by the silence of the Book of Kings, is perhaps completely refuted by 2 Kings xxiii. 22. The author of the story, wishing to place in the strongest light Hezekiah's zeal for religion, represents him, not Josiah, as the restorer of the Passover after long desuetude, and this in the very beginning of his reign, without, perhaps, caring to reflect that the final deportatio-

of the Ten Tribes, implied in xxx. 6, had not then taken place.' But 2 Kings xxiii. 22, taken in connection, as it ought to be, with the preceding verse, is perfectly compatible with the account in the Chronicles. It says: 'Surely such a Passover'—one kept in all respects 'as it is written in the Book of the Covenant'—'was not holden from the time of the Judges,' etc.: whereas Hezekiah's Passover, though kept with even greater joy and fervour than Josiah's, was held neither at the appointed season, nor in strict conformity with the law. Nor is it necessary to suppose that by 'the remnant' the chronicler understood those who were left by Shalmaneser. Rather, his view is, that the people of the Ten Tribes, untaught by the judgments brought upon them by former reverses and partial deportations (under Tiglath-Pileser), in respect of which they might well be called a 'remnant' (comp. the very similar terms in which even Judah is spoken of, xxix. 8, 9), and scornfully rejecting the last call to repentance, brought upon themselves their final judgment and complete overthrow (Bertheau, kgf. exeg. Hdb. 2 Chron. p. 395 ff.) Those, however, of the Ten Tribes who had taken part in the solemnity were thereby (such is evidently the chronicler's view of the matter, xxxi. 1) inspired with a zeal for the true religion which enabled them, on their return home, in defiance of all opposition on the part of the scorners or of Hoshea, to effect a destruction of the high-places and altars in Ephraim and Manasseh, as complete as was effected in Jerusalem before, and in Judah after the Passover. The notice of the reformation in 2 Kings xviii., brief as it is, and confined to Hezekiah's destruction of the bamoth, images, and asherah in his own kingdom, specifies one notable act unmentioned by the chronicler—his breaking in pieces 'the brazen serpent which Moses had made, for unto those days the children of Israel did burn incense to it, and (men) called it (it was known as) Nehushtan,' the Brazen (god). So the passage must be understood. See Ewald, Ausf. Lehrb. sec. 163, Gesch. iii. 328.

That this prudent and pious king was not deficient in military qualities, is shown by his successes against the Philistines, seemingly in the latter part of his reign after the overthrow of Sennacherib, 2 Kings xviii. 8, and by the efficient measures taken by him for the defence of Jerusalem against the Assyrians. But he assiduously cultivated the arts of peace, and by wise management of finance, and the attention which, after the example of David and Uzziah, he paid to agriculture and the increase of flocks and herds, he became possessed, even in troubled times, of an ample exchequer and treasures of wealth (2 Chron. xxxii. 27-29; 2 Kings xx. 13; Is. xxxix. 2). Himself a sacred poet, and probably the author of other psalms besides that in Is. xxxviii., he seems to have collected the psalms of David and Asaph for the Temple-worship, and certainly employed competent scribes to complete the collection of Solomon's Proverbs (Prov. xxv. 1). He appears also to have taken order for the preservation of genealogical records. A critical examination of the principal documents relating to the Levitical families in 1 Chron. has satisfied the present writer that the originals terminated in the reign of Hezekiah (Review of Lepsius on Bible Chronology, in Arnold's Theological Critic, i. 59 ff.)

At what time it was that Hezekiah 'rebelled against the king of Assyria, and served him not,'

we do not learn from the direct history: in the brief summary, 2 Kings xviii. 7, 8 (for such it clearly is), of the successes with which the Lord prospered him, that particular statement only introduces what is more fully detailed in the sequel, xviii. 13-19. 37. That it precedes the notice of the overthrow of Samaria, ver. 9, ff., does not warrant the inference that the assertion of independence belongs to the earliest years of Hezekiah's reign (see Winer, Real W. B. i. 497, n. 2). Ewald, however, thinks otherwise: in the absence of direct evidence, making history, as his manner is, out of his own peremptory interpretation of certain passages of Isaiah (c. i. and xxii. 1-14), he informs us that Hezekiah, holding his kingdom absolved by the death of Ahaz from the obligations contracted with Tiglath-Pileser, prepared himself from the first to resist the demands of Assyria, and put Jerusalem in a state of defence. (It matters not to Ewald that the measures noted in 2 Kings xx. 20, 2 Chron. xxxii. 3-5, 30, are, in the latter passage, expressly assigned to the time of Sennacherib's advance upon Jerusalem.) 'From Shalmaneser's hosts at that time stationed in Phœnicia and elsewhere in the neighbourhood of Judah, forces were detached which laid waste the land in all directions: an army sent against them from Jerusalem, seized with panic at the sight of the unwonted enemy, took to flight, and, Jerusalem now lying helplessly exposed, a peace was concluded in all haste, upon the stipulation of a yearly tribute, and the ignominious deliverance was celebrated with feastings in Jerusalem' (Gesch. des V. J. iii. p. 330, ff.): all of which rests upon the supposition that Ewald's interpretation of Is. i. 22 is the only possible one: it cannot be said to be on record as history.

As gathered from the Scriptures only, the course of events appears to have been as follows: Ahaz had placed his kingdom as tributary under the protection of Tiglath-Pileser (2 Kings xvi. 7). It would seem from Is. x. 27, and xxviii. 22, that in the time of Shalmaneser, to which the latter passage certainly, and the former probably, belongs, Judah was still under the yoke of this dependence. The fact that Sargon (whether or not the same with the Shalmaneser of the history) in his expedition against Egypt left Judah untouched (Is. xx.), implies that Judah had not yet asserted its independence. A powerful party, indeed, was scheming for revolt from Assyria and a league with Egypt; but there appears no reason to believe that Hezekiah all along favoured a policy which Isaiah in the name of the Lord, to the last, strenuously condemned. It was not till after the accession of Sennacherib that Hezekiah refused the tribute, and at the instigation of his nobles made a league with Egypt by ambassadors sent to Zoan (Tanis) Is. xxx., xxxi.; comp. xxxvi. 6-9.* Hereupon, 'in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah, Sennacherib came up against all the fenced cities of Judah, and took them' (2 Kings xviii. 13; Is. xxxvi. 1); and Hezekiah by an embassy sent to Lachish, made humble submission, and bought the king's forbearance by a tribute of 300 talents of silver, and 30 talents of gold (2 Kings xviii. 14-16: it is remarkable that in Is. xxxvi. and 2 Chron. xxxii. there is no mention made of this submission). To this conjuncture Is. xxii. 1-14 may be most suitably referred, as prophecy (not with Eichhorn, Ewald, Maurer, as history, to the time of Shalmaneser, in the early years of Hezekiah). The untimely and shameful rejoicing there condemned was, however, turned into renewed dismay when Sennacherib, alleging the Egyptian alliance as the provocation, sent his Tartan, or chief of the body-guard, with two other high officials, the Rab-saris and the Rab-shakeh, with a powerful force from Lachish against Jerusalem (2 Kings xviii. 17; Is. xxxvi. 2; 2 Chron. xxxii. 9). What length of time elapsed between the acceptance of the submission and the hostile advance from Lachish, the history does not inform us; only it is clear that in the view of the writer of the narrative in 2 Kings xviii., and especially of him by whom it was transferred to the volume of Isaiah's prophecies, the two are separated by no great interval, and both are referred to Hezekiah's fourteenth year. According to the chronicler, ibid. 2, ff., it was after the attack upon 'the fenced cities of Judah,' and in the prospect of an assault upon Jerusalem,* that Hezekiah took measures for its defence, and especially for at once cutting off from a besieging army the principal run of water without the walls ('the upper water-course of Gihon,' on the north-west side), and bringing it within the walls for the supply of the western portion of Jerusalem: a work for which his memory was honoured in later times (2 Chron. xxxii. 3, ff., 30; comp. 2 Kings xx. 20; and Eccles. xlviii. 17).† Whether the reservoir traditionally called 'the Pool of Hezekiah' was the work of this king, is disputed by Ritter, Erdrkunde xvi. 371, ff.; but Robinson's latest investigations, p. 112, comp. Bartlett, Walks about Jerusalem, p. 82, ff., leave little doubt that it was (Thenius, u. s., p. 409).

* Some, indeed (as Ewald and Caspari), place Is. xxix.-xxxii. before the fall of Samaria, to which time ch. xxviii. must unquestionably be assigned. Possibly ch. xxix. may belong to the same time, and ver. 15 may refer to plottings for a league with Egypt already carrying on in secret. Knobel, kgf. exeg. Hdb. pp. 215, 223, decides too peremptorily that such must be the reference, and consequently that ch. xxix. falls only a little earlier than the following chapters, where the league is openly denounced, viz., in the early part of the reign of Sennacherib.

The assault, however, did not take place, and Sennacherib's officers drew off their force to join him at Libnah, another fortified town in the south of Judah. Alarmed by tidings of the advance of Tirhaka, 'king of Ethiopia,' Sennacherib dispatched a letter to Hezekiah (whether from Libnah or what other place is not said), imperiously urging him to abandon all further resistance. The miraculous overthrow of the Assyrian army, which is represented as following immediately, may have been brought about by a pestilence (ἀνμικὴ νόστος, Josephus), if 'the angel of the Lord' has the same reference as in 2 Sam. xxiv. 15, 16. It is not said where it occurred: the prophecies concerning it, Is. x.-xxxvii., seem to denote the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, as would Ps. lxxvi., if it was written at that time. On the other hand, the narrative would surely have been fuller, had the overthrow, with its attendant opportunities of beholding the bodies of their dreaded enemies and of gathering great spoil, befallen near Jerusalem, or even within the limits of Judah. That version of the story which reached Herodotus (ii. 140)—for few will hold with Ewald (Gesch. iii. 336) that the story is not substantially the same—indicates the frontier of Egypt near Pelusium as the scene of the disaster. The Assyrian army would probably break up from Libnah on the tidings of Tirhaka's approach, and advance to meet him. In ascribing it to a vast swarm of field-mice, which, devouring the quivers and bow-strings of the Egyptians, compelled them to flee in the morning, Herodotus may have misinterpreted the symbolical language of the Egyptians, in which the mouse denotes annihilation (ἀφανισμός, Horapoll. i. 50): though, as Knobel (u. s. p. 280) has shewn by apposite instances, an army of mice is capable of committing such ravages and also of leaving pestilence behind it. That the destruction was effected in the course of one night, is clearly expressed in 2 Kings xix. 35, where 'that night' is plainly that which followed after the delivery of Isaiah's prophecy, and is evidently implied alike in Is. xxxvi. 36 ('when men arose early in the morning'), and in the story of Herodotus.

'In those days was Hezekiah sick unto death.' So begins, in all the accounts, and immediately after the discomfiture of Sennacherib, the narrative of Hezekiah's sickness and miraculous recovery (2 Kings xx. 1; 2 Chron. xxxii. 24; Is. xxxviii. 1). The time is defined, by the promise of fifteen years to be added to the life of Hezekiah, to the fourteenth year complete, or fifteenth current, of his reign of twenty-nine years. But it is stated to have been in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah that Sennacherib took the fenced cities of Judah, and thereafter threatened Jerusalem and came to his overthrow. The two notes of time, the express and the implied, fully accord, and place beyond question at least the view of the writer or last redactor in 2 Kings xviii., xix.; Is. xxxvi., xxxvii., that the Assyrian invasion began before Hezekiah's illness,* and lies in the middle of his reign. In the received chronology, as the first year of Hezekiah precedes the fourth of Jehoiakim = first of Nebuchadnezzar (i. e., 604 B.C. in the Canon, 606 B.C. in the Hebrew reckoning) by 29, 55, 2, 31, 3 = 120 years, the epoch of the reign is 724 or 726 B.C., and its 14th year 711 or 713 B.C. But it is contended that so early a year is irreconcilable with definite and unquestionable data of contemporary history, Egyptian, Assyrian, and Babylonian. The grounds on which that conclusion rests have been briefly indicated in the article CHRONOLOGY, sec. 12, ff.: a fuller consideration of the facts and necessities of the case is reserved for the articles MERODACH-BALADAN and SENNACHERIB. The present article has confined itself to the Biblical elements of the question.

* But from the promise 'I will deliver thee and this city out of the hand of the king of Assyria' (2 Kings xx. 6; Is. xxxviii. 6), it appears that the deliverance was not yet completed. Hezekiah also, in his Psalm of thanksgiving, acknowledges only the personal, not a national deliverance. This circumstance, however, and the absence of all allusion to the peril then impending over the nation, may be urged in favour of Dr. Hincks's conclusion, that the Assyrian invasion was long subsequent to Hezekiah's illness.

* Is. xxxiii. belongs to this time, and perhaps to the period of suspense before the submission was accepted.

† The defensive works of Hezekiah seem to be intended in Is. xxii. 9-11, and perhaps in Ps. xlviii. 12, 13.

Some writers have thought to find a note of time in 2 Kings xix. 29, Is. xxxvii. 30, 'Ye shall eat this year such as groweth of itself,' etc., assuming that the passage is only to be explained as implying the intervention of a sabbath-year, or even of a sabbath-year followed by a year of jubilee. All that can be said is, that the passage may be interpreted in that sense; and it does happen that according to that view of the order of sabbatic and jubilean years which is the best attested, a sabbath-year would begin in the autumn of B.C. 713 (Ordo Saeculorum, sec. 272-280), i. e., on the perhaps precarious assumption that the cycle persisted without interruption. At most, however, this no more fixes the fourteenth of Hezekiah to the year 713 B.C., than it does to 706 or 699 or any other year of the series. But, in fact, it is not necessary to assume any reference to a sabbath-year. Suppose the words to have been spoken in the autumn, then, the produce of the previous harvest (April, May) having been destroyed or carried off by the invaders, there remained only that which sprung naturally from the dropt or trodden-out seed (חֲרִיץ), and as the enemy's presence in the land hindered the autumnal tillage, there could be no regular harvest in the following spring (only the שָׁמֶר, avbūara). Hence there is no need to infer with Thenius ad loc. that the enemy must have been in the land at least eighteen months, or, with Ewald, that Isaiah, speaking in the autumn, anticipated that the invasion would last through the following year (die Propheten des A. B. I. 301, and similarly Knobel u. s., p. 278).

The sign given to Hezekiah in the going back of the shadow on the 'sun-dial of Ahaz,' can only be interpreted as a miracle (see DIAL). The explanation proposed by J. von Gumpach (Alt. Test. Studien, p. 181, ff.) is as incompatible with the terms of the narrative (Is. xxxviii. 8, especially the fuller one, 2 Kings xx. 8-11) as it is insulting to the character of the prophet, who is represented to have managed the seeming return of the shadow by the trick of secretly turning the movable dial from its proper position to its opposite! Thenius (u. s. p. 403, ff.) would naturalise the miracle so as to obtain from it a note of time. The phenomenon was due, he thinks, to a solar eclipse, very small, viz., the one of 26th September 713 B.C. Here, also, the prophet is taxed with a deception, to be justified by his wish to inspire the despairing king with the confidence essential to his recovery. The prophet employed for this purpose his astronomical knowledge of the fact that the eclipse was about to take place, and of the further fact that 'at the beginning of an eclipse the shadow (e.g., of a gnomon) goes back, and at its ending goes forward': an effect, it is true, so minute that the difference amounts at most to sixty seconds of time; but then, the 'degrees' would mark extremely small portions of time, possibly even 1080 to the hour (like the later Hebrew Chlakim), and the so-called 'dial' was enormously large! Not more successfully, Mr. Bosanquet (Trans. of R. Asiat. Soc. xv. 277) has recourse to the same expedient of an eclipse on 11th Jan. 689 B.C., which, in this writer's scheme, lies in the fourteenth of Hezekiah (see the art. CHRONOLOGY, sec. 17). 'Whoever truly believes in the Old Testament, as Mr. Bosanquet evidently does, must also be prepared to believe in a miracle,' is the just comment made by M. v. Niebuhr, Gesch. Assurs und Babels, p. 49. Mr. Greswell's elaborate attempt to prove from ancient astronomical records that the day of this miracle was preternaturally lengthened out to thirty-six hours will scarcely convince any one but himself (Fasti Temporis Catholici, etc., and 'Remarks' on the same by the present writer, 1852, p. 23, ff.)

Between Hezekiah's recovery and the embassy sent from Babylon to congratulate him (MERO-DACH-BALADAN), the narrative implies no greater length of time than would be required for the tidings to reach Babylon, and the ambassadors to make the journey to Jerusalem. The manner in which Babylon is pointed to as the instrument of a future judgment shews plainly that in the view of the writer or last redactor the Assyrian crisis was past. If in the original record the account of Hezekiah's illness preceded the Assyrian invasion, this mention of a Babylonian judgment, and the expression of Hezekiah's thankfulness 'there shall be peace and truth in my days,' could not form the sequel to that account. And unless we are prepared to assume that the relation of what passed between Isaiah and Hezekiah took its present form and colouring at a later time when the event had verified the prophet's foreboding (Ewald, iii. 346), we must suppose the order of events to be—1. Hezekiah's illness and recovery; 2. The Assyrian invasion, and Sennacherib's discomfiture; 3. The embassy from Babylon—that is, on that construction of the chronology which is said to be rendered necessary by external testimony, the Babylonian king sent to congratulate Hezekiah some ten or twelve years after his recovery! On the ordinary construction a difficulty arises from the fact that Hezekiah, whose resources were exhausted by the Assyrian tribute, was able only one or two years later to exhibit treasures of wealth to these ambassadors: but this is explained by the notice, 2 Chron. xxxii. 23, of the costly gifts which flowed in from the surrounding nations after the overthrow of the Assyrians. It is peculiar to the chronicler that he represents the embassy to have been 'sent to inquire of the wonder that was done in the land' (xxxii. 31), meaning by the מֵוֹדָע, 'the sign' ('וֹד, ver. 24) given to Hezekiah, which this writer must therefore have conceived to have in some way attracted the attention of the Chaldean astronomers. It would be unwise to urge the unsupported statement of the chronicler, either as implying an eclipse (Thenius, u. s.), or for proof that the preternatural occurrence was noted elsewhere than at Jerusalem. Perhaps he put his own construction on a statement in his sources purporting that the ambassadors were sent to congratulate Hezekiah on his recovery, and on the miraculous deliverance afforded by the overthrow of the Assyrians.

After this embassy we have only a general account of the peace and prosperity in which Hezekiah closed his days.* In later times, he was held in honour as the king who had 'after him none like him among all the kings of Judah, nor any that were before him' (2 Kings xviii. 5); in Jer. xxvi. 17 the elders of the land cite him as an example of pious submission to the word of the Lord spoken by Micah; and the son of Sirach closes his recital of the kings with this judgment—that of all the kings of Judah, 'David, Hezekiah, and Josiah alone transgressed not, nor forsook the law of the Most High' (Ecclus xlii. 4).—H. HEZEL, J. W. F., a German Orientalist and theologian, was born at Königsberg, May 16, 1754. Having received his first instruction from his father, who was a Protestant pastor, he subsequently repaired to the University of Jena, 1772. In 1786 he was appointed professor of the Oriental languages at Giessen; and in 1800 keeper of the university library there. In 1801 he was called to the University of Dorpat, where he filled the chair of Oriental literature till 1820, in which year he requested permission to retire, which was granted. He died February 1st 1829, at the age of 75. Hezel's works are many, but they are little read at the present day. They are chiefly these:—Ausführliche Hebräische Sprachlehre, 1777, 8vo; Anweisung zum Hebräischen bei Ermangelung alles mündlichen Unterrichts, 1781, 8vo; Nominalformenlehre der Hebräischen Sprache, 1793, 8vo; Institutio Philologi Hebraei, 1793, 8vo; Palaeographische Fragmente, 1816, 8vo; Geschichte der Hebräischen Literatur, 1776, 8vo; Anweisung zum Chaldeischen bei Ermangelung alles mündlichen Unterrichts, 1787, 8vo; Syrische Sprachlehre, 1788, 8vo; Arabische Grammatik nebst einer kurzen Arabischen Chrestomathie, 1776, 8vo; Anweisung zur Arabischen Sprache bei Ermangelung alles mündlichen Unterrichts, 1784-1785, 2 vols. 8vo; Die Bibel altes und neues Testament mit vollständig erklärenden Bemerkungen, 1780-1791, 10 vols. 8vo; Dialogen zur Erläuterung der Bibel, 1785, 8vo; Die Bibel in ihrer wahren Gestalt, 1786, 8vo; Neuer Versuch ueber den Brief an die Hebräer, 1795, 8vo; Biblisches Reallexicon, 1783-1785, 3 vols. 8vo; Die freie Untersuchung der Absicht des Hohenliedes, 1777, 8vo. HEZION (הֶזִיּוֹן); LXX. Ἀζῆν; Alex. Ἀζαήλ; Vulg. Hezion), the grandfather of the first of the Benhadads mentioned in Scripture History. A question has long been raised whether this name (which occurs in 1 Kings xv. 18) indicates the same person as the REZON of 1 Kings xi. 23. Thenius, after Ewald, suggests that the successful adventurer who became king of Damascus, and was so hostile a neighbour to Solomon throughout his reign, was really called Hezion, and that the designation Rezon (הֶזִיּוֹן, 'prince') was either assumed by him, or bestowed on him by his followers after he was seated on his new throne. There is of course no chronological difficulty in this supposition. Less than forty years intervened between the death of Solomon, when Rezon was reigning at Damascus (1 Kings xi. 25), and the treaty between Asa and Benhadad I. (1 Kings xv. 18, 19), during which interval there is no violence to probability in assuming the occurrence of the death of Rezon or Hezion, the accession and entire reign of Tabrimon his son, who was unquestionably king of Syria and contemporary with Asa's father (1 Kings xv. 19), and the succession of Tabrimon's son, Benhadad I. This identity of Hezion with Rezon is an idea apparently as old as the Septuagint translators; for they associated in their version with Solomon's adversary the Edomite Hadlad [or, as they called him, Ader, τὸν Ἀδερ], 'Esrom, the son of Eliadad' (see the LXX. of 1 Kings xi. 14); a name which closely resembles our Hezion, though it refers to Rezon, as the patronymic proves (1 Kings xi. 23).

* 'He was buried in the going up (מַעְלֵה) to the sepulchres of the sons of David,' 2 Chron. xxxii. 33: from this, and the fact that the succeeding kings were laid in sepulchres of their own, it may be inferred that after Ahaz, thirteenth from David, there was no more room left in the ancestral sepulchre (Thenius, u. s., p. 410).

The later versions, Peschito (ܠܗܕܪܘܢ Hadron), and Arabic (هذرون Hedron), seem to approximate also more nearly to Hezion than to Rezon. Of the older commentators, Junius, Piscator, Malvenda, and Menochius have been cited (see Poli Synops. in loc.) as maintaining the identity. Köhler also, and Marsham (Can. Chron. p. 346) and Dathe, have been referred to by Keil as in favour of the same view. Keil himself is uncertain. According to another opinion, Hezion was not identical with Rezon, but his successor; this is propounded by Winer (B. R. W., vol. i. p. 245, and vol. ii. p. 322). If the account be correct which is communicated by Josephus (Antiq. vii. 5. 2) from the 4th book of Nicolaus Damascus, to the effect that the name of the king of Damascus who was contemporary with David was Hadad (Ἀδαδός), we have in it probably the dynastic name which Rezon or Hezion adopted for himself and his heirs, who, according to the same statement, occupied the throne of Syria for ten generations. According to Macrobius (Saturnalia, i. 23) Adad was the name of the supreme god of the Syrians ['Deo quem summum maximumque veneratur Adad nomen dederunt']; and as it was a constant practice with the kings of Syria and Babylon to assume names which connected them with their gods (cf. Tabrimon of 1 Kings xv. 18, the son of our Hezion, whose name = קֹבֵץ וְרִמּוֹן, 'good is Rimmon,' another Syrian deity, probably the same with Adad; see 2 Kings v. 18, and Zech. xii. 11), we may not unreasonably conjecture that Hezion, who in his political relation called himself Rezon, or 'prince,' adopted the name Hadad [or rather Benhadad, 'Son of the supreme God'] in relation to the religion of his country and to his own ecclesiastical supremacy. It is remarkable that even after the change of dynasty in Hazael, this title of Benhadad seemed to survive (see 2 Kings xiii. 3). If this conjecture be true, the energetic marauder who passes under the names of Rezon and Hezion in the passages which we quoted at the commencement of this art., was strong enough not only to harass the great Solomon, but to found a dynasty of kings which occupied the throne of Syria to the tenth descent, even down to the revolution effected by Hazael, 'near two hundred years, according to the exactest chronology of Josephus' (Whiston's note, on Antiq. vii. 5. 2).—P. HIDDEKEL (חִדְקֵל; Τίγρις and Τίγρις Ἐδδκελ; Tygris and Tigris), the third river of Eden, described in Gen. ii. 14 as flowing 'to the east of Assyria' (קדמת אשור), or it may be translated 'towards the east of Assyria.' It is also mentioned by Daniel, who saw one of his wondrous visions as he stood 'by the side of the great river, which is Hiddekel' (x. 4). The translators of the Septuagint identify this river with the Tigris; and so also does Jerome. There can be no doubt that they are correct. The name suggests the identity.

The Aramaean name of the Tigris is דגלא, Digla, and the Arabic دجلة. The Hebrew name חדקל appears to be compounded of חר, 'active,' and דקל, the common name. Digla was easily transformed by the Greeks into Tigris; or perhaps the latter was the Persian form, derived from the word Tigra, 'an arrow.' Pliny says, 'as soon as this river begins to flow, though with a slow current, it has the name Diglito. When its course becomes more rapid it assumes the name Tigris, given to it on account of its swiftness, that word signifying 'an arrow' in the Median language' (vi. 27). To the same effect Strabo writes (xi. 14. 8). Josephus states that the word 'Tigris, or Diglath, signifies what is swift, with narrowness' (Antiq. i. 1. 3). The great rapidity of the current appears to have suggested the name.

The Tigris is often mentioned by classic writers. Pliny gives the fullest description; but the notices of Herodotus (v. 22), Strabo (xi. 14), and Xenophon (Anab. iv. 1. 3) supply some important details. The river has several sources among the mountains of Armenia. Those of the eastern branch were discovered by Layard, south of Lake Van (Lavard Nin. and Babylon, 420); the highest source of the western branch is only a few miles distant from the Euphrates. The Tigris flows at first eastward, then gradually turns to the south-east; and after a tortuous course of more than 200 miles through a wild mountainous region, it passes by a sublime ravine into the plain of Assyria (Layard, p. 51). It then sweeps past the great mounds of Nineveh, Rehoboth, Calah, and other primeval cities—still retaining its rapidity, and frequently breaking over rocky barriers and artificial dams. At length, near the old town of Tekrit, 100 miles below Mosul, it enters the low plain of Mesopotamia. Here its waters were formerly drawn off by canals for irrigation. The stream is now sluggish, and the banks are fringed with thick jungles. It flows on through the palm groves of Baghdad, laving the walls of the decaying city. It is here only about 30 miles from the Euphrates. The two sister rivers run parallel for 100 miles or more; and then the Tigris sweeps round to the eastward, through the marshy plains of Elam, and turning south unites with the Euphrates at Korna. The river formed by the junction is called Shât el-Arab. It flows in a south-eastern course, through swamps and desolate plains, to Busrah and the Persian Gulf.

The Tigris is navigable for small vessels as high up as Tekrit—nearly 500 miles; and a channel could easily be formed to Mosul. But the indifference and neglect of the Turkish government leave the river useless, and the magnificent country surrounding it a desert (Layard, p. 475). In addition to the authors already cited, descriptions of the Tigris are given in Rich's Koordistan; Chesney's Euphrates Expedition; Rawlinson's Ancient Monarchies, vol. i.—J. L. P.

HIERAPOLIS (Ἱερὰ πόλις), a city of Phrygia, not far from Colossæ and Laodicea, where there was a Christian church as early as the time of St. Paul (Col. iv. 12, 13). The place is visible from the theatre at Laodicea, from which it is five miles distant northward.

Smith, in his journey to the Seven Churches (1671), was the first to describe the ancient sites in this neighbourhood. He was followed by Pococke and Chandler; and more recently by Richter, Cockerell, Hartley, and Arundell.

The place now bears the name of Pambouk-Kul-asi (Cotton-castle), from the white appearance of the cliffs of the mountain on the lower summit, or rather an extended terrace, on which the ruins are situated. It owed its celebrity, and probably the sanctity indicated by its ancient name (Holy City), to its very remarkable springs of mineral water, the singular effects of which, in the formation of stalactites and incrustations by its deposits, are shewn in the accounts of Pococke (ii. pt. 2, c. 13) and Chandler (Asia Minor, c. 68), to have been accurately described by Strabo (xiii. p. 629). A great number and variety of sepulchres are found in the different approaches to the site, which on one side is sufficiently defended by the precipices overlooking the valleys of the Lycus and Mæander, while on the other sides the town walls are still observable. The magnificent ruins clearly attest the ancient importance of the place. The main street can still be traced in its whole extent, and is bordered by the remains of three Christian churches, one of which is upwards of 300 feet long. About the middle of this street, just above the mineral springs, Pococke, in 1741, thought that he distinguished some remains of the Temple of Apollo, which, according to Damascius, quoted by Photius (Biblioth. p. 1054), was in this situation. But the principal ruins are a theatre and gymnasium, both in a state of uncommon preservation; the former 346 feet in diameter, the latter nearly filling a space of 400 feet square. Strabo (loc. cit.) and Pliny (Hist. Nat. v. 29) mention a cave called the Plutonium, filled with pestilential vapours, similar to the celebrated Grotto del Cane in Italy. High up the mountain-side is a deep recess far into the mountain; and Mr. Arundell says that he should have supposed that the mephitic cavern lay in this recess, if Mr. Cockerell had not found it near the theatre, the position anciently assigned to it. He adds, that the experiments made in this mountain-side recess do not seem very conclusive, and conjectures that it may be the same in which Chandler distinguished the area of a stadium (Arundell, Asia Minor, ii. 210). The same writer gives, from the Oriens Christianus, a list of the bishops of Hierapolis down to the time of the emperor Isaac Angelus. Fuller accounts of the ruins, etc., may be seen in the authors named above (comp. also Col. Leake's Geogr. of Asia Minor, pp. 252, 253).—J. K.

HIGH PLACES AND GROVES. i. High Places.—The word rendered 'high place' in the A. V. is בִּמְצָה, 'a natural height.' Upon such heights in Palestine altars were raised and temples built, the latter called 'houses of high places' (בְּתֵי הַבִּמְצֹת, sing. בֵּית הַבִּמְצָה). When used in relation to religion, whether idolatrous or not, this word may signify the sacred height itself, or the altar or temple upon it. At a late period high places seem to have been often slight artificial elevations, and thus the name may have come to be applied to altars. It is needless to shew the motives which led mankind to worship upon heights, or to instance different forms of this practice. Our inquiry must be as to the character of the worship at the high places of Palestine (1) before the conquest of the country; (2) in the time of the Judges, and until the Temple was built; and (3) after the building of the Temple. [ALTAR.]

1. This practice was probably of great antiquity in Palestine. Upon the summit of lofty Hermon are the remains of 'a small and very ancient temple,' towards which faced a circle of temples surrounding the mountain (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, HERMON, i. p. 790 a). That a temple should have been built on a summit of bare rock perpetually covered with snow, shews a strong religious motive, and the position of the temples around the mountain indicates a belief in the sanctity of Hermon itself. This inference is supported by a passage in the treaty of Rameses II. with the Hittites of Syria, in which, besides gods and goddesses, the mountains and the rivers, both of the land of the Hittites and of Egypt, and the winds, are mentioned, in a list of Hittite and Egyptian divinities. The Egyptian divinities are spoken of from a Hittite point of view, for the expression, 'the mountains and the rivers of the land of Egypt' is only half-applicable to the Egyptian nature-worship, which had, in Egypt at least, but one sacred river (Lepsius, Denkmäler, iii. 146; Brugsch, Geographische Inschriften, ii. p. 29; De Rouge in Rev. Arch., nouv. ser., iv. p. 372; HITTITES). That Hermon was worshipped in connection with Baal is probable from the name Mount Baal-Hermon (Judg. iii. 3), Baal-Hermon (1 Chron. v. 23) being apparently given to it,* Baal being, as the Egyptian monuments indicate, the chief god of the Hittites [HITTITES]. That there was such a belief in the sanctity of mountains and hills seems evident from the great number of high places of the old inhabitants, which is clearly indicated in the prohibition of their worship as compared with the statement of the disobedience of the Israelites. The command enjoined the destruction of all the idolatrous places 'upon the high mountains, and upon the hills, and under every green tree' (Deut. xii. 2); and it is related that the Israelites set up idolatrous objects 'in every high hill, and under every green tree,' high places being spoken of in connection with this worship, and as belonging to the system of the natives of Canaan (2 Kings xvii. 9-11). There is no distinct mention of the exact character of any idolatrous worship at high places in the narrative portions of Scripture relating to the period before the conquest of Canaan, but no doubt there is an indication in the name 'high-places of Baal,' applied to one of the heights whence Balaam saw Israel, and where he sacrificed. But Balaam here, as elsewhere, had altars built for the sacrifices (Num. xxii. 41; xxiii. 1). There is no evidence that the believing Hebrews before the Law followed this practice. Those who endeavour to discover it cite the passage describing Abraham's arrival at 'a mountain' between Bethel and Ai, and there building an altar (Gen. xii. 8), but this is very insufficient. The mountain, as the Hebrew term allows, must have been a slight eminence, and it is mentioned in connection with Abraham's pitching his tent, rather than his building the altar. It is most unlikely that Abraham would have chosen a place that would have been chosen by the heathen; had he done so in this case, we should probably have had some additional evidence from another instance.

2. The Israelites, on occupying Canaan, must have found the land covered with the places of idolatrous worship. During the troubled period of the Judges, they were mainly confined to the three mountainous tracts separated by the plain of Esdraelon and the Jordan valley, the territory of the northern tribes, three of which rose at the call of Barak; that of which Judah and Ephraim formed the great rallying points; and, beyond Jordan, hilly Gilead. The plain of Esdraelon was held by the Canaanites, the coast of the Mediterranean, by the Phœnicians and the Philistines, the great pastures-lands on the east of Jordan, mainly by wandering tribes of Abrahamic descent. Thus confined to the hilly parts of the country, the Israelites lived where the associations of the old idolatry were strongest. Worship at high places was thus adopted by them, and in their subsequent history we find it practised among them, both by believers, up to a certain period, and by idolaters. It was, perhaps, on this account that the servants of Benhadad counselled him to fight Israel in the plain, arguing: 'Their gods [are] gods of the hills; therefore they were stronger than we; but let us fight against them in the plain, and surely we shall be stronger than they' (1 Kings xx. 23). [See PHœNICIA.]

In the Law it was distinctly commanded that no sacrifices should be offered except at the one place of worship. It is indeed said that the offerings were to be brought to this place after the people had rest from their enemies (Deut. xii. 10, 11); but this injunction seems to refer to the rest after the first conquest, and certainly does not allow of the use of other altars. That this law was clearly understood at the first is evident from the history of the altar of witness built by the two tribes and a half when they departed to their inheritance (Josh. xxii. 10-34). Nothing can be more explicit than the words of these tribes—'God forbid that we should rebel against the LORD, and turn this day from following the LORD, to build an altar for burnt offerings, for meat offerings, or for sacrifices, beside the altar of the LORD our God that [is] before his tabernacle' (ver. 29). There is therefore no possibility of admitting the theory that the prohibition was not to come into force until the Temple had been built, when it was thus understood in the lifetime of Phinehas.

Not long after this, the custom of sacrificing else-

where than at Shiloh appears to have commenced, for we read how, evidently in the earliest days of the occupation of Canaan, the people were reprov'd by an angel at Bochim, and 'sacrificed there unto the LORD' (Judg. ii. 5). It is still more remarkable to read that Gideon built an altar to the LORD, and afterwards that he was commanded to destroy the altar of Baal, and build an altar to the LORD (vi. 24, 25, 26). So, too, Manoah sacrificed where the angel appeared (xiii. 19). This worship seems to have been occasioned by the disturbed state of the country and the difficulty of uniting in journeys to Shiloh for the great feasts, and it may perhaps have been permitted as a recurrence to the patriarchal system. The local idolatrous worship adopted from the heathen was carried on at the same time. We hear, however, nothing of high places until the time of Samuel, when the sacrificing and worship in high places seems to have been usual, and was sanctioned by the practice and approval of the priest-judge (1 Sam. ix. 12; x. 5, 13). In the time of Solomon this worship still obtained, for it is said of the beginning of his reign, 'Only the people sacrificed in high places, because there was no house built unto the name of the LORD, until those days' (1 Kings iii. 2). Solomon accordingly 'went to Gibeon to sacrifice there; for that [was] the great high place' (ver. 4). That his sacrificing was not disapproved is evident from the dream which God there granted to him. At this time the Tabernacle was at Gibeon, though David had removed the Ark to Jerusalem (2 Chron. i. 3-6, comp. 1 Chron. xvi. 37-40). The separation of the Ark from the Tabernacle, and the pitching the latter at a high place, are very remarkable points.

3. After the completion of the Temple there must have been no excuse for worship at high places, and it was probably for a time discontinued. When they are again mentioned it is in connection with idolatry. Solomon made a high place, or high places, for the idols of Moab and Ammon (1 Kings xi. 7). Jeroboam, to prevent his subjects from going to Jerusalem, established a series of high places. At Dan and Bethel he raised houses of high places, and throughout his kingdom (xii. 26-31; xiii. 32). The Levites having left their cities in his dominions, and gone to Rehoboam, the king of Israel appears to have made use of Shishak to capture those cities, and established a spurious priesthood (2 Chron. xi. 13, 14, 15; 1 Kings xii. 31; xiii. 33; comp. Brugsch, Geogr. Inschr. ii. pp. 70, 71). The system set up by Jeroboam was partly an imitation of the national religion, partly of the idolatry of Egypt and Canaan [IDOLATRY]. From this time we find high places used either for idolatrous worship, or, apparently, for an independent and unlawful practice of the national rites. In general, the former use seems to have obtained in Judah, and the latter in Israel, though this rule cannot be strictly applied in either case. Already in Rehoboam's time the people of Judah had set up idolatrous high places (1 Kings xiv. 23). Later we find it recorded as a flaw in the reigns of pious kings of Judah that the high places yet remained in use, the people still sacrificing and burning incense at them. It is said of Asa that he took away the high places (2 Chron. xiv. 5), but it appears that this reform was not successfully accomplished, at least in Israel (xv. 17; 1 Kings xv. 14), of which he held cities (2 Chron. xv. 8; xvii. 2). Jehoshaphat, again, is said to have taken away

'the high places and groves out of Judah' (ver. 6, comp. xix. 3); but it seems that he was not fully successful, for we read in a later place that 'the high places were not taken away' (xx. 33; 1 Kings xxii. 43). Hezekiah appears, however, at the commencement of his reign, to have successfully suppressed the high places. They were destroyed not only in Judah and Benjamin, but also in Ephraim and Manasseh. This work, so far as it concerned the Israelite territory, may have been spontaneously executed by the believing people, as seems implied in the account in Chronicles, but it is also possible that in the broken state of the Israelite monarchy Hezekiah held a large portion of its more southern territories (2 Kings xviii. 4, comp. 2 Chron. xxxi. 1). But even this reform was not final, and, after the relapse into idolatry of Manasseh and Amon, there was another suppression of the high places by Josiah, apparently the first which was thorough. He destroyed and defiled the high place of Bethel which Jeroboam had made, the houses of the high places in the cities of the kingdom of Samaria, the high places which Solomon had built for foreign idols in the Mount of Corruption, and those in the cities of Judah (2 Kings xxiii. 5, 8, 13, 15, 16, 19, 20; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 3-7).

Worship at altars not at Jerusalem seems to have been occasionally practised by believers after the building of the Temple, as in the remarkable instance of Elijah on Mount Carmel, where 'he repaired the altar of the LORD [that was] broken down,' building it of twelve stones, according to the number of the tribes of Israel, a circumstance which seems to make its much older origin probable (1 Kings xviii. 30-32). Elijah also complained at Horeb that God's altars were overthrown (xix. 10). Yet we have no ground for supposing that any general deviation from the worship at the one sanctuary was allowed after the Temple had been built. A prophet might have been commanded to sacrifice at an altar away from Jerusalem on a special occasion. But a general practice, tending to a neglect of the feasts and their sacrifices, and to the formation of an unlawful priesthood, was evidently forbidden as wrong and dangerous. The increase of strength in the terms in which this practice is condemned, seems due to the increase of corruption which it caused. The sin of Jeroboam soon led to idolatry of various other kinds, and the high places, which probably were originally, save in the case of Solomon's, which, perhaps, were soon abandoned, intended for corrupt worship, seem to have been used at last wholly for heathen rites. As they were opposed to the temple-worship, the high places probably never took an important position in the kingdom of Judah; on the contrary, in the rival kingdom they were adopted as a state-expedient to prevent the return of the people to their allegiance to the line of David.

The passages relating to the high places furnish us with several interesting particulars. Jeroboam not only set up the calves as objects of worship at the houses of the high places of Bethel and Dan, but, as we have seen, he made a priesthood of the lowest of the people, not Levites, and he also fixed an annual feast on the fifteenth day of the eighth month (1 Kings xii. 28-33). It was when Jeroboam stood by the altar at Bethel that the prophet who came out of Judah fore told its overthrow (xiii. 1-3). It was at Bethel, in the time of the second Jeroboam, that Amos predicted the ruin of the high places, and was complained of to the king by Amaziah, the priest of Bethel (Amos vii. 9-13). The remarkable passage, 'And the high places of Isaac shall be desolate, and the sanctuaries of Israel shall be laid waste' (ver. 9), is explained by a comparison with a previous enumeration of high places; 'Seek not Bethel, nor enter into Gilgal, and pass not to Beer-sheba' (ver. 5). The high places of Isaac would refer to Beer-sheba, and the sanctuaries of Israel to Bethel; Gilgal was a place of worship at the time of Samuel (1 Sam. xii. 15). Hosea, like Amos a prophet especially sent to Israel, like him condemns the worship at high places. He mentions their priests by the name Chemarim, כְּמָרִים, a word of Syriac origin, used only for idolatrous priests, occurring as the designation of the priests of the high places of the cities of Judah (2 Kings xxiii. 5), and in Zephaniah as that of idolatrous priests (i. 4). We have no means of forming any idea of the character of the temples attached to the high places, but it is evident that they must have been too numerous to have been large, except perhaps those at Dan and Bethel. Probably the high place had frequently nothing on its summit but an altar, and this would account for the difficulty of destroying this worship. So long as the site was considered sacred, it little mattered that a fresh altar was to be built. Josiah's way of dealing with this practice was evidently effectual.

ii. Groves.—'The Grove,' or 'the Groves,' as the word Asherah, אֲשֶׁרָה, and its plural are rendered in the A. V., are constantly mentioned with high places. At first sight the common LXX. rendering, followed by our version, seems to carry conviction with it, from the connection of high places with worship under the trees, and the prevalence of nature-worship in Palestine; but a closer examination shews that something of the character of an image must be intended. In a previous article [ASHTORETH] the reasons for this conclusion have been stated, and it has been proposed to adopt the theory which makes Asherah a name for Ashtoreth, as the goddess of good fortune, a sense of the former taken from the root אָשַׁר, 'he, or it, was straight, right,' and hence, 'fortunate.' It is especially noticed, in favour of this identification, that the grove, or groves, occur with Baal like Ashtoreth; that the LXX. renders asherah by Astarte in 2 Chron. xv. 16, as does the Vulg. in Judg. iii. 7, and conversely Ashtoreth by groves in 1 Sam. vii. 3. But it may be objected that it is very strange that two names should be applied to the same goddess in writings of the same age, and that she should be indiscriminately mentioned by her usual proper name and as a statue, for asherah, if a proper name, certainly would indicate a statue; that the root equally allows us to understand by asherah something upright, set up; and that isolated renderings of the LXX. and Vulg. may merely indicate errors of copyists. Supposing that the radical meaning indicates something upright or set up, which seems always, be it recollected, to have been made of wood, do we find anything in ancient idolatry to warrant the translation 'grove'? It must be remembered that the grove is constantly connected with Baal. On the ancient Egyptian monuments, the figure of Khem, the god of productiveness, is constantly accompanied by the representation of one or more trees or plants. In the plates of Sir Gardner Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians we observe the following variations in these objects. A shrine, from which rises a double flower like two blossoms of the lotus, behind Khem (here as AMEN-RA KA-MUT-EF, 'Amen-ra, who is male and female,' pl. 22); a shrine, from which rise a flower and two trees, behind Khem (pl. 26); a great nosegay in effigy, carried before, and another, behind an image of Khem; behind the same image, a sacred chest adorned with rosettes, upon which are five representations of trees; and behind an image of Khem, a flower and two other objects (pl. 76). It is quite evident that all these trees and flowers are imitations, on account of their dimensions, and, in some cases, the manner in which they are attached to shrines or the like. From their forms and size, compared, in the latter particular, with their being portable, it is equally certain that they must have been generally, if not always, of wood. It is not necessary to prove how completely they agree with the idolatrous objects rendered 'groves' in the A. V. Are we to suppose that the LXX. translators adopted the meaning in consequence of their observing objects in Egyptian idolatry which aptly corresponded, letting alone the signification 'grove' as probably not derivable from the Hebrew, to the idolatrous objects connected with the worship of Baal and Ashtoreth; and, further, that the groves of Egypt and Palestine were identical? The former question seems easily answered affirmatively, the latter suggests several curious inquiries. We have to determine how far Baal and Ashtoreth were identical with Khem, whether the worship of groves is to be traced to Egypt, and what is the etymology of the name asherah. Khem is the Egyptian personification of the productiveness of nature; hence the connection of these vegetable objects with his worship is easily understood. Baal is sometimes connected with productiveness, and Ashtoreth has certainly this relation. Perhaps they may be reasonably supposed to represent the two ideas that are expressed in the title of Khem, 'who is male and female.' But it is to be observed that the name of Baal is found on the Egyptian monuments as equivalent to that of Set or Sutekh, the personification of physical evil. The idea conveyed by the latter is so opposed to that of Baal that we may reasonably conjecture that the identification was founded upon something different from a comparison of the supposed characteristics of these idols. It seems reasonable to trace it to some such idea as that the personification of physical evil would be the protector of the warlike enemies of Egypt. Khem, if the name be correctly read, was probably introduced from the East, and perhaps from Palestine. Ashtoreth, like Baal, is mentioned on the Egyptian monuments. She is worshipped as a foreign divinity, and is connected with Set (Chabas, Papyrus Magique Hariri, pp. 55, seqq.) The worship of groves may have been common from a remote period to Egypt and Palestine, or it may have been derived from Egypt. This question depends for its resolution very much upon the degree of completeness which the worship of Khem may be supposed to have attained at the time of its first introduction into Egypt, if introduced into that country. With reference to the etymology of asherah, we find no reason for considering it anything but Hebrew, nor have we any ground for supposing it to have been adopted from the resemblance of a Hebrew to an Egyptian word.—The question of the connection of the Israelite groves and the like Egyptian objects with primitive low nature-worship will be considered in the article IDOLATRY.—R. HILALI, or HELALI CODEX (הִלְאִי), one of the most ancient and most celebrated codices of the Hebrew Scriptures, which derived its name from the fact that it was written at Hilla

(הִלְאִי; Arab. حلي), a town built near the ruins of ancient Babel. Others, however, maintain that it was called Hilali because the name of the man who wrote it was Hilal. But whatever uncertainty there may be about the derivation of its name, there can hardly be any doubt that it was written A.D. 600, for Sakkuto tells us most distinctly that when he saw the remainder of it (circa 1500), the Codex was 900 years old. His words are—'In the year 4956, on the 28th of Ab (1196, better 1197), there was a great persecution of the Jews in the kingdom of Leon from the two kingdoms that came to besiege it. It was there that the twenty-four sacred books which were written long ago, about the year 600, by R. Moses b. Hillel (on which account the Codex was called Hilali), in an exceedingly correct manner, and after which all the copies were corrected, were taken away. I saw the remaining two portions of it—viz., the earlier and later prophets—written in large and beautiful characters, which were brought to Portugal and sold in Africa, where they still are, having been written 900 years ago. Kimchi, in his Grammar on Num. xv. 4, says that the Pentateuch of this Codex was extant in Toleti' (Guchassin ed. Filipowski, London 1857, p. 220). The Codex had the Tiberian vowels and accents, Massora and Nikud glosses, and it served up to A.D. 1500 as a model from which copies were made. This Codex which Haja had in Babylon about A.D. 1000, was conveyed to Leon in Spain, where the greater part of it became a prey to the fury of the martial hosts who sacked the Jewish dwellings in 1197. The celebrated grammarian, Jacob b. Eleazar, fixed the renderings of the Biblical text according to this Codex [JACOB B. ELEAZAR], and the older philologists frequently quote it. Comp. HILARIUS, a native of Poitiers, was bishop of that see in the middle of the 4th century, and a zealous opponent of the Arian party. He became bishop in 350, and died 13th January 368. Of his numerous works two are of an exegetical character, his Commentationes in Evangelium Matthæi, and his Commentarii in Psalmos. He displays little exegetical ability and no learning; his strength as a writer lying chiefly in his polemical abilities. The best edition of his works is that edited by Maffei, from the Benedictine edition, 2 vols fol., Verona 1730.—W. L. A.

HILARIUS, surnamed DIACONUS, was a native of Sardinia, and a deacon of the church at Rome. He flourished in the middle of the 4th century. To him are ascribed the *Questiones in Vet. et Nov. HILKIAH (הִלְקִיָּהּ), more fully הִלְקִיָּהוּ, HILKIAHU, Sept. Χελκίας). Of the seven persons bearing this name in the Bible, the most important is the high-priest in the reign of Joash (2 Kings xxii. 4, ff.; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 9, ff.). He was the son of Shallum (1 Chron. vi. 13); and Ezra, the scribe, was his great-grandson (Ezra vii. 1). He took a prominent part in the reforms effected by king Josiah, and is especially remarkable for the discovery which he made in the house of the Lord of a book which is called 'The Book of the Law' (2 Kings xxii. 8), and 'The Book of the Covenant' (xxiii. 2). That this was some well-known book is evident from the form of the expression; but as to what it was opinions are divided. That it was the writing of Moses is expressly stated (2 Chron. xxxiv. 14); that it was the entire Pentateuch is the opinion of Josephus, von Lengerke, Keil, Ewald, Hävernick, etc.; but others think it was only part of that collection, and others, that it was simply a collection of laws and ordinances appointed by Moses, such as are given in the Pentateuch, and especially in Deuteronomy. The objection to its being the whole Pentateuch is the improbability of that being read in the audience of the people at one time, as was this book (xxiii. 2); and there are many circumstances which render it probable that what was read to the people was the book of Deuteronomy, as, ex. gr., the apparent allusion to Deut. xxix. 1 and xxx. 2 in ch. xxii. 2, 3, and the special effect which the reading of the book had on the king, who did, in consequence, just what one impressed by such passages as occur in Deut. xvi. 18, etc., would be likely to do. At the same time, even if we admit that the part actually read consisted only of the summary of laws and institutions in Deuteronomy, it will not follow that that was the only part of the Pentateuch found by Hilkiah; for, as the matter brought before his mind by Huldah, the prophetess (2 Kings xxii. 15, ff.), respected the restoration of the worship of Jehovah, it might be only to what bore on that that the reading specially referred. The probability is that the book found by Hilkiah was the same which was entrusted to the care of the priests, and was to be put in the side of the ark (Deut. xxxi. 9-26); and that this was the entire body of the Mosaic writing, and not any part of it, seems the only tenable conclusion (Hengstenberg, Beiträge ii. 159, ff.).—W. HILLEL I., HA-SAKEN (הִלְלֵי), or the GREAT B. SIMON. This extraordinary Rabbi, the second Ezra, or the restorer of the Law, as he is called (Succa, 20, a), under whose presidency Christ was born, and who, by his self-denying and holy life, as well as by his great wisdom and learning, exercised so remarkable an influence both upon the theology and literature of the Jewish nation, and prepared the way for the advent of the Saviour, was born in Babylon about 75 B.C., of the royal family of David. He settled in Jerusalem about 36 B.C., where, notwithstanding his renowned lineage, he had to support himself by the labour of his hands, and attended at the same time the lectures of Shemaja and Abtalion, who were the heads of the Sanhedrim [EDUCATION]. So great was his thirst after knowledge that he gave daily half of his scanty earnings to the doorkeeper of the college in order to be admitted to the lectures, and when the janitor would not admit him one day because he had no money to pay, this zealous scholar, rather than lose the day's instruction, climbed up to the window, and there sat outside on a bitterly cold winter's day, attentively listening till he was completely covered with snow and rendered insensible by the cold. When he was discovered, though it was on the Sabbath, the students disregarding the sanctity of the day, procured the necessary remedies, and to their joy restored him to life, and from that day looked up to him as their future guide (Joma, 35, b). He succeeded to the presidency of the Sanhedrim about 30 B.C. His zeal for the Law of God, and his modest honesty, would not, however, allow him to be seated on the presidential throne without plainly telling the spiritual guides of Jerusalem that it was their negligence in studying the Law which necessitated them to elect him. 'What,' said he to them, in godly sincerity, 'has led to it that I, insignificant Babylonian, must become president of the Sanhedrim? Your negligence in attending to the teaching of Shemaja and Abtalion' (Sabbath, 15, a; Pesachim, 66, b). He had no less than 1000 pupils, 80 of whom had more especially distinguished themselves—Jonathan ben Uziel, the translator of the prophets into Chaldee, being the chief, and Jochanan b. Zakkai the least amongst them (Succa, 28, a; Baba Bathra, 134, a). As most of these disciples became the spiritual guides of the nation at the advent of Christ, it is most important to give some of the lessons which they were taught by their great master Hillel, and which they again imparted to the people, in order to see how far these lessons agree with those of the Saviour, and how they prepared the minds of the people to receive the teachings of the Gospel. His cardinal doctrine and aim of life were 'to be gentle, shewing all meekness to all men,' and 'when reviled not revile again;' and of this he gave a signal illustration on one occasion when one laid a wager that he would provoke the Rabbi to anger. He went to Hillel and teased him with a number of foolish questions, and seeing that he bore it meekly and patiently, the man began to insult him, but Hillel answered him with uniform kindness, mildness, and forbearance, and uttered not an angry word in reply to the insulting language (comp. Sabbath, 30 a, 31 b, with Titus iii. 2; 1 Pet. ii. 20-23; iii. 9). A heathen appealed to him to tell him one sentence which embodies the whole Law, to which Hillel replied, 'Whosoever thou wouldst not that a man should do to thee do not thou to him: this is the whole law' (comp. Sabbath, 31, a, with Matt. vii. 12; Mark vi. 31). Let a few more of his maxims suffice: 'Say not I will repent when I have leisure, lest the leisure should never be thine.' 'If I do not care for my soul, who can do it for me? If I only care for my own soul, what am I? If not now, when then?' (comp. Aboth. i. 14; Sab. iii. 13, with James iv. 13, 14). 'Do not separate thyself from the congregation, and have no confidence in thyself till the day of death' (comp. Aboth. ii. 4, with 1 Cor. x. 12). 'Judge not thy neighbour till thou art in his situation' (Aboth. ii. 4, with Gal. vi. 1-4). 'Be of the disciples of Aaron, love peace and pursue it, be kindly affectioned to all men, and thus commend the law of God' (Aboth. i. 12, with Rom. xiii. 10). 'Whosoever shall exalt his name, shall abase it; whosoever does not strive to the knowledge of the law is not worthy of life; whosoever does not increase his knowledge decreases it; whosoever turns the crown of knowledge into filthy lucre shall perish' (Aboth. i. 13, with Matt. xxiii. 12).

Hillel was the first who laid down definite hermeneutical rules for the interpretation of the Bible. Just as at the commencement of the Reformation England was distracted by the vacillation of Henry VIII., who one day became a defender of the Roman Catholic faith and another day espoused the cause of Protestantism; by the alternate powers of More, Fisher, and Gardiner, and Cromwell, and Cranmer; by Mary, who succeeded to the throne, and then again the good Protestant Edward VI. who followed her; so Judæa was perplexed by the Sadducean and Pharisean princes who alternately followed each other; Alexander Janai, a Sadducee, was succeeded by Queen Salome, whose sympathies were with the Pharisees, she again was succeeded by Aristobulus II., a Sadducee; and he again was followed by his brother Hyrcanus II., who favoured the Pharisees. Now Hillel tried to reconcile these opposite parties. He endeavoured to shew the Sadducees, who rejected every law which was not expressly laid down in the word of God, that the traditional law naturally flows from the written law, through the medium of the following seven rules of interpretation (זו מדרת).

1. Inference from minor to the major (קל וחומר), e.g., Exod. xxii. 13, does not say whether the borrower of a thing is responsible for theft. In ver. 9-11, however, it is declared that the depositary who can free himself from making restitution in cases of death or accident, must make restitution when the animal is stolen; whilst in ver. 13, the borrower is even obliged to make restitution in cases of death or accident. Hence the inference made from the minor (i.e., the depositary) to the major (i.e., the borrower) that he (in xxii. 13) is all the more responsible for theft (Baba Mezia, 95, a). This exegetical law is employed by Christ and the apostles (comp. Matt. vii. 11; x. 29-31; Rom. v. 8; viii. 32-34; Heb. iii. 3).

2. The analogy of ideas (שוה), or analogous inferences. This rule was employed by Hillel himself on a very extraordinary occasion. In his days the evening of the Passover (ערב פסח) happened to fall on a Sabbath, which is of very rare occurrence, and the question was hotly contested, whether or not the Paschal lamb might be slain on the Sabbath. Hillel said that it may be slain, and argued it thus:—It is said respecting the daily sacrifice, 'to offer it (במזמרה) in its time' (Num. xxviii. 2); and it also said, respecting the Paschal lamb, 'let the children of Israel keep it (במזמרה) in its time' (ibid. ix. 2). Now, with regard to the daily sacrifice, it is distinctly ordered that it should be offered on the Sabbath (ibid. xxviii. 9); the expression in its time does not, therefore, denote the day, but that the offering is to be observed at the appointed time; and as the expression is also used of the Passover lamb, hence it must be offered irrespective of the day, and, therefore, also irrespective of the Sabbath (comp. Jerusalem Pesachim, 66, a; Pesachim, vi. 1; Tosifta Pesachim, cap. iv.)

3. Analogy of two objects in one verse (בְּכֵן אֶבֶן). Thus Lev. xv. 4 mentions two objects, viz., the bed and the chair (מִשְׁכָּב וּמוֹשָׁב), which, though belonging to two different classes, have the common quality of serving for repose. And as these are declared to be unclean when touched by him who has an issue, and to have the power of defiling both men and garments through contact, it is inferred that all things which serve for resting may be rendered unclean by him who has an issue and then defile both men and garments.

4. Analogy of two objects in two verses (בְּכֵן אֶבֶן). (מִשְׁנֵי כְּתוּבִים), e.g., though the command to light the lamps in the sanctuary (נֵרוֹת, Lev. xxiv. 4) is different from the command 'to put out of the camp every leper'

(וְשָׁלַח מִן הַמַּחֲנֶה כָּל טָמֵא), Num. v. 2), inasmuch as in the former case the injunction is described as binding for ever or for all times (Levit. xxiv. 3), whilst in the latter the speedy carrying out of it is especially spoken of (Num. v. 4); yet because they have that in common that they are both alike commands, and that the word צִוְּ, command, is used with regard to both of them, hence it is concluded that every law with regard to which the expression צִוְּ, command, is used, must at once and for ever be obeyed.

5. General and special (כָּלל וּפְרָט). Thus, wherever a special statement follows a general one, the definition of the special is to be applied to the general one, because it is always the only valid meaning, e.g., it is said in Lev. i. 2, 'if any man of you bring an offering to the Lord, from cattle, from oxen, and from sheep.' Here cattle is a general expression, and may denote different kinds of animals. Oxen and sheep is the special whereby the general is defined, and therewith it is rendered co-extensive. Hence it is inferred that only oxen and small cattle may be brought as sacrifices but not beasts.

6. Analogy of another passage (כִּינָא בִּזְמָנִים). This is an extension of rules 3 and 4.

7. The connection (דְּרַבִּי הַלֹּמֵד מֵעֵינַי). Thus the prohibition, 'ye shall not steal,' in Lev. xix. 11, is explained to refer to stealing money and not human beings (comp. Exod. xxii. 16), because the whole connection treats upon money matters (comp. Sanhedr. 86).

These hermeneutical rules which are most important to the understanding of the ancient versions [MIDRASH] were afterwards extended by R. Ishmael and others [ISHMAEL]. Hillel also simplified the accumulated mass of the traditional explanations of the Pentateuch which had been divided into six or seven hundred sections (Chagiga 24; Succa xi.), by classifying its materials under six Sedarim (סִדְרִים) or Orders—the basis of the present arrangement of the Mishna. Hillel's liberality of mind did not suit his colleague, the rigid Shammai: the latter therefore founded a separate school, of which he became the head. The one is well known as the school of Hillel, and the other as the school of Shammai. After occupying the presidential throne for about forty years, the learned, godly, humane, meek, self-denying Hillel died when Jesus of Nazareth, the Redeemer of the world, was about ten years old. The presidency became hereditary in Hillel's family for fifteen generations [EDUCATION].

HILLEL II., b. JEHUDAH III.,* succeeded to the presidential throne about 330, which he occupied about thirty-five years. He immortalized his name by the introduction of the calendar, which is followed by the Jews to the present day. Up to his time the beginning of the month was fixed in Palestine upon the testimony of two witnesses, who appeared before the Sanhedrim, and declared that they had seen the new moon. The new month was then proclaimed and celebrated, which was called קִדְּשׁ הַחֹדֶשׁ עַל פִּי הָרִאיוֹנִים, and the festivals which happened to occur during the month were fixed. As all the Jews who lived away from Jerusalem depended upon the authorities in the metropolis for their information about the time when the new moon began, it was arranged that if it be fixed that the closing month should have twenty-nine days, torches would be lighted on the mountain near Jerusalem, and thus, as if by telegraph, communicate the light, and with it the information from mountain to mountain throughout the land and beyond Judæa. If these lights did not appear, it was understood that the new month begins on thirty-first of the closing month, so that the last month had thirty days (מָלֵא, מַעֲוֵבָה), and the festivals which happened to occur during the new month were arranged accordingly. When, however, the Samaritans out of spite kindled torches at improper times, and thereby led the Jews at a distance to begin their festivals at an improper time, the authorities in Jerusalem discarded the lights, and resolved henceforth to communicate the information through authorised messengers. But this, too, was attended with difficulties, as the messengers could not reach on the same day the places which were at a distance from Jerusalem, and hence led to the institution that those Jews who lived out of Palestine were to double the festival days, because they could not know at once whether the closing month was to have twenty-nine days or thirty [FESTIVALS]. Now Hillel, by the introduction of his calendar, rendered the Jews, dispersed through so many lands, independent of all such decisions. The calculations of his calendar are so simple and certain, that they, with a little improvement, are adopted by the Jews to the present day. According to this calendar, the difference between the solar and lunar year, upon which the cycle of the Jewish festivals depends, is yearly made up; the length of the month is made to approximate to the astronomical course of the moon; and attention is also paid in it to the Halachic matters connected with the Jewish festivals. It is based upon the cycle of nineteen years (מַחְזֹר הַלְבָנָה), introduced by the Greek astronomer Meton, in which occur seven intercalary years. Each year has ten unchangeable months of alternately twenty-nine and
